⁴⁶ The words τοῦ χαίρειν are evidently an explanation of τοῦρου: or else we must read with one MS. τοῦ, χαίρε, as just above, ἀντι τοῦ, χαίρε.

⁴⁷ I cannot understand ὡς διανοούμενος ἀνέθηκεν ὁ ἀναθεῖς. I could have understood ὡς διανοούμενος ἦν ὁ ἀναθεῖς. Ficinus has "ut sensit ille, qui inscripsit."

⁴⁸ Ficinus has "ut literæ testantur, egoque interpretor," which is evidently more elegant.

^{49, 50} The authors of these apophthegms respectively are not known for certain. See Menage on Diogen. Laert. i. 41.

thought that "Know thyself" was a bit of advice, and not an address from the god for the sake of the comers; and then, that they might put up bits of advice not less useful, they put up these inscriptions. Now the reason, Socrates, for the sake of which I am saying all these things, is this—(that) I give up to you all that has been said before; for perhaps you have spoken more correctly about them; and perhaps, too, I; and there is, of what we have said, nothing very clear. But now I am willing to give you the reason for this, if you do not concede, that temperance is to know oneself. [28.] But, Critias, said I, you come against me, as if I asserted that I had a knowledge of what I am asking about,⁵¹ and if I wish, having agreed with you.⁵¹ But this is not the case. For I am seeking with you continually what is placed before us, through being myself ignorant. Hence, after having considered, I am willing to say whether I agree or not. But do you stop, till I have considered.—Consider then, said he.—I do consider, said I.—For if to know a thing is temperance, it is evident that temperance would be some science, and of some thing. Or would it not?—⁵²It is, he replied, and of itself.⁵²—Is not then medical science, said I, the science of that which is healthy?—Entirely so.—If then, said I, you should ask me, for what is the medical science of that, which is healthy, useful to us, and what does it effect, I should reply, that it is of no small utility, because it effects for us health, a beautiful work. Do you admit this?—I do admit it.—And if then you should ask me, what work does house-building, which is the science of house-building, effect, I should say, dwellings; and (I should reply) in a similar manner with respect to other arts. [29.] Since then, Critias, you say that temperance is the science of itself, you must, when asked, be able to tell in behalf of temperance, what beautiful work does temperance, being the science of itself, effect, and which deserves to be mentioned. Come then, tell me.—Nay but, Socrates, said he, you do not make the inquiry correctly. For temperance is not naturally similar to the other sciences, nor are the other sciences similar, some to some, and others to others. But you make your inquiry, as if they were similar. For tell me, said he, what work is there in the calculating or geometric art, which is of the like nature with a dwelling, the work of the house-building art? or with that of a garment, the work of the weaving art? and in other works of such a kind, many of which any one would be able to show, as belonging to many arts? Can you in these show me any such work? You will not be able.—You speak the truth, said I. But this I can show, of what thing each of these sciences is the science, and which is something different from the science itself. Thus, for instance; the calculating science is the science of the even and the odd, how they are situated as regards multitude, with respect to themselves and to each other. Is it not?—Entirely so, he replied.—Are not, therefore, the even and the odd different from the calculating science?—How not?—Moreover, the weighing science is that relating to a heavier and lighter weight; now the heavy and the light are different from the weighing science itself. Do you agree to this?—I do.—[30.] Tell me then, of what is temperance the science, and which is different from temperance itself?—This is that very thing, Socrates, said he, to which⁵³ you have arrived by seeking in what point does temperance differ from all (the other)⁵⁴ sciences: but you are seeking after some similitude in it to other sciences. This, however, is not the case. For all the other sciences are sciences of another thing, but not of themselves; but this alone is both the science of other sciences and of itself likewise. And these things ought to be far from lying hid from you.

⁵¹⁻⁵² The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, who perceived, no doubt, that they were unintelligible. The Greek is, καὶ, ἴαν δὴ βούλωμαι, ὁμολογήσαντος σοί—But the idea of the future in ἴαν βούλωμαι is at variance with the idea of the past in ὁμολογήσαντος. Ficinus has "offersque mihi te, si voluero, concessurum," as if he had found in his MS. ὁμολογήσοντα σὲ δίδως. But that Critias was certainly not likely to do. Heusde suggested ὁμολογήσοντος σοί, which Stalbaum is disposed to adopt. But the consent of Socrates, to be of any value, ought to be the result of his reason, not of his will. Instead then of δὴ, which has no meaning here, I would read μή—i. e. "and even if I do not wish it"—and, with Heusde, ὁμολογήσοντος σοί—"about to agree with you."

⁵⁴ Ficinus alone has "omnibus aliis;" in Greek πασῶν τῶν ἄλλων.

But I think you are doing the very thing, which you just now said you were not doing: for you are attempting to confute me, after leaving alone that, about which is our discourse.—What are you doing, said I, by your thinking that if I should confute you as much as possible, I should do it on any other account, than for the sake of thoroughly searching out what I mean myself; as I am fearful lest, whilst I think I know something, I am unconsciously knowing nothing? And now I say I am doing this, while considering the argument, principally indeed for my own sake, but perhaps also for the sake of the rest of our friends. Or do you not think it is a good, common for nearly all men, that each thing should become apparent in what state it is?—Very much so, Socrates, said he.—[31.] Boldly then, said I, O give, thou blessed man, an answer when asked, how the matter appears to you, and leave, whether it is Critias or Socrates who is confuted, to go hang;⁵⁵ but giving your attention to the reasoning itself, consider whither it will go, when confuted.—I shall do so, he replied: for you appear to me to speak with moderation.—Tell me then, said I, what do you mean on the question of temperance?—I mean then, he replied, that this alone, of all other sciences, is both the science of itself and of the other sciences. Will it then, said I, be the science of ignorance, since it is of science?—Entirely so.—The temperate man therefore alone will know himself, and be able to examine what it is he happens to know, and what he does not; and in like manner he will be able to look into the rest of things, what it is that a person knows, and thinks (he knows),⁵⁶ if indeed he knows,⁵⁶ and what on the other hand he thinks he knows, but does not know; but no other person (will be able).⁵⁷ And this then is to be temperate; and it is temperance, and the knowledge of oneself, to know what one knows, and what one does not know. Are these the things you assert?—They are, he replied.—[32.]

⁵⁶ These words, simple as they are, I confess I hardly understand. The very balance of the sentences proves that they are not in their place.

Again then, said I, let us consider the third point⁵⁸ from the beginning, as if it were (the cup) to the saviour deity. In the first place, whether it is possible or not to know, with respect to what a person knows, and does not know, that he does know, and does not know; and, in the next place, if this be ever so completely possible, what will be the utility of it, to us, who know it.—It is requisite, said he, to consider this.—Come then, Critias, said I, and consider whether you are more able to find a way on these points than myself. For I am in doubt, and where I am in doubt I will tell you.—By all means, said he.—⁵⁹ The following consequence then will ensue,⁵⁹ I replied, if there be, what you just now asserted, some one science, which is the science of nothing else than itself and the rest of the sciences, and of ignorance besides.—Entirely so.—See then, my friend, how absurdly we have endeavoured to argue. For if you consider this very same thing in other matters, it will, I think, appear to you to be impossible.—[33.] How and where?—In these. For consider, whether it appears to you that a seeing power exists, which is not the seeing power of those things, which are the objects of the rest of seeing powers, but is the seeing power of itself and the rest of seeing powers, and similarly of not seeing powers; and though it is a seeing power, it does not see any colour, but (sees) itself and the rest of the seeing powers. Does it appear to you that there is such a seeing power as this?—By Zeus, it does not to me at least. What then (say you) to the hearing power, which does not hear any sound, but hears itself, and the rest of the hearing powers, and the non-hearing power besides?—Nor yet this.—To speak briefly then, consider with respect to all the senses, whether it appears to you that there is any sense, which perceives other senses and itself, but perceives none of those things which the other senses perceive.—

It does not appear to me at least.—But does it appear to you that there is any desire, which is the desire of no pleasure, but is the desire of itself and of the rest of desires?—It does not.—Nor, as I think, is there any will, which wills no good, but wills itself alone and the rest of wills.—There is not.—But would you say that there is a love of such a kind, as to be the love of nothing beautiful, but which is the love of itself and the rest of loves?—Not I, said he.—Have you ever conceived that there is any fear, which fears itself and the rest of fears, but fears nothing fearful?—I have not conceived, said he.—[34.] And (have you conceived) any fancy, which fancies fancies and itself, but which forms no fancy respecting those things, which are the subjects of the rest of fancies?—By no means.—But we say, as it seems, that there is a science of such a kind, as to be the science of no learning, but the science of itself and the rest of sciences.—We do say so.—⁶⁰ Would it not be strange⁶⁰ if there were (such a science)? For let us not strenuously assert that there is not, but consider if there be.—Right.—Come then, there is this science, the science of something; and it does possess some such power, as to be the science of something. Is it so?—Entirely so.—For we also say that the greater possesses some such power, as to be greater than something?—It does so possess.—Is it not then greater than something less, if it is (greater)?—Of necessity.—If therefore we should find something greater, which is greater than the greater and than itself, but which is not greater than any of those things than which the rest of things are greater, it would surely be in this situation, that if it is greater than itself, it would be also less than itself?—Of this there is, Socrates, a great necessity, said he.—[35.] If therefore there is any thing which is the double of the rest of doubles and of itself, it will be the double of the rest of doubles and of itself, in consequence of its being the half; for nothing can be the double of any thing else than of the half.—True.—But being more than itself, will it not also be less than itself? and being heavier, be lighter than itself? and being older, be younger than itself? and similarly as regards all other properties? For whatever has a power of its own with respect to itself, will it not possess likewise that existence, to which that power is related? I mean some such thing as this. For instance, we say that hearing is nothing else than a hearing of sound.—Is it not so?—Yes.—If therefore it could hear itself, would it not hear itself, as having a voice? For otherwise it would not hear.—This is perfectly necessary.—The sight too, thou best of men, if it could itself see itself, must necessarily have some colour. For sight would never be able to see any thing colourless.—It would not.—You see therefore, Critias, that the matters we have gone through, appear to us to be, some of them, altogether impossible; and of others it is greatly disbelieved that they could have a power of their own with respect to themselves. For as regards magnitudes, multitudes, and things of this kind, it is perfectly impossible. Or is it not?—Entirely so.—[36. Again,⁶¹ [that hearing (hears itself), and sight (sees itself), and]⁶¹ that motion moves itself, and heat burns (itself), and all other such like assertions, would bring disbelief to some, but to some perhaps not. There is then, my friend, a need of some great man to draw sufficiently a distinction through all things on this point, whether of existing things not one [except science]⁶² has naturally a power of its own with respect to itself, but with respect to another thing, or that some have, and some not: and again, if there are certain things, which (have a power) with respect to themselves, whether amongst these is the science, which we say is temperance. For I do not believe myself to be sufficient to draw such a distinction. Hence I am not able to affirm positively, whether it is possible for this to take place, that there is a science, of science; nor, if there is, will I admit that temperance is that science, until I have considered whether, being such, it would be useful to us, or not. For I divine that temperance is something useful and good. Do you then, son of Callæschrus,—since you lay down that temperance is this science of a science, and likewise of a not-science,—show in the first place this; that what I have just now mentioned [it] is possible⁶³ [for you to show];⁶³ and in the next place, in addition to its being possible, show that it is ⁶¹—⁶¹ The words within brackets are evidently an interpolation. For the question relating to hearing and sight has been already discussed.

⁶³—⁶³ Ficinus has—"Ostende primum possibile hoc esse, quod supra useful; and thus perhaps you will satisfy me that you are correctly speaking about temperance, what it is.—[37.] On Critias hearing this, and seeing that I was in doubt, he did, as they do, who, through looking in the face of those, who are gaping, are affected in the very same way; and he seemed to me to be compelled by my doubting to be seized with a doubt himself. However, being in great repute on every occasion, he felt a shame before those who were present; and was neither willing to concede that he was unable to draw the distinction on points that I had proposed to him, nor did he say any thing clearly, but concealed his perplexity. But, said I,—in order that the discourse might proceed—if it seems good to you, Critias, let us now concede this, that it is possible for a science of a science to exist. But let us consider again whether it is or not in this way. Come then, if it is in the highest degree possible, in what way is it the more possible to know what a person does know, and what he does not? For we surely said that this is to know oneself, and to be temperate. Or did we not?—[38.] Entirely so, he replied; and this happens in a certain respect to be the case, Socrates. For if any one possesses the science, which knows itself, he will be such as that is which he possesses. Just as when any one possesses swiftness, he is swift; and when beauty, is beautiful; and when knowledge, is knowing. So too when any one possesses the knowledge, that knows itself, he will surely then become knowing himself.—To this I replied, I do not doubt that when any one possesses that, which knows itself, he will be then knowing himself; but, what necessity is there for the person who possesses this knowledge, to know what he knows, and what he does not know?—Because, Socrates, this⁶⁴ is the same with that.—Perhaps so, I replied; but I am near to being always similar (to myself).⁶⁵ For I do not well⁶⁶ understand⁶⁷ how it is the same thing for a person to know, what he dicebam;” whence Heindorf was led to reject ἀποδείξαι σε, whom Bekker and Stalbaum have followed. The fact is that ἀποδείξαι is a various reading for ἐνδείξαι.

⁶⁴ Instead of τὸ αὐτὸ, Cornarius proposed τοῦτο, from Ficinus’ “hoc.”

⁶⁵ After ὁμοιος Heindorf supplies ἐμavτῷ. He should have read αἰ ἐμοὶ ὁμοιος; and in Sympos. p. 173, D. § 2, ‘Αἰ ὁμοιος σοι, ὡς Ἀπολλόδωρ’, εἰ, similar to “dispar sibi” in Horace; as I ought to have mentioned on that passage.

⁶⁶ In lieu of αὖ Plato evidently wrote εἴ—knows, and to know what he does not know.⁶⁷—How do you mean? said he.—Thus, I replied. Since there is a science of science, will it be able to draw a distinction more than this; that of these things this is a science, and that is ignorance?—It will not; but thus far alone.—Is the science, then, and ignorance of that, which is healthful, the same with the science and ignorance of that, which is just?—By no means; but the one is, I think, a medical, and the other a political science; but this is nothing else than a science.—How not?—[39.] He therefore who does not know the healthy and the just, but knows only a science, as alone possessing a science of this, that he knows something, and that he possesses a certain science, would probably have a knowledge respecting both himself and the other things. Is it not so?—Yes.—But how will he by this science know what he knows? For he knows the healthful by medical science, and not by temperance; and the harmonical by musical science, and not by temperance; and house-building by house-building science, and not by temperance; and so in every thing else. Is it not so?—So it appears.—But how by temperance, if it is only a science of sciences, will he know that it knows the salubrious, or house-building?—By no means.—The person then ignorant of this will not know what he knows, but only that he knows.—So it seems.—To know then what he knows and what he does not know, will not be to be temperate, nor will it be temperance, but, as it seems, only that he knows, and that he does not know.—It nearly appears so.—Nor will this person be able to examine another, who professes to know something, whether he knows, or does not, what he says he knows; but as it seems he will only know thus much, that he possesses a certain science, but of what thing, temperance will not cause him to know.—It does not appear it will.—[40.] Neither then will he be able to distinguish one who pretends to be a physician, but is not, from one who is a true physician; nor any one else of those who are skilled or who are not. But let us view it from these points. If a temperate man, or any other person, intends to distinguish the true and false physician, will he not act in this way? He will not discourse with him respecting the medical science; for, as we have said, a physician attends to nothing but the healthy and the diseased,⁶⁸ (the salubrious and the noxious).⁶⁸ Is it not so?—It is.—But of science he knows nothing; for this we have attributed to temperance alone.—Yes.—The physician therefore will not know any thing of the medical art, since the medical art is a science.—True.—And the temperate man will know, that the physician possesses a certain science; ⁶⁹but some one else will look into the science of the physician, what it is, and of what things; which is then laid open, when it is known of what things it is the science.⁶⁹ Or is not each science defined by this, by not only being a science, but by being what, and of what things?—Yes.—And the medical science has been defined to be different from the rest of sciences by its being the science of the healthy and diseased.—It is.—[41.] Is it not therefore necessary, for the person wishing to consider the medical science, to view it in the things in which it is? For it is surely not (to be considered)⁷⁰ in things external, in which it is not.—Certainly not.—He therefore who considers rightly, will consider a physician, so far as he is a physician, in things healthy and diseased.—So it seems.—In what is thus⁷¹ either said or done, he (will be) considering whether what is said is said truly, and what is done is done correctly?—It is neces-

⁶⁸⁻⁶⁹ The words within numerals have been preserved by Ficinus alone in his version, "salubreque et noxium."

⁷¹ Heindorf, justly objecting to τοῖς οὕτως, properly suggested τοῖς τοιούτοις, i. e. "in things of this kind."

sary.—But could any one without medical science be able to follow either method?—Certainly not.—Nor yet can any other person, as it seems, but the physician, nor truly⁷³ the temperate man. For he would be a physician in addition to temperance.⁷³—So it is.—More than all, if temperance is merely the science of a science, and of ignorance, it will be able to distinguish neither the physician, who knows his art, nor him, who does not; the person who pretends to be, and him, who thinks he is (a physician); nor any other person, who knows any thing whatever, except a fellow-artist, as is the case with other operatives.—It appears so, said he.—[42.] What utility then, Critias, shall we derive from temperance, if it is of such a kind? For if, as we laid down at the beginning, the temperate man knew what he knew and what he did not know—the former because he knows, and the latter because he does not know—and if he were able to consider respecting another person affected in the very same manner, there would, we assert, be some vast utility to us in being temperate. For both we, who possess temperance, and all the rest that were governed by us, would have passed through life without fault; for we should neither ourselves have endeavoured to do any thing, which we did not know, but finding out those who did know, we should have handed over those things to them; nor should we have permitted to the rest of those, whom we commanded, to do any thing else than what by doing they would do well; now this would be that, of which they possessed a knowledge. And thus a family governed by temperance, would be about to be well governed, and a state (correctly) administered, and every thing else, over which temperance rules. For error being taken away, and rectitude being the leader in every action, it is necessary for the persons thus situated to act honourably and well, and for those who act well, to be happy. [43.] Were we not, Critias, speaking⁷⁴ in this manner about temperance, saying how great a good it is to know what one does know, and what one does not know?—Entirely so, he replied.—But now, said I, you see that no such science has appeared to us any where.—I see it, he replied.—Has not therefore, said I, temperance, which we have now found to be that, which knows both science and ignorance, this good, that he who possesses it, will easily learn whatever else he may attempt to learn, and all things will appear in a clearer point of view to him, inasmuch as he is looking upon the science, which relates to each thing he may learn? And will he not examine other persons better respecting what he may learn? And must not they, who examine others without this, do it in a more weak and trifling manner? Are these, my friend, the things we enjoy through temperance? and do we look to something greater, and seek for it to be greater than it is?—Perhaps, said he, this would be the case.—Perhaps so, I replied; but perhaps too we have sought after nothing useful. [44.] And I conjecture so, because certain absurdities distinctly present themselves to me respecting temperance, if it be of such a nature. For let us see, if you please, admitting that it is possible for science to know,⁷⁵ and, what we laid down at the beginning, that temperance is to know what it does know, and what it does not know, let us not take this away, but concede it; and having conceded all these points, let us still better consider, if being such it will benefit us at all. For what we just now said, that temperance would, if it were of such a nature, be a great good, by regulating families and states, appears to me, Critias, to have been not correctly conceded.—How so, he replied.—Because, said I, we too easily conceded that it would be a great good to mankind, if each of us performed those things which we knew, and committed those, which we did not know, to persons who did know.—Did we not then, said he, rightly concede?—To me, I replied, we did not appear so.—You are speaking, Socrates, said he, really absurdly.—By the dog,⁷⁶ said I, so it appears to me. And just now, looking to these points, I said, that they seemed to me to be absurd, and that I was afraid we had not rightly considered them. [45.] For in reality, if temperance be ever so much of such a nature, it does not appear evident to me, what good it will effect for us.—How is this? said he; speak, that we may also know what you mean.—I fancy, I replied, that I am trifling; nevertheless it is necessary to consider that, which presents itself to our view, and not carelessly to pass it by, if any one takes the least thought of himself.—You speak well, said he.—Hear then, I replied, my dream, (no matter) whether it has passed through the gate of ⁷⁷horn or ivory.⁷⁷ For if temperance ruled us ever so much, would it not, being such as we have now defined it, be acted upon according to the sciences; and neither would he, who boasts to be a pilot when he is not, deceive us; nor would a physician, or a general of an army, or any other person, who pretends to know that, which he does not know, lie hid from us. But from this state of things something else would happen to us; for our bodies would be more healthy than at present, and we should be preserved, when in danger at sea and in war; and all our utensils and garments, and all our shoes, and all the necessaries (of life), all things else, would be made more scientifically through our employing true artists. [46.] And if you are willing, let us grant that prophecy is the science of that, which is to be; and that temperance, presiding over it, turns away the boastful diviners, but appoints over us the true prophets of things to come. Furnished then in this way, the human race would, I concede, act and live scientifically. For temperance being our guard, it would not permit ignorance to interfere and cooperate with us. But that, by acting scientifically, we should do well and be happy, this, friend Critias, I am not yet able to understand.—But, he replied, you will not however easily find any other method of doing well, if you despise the doing a thing scientifically.—Instruct me then still a little, said I, of what scientific doing are you speaking? Is it that of leather-cutting?—By Zeus, it is not.—Is it that of brass-work?—By no means.—But is it that of working in wool, or wood, or any such things?—It is not.—[47.] We do then, I replied, no longer persist in the assertion, that he is happy, who lives scientifically. For those artists, although living scientifically, are confessed by you to be not happy; ⁷⁸ but you seem to me to separate the happy man from them, when they possess a science of certain things.⁷⁸ And perhaps you call (happy) the diviner, whom I just now mentioned, who knows all that is to be. Do you mean this, or any other person?—Both this, said he, and another.—What other? I replied. You surely do not speak of the person, who knows, in addition to future events, every thing past and present, and is ignorant of nothing; for let us admit that there is such a man, you will not say, I think, that any one lives more scientifically than he at least does.—Certainly not.—But this also I desiderate—Which of the sciences makes him happy? Or do all the sciences equally produce this effect?—By no means equally, said he.—But which the most? Is it that, by which he knows some of things present, past, and to come? Is it that, by (which he knows) the science of back-gammon?⁷⁹—What back-gammon? he replied.—But is it that, by which (he knows) the calculating science?—By no means.—But is it that, by which (he knows) things healthful.—Rather so, said he?—[48.] ⁸⁰ But is it, said I, that, of which I am speaking especially, by which (he knows) what?⁸⁰—By which (he knows) good and evil.—O thou vile man, I replied; ⁸¹ who for some while hast been drawing me round in a circle, concealing from me, that to live scientifically was not the causing,⁸¹ to do well and to be happy, nor belonging

⁷⁵ Heusde acutely saw that there was some error here; and by comparing p. 169, D. § 37, he wished to read γινίσθαι ἐπιστήμην ἐπιστήμης δυνατόν εἶναι. He ought rather to have suggested ἐπιστάσθαι τι δι' ἐπιστήμην ἐπιστήμης, i. e. "to know something through the science of a science."

⁷⁹ As in the game called παιρία, mention is made both of pebbles, or dice, and of lines, it was probably something like the modern back-gammon.

to all the other sciences, but to one (science) alone, relating to good and evil. Since,⁸³ Critias, if you were willing to take away this last science from the other sciences, the physician's science will no less cause one to be healthy; and that of the shoe-maker, to be shod; and that of the weaver, to be clad; and (no less) the pilot's science prevent one from losing one's life at sea, and the general's science in war?—No less, said he.—But, friend Critias, by this science being absent, it will be no longer left for each of those (other sciences) to turn out well and usefully.—You speak the truth.—But this science, as it seems, is not temperance, but that, the work of which is to benefit us: for it is not the science of sciences and ignorances, but that of good and evil. So that if this be useful, temperance would be something else than⁸³ useful.—[49.] What then, said he, would not temperance be useful? For if temperance is as much as possible a science of sciences, and presides over the other sciences, it will surely benefit us by ruling over that science which relates to the good.—But will temperance, I replied, cause us to be in health, and not the medical science? And will this perform the rest of the works of the arts, and not the rest, each its own work? Or did we not some time since testify that temperance is a science of science, and ignorance alone, but of nothing else? Is it not so?—So it appears.—It is not then the worker of health.—Clearly not.—For health is the work of another art. Is it not?—Of another.—Nor is it, my friend, of utility; for we attributed this very work to another art. Did we not?—Entirely so.—How then will temperance be beneficial, since it is the worker of no utility?—By no means, Socrates, as it seems.—Do you not see then, Critias, that I felt very properly some time since a fear, and justly blamed myself, because I could descry nothing useful about temperance? For that which is confessed to be the most beautiful of all things, would not have appeared to us to be useless, if there were any thing useful in myself towards making a search correctly. [50.] But now,⁸⁴ for we are vanquished on every side, and unable to discover for what purpose the name-

founder⁸⁵ assigned to temperance this very name. And yet we have conceded many things that did not result (correctly)⁸⁶ from the reasoning. For we conceded, that there is a science of sciences, although the reasoning neither permits nor asserts this; and on the other hand, we conceded that we know by this science the works of the other sciences—the reasoning permitting not even this—in order that the temperate man might be one, who has a knowledge of what he knows, because he knows, and of those which he does not know, because he does not know. This indeed we conceded very liberally, without ever considering that it is impossible for a person to know in any way whatever what he does not know at all. ⁸⁷ For our concession says that he knows those things, because he does not know them.⁸⁷ And yet as I think there is nothing which would appear more absurd than this. The inquiry however, having met with us so very easy tempered and by no means morose, is not a bit more able to discover the truth; but has rather laughed at it so much, that, what we formerly conceded to be temperance, and, after moulding it into some shape, laid it down to be, this it has very saucily shown to us as being of no use. [51.] On my own account then I am less indignant; but for your sake, Charmides, I am, said I, very indignant, if you, so beautiful in body, and most temperate to boot in mind; derive no advantage from this temperance, and if it does not by its presence bring to you any benefit during life. But I am still more indignant for the sake of the incantation, which I learned from the Thracian, if being a thing of no worth, I have learnt it with so much labour. I do not then⁸⁸ [very much then]⁸⁸ think that this is the case, but that I am a bad searcher; since (I consider) temperance to be a great good, and that, if you possess it, you are blessed indeed. But see whether you do possess it, and do not require at all the incantation. For if you do possess it, I would rather advise you to think me a trifler, and incompetent to search out any thing whatever by a course of reasoning, and yourself so much the happier, as you are the more temperate.—But by Zeus, Socrates, said Charmides, I do not know whether I possess it, or not. For how can I know that, which not even you can discover what it is, as you say yourself? I am not however much persuaded by you; and I consider myself, Socrates, to be greatly in want of the incantation; and no business of mine hinders me from being daily enchanted by you; until you shall say that I have had enough.—[52.] Be it so, said Critias. But, Charmides, if you act thus, it will be a proof to me at least that you are temperate, if you will give yourself up to Socrates to be enchanted, and will not desert him for any thing, either great or small.—(Consider me,) said he, as about to follow and not to desert him. For I should act in a fearful manner, if I did not obey you, my tutor, nor do as you bid me.—Nay then, said Critias, I do bid you.—I shall therefore do so, said Charmides, beginning from this very very day.—But what, said I, are ye two deliberating to do?—Nothing, said Charmides: we have ceased to deliberate.⁸⁹—Will you then, said I, use violence, and not grant me a previous inquiry?—(Consider me) as about to use violence, said he, since Critias commands me. Do you therefore take counsel about what you are to do.—But no consultation, said I, is left for me: for not one man will be able to oppose you, when endeavouring to do any thing yourself and forcing him.—Do not you then oppose me, said he.—I shall not indeed, said I, oppose you.

⁸⁹ The perfect passive is used here as in Criton, p. 46, A., οὐδὲ βουλευέσθαι ἔτι ὧρα, ἀλλὰ βεβουλευῆσθαι, and means “to cease to do.” So in Eurip. Hippol. 1457, Κεκαρτίρηται τάμυ—is the reply to καρτίρει: and so too in Virgil, “Fuimus Troes.”

INTRODUCTION TO THE LACHES,

OR

ON FORTITUDE.

As Plato had in the Charmides discussed the question relating to Temperance, one of the cardinal virtues, so in the Laches he has taken for his subject another, with the view of showing that it is equally difficult to give a definition of Fortitude. Like the Charmides too this dialogue has been rejected by Ast as a spurious production, fathered upon Plato, for reasons which Stalbaum asserts are not of the least weight; and who correctly remarks that there is such a similarity between the manner of the two dialogues, as to show that they must have been written by the same hand; and hence, until the Charmides can be proved to be not genuine, it is needless to inquire into the authorship of the Laches. For though there is some discrepancy in the view here taken of Fortitude, and what is stated in the Republic, iii. p. 386, and iv. p. 427—430, yet that, says Stalbaum, may be accounted for on the supposition that in this dialogue we have the opinion of Plato, when he began his career as a philosophical writer, but in the more elaborate work the result of his matured reflection. Schleiermacher indeed conceives that the Laches was a kind of supplement to the Protagoras. But as it wants the subtlety to be found there, Stalbaum is disposed to believe that it preceded rather than followed that dialogue.

Be however the author who he may—and I confess I can see no reason for doubting its genuineness—the dialogue alludes to some curious circumstances not mentioned elsewhere, and which could hardly be known except to a person contemporary with Plato; who shows towards the end of the dialogue that the theory, which he was contending against, emanated from the school of Damon, the Pythagorean, of whom it would seem from the Protagoras, § 20, and Alcibiad. i. § 30, he had not so high an opinion as Pericles and others had.

LACHES.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

LYSIMACHUS,¹ MELESIAS,² NICIAS,³ LACHES,⁴ AND THE SONS
OF LYSIMACHUS AND MELESIAS, AND SOCRATES.

LYSIMACHUS.

[1.] You have seen, Nicias and Laches, the man fighting in armour;⁵ but on what account I and Melesias here invited you to see him with us, we did not then tell you; but now we will mention it; for we think it is proper to speak freely to you. There are, indeed, some who laugh at things of this kind; and if any one consults with them, they will not say what they think; but making a guess about the views of the persons consulting them, they speak what is contrary to their own opinion. Thinking however that you are sufficiently qualified to know, and that knowing you would state simply what you think, we have thus taken you as our associates in the consultation respecting the matters we are about to communicate. Now the question, about which I have made this lengthy pre-

³ A general of the Athenians, who, after a victorious career, perished at last in the Sicilian expedition.

face is this. These are our sons. That youth, the son of Melesias here, is called Thucydides, bearing his grandfather's name; and this one here, Aristides, is mine, and bears my father's name; for we call him Aristides. It has been determined therefore by us to pay all the attention to them in our power, and not to act as the many do who, when their children become lads,* suffer them to do as they please, but to begin already to take care of them as far as we can. Knowing then that you also have children, we have thought that there has been a care respecting them to you, if to any one else, how they might become the best by being attended to. If however you have not frequently paid attention to this matter, we will now remind you, that you ought not to neglect it; and we call upon you to take upon yourselves, in common with us, the charge of your sons. But from whence we have so determined, it is requisite for you, Nicias and Laches, to hear, although the narration be rather long.

[2.] I and Melesias here take our meals together, and these lads have their food at our side. As I stated then at the commencement of the discourse, we shall speak freely to you. For both of us are able to relate to the youths many beautiful feats of our fathers, which they did both in war and peace, while they were administering the affairs of our allies and of the state here. But neither of us have to relate deeds of our own. For this we feel, in the presence of these youths, a shame, and we find fault with our fathers because they permitted us to live the life of rakes when we became lads, and they were busily employed about the affairs of others. These very things we point out to these youths, and tell them that if they neglect themselves, and do not obey us, they will be in disrepute; but that, if they pay attention to themselves, they will perhaps be worthy of the name they bear. They say indeed they will obey us; but we are considering, by learning what and pursuing it steadily they will become the best of men. Now some one has introduced to us this kind of instruction, and said that it would be well for a young person to learn to fight in armour; and he praised the party whom you have just now seen exhibiting, and invited us to see him likewise. We determined then that it was requisite for us to come ourselves, and take you along with us to the sight, in order that you might not only be fellow-spectators, but fellow-counsellors and co-partners, if you were willing, in the matter relating to the care to be paid to children. These are the subjects on which we wish to communicate with you. It is now, therefore, your part to advise about this kind of instruction, whether it appears they ought to learn it or not, and about the rest, if indeed you are able to praise any kind of discipline or study for a young man, and to state what you will do touching this matter in common.

Lac. You think with truth, Nicias. And what Lysimachus has just now said about his father, and the father of Melesias, appears to me to have been very well said, both against them and us, and all such as engage in political affairs. For there nearly happens to them, what he says, both with respect to their children and the rest of private concerns, that they are considered of little account and treated negligently. On these points, therefore, Lysimachus, you have spoken correctly. But I marvel that you should call upon us to be fellow-counsellors about the education of youth, and not call upon Socrates here, who is, in the first place, of the same demus;⁷ and secondly, has ever his haunts there, where there is any thing connected with the points you are in search of, relating to young persons, either of instruction or an honourable pursuit.

Lys. How say you, Laches? Does Socrates here make any thing of this kind his study?

Lac. Very much so, Lysimachus.

Nic. I too can assert this not less than Laches. For he lately introduced a stranger to me, as the instructor of my son in music, Damon, the disciple of Agathocles, a man most deserving of favour, not only for his skill in music, but in other respects which what you will for young men such as these to pass their time with.

Lys. No longer, Socrates, Nicias, and Laches, do I and my friends it may have any acquaintance with younger persons, inasmuch as we for the most part pass the time with our family on account of our period of life. But if, son of Sophroniscus,⁸ you have any thing to advise for the good of mine⁹ your fellow-citizens, you ought to communicate it: and you are justified in doing so: for you happen to be a friend of your father's side: for I and your father were always associates and friends: and he ended his days before he had any difference with me: and some recollection came round me as these persons were speaking: for these lads, while talking with each other at home, made frequent mention of Socrates, and very much praised him: but I never have asked them whether they spoke of Socrates, the son of Sophroniscus. Tell me now, children, is this the Socrates of whom you so often made mention?

Sons of Mai and Lys. Yes father, it is the same.

Lys. It is well by Juno, Socrates, that you give a support¹⁰ to your father, who was the best of men, in other respects, and this too, that your interests shall be mine, and mine yours.

Lac. And moreover, Lysimachus, do not omit the acts of the man; for I have elsewhere beheld him, not only giving a support to his father, but to his country likewise. For, in the flight from Delium,¹¹ he retired along with me; and I tell you, that if the rest had been willing to be such (as he was), our city would have stood erect, nor would so great a disaster have befallen it.

[5.] Lys. This, Socrates, is indeed honourable praise, with which you are extolled by men worthy to be believed, and (to be praised)¹² for those very things, for which they praise you. Rest

⁹ By "this" Lysimachus means himself.

¹⁰ With the idea contained in the verb ὀρθεῖν may be compared the expression in Eurip. Iph. T. 57, Στῆλοι γὰρ οἴκων παῖδες εἶσιν ἄρσενες.

¹¹ To the courageous conduct of Socrates allusion is likewise made in The Banquet, § 43.

assured, then, that in hearing this, I am right glad that you are in high repute; and do you consider me amongst those the most kindly disposed towards you. You should therefore have been the first to visit me, and to believe me your familiar friend, as it was just for you to be. Now therefore, from this very day, since we have recognised each other, do not do otherwise, but be with me, and become the acquaintance of myself and these youngsters, in order that you may preserve our friendship. You then will do this, and we will again recall it to your memory. But with respect to the matters about which we commenced, what say you? What, does it appear to you that this instruction is suited to lads, or not?¹³ [the learning to fight in armour.]¹³

Soc. Nay then about these matters, Lysimachus, I will endeavour to advise, if I am able; and moreover to do all that you invite me to. It seems however to me to be the most just for myself, as being the younger, and the less experienced in these matters, to hear first what these persons say, and learn from them. And if I have any thing to say contrary to what has been stated by them, then indeed to teach and persuade both you and them. But, Nicias, why do not¹⁴ one of you speak the first?¹⁴

[6.] Nic. There is nothing to prevent it, Socrates; for it appears to me that this kind of instruction is on many accounts useful for youths. For it is well to pass the time not in another place and in the pursuits, in which young men are wont to make for themselves an occupation, when they are at leisure, but in this, from whence they necessarily have the body in a better condition; for it is not inferior to any of the gymnastic exercises, nor has it less labour; and at the same time both the exercise and equestrian skill are especially proper for a liberally educated man. For where we are the combatants in fore justly finds fault with the Greek καὶ εἰς ταῦτα εἰς ἃ οὗτοι ἐκαινοῦσαν: which Stalbaum however would defend. Heusde too saw that ἐκαινέσθαι had dropt out; but he incorrectly wished to insert καὶ ἐκαινέσθαι after πιστεύεσθαι.

¹³—¹³ The words within brackets are evidently an interpretation of τὸ μάθημα.

them. [45.] For in reality, if temperance be ever so much of such a nature, it does not appear evident to me, what good it will effect for us.—How is this? said he; speak, that we may also know what you mean.—I fancy, I replied, that I am trifling; nevertheless it is necessary to consider, that, which presents itself to our view, and not carelessly to pass it by, if any one takes the least thought of himself.—You speak well, said he.—Hear then, I replied, my dream, (no matter) whether it has passed through the gate of ⁷⁷horn or ivory.⁷⁷ For if temperance ruled us ever so much, would it not, being such as we have now defined it, be acted upon according to the sciences; and neither would he, who boasts to be a pilot when he is not, deceive us; nor would a physician, or a general of an army, or any other person, who pretends to know that, which he does not know, lie hid from us. But from this state of things something else would happen to us; for our bodies would be more healthy than at present, and we should be preserved, when in danger at sea and in war; and all our utensils and garments, and all our shoes, and all the necessaries (of life), all things else, would be made more scientifically through our employing true artists. [46.] And if you are willing, let us grant that prophecy is the science of that, which is to be; and that temperance, presiding over it, turns away the boastful diviners, but appoints over us the true prophets of things to come. Furnished then in this way, the human race would, I concede, act and live scientifically. For temperance being our guard, it would not permit ignorance to interfere and cooperate with us. But that, by acting scientifically, we should do well and be happy, this, friend Critias, I am not yet able to understand.—But, he replied, you will not however easily find any other method of doing well, if you despise the doing a thing scientifically.—Instruct me then still a little, said I, of what scientific doing are you speaking? Is it that of leather-cutting?—By Zeus, it is not.—Is it that of brass-work?—By no means.—But is it that of working in wool, or wood, or any such things?—It is not.—[47.] We do then, I replied, no longer persist in the assertion, that he is happy, who lives scientifically. For those artists, although living scientifically, are confessed by you to be not happy; ⁷⁸ but you seem to me to separate the happy man from them, when they possess a science of certain things.⁷⁸ And perhaps you call (happy) the diviner, whom I just now mentioned, who knows all that is to be. Do you mean this, or any other person?—Both this, said he, and another.—What other? I replied. You surely do not speak of the person, who knows, in addition to future events, every thing past and present, and is ignorant of nothing; for let us admit that there is such a man, you will not say, I think, that any one lives more scientifically than he at least does.—Certainly not.—But this also I desiderate—Which of the sciences makes him happy? Or do all the sciences equally produce this effect?—By no means equally, said he.—But which the most? Is it that, by which he knows some of things present, past, and to come? Is it that, by (which he knows) the science of back-gammon?⁷⁹—What back-gammon? he replied.—But is it that, by which (he knows) the calculating science?—By no means.—But is it that, by which (he knows) things healthful.—Rather so, said he?—[48.] ⁸⁰ But is it, said I, that, of which I am speaking especially, by which (he knows) what?⁸⁰—By which (he knows) good and evil.—O thou vile man, I replied; ⁸¹ who for some while hast been drawing me round in a circle, concealing from me, that to live scientifically was not the causing,⁸¹ to do well and to be happy, nor belonging

 enter viventibus unum quendam certa ex scientia scien-ter viventem beatum determinas;" who must have met with something very superior to the common Greek text, which is literally, "but concerning some living scientifically you seem to me to set apart the happy."

⁷⁹ As in the game called περρεία, mention is made both of pebbles, or dice, and of lines, it was probably something like the modern backgammon.

⁸⁰⁻⁸⁰ The Greek is 'Εκείνη δ', ἣν λέγω μάλιστα, ἣν ὁ ἐγὼ, ᾗ τί; out of which both Heindorf and Stalbaum have failed to make a satisfactory sense and syntax. Ficinus, "Illa vero, quam dico maxime, quâ quid norim." Perhaps Plato wrote 'Εκείνην δ' οὖν λέγ' εὖ μάλιστα, ἣν ὁ ἐγὼ, ᾗ τί; i. e. "Do you then state in the best way, said I, that, by which (he knows) what?" where ἐκείνην is due to two MSS.

⁸¹⁻⁸¹ Here again the version of Ficinus differs greatly from, and is in some respects superior to, the Greek—"jamdiu me clam circulo reflectis retrahisque ad id, ut beatum vivere non sit secundum universas scientias vivere; immo secundum unam quendam boni malive scientiam."

to all the other sciences, but to one (science) alone, relating to good and evil. Since,⁸² Critias, if you were willing to take away this last science from the other sciences, the physician's science will no less cause one to be healthy; and that of the shoe-maker, to be shod; and that of the weaver, to be clad; and (no less) the pilot's science prevent one from losing one's life at sea, and the general's science in war?—No less, said he.—But, friend Critias, by this science being absent, it will be no longer left for each of those (other sciences) to turn out well and usefully.—You speak the truth.—But this science, as it seems, is not temperance, but that, the work of which is to benefit us: for it is not the science of sciences and ignorances, but that of good and evil. So that if this be useful, temperance would be something else than⁸³ useful.—[49.] What then, said he, would not temperance be useful? For if temperance is as much as possible a science of sciences, and presides over the other sciences; it will surely benefit us by ruling over that science which relates to the good.—But will temperance, I replied, cause us to be in health, and not the medical science? And will this perform the rest of the works of the arts, and not the rest, each its own work? Or did we not some time since testify that temperance is a science of science, and ignorance alone, but of nothing else? Is it not so?—So it appears.—It is not then the worker of health.—Clearly not.—For health is the work of another art. Is it not?—Of another.—Nor is it, my friend, of utility; for we attributed this very work to another art. Did we not?—Entirely so.—How then will temperance be beneficial, since it is the worker of no utility?—By no means, Socrates, as it seems.—Do you not see then, Critias, that I felt very properly some time since a fear, and justly blamed myself, because I could descry nothing useful about temperance? For that which is confessed to be the most beautiful of all things, would not have appeared to us to be useless, if there were any thing useful in myself towards making a search correctly. [50.] But now,⁸⁴ for we are vanquished on every side, and unable to discover for what purpose the name-

founder⁸⁵ assigned to temperance this very name. And yet we have conceded many things that did not result (correctly)⁸⁶ from the reasoning. For we conceded, that there is a science of sciences, although the reasoning neither permits nor asserts this; and on the other hand, we conceded that we know by this science the works of the other sciences—the reasoning permitting not even this—in order that the temperate man might be one, who has a knowledge of what he knows, because he knows, and of those which he does not know, because he does not know. This indeed we conceded very liberally, without ever considering that it is impossible for a person to know in any way whatever what he does not know at all. ⁸⁷ For our concession says that he knows those things, because he does not know them.⁸⁷ And yet as I think there is nothing which would appear more absurd than this. The inquiry however, having met with us so very easy tempered and by no means morose, is not a bit more able to discover the truth; but has rather laughed at it so much, that, what we formerly conceded to be temperance, and, after moulding it into some shape, laid it down to be, this it has very saucily shown to us as being of no use. [51.] On my own account then I am less indignant; but for your sake, Charmides, I am, said I, very indignant, if you, so beautiful in body, and most temperate to boot in mind, derive no advantage from this temperance, and if it does not by its presence bring to you any benefit during life. But I am still more indignant for the sake of the incantation, which I learned from the Thracian, if being a thing of no worth, I have learnt it with so much labour. I do not then⁸⁸ [very much then]⁸⁸ think that this is the case, but that I am a bad searcher; since (I consider) temperance to be a great good, and that, if you possess it, you are blessed indeed. But see whether you do possess it, and do not require at all the incantation. For if you do possess it, I would rather advise you to think me a trifle, and incompetent to search out any thing whatever by a course of reasoning, and yourself so much the happier, as you are the more temperate.—But by Zeus, Socrates, said Charmides, I do not know whether I possess it, or not. For how can I know that, which not even you can discover what it is, as you say yourself? I am not however much persuaded by you; and I consider myself, Socrates, to be greatly in want of the incantation; and no business of mine hinders me from being daily enchanted by you, until you shall say that I have had enough.—[52.] Be it so, said Critias. But, Charmides, if you act thus, it will be a proof to me at least that you are temperate, if you will give yourself up to Socrates to be enchanted, and will not desert him for any thing, either great or small.—(Consider me,) said he, as about to follow and not to desert him. For I should act in a fearful manner, if I did not obey you, my tutor, nor do as you bid me.—Nay then, said Critias, I do bid you.—I shall therefore do so, said Charmides, beginning from this very very day.—But what, said I, are ye two deliberating to do?—Nothing, said Charmides: we have ceased to deliberate.⁸⁹—Will you then, said I, use violence, and not grant me a previous inquiry?—(Consider me) as about to use violence, said he, since Critias commands me. Do you therefore take counsel about what you are to do.—But no consultation, said I, is left for me: for not one man will be able to oppose you, when endeavouring to do any thing yourself and forcing him.—Do not you then oppose me, said he.—I shall not indeed, said I, oppose you.

⁸⁹ The perfect passive is used here as in Criton, p. 46, A., οὐδὲ βουλευέσθαι ἐτι ὥρα, ἀλλὰ βεβουλευῆσθαι, and means “to cease to do.” So in Eurip. Hippol. 1457, Κεκαρτίρηται τὰμὺδ—is the reply to καρτέρει: and so too in Virgil, “Fuimus Troes.”

INTRODUCTION TO THE LACHES,

OR

ON FORTITUDE.

As Plato had in the Charmides discussed the question relating to Temperance, one of the cardinal virtues, so in the Laches he has taken for his subject another, with the view of showing that it is equally difficult to give a definition of Fortitude. Like the Charmides too this dialogue has been rejected by Ast as a spurious production, fathered upon Plato, for reasons which Stalbaum asserts are not of the least weight; and who correctly remarks that there is such a similarity between the manner of the two dialogues, as to show that they must have been written by the same hand; and hence, until the Charmides can be proved to be not genuine, it is needless to inquire into the authorship of the Laches. For though there is some discrepancy in the view here taken of Fortitude, and what is stated in the Republic, iii. p. 386, and iv. p. 427—430, yet that, says Stalbaum, may be accounted for on the supposition that in this dialogue we have the opinion of Plato, when he began his career as a philosophical writer, but in the more elaborate work the result of his matured reflection. Schleiermacher indeed conceives that the Laches was a kind of supplement to the Protagoras. But as it wants the subtlety to be found there, Stalbaum is disposed to believe that it preceded rather than followed that dialogue.

Be however the author who he may—and I confess I can see no reason for doubting its genuineness—the dialogue alludes to some curious circumstances not mentioned elsewhere, and which could hardly be known except to a person contemporary with Plato; who shows towards the end of the dialogue that the theory, which he was contending against, emanated from the school of Damon, the Pythagorean, of whom it would seem from the Protagoras, § 20, and Alcibiad. i. § 30, he had not so high an opinion as Pericles and others had.

LACHES.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

LYSIMACHUS,¹ MELESIAS,² NICIAS,³ LACHES,⁴ AND THE SONS
OF LYSIMACHUS AND MELESIAS, AND SOCRATES.

LYSIMACHUS.

[1.] You have seen, Nicias and Laches, the man fighting in armour;⁵ but on what account I and Melesias here invited you to see him with us, we did not then tell you; but now we will mention it; for we think it is proper to speak freely to you. There are, indeed, some who laugh at things of this kind; and if any one consults with them, they will not say what they think; but making a guess about the views of the persons consulting them, they speak what is contrary to their own opinion. Thinking however that you are sufficiently qualified to know, and that knowing you would state simply what you think, we have thus taken you as our associates in the consultation respecting the matters we are about to communicate. Now the question, about which I have made this lengthy pre-

face is this. These are our sons. That Melesias here, is called Thucydides, bearing name; and this one here, Aristides, is mine other's name; for we call him Aristides. It has therefore by us to pay all the attention to them and not to act as the many do who, when they come lads,⁶ suffer them to do as they please, and to take care of them as far as we can. But if you also have children, we have thought that it might be better care respecting them to you, if to any one else, might become the best by being attended to by you. For you have not frequently paid attention to them, and now remind you, that you ought not to neglect them, but call upon you to take upon yourselves, in the charge of your sons. But from when the matter is terminated, it is requisite for you, Nicias and I, although the narration be rather long.

[2.] I and Melesias here take our meals with the lads have their food at our side. As I have commenced the discourse, we shall say no more. For both of us are able to relate to the youths the feats of our fathers, which they did both while they were administering the affairs of the state here. But neither of us have to relate of our own. For this we feel, in the presence of the youths, a shame, and we find fault with our fathers who permitted us to live the life of rakes when we were they were busily employed about the affairs of the state. The very things we point out to these youths, and say if they neglect themselves, and do not obey us, will in disrepute; but that, if they pay attention to us, they will perhaps be worthy of the name of men. I say indeed they will obey us; but we are not learning what and pursuing it steadily the best of men. Now some one has introduced of instruction, and said that it would be well for a young person to learn to fight in armour; and he praised the party whom you have just now seen exhibiting, and invited us to see him likewise. We determined then that it was requisite for us to come ourselves, and take you along with us to the sight, in order that you might not only be fellow-spectators, but fellow-counsellors and co-partners, if you were willing, in the matter relating to the care to be paid to children. These are the subjects on which we wish to communicate with you. It is now, therefore, your part to advise about this kind of instruction, whether it appears they ought to learn it or not, and about the rest, if indeed you are able to praise any kind of discipline or study for a young man, and to state what you will do touching this matter in common.

Lac. You think with truth, Nicias. And what Lysimachus has just now said about his father, and the father of Melesias, appears to me to have been very well said, both against them and us, and all such as engage in political affairs. For there nearly happens to them, what he says, both with respect to their children and the rest of private concerns, that they are considered of little account and treated negligently. On these points, therefore, Lysimachus, you have spoken correctly. But I marvel that you should call upon us to be fellow-counsellors about the education of youth, and not call upon Socrates here, who is, in the first place, of the same demus; ⁷ and secondly, has ever his haunts there, where there is any thing connected with the points you are in search of, relating to young persons, either of instruction or an honourable pursuit.

Lys. How say you, Laches? Does Socrates here make any thing of this kind his study?

Lac. Very much so, Lysimachus.

Nic. I too can assert this not less than Laches. For he lately introduced a stranger to me, as the instructor of my son in music, Damon, the disciple of Agathocles, a man most deserving of favour, not only for his skill in music, but in other respects worth what you will for young men such as these to pass their time with.

[4.] Lys. No longer, Socrates, Nicias, and Laches, do I and my equals in age have any acquaintance with younger persons, inasmuch as we for the most part pass the time with our family on account of our period of life. But if, son of Sophroniscus,⁸ you have any thing to advise for the good of this⁹ your fellow-wardsman, you ought to communicate it: and you are justified (in doing so); for you happen to be a friend on your father's side; for I and your father were always associates and friends; and he ended his days before he had any difference with me: and some recollection came round me as these persons were speaking; for these lads, while talking with each other at home, made frequent mention of Socrates, and very much praised him; but I never have asked them whether they spoke of Socrates, the son of Sophroniscus. Tell me now, children, is this the Socrates of whom you so often made mention?

Sons of Mel. and Lys. Yes, father, it is the same.

Lys. It is well, by Juno, Socrates, that you give a support¹⁰ to your father, who was the best of men, in other respects, and this too, that your interests shall be mine, and mine yours.

Lac. And, moreover, Lysimachus, do not omit the acts of the man; for I have elsewhere beheld him, not only giving a support to his father, but to his country likewise. For, in the flight from Delium,¹¹ he retired along with me; and I tell you, that if the rest had been willing to be such (as he was), our city would have stood erect, nor would so great a disaster have befallen it.

[5.] Lys. This, Socrates, is indeed honourable praise, with which you are extolled by men worthy to be believed, and (to be praised)¹² for those very things, for which they praise you. Rest

⁹ By "this" Lysimachus means himself.

¹⁰ With the idea contained in the verb ὀρθοῦν may be compared the expression in Eurip. Iph. T. 57, Στῦλοι γὰρ οἴκων παῖδες εἰσιν ἄρσενες.

¹² Ficinus has what the sense evidently requires, "qui in iisdem laudandi et ipsi sunt, in quibus te laudant," having no doubt found in his MS. καὶ εἰς ταῦτά, εἰς ἃ οὗτοι σ' ἐπαινοῦσιν, ἐπαινέσθαι. Ast there-

assured, then, that in hearing this, I am right glad that you are in high repute; and do you consider me amongst those the most kindly disposed towards you. You should therefore have been the first to visit me, and to believe me your familiar friend, as it was just for you to be. Now therefore, from this very day, since we have recognised each other, do not do otherwise, but be with me, and become the acquaintance of myself and these youngsters, in order that you may preserve our friendship. You then will do this, and we will again recall it to your memory. But with respect to the matters about which we commenced, what say you? What, does it appear to you that this instruction is suited to lads, or not?¹³ [the learning to fight in armour.]¹³

Soc. Nay then about these matters, Lysimachus, I will endeavour to advise, if I am able; and moreover to do all that you invite me to. It seems however to me to be the most just for myself, as being the younger, and the less experienced in these matters, to hear first what these persons say, and learn from them. And if I have any thing to say contrary to what has been stated by them, then indeed to teach and persuade both you and them. But, Nicias, why do not¹⁴ one of you speak the first?¹⁴

[6.] Nic. There is nothing to prevent it, Socrates; for it appears to me that this kind of instruction is on many accounts useful for youths. For it is well to pass the time not in another place and in the pursuits, in which young men are wont to make for themselves an occupation, when they are at leisure, but in this, from whence they necessarily have the body in a better condition; for it is not inferior to any of the gymnastic exercises, nor has it less labour; and at the same time both the exercise and equestrian skill are especially proper for a liberally educated man. For where we are the combatants in fore justly finds fault with the Greek καὶ εἰς ταῦτα εἰς ἃ οὗτοι ἐπαινοῦσιν: which Stalbaum however would defend. Heusde too saw that ἐπαινέσθαι had dropt out; but he incorrectly wished to insert καὶ ἐπαινέσθαι after πιστεύεσθαι.

^{13—13} The words within brackets are evidently an interpretation of τὸ μάθημα.

^{14—14} The MSS. vary between πρότερος, and πότερος, and ὀπότερος. Plato wrote either λέγει πρότερος ὀπότερος, or else λέγεις πρότερος, similar to "ipse prior loqueris"—in Ficinus: which Stalbaum once approved of, but subsequently rejected.

a contest, and in those (exercises) in which a contest is proposed to us, they alone contend who are exercised in these very instruments relating to war. In the next place, this instruction will be of advantage in battle itself, when it is necessary to fight in a rank with many others. But it is the most useful, when the ranks are broken, and when it is necessary in single combat either in pursuit to attack a person defending himself, or in flight to defend oneself, while another is making an attack. For he who is skilled in this art, will suffer nothing at the hands of one, and, perhaps, not at the hands of many; but will every where through this come off the best. And still further, a thing of this kind incites to the desire of another honourable kind of instruction. For every one who has learnt to fight in armour, will also desire the instruction respecting the arrangements of an army; and having obtained this, he will, through the love of honour in these points, press forward to every thing connected with generalship. And ¹⁵it is already evident¹⁵ that he will attend to all instructions and studies connected with them, both honourable and well worth while for a man to learn and attend to, and to which this instruction has been the leader. And we will add to this, a no trifling addition, that this very science will make every man in no small degree more daring and brave in battle ¹⁶than he was before.¹⁶ Nor let us hold it in dishonour to say, although it may appear to any one a rather small matter, that it gives a man a graceful bearing, where a man should appear the most graceful;¹⁷ and where through this graceful bearing he will at the same time appear more terrible to his enemies. To me then, Lysimachus, it appears that, as I have said, we ought to teach young men these things; and I have stated why it appears so. But if Laches has any thing to say contrary to this, I shall hear him with pleasure.

[7.] Lac. It is difficult, Nicias, to assert respecting any ¹⁵—¹⁶ Heusde, justly offended with ἡδὲ δηλον, proposed to read τί δὲ δηλοῦν, i. e. "why need one show." Perhaps Plato wrote καὶ, ἃ ἡδὲ Δήλιον, i. e. "and what Delium knew"—For the very spot, where the Athenians lost the day through their want of discipline, would be properly appealed to as a witness to the truth of the present remarks.

¹⁶—¹⁷ This is Taylor's correct translation of αὐτὸς αὐτοῦ, united to a comparative, on which see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 452.

¹⁷ I have adopted εὐσχημονίστατον, found in two MSS. and similar to "maxime aptum"—in Ficinus.

instruction whatever, that one ought not to learn it; for it appears to be good to know all things; and especially this science of arms; if it is a thing to be learnt, as those say who teach it, and such as Nicias speaks of, one ought to learn; but if it is not a thing to be learnt, and those are deceiving us who promise to teach it, or if, being a thing to be learnt, it is not of much worth, why should one learn it? this I say concerning it, through looking to these points, that, if it were of any value, I think it would not have lain hid from the Lacedæmonians, who have no other care in life than to seek and study that, by which they may surpass others in war. Now if this art were concealed from them, yet this fact would not have been concealed from the teachers of it, that the Lacedæmonians do, the most of all the Greeks, pay attention to things of this kind; and by them he would be honoured for it, and beyond¹⁸ all others he would make the most money, just as a tragic poet is honoured by us. For he, who thinks that he composes tragedies well, does not go about to other cities at a distance from, and in a circle round, Attica, and make an exhibition there; but he straightway comes hither, and exhibits himself to the people here, for a very good reason. But I see that the persons who fight in armour, consider Lacedæmon as sacred ground, not to be trodden; and do not walk upon it even on tip-toe; but they go round it, and rather exhibit themselves to all, and especially to those who would acknowledge that many are before them in warlike matters. [8.] In the next place, Lysimachus, I have been acquainted with not a few of these men during the work itself, and I have seen what kind of men they are. And we may form a judgment of them from this circumstance. For, as if with a fixed design, not one of those, who has applied himself to the science of arms, has ever become illustrious in war; although in all other cases men have become celebrated from among those, who have paid attention to each science. But these men, as it seems, have been, as compared with the rest, in this respect so very unfortunate. For this very same Stesileus, whom you beheld together with me exhibiting himself in so great a crowd,¹⁹ and saying the great things in truth²⁰ which he said of himself,¹⁹ I have seen him truly displaying himself elsewhere, in a far better manner, though unwillingly. For when the ship, on which he was aboard as a marine, fell upon a merchant vessel, he fought with a spear headed with a scythe, a weapon as different²¹ (from other weapons)²¹ as he was himself from the rest²² (of the combatants.)²² Other particulars respecting the man do not deserve to be related; but how his plan of the spear in addition to the scythe turned out²³ (must not be passed over in silence);²³ for while he was fighting, (the weapon) became somehow entangled in the tackling of the (enemy's) ship; Steasileus therefore pulled in order to disengage it, but he was not able to effect his purpose; and the one ship passed by the other. In the mean time he followed the course of the ship holding by his spear. But when the enemy's ship had sheered off, and was drawing him in, as he was still holding by his spear, he let the spear down towards his hands, until he had only hold of it by the stump. Hereupon there arose a laughter and shout from those on board the merchant vessel, at the figure he made; and some one having pelted him with a stone that fell just at his feet, he threw himself from the spear upon the deck. And then indeed they who were in the trireme were no longer able to restrain their laughter on seeing the spear headed with a scythe hanging from the ship. [9.] Perhaps therefore this art may be of some use, as Nicias says; such however are the circumstances which I met with myself.²⁴ Hence, what I said at first, if it be a thing to be learnt, it possesses but little utility; and if it be not, and persons say and pretend it is a thing to be learnt, it is not worth while to ²⁰ Stalbaum endeavours, I think, unsuccessfully to defend ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ ὡς ἀληθῶς.

²¹—²¹ Ficinus has alone preserved the words requisite for the sense in his version, "instrumentum—ab aliis longe diversum."

²³—²³ Here again we are indebted to Ficinus for a supplement necessary for the sense. His version is, "Hoc tamen non erit silentio prætereundum." Perhaps Plato wrote ἀποσβῆναι οὐ χρῆ between ἀπέβη and μαχόμενον.

endeavour to learn it. For it appears to me, that if any one being a coward should think he ought to learn it, and through it become more bold, it would become only more apparent what he is; but if a brave man (learnt it), he would through being watched by every one have to endure, if he erred but little, calumnies of a grievous kind. For the pretension to this science is exposed to envy; so that unless he surpasses others in valour to a wonderful degree, it is not possible for him, who asserts that he possesses this science, to avoid becoming ridiculous. Of such value, Lysimachus, does the pursuit of this kind of instruction appear to be to myself. But it is requisite, as I said at first, not to let this Socrates go away, but to request him to give his opinion as to the view in which the matter appears to him.

[10.] Lys. And I do indeed request you, Socrates: for it appears to me that the consultation requires a person to decide. For had these agreed, there would have been no need of such a person. But now—for you see that Laches has given an opposite (vote)²⁵ to Nicias—it will be well to hear from you with which of the men you are a fellow-voter.

Soc. What then, Lysimachus, are you about to make use of that, which the majority of us shall praise?

Lys. What else, Socrates, can any one do?

Soc. And will you too, Melesias, act in this manner? And if the consultation were about the contending art for your son, ²⁶what he ought to practise,²⁶ would you rather obey the many than one, who happened to have been instructed under a skilful teacher, and had practised himself.

Mel. It is reasonable, Socrates, (to obey) him.

Soc. You would therefore obey him rather than us four?

Mel. Perhaps so.

Soc. For that which is about to be judged correctly ought, I think, to be judged by science, and not by a multitude.

Mel. How not?

Soc. It is meet therefore to consider now this very thing in the first place, whether any one of us is an artist in the matter about which we are consulting, or not. And if any of us is, we should obey him, although he is but one, and dismiss the rest. But if not, we must seek some other person. Or, do you and Lysimachus think that a hazard is run respecting a trifling thing, and not respecting that very possession, which is the greatest of all belonging to you? For by the sons being good, or the contrary, the whole of their father's house will be regulated in such a manner, as the children may turn out.

Mel. You speak the truth.

Soc. One must therefore have much forethought on this point.

Mel. Certainly.

Soc. How then, what I just now stated, should we have considered, if we had wished to inquire which of us is most expert in the contending art? ²⁷Is not he, who had learned and studied, and to whom there had been good teachers of this very thing?²⁷

Mel. To me at least it appears so.

Soc. And prior to this, ²⁸(should we not have considered) what the thing is, ²⁸of which we are seeking the teachers?

Mel. How say you?

Soc. In this way, perhaps, it will be more manifest. [11.] It does not seem to me to have been conceded by us at first, ²⁹what is the thing about which we are consulting and considering, ²⁹which of us is (the most)³⁰ skilled, and for the sake of this has taken masters, and which of us is not.

Nic. Were we not considering, ³¹Socrates, about fighting in armour, whether it was proper lads should learn it or not?

Soc. Entirely so, Nicias. But when any one considers about a remedy for the eyes, whether it ought to be applied or not, whether think you should the consultation be about the remedy, or about the eyes.

²⁷—²⁷ Stephens alone has seen that the sentence is incomplete; which is thus supplied by Ficinus—"nonne eum perscrutati essemus, qui et didicit et exercuit, cui videlicet idonei hujus rei præceptores exstiterint."

²⁹—²⁹ Ficinus has more tersely, "quid illud sit, in quo perquirimus—" ³⁰Taylor has adopted the superlative from "peritissimus" in Ficinus.

³¹ Ficinus—"quærebamus"—which leads to ἔσκοπούμεν for σκοποῦμεν.

Nic. About the eyes.

Soc. Hence too when any one is considering about a bridle for a horse, whether it should be applied or not, and when, he will then consult about the horse, and not about the bridle.

Nic. True.

Soc. In one word then, when any one is considering any thing for the sake of any thing, his consultation is about that thing for the sake of which he is considering, and not about that, which³³ he was seeking for the sake of something else.³³

Nic. Necessarily so.

Soc. It is necessary therefore to consider whether the fellow-counsellor is skilled in that thing, for the sake of which³⁴ we are considering what we are considering.³⁴

Mel. Very much so.

Soc. Are we not saying then, that we are inquiring about a thing to be learnt for the sake of the soul of the young man?

Nic. Yes.

Soc. Whether then any one of us is skilled in the art of attending to the soul, and is able to well perform this attendance, and who has had good teachers, must be considered.

Lac. What then, Socrates, have you never seen persons become more skilful in some things without teachers than with them?

Soc. I have, Laches; to whom however you would not be willing to trust, if they said they were good artists, unless they could show you some well-finished work of their art, both one and many.

Nic. What you say is true.

[12.] Soc. And for us too, Laches and Nicias, it is requisite, since Lysimachus and Melesias have invited us to a consultation with them respecting their sons, through their being desirous that their souls should become the best possible, that we, if we say we have had masters, should show who they were, who ³⁵in the first place³⁵ being themselves good teachers, and having attended to the souls of many youths, appear in the next place to have instructed us likewise. Or, if any one of us shall say that he has had no teacher, he ought at least to be able to speak of his own works, and to show what Athenians or foreigners, what slaves or freemen, have become good confessedly through him. But if neither of these is in our power, we must be ordered³⁶ to seek after others, and not run the risk in the case of the sons of persons our friends, of incurring the greatest blame from their nearest relatives for doing them a mischief. Now with respect to myself, I am the first to say, Lysimachus and Melesias, that I have had no teacher in this matter; although, beginning from my youth, I have felt a desire for such a thing. But I am not able to pay the sophists their fees, who alone profess themselves able to make me a man beautiful in body and mind; and by myself even now I am unable to discover the art. If however Nicias or Laches have either discovered or learned it, I should not wonder; for they have a more money-power than myself, so as to be able to learn from others; and they are at the same time older, so that they may have already discovered it (themselves.)³⁷ And they appear to me to be able to instruct a (grown) man; for they would never have so fearlessly expressed their opinions about pursuits good and bad for a young person, unless they believed they had a sufficient knowledge of them. Now as to the other things, I do indeed believe them; but I have wondered that they differ from each other. [13.] Hence, as Laches just now bade you not dismiss but interrogate me, so now I make a request in turn for you not to dismiss Laches and Nicias, but to interrogate them; at the same time telling them, that Socrates says he has no knowledge of the thing, nor is he competent to decide which of you speaks the truth; for he is neither the in-

³⁵⁻³⁵ The Greek is αὐτοὶ πρῶτοι. Ficinus has "qui et ipsi primum," from which Bekker obtained ο, and Stephens "primum."

³⁶ I have translated as if the Greek were κελευστί' ἡμῖν, not κελεύειν.

³⁷ The very antithesis in παρ' ἄλλων proves that αὐτοὶ has dropt out after ὥστε. Compare just below μαθόντε παρὰ τοῦ—ἡ αὐτῷ ἐξευρόντε.

ventor nor the teacher of any thing relating to such matters. But do you, Laches and Nicias, one or the other, tell us what man you have met with most skilled in the bringing up of youth; and whether you have learnt from any one, or discovered yourselves; and, if you have learnt, who was the teacher to each of you, and what others are their fellow-artists, in order that if amidst the affairs of the city you have no leisure, we may go to them, and induce, either by gifts or caresses, or both, to take care of our children and yours, that they may not become depraved, and a disgrace to their ancestors. But if you yourselves are the discoverers of such a thing, give us an instance of what other persons you have had the care, and whom from being depraved you have made beautiful and good. For if you will now begin to give instruction for the first time, you must reflect that the risk is run not in the case of a Carian,³⁹ but in that of your own sons, and the sons of your friends; and truly will it happen to you, according to the proverb, for a pottery to be in a tub.⁴⁰ State then which of these matters ye say or deny is in our power and suited to you. This, Lysimachus, inquire of them, and do not let them off.

[14.] Lys. Socrates seems, my friends, to me to speak well. But whether it is agreeable to you to be interrogated about such matters, and to give reasons,⁴¹ it is meet for you, Nicias and Laches, to know; for to myself and Melesias here it will clearly be very agreeable, if you are willing to go through in a discussion all that Socrates may ask. For at the commencement I began speaking from that point, that we had invited you to a consultation on this account, because we thought, as was likely, that you had paid attention to these things, especially since your sons, as well as ours, are arrived at an age to be instructed. If, therefore, it makes no difference to you, speak, and consider the affair in common with Socrates, giving and receiving reasons from each other: for he says this very properly, that we are now consulting about the most important of our concerns. See, therefore, whether it appears to you that we ought to act thus.

Nic. You seem to me, Lysimachus, to know in good truth Socrates only from his father, and not to have associated with him yourself; unless, perhaps, when he was a boy, he came near you, while following his father, amongst his wardsmen, or in a temple, or some other congregation of the people; but since he has grown older, it is evident that you have never fallen in with him.

Lys. Why say you this especially, Nicias?

[15.] Nic. You seem to me not to know that for him, who happens to be near to Socrates, through a conversation, as if through a family alliance, ⁴²[and approaches towards him by conversing,] ⁴³it is a matter of necessity that, even if he shall have previously begun to converse about any thing else, he will not cease to be led about by the person here during the conversation, until he falls into giving an account of himself, in what manner he lives now, and what is the life he has previously lived. And when he shall have so fallen, Socrates will not dismiss him, until he has tried, as by a touchstone, all these points well and truly. But I am accustomed to him, and I know that it is necessary for me to suffer thus at his hands; and I further know well that I shall suffer now. For I am delighted, Lysimachus, to draw near to the man; and I think it is no bad thing to be reminded of what we have done or are doing not correctly; and that for the subsequent period of life it is necessary for the person to be more thoughtful, who does not fly from such an examination, but is willing and thinks it worth while, according to the saying of Solon, ⁴³to learn as long as he lives, and by not imagining that age itself will come bringing intellect along with it. To me, therefore, it is neither unusual nor unpleasant to be tested by Socrates. But I have for some time known almost that our discourse, as Socrates is present, would not be about the lads, but about ourselves. Hence, as I said before, nothing as regards myself prevents me from passing the time in discourse with Socrates in the manner he wishes. But see how Laches here is disposed about a thing of this kind.

[16.] Lac. With respect to conversations, Nicias, my state is simple, or, if you will, is not simple, but double; for to a person I should appear to be now a lover of talk, but again a hater. For when I hear a man talking about virtue, or concerning wisdom, if he be truly a man, and worthy the arguments which he uses, I am delighted beyond all bounds, perceiving at the same time both the speaker and what is spoken, how they become and suit each other. And, really, such a man appears to me to be a musician, who composes the most beautiful harmony, not through⁴³ the lyre, or instruments of play, but by living in reality⁴⁴ correctly, after having skilfully⁴⁴ made⁴⁵ his life to accord by words to deeds like⁴⁶ the Dorian strain, but not the Ionic, nor I conceive the Phrygian or Lydian,⁴⁶ but that which alone is the Hellenic. Such a man, therefore, when he speaks, makes me to be glad, and to appear to any one whatever a lover of talk, with such avidity do I receive what is spoken by him. But he, who acts in a manner contrary to this man, gives me pain; and by how much the better he seems to speak, by so much the more does he (pain me), and make me on the other hand to appear a hater of talk. Of the discourses of Socrates I have not yet, indeed, had any experience; but of his deeds, as it seems, I have formerly had a ⁴³ I have translated as if the Greek were ὁ ΔΙΑ ΔΥραν, and not ὁ ΔΥραν.

trial, and there I found him a man worthy of beautiful words and all liberty of speech. If then he possesses these properties, I agree with the party here; and I shall with the greatest pleasure be examined by such a person; nor shall I feel annoyed at being a learner. But though I assent to the saying of Solon, I will add just one thing, for I wish to be taught many things as I grow old, but by the good alone. Let this then be granted, that the teacher is himself a good man, that I may not appear hard to learn, when I learn without pleasure. But whether the teacher be younger, or not as yet in repute, or possesses any thing else of such a kind, I take no thought. I state then, as it were by the crier, to you, Socrates, that you may teach and confute me in whatever point you please; ⁴⁷and to learn on the other hand what I know; ⁴⁷ for so you are laid up in my thoughts, from the day in which you were my companion in danger, ⁴⁸ and gave such a proof of your virtue, as it is meet for man to give, who is about ⁴⁹ to give it justly. ⁴⁹ Say then whatever you please, and take no account of our age.

[17.] Soc. We cannot then blame, as it seems, your feelings, as being not ready to consult and investigate with us conjointly.

Lys. This then is our business, Socrates. For I put you down as one of us. Do you therefore consider, instead of me, in behalf of the youths, what we ought to inquire of them; and do you by conversing consult for them. For, through my age, I have forgotten the majority of things which I had intended to ask them; and moreover, I do not very well remember what I hear, if any other conversation intervenes. Do you therefore speak about, and discuss among yourselves, the things which we have laid before you; and I shall afterwards hear (the result); and having heard, I will, with Melesias here, do whatever shall seem good to you.

Soc. We must, Nicias and Laches, obey Lysimachus and ⁴⁷⁻⁴⁷ Taylor, perceiving no doubt the absurdity of the clause within the numerals, tacitly omitted them. Plato, in lieu of μαρθάνειν αὐ, probably wrote ἀναμαρθάνειν, "to unlearn:" which, as we know from Horace, old persons are very unwilling to do.

⁴⁸ The fact alluded to is mentioned in The Banquet, § 43.

⁴⁹⁻⁴⁹ This I cannot understand. Ficinus has "quisquis juste periculum est facturus," as if he had found in his MS. δικαίως κινδυνεύσειν. The sense requires δικαίως διδάσκειν. For Laches had said just before that a teacher ought to be a virtuous person.

Melesias. The points then, which we just now endeavoured to consider, (namely,) who had been our teachers in such kind of instruction, or what other persons we had made better, it will not be improper, perhaps, to examine amongst ourselves. But I think that a consideration of this kind tends to the same point,⁵⁰ and would be almost and more from a beginning.⁵⁰ For if we happen to know respecting any thing, that, when it is present to any thing, it renders that thing better, to which it is present; and, moreover, (if) we are able to cause that thing to be present to the other,⁵¹ respecting which we may be the fellow-counsellors,⁵¹ so that a person might acquire it in the easiest and best manner—Perhaps you do not understand what I am saying; but in this way you will more easily understand it. If we happen to know that the sense of sight, when present to the eyes, makes those eyes to which it is present better; and, moreover, if we are able to cause the sense of sight to be present to the eyes, it is evident that we know what the sense of sight is, respecting which we may be the fellow-counsellors, so that a person may acquire it in the easiest and best manner. For if we did not know this very thing, what the sense of sight is, or what that of hearing is, we should be not at all⁵² counsellors or physicians worthy of any account, respecting either the eyes or the ears, and as regards the manner in which a person might acquire in the best manner the sense of hearing or of sight.

Lys. You speak the truth, Socrates.

Soc. Do not then these persons, Laches, now invite us to consult with them respecting the manner by which virtue, being present to the souls of their sons, may make them better?

Lac. Entirely so.

Soc. Ought there not then to be at hand the power, namely, to know what virtue is? For if we do not know at all what virtue happens to be; in what way can we become fellow-counsellors to any one, so that he may in the best manner acquire it?

Lac. In no way, it appears to me, Socrates.

⁵⁰—⁵⁰ This I cannot understand; nor could Ficinus; whose version is “et altius repetetur,” which cannot answer to σχεδόν δὲ καὶ μάλλον ἐξ ἀρχῆς δὲ εἶναι. Taylor’s translation is equally wide of the Greek—“or nearly it will be something which rather flows from a principle.”

⁵¹—⁵¹ The words within the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁵² Literally, “at leisure.” On συχολῶ thus used, see the commentators on Soph. CEd. T. 434.

Soc. Say we then, Laches, that we know what it is?

Lac. Yes, we say so.

Soc. What we know then, cannot we also tell, what it is?

Lac. How not?

[18.] Soc. Let us not, however, thou best of men, speculate forthwith about the whole of virtue—for that perhaps would be a rather great undertaking; but let us first see about a certain part of it, if we are sufficiently able to know it; and thus,⁵⁴ it is probable, the speculation will be more easy to us.

Lac. Let us do so, Socrates, since you wish it.

Soc. Which of the parts of virtue then shall we select? Or is it not evident that it is that, to which the instruction in arms seems to tend? Now it seems to the many to tend to fortitude. Is it not so?

Lac. It seems very much so.

Soc. Let us then in the first place, Laches, endeavour to state what fortitude is; and in the next place, we will consider by what means it can be present to young men so far as it is possible for it to be present by study and instruction. But do you endeavour to state what fortitude is.

Lac. By Zeus, Socrates, it is not difficult to state. For if any one is willing to remain in his place, and defend himself from the enemy, and does not fly, rest assured that he would be a brave man.

Soc. You speak well, Laches; but perhaps from not speaking clearly myself, I am the cause of your not answering what I intended to ask, but something else.

Lac. How say you this, Socrates?

Soc. I will tell you, if I am able. A brave man, as you say, is one who, remaining in his place, fights with the foe.

Lac. So I say.

Soc. And I also. But what on the other hand is he, who, while flying,⁵⁵ fights with the foe, and does not remain in his place?

Lac. How flying?

Soc. Just as the Scythians surely are said to fight, no less

⁵⁴ Ficinus has "in hunc modum," as if he had found in his MS., οὕτως, ὡς τὸ εἰδός, not merely ὡς τὸ εἰδός—

⁵⁵ Jacobs refers to Horace, Od. i. 35, 9, "Scythas et versis animosum equis Parthum."

while flying than pursuing. And Homer some where, praising the horses of Æneas, says, (Il. v. 225,) Hither and thither swiftly to pursue

And fly they know ;

and for this very thing he praises Æneas himself, and calls him, through his skill in flying, "in flight expert."

Lac. And very properly, Socrates: for he is there speaking of chariots; but you are speaking about the Scythian cavalry; for so they fight; but the heavy-armed infantry of Greece (fight) as I say.

Soc. Except perhaps the Lacedæmonians, Laches. For they say that the Lacedæmonians, when they engaged with the Gerrophori at Plataea,⁵⁶ were not willing to remain and fight against them, but fled;⁵⁷ but when the ranks of the Persians were broken, they rallied and fought like cavalry, and thus won the battle.

Lac. You speak the truth.

[19.] Soc. ⁵⁸ This then I meant as the reason for saying),⁵⁸ that I was the cause of your not answering correctly, because I did not put the question correctly. For wishing to ask you not only about those, who are brave amongst the heavy-armed, but also about those in the cavalry, and in every form of war, and not only about those brave in battle, but also those in the dangers of the sea, and such as act a manly part in diseases, in poverty, and in political affairs, and still further, not only such as bear themselves bravely up against pain or fear, but also bear themselves up against desires or pleasures, both by remaining, or turning their backs—for there are surely some men, Laches, brave in things of this kind likewise.

Lac. And very much so, Socrates.

⁵⁶ These were some Persian troops, who carried bucklers made of osiers and willows united, probably not unlike the targets, at which persons shoot with a bow and arrows.

^{58—58} This seems to be what Plato meant to say. But the Greek is merely Τούτο τοίνυν αἴτιον ἔλεγον. Perhaps it was τούτο τοίνυν τὸ αἴτιον ἐν ἔλεγον λέγων. Ficinus has "Merito ergo dicebam?"

Soc. All these, therefore, are brave; but some of them possess fortitude in pleasures, others in pains, others in desires, and others in fears; and others, I think, possess timidity in these very same things.

Lac. Entirely so.

Soc. What then is each of these? This is what I was asking. Try then again to tell me, in the first place, what is that fortitude, which is the same in all these. Or do you not yet understand what I mean?

Lac. Not very well.

[20.] Soc. But I will speak in this way; just as if I had asked, What is the swiftness, which happens to be present with us in running, in playing on the harp, and in speaking, and in learning, and in many other things, and we nearly possess that, about which it is worth while to say any thing, in the acts of the hands or feet, or mouth or voice, or mind. Or do not you also say so?

Lac. Entirely so.

Soc. If, therefore, any one should ask me—What, Socrates, do you call that, which you denominate swiftness in all things? I should say to him, that I call by the name of swiftness that power, which accomplishes many things in a short time, as regards the voice, and running, and all other things.

Lac. And you would say rightly.

Soc. Do you then endeavour, Laches, in like manner, to define fortitude. What is that power, which is the same in pleasure and in pain, and in all the things in which we just now said it is, and is afterwards⁵⁹ called fortitude.

Lac. It appears then to me to be a certain endurance of the soul, if one must speak of that, which exists connected with fortitude taken universally.

Soc. And this must be, if we are to reply to the question asked by ourselves. This then appears to me, that you do not consider every kind of endurance to be fortitude. And I too infer it from hence; for I nearly know, Laches, that you think fortitude to belong to the things which are very beautiful.

⁵⁹ I cannot understand ἔπειτα; nor could Ficinus, whose version is "fortitudinem per singula nominari,"—which leads to εἰς πάντα—similar to εἰς ἀπαντα in § 21, or εἰς ἕκαστα. They, however, who wish for a long but unsatisfactory defence of ἔπειτα, may turn to the note of Engelhardt.

Lac. Rest assured that it does belong to things the most beautiful.

Soc. Is not, therefore, that endurance, which subsists in conjunction with prudence, beautiful and good?

Lac. Entirely so.

Soc. But what of that endurance, which subsists with folly? Is it not, on the contrary, hurtful and evil-working?

Lac. Yes.

Soc. Do you then say that a thing of this kind is beautiful, though it is evil-working and hurtful?

Lac. This, Socrates, (would be) not just.

Soc. You do not then acknowledge such an endurance as this to be fortitude, since it is not beautiful; but fortitude is beautiful.

Lac. You say true.

Soc. Prudent endurance therefore, according to your assertion, would be fortitude.

Lac. So it seems.

[21.] Soc. Let us see then in what it is prudent; or whether it is prudent in all things both great and small. Thus, for instance, if some one endures to spend his money prudently, knowing that, by thus spending it, he should obtain more, would you call him a brave man?

Lac. By Zeus, not I.

Soc. Or if some one, being a physician, while his son or any one else is attacked with an inflammation in the lungs, and requests him to give something to eat or drink, should be inflexible and persist (in denying. Is this fortitude?)

Lac. Not even this at all.

Soc. But in the case of war, where a man is enduring and willing to fight, and reasoning prudently with himself, through knowing that others will give him assistance, or that he shall fight against foes fewer and of less account than those on his own side, and, further still, that he has the advantage of the ground, would you say that this man, enduring with such like prudence and preparation, is braver than him in the opposite army, who is willing to stand his ground and endure?

Lac. The man in the opposing army seems to me, Socrates, to be the braver.

Soc. And yet the endurance of the latter is more imprudent than that of the former.

Lac. You say true.

Soc. And will you say that the man, who endures in a cavalry engagement, with a knowledge of horses, is less brave than him, who endures without science?

Lac. To me at least it appears that he is.

Soc. And he too, who with the art of a slinger, or archer, or of any other kind, is enduring?

Lac. Entirely so.

[22.] Soc. And will you say, that such as are willing to descend into a tank, and there to endure swimming, although not skilled in that exercise, or in any thing else of that kind, are braver than those who are skilled in them?

Lac. What else, Socrates, could one say?

Soc. Nothing, if indeed he think so.

Lac. But I do indeed think so.

Soc. And yet, Laches, such persons encounter danger and endure more imprudently than those, who do this with art.

Lac. So they appear.

Soc. Did not then unseemly and imprudent boldness and endurance formerly appear to us to be hurtful likewise?

Lac. Entirely so.

Soc. But fortitude was acknowledged to be something beautiful.

Lac. It was acknowledged.

Soc. But now on the other hand we say that the unseemly thing, namely, imprudent endurance, is fortitude.

Lac. We seem so.

Soc. Do we then appear to you to speak well?

Lac. By Zeus, Socrates, not to me.

Soc. In your own language, then, Laches, you and I are not Dorically harmonized; for our works do not accord with our words. For some one, as it seems, would say in deed that we have a share of fortitude; but he would not say in word, as I think, if he should hear us now discoursing.

Lac. You speak most truly.

[23.] Soc. What then, does it appear to you to be beautiful for us to be in this condition?

Lac. By no means.

Soc. Are you willing then for us to yield to what we said, to this extent?

Lac. To what extent, and to what assertion?

Soc. To that which orders us to endure. If then you are willing, let us persist in the inquiry, and endure, lest fortitude itself should deride us for not bravely searching it out; if, perchance,⁶⁰ endurance itself is fortitude, Lac. I indeed, Socrates, am prepared not to previously stand aloof, although I am unaccustomed to such like conversations. But a certain love of contention against what has been said has laid hold of me, and I am truly indignant that I am so unable to tell what I have in my mind. For I seem to myself to conceive what fortitude is; but I know not how it has just now escaped me, so that I cannot comprehend it in words and say what it is.

Soc. But ought not a good huntsman, my friend, to keep running in pursuit, and not to give up.

Lac. By all means.

Soc. Are you then willing for us to invite Nicias also to the hunting, if perchance he is at all more ready to find a path than we are?

Lac. I am willing; for how not?

[24.] Soc. Come then, Nicias, and if you possess any power, assist your friends, tossed, as it were, in a storm of words and in doubt; for you see how pathless are our affairs. Do you then state what you think fortitude is, and free us from this doubt, and confirm by reason what you conceive it to be.

Nic. You appear to me, Socrates, for some time past, not to have well defined fortitude; for of that, which I have heard you correctly asserting, you make no use.

Soc. What is that, Nicias?

Nic. I have often heard you asserting that each of us is good, as regards the things in which he is wise, but bad, as regards those of which he is ignorant.

Soc. By Zeus, Nicias, you speak the truth.

Nic. If, therefore, the brave is a good man, he is clearly a wise man.

Soc. Do you hear, Laches?

Lac. I do; but I do not very well understand what he means.

* Heusde after Abresch in Dilucid. Thucyd. p. 174, renders πολλάκις by "perchance." But how the word, which means literally an act frequently done, can be applied to one rarely done, I cannot understand. The notion has however been frequently adopted by Stalbaum.

Soc. But I seem to understand; and the man seems to me to call fortitude a certain wisdom.

Lac. What kind of wisdom, Socrates?

Soc. Why do you not ask this of him?

Lac. I do.

Soc. Come then, Nicias, tell him what kind of wisdom fortitude would be according to your reasoning; for it is surely not that belonging to the hantboy.

Nic. By no means.

Soc. Nor yet that belonging to the harp.

Nic. Certainly not.

Soc. But what is it then, or of what is it the science?

Lac. You very rightly interrogate him, Socrates; and let him tell us what he says wisdom is.

Nic. I say then, Laches, that it is the science relating to things of dread and daring, both in war and in all other things.

Lac. How absurdly, Socrates, he talks!

Soc. Looking to what do you say this, Laches?

Lac. To what? Wisdom is surely separate from fortitude.

Soc. Nicias does not say so.

Lac. He does not, by Zeus; and therefore he is a trifler.

Soc. Let us then teach, but not revile him.

Nic. It is not so. But Laches seems to me, Socrates, to be desirous for me likewise to appear to say nothing to the purpose, because he too appeared just now to be such a kind of person.

[25.] Lac. Entirely so, Nicias; and I will endeavour to show this. For you do say nothing (to the purpose); since, for example, in diseases do not physicians know things of dread? Or do brave men seem to you to know this? Or do you call physicians brave men?

Nic. By no means.

Lac. Neither do you give that name, I think, to husbandmen, although they know things of dread in agriculture; and all other artificers know things of dread and daring in their own arts; and yet they are not in any respect the more brave for this.

Soc. What, Nicias, does Laches appear to you to say? He appears, however, to say⁶¹ something.

⁶¹ Instead of μῆντοι, I should prefer ἐμμοιγε, on account of the antithesis in Nicia.

Nic. He does indeed say something, and yet not what is true.

Soc. How so?

Nic. Because he thinks that physicians know something more about the sick than the being able⁶² to say that a thing is healthful or unhealthful. Now they do know only so much as this. But whether to be well is a thing of dread to any one rather than to be ill, think you, Laches, that physicians know this? Or do you not think that it is better for many not to recover from disease than to recover? For tell me this. Do you say that it is better for all men to live, and that it is not better for many to die?

Lac. I think that the latter is the case.

Nic. To those then, to whom it is an advantage to die, do you think the same things are dreadful, as to those to whom it is (an advantage) to live?

Lac. Not I.

[26.] Nic. But do you grant physicians to know this, or to any other artificer beside the man, who knows what are things of dread,⁶³ and what are not,⁶³ whom I call a brave man?

Soc. Do you understand, Laches, what he says?

Lac. I do; and I perceive that he calls prophets brave men: for who else knows to whom it is better to live than to die? And yet, Nicias, do you acknowledge yourself to be a prophet,⁶⁴ or to be neither a prophet nor a brave man?

Nic. What then, do you think it belongs to a prophet to know things of dread and daring?

Lac. I do; for to whom else does it?

Nic. Much more, thou best of men, to him of whom I was speaking; since it is necessary for a prophet to know merely the signs of future events, whether there will be to any one death, or disease, or the loss of property, or victory, or defeat, either in battle or in any other contest. But which of these things it is better for any one to suffer or not to suffer, how does it belong to a prophet, more than to any other person, to judge of?

⁶² Such is Taylor's translation, as if he read with Stephens, οἷοί τε αἶψα, and thus met the difficulty which Stalbaum seems to find here. Stephens suggested likewise οἷόν τι—

^{63—64} The words between the numerals Bekker first restored from four MSS. They were in the MS. of Ficinus likewise, as shown by his version, "metuenda et non metuenda."

⁶⁴ This is rather a hard hit at Nicias; who, as we know from Thucydides, Aristophanes, and Plutarch, placed no little confidence in diviners.

Lac. I do not understand, Socrates, what he means to say. For he does not show whom he calls brave, either a prophet, or a physician, or any other person, unless he says that this brave person is a certain god. To me then Nicias appears to be unwilling to ingenuously confess that he is saying nothing to the purpose; but he turns himself upwards and downwards, concealing his perplexity; and both you and I would have been able to turn ourselves in this way, had we wished not to appear to contradict ourselves. If, indeed, our speeches had been in a court of justice, he would have had some reason to act in this manner; but now in such a conference as this, why should you vainly deck yourself with empty words?

Soc. For no reason, as it appears to me, Laches. But let us see, lest Nicias thinks he is saying something to the purpose, and does not assert this merely for the sake of talking. Let us then inquire of him more clearly what he means; and if it shall appear that he says any thing pertinent, let us assent to him; if not, we will teach him better.

[27.] Lac. Do you then, Socrates, if you will, question him; for I have questioned him enough.

Soc. Nothing prevents me, for the questioning will be in common, both on my account and yours.

Lac. Entirely so.

Soc. Tell me then, Nicias—for I and Laches unite in the speech—do you say that fortitude is the science of things of dread and daring?

Nic. I do.

Soc. But it does not belong to every man to know this; since neither a physician nor a prophet knows it, nor will a man be brave, unless he acquires this science. Did you not say so?

Nic. I do.

Soc. According to the proverb⁶⁵ then, in reality every sow would not know this, nor would it become valiant.

Nic. It does not seem to me it would.

⁶⁵ The proverb—"This e'en a sow would know"—was applied to those who could, although ever so stupid, still learn.

Soc. It is then evident, Nicias, that you do not believe that even the Cromyonian sow⁶⁶ was brave. I do not say this in jest; but I think it is necessary for him, who asserts this, to admit that no wild beast is brave; or to grant that any wild beast, a lion, or a leopard, or any boar, is so wise, as to be born to know⁶⁷ what few men, through the difficulty of knowing, do. But he who lays down fortitude to be, what you lay it down, must necessarily say that a lion and a stag and a bull and an ape, are similarly formed by nature with respect to fortitude.

[28.] Lac. By the gods, Socrates, you speak well; and do you, Nicias, truly answer us. Do you say that these wild beasts, which we all of us acknowledge to be brave, are wiser than we are? or, in opposition to all, dare you to call them not brave?

Nic. Indeed, Laches, I do not call either a wild beast or any thing else brave, which through ignorance⁶⁸ has no fear of things of dread, but (I call it) fearless and stupid. Or, do you think, that I call children brave, who through ignorance, fear nothing? But I am of opinion, "the fearless" is not the same with "the brave." For, I think, that of fortitude and forethought very few have a share; but of confidence and boldness, and fearlessness, together with the want of forethought, very many men and women and boys and wild beasts have. Those acts therefore which you and the many call courageous, I call rash,⁶⁹ but the brave are the prudent, about whom I am now speaking.

Lac. Behold, Socrates, how well this man bedecks himself, as he thinks, with fine words; for those, whom all men ac-

⁶⁸ The reading of ἀγνοίας has been hitherto found only in the MS. used by Ficinus, as shown by his version, "propter ignorantiam." All the rest have ἀνοίας.

knowledge to be brave, he endeavours to deprive of this honour.

Nic. Not I indeed, Laches; but take courage. For I say that you and Lamachus⁷⁰ are wise, if you are brave, and many others of the Athenians likewise.

Lac. Against this I will say nothing; although I could say something, lest you should say that I am in reality an Aixōnean.⁷¹

Soc. Say nothing, Laches; for you seem to me to have not at all⁷² perceived that Nicias here received this wisdom from our friend Damon; and Damon is very intimate with Prodicus,⁷³ who appears indeed to distinguish the best of the sophists' such kind of terms.

Lac. For it becomes a sophist, Socrates, to be ingenious on such kind of subjects, rather than the man, whom the city thinks fit to place in a post of pre-eminence.

Soc. It does, thou blessed man, indeed become him, who presides over things of the greatest consequence, to have the greatest share of wisdom. But it appears to me a thing worthy of consideration, with a view to what does Nicias thus define fortitude.

[29.] Lac. Consider, Socrates, this yourself.

Soc. This I intend to do, thou best of men. Do not, however, imagine that I shall dismiss you from your share in the conversation; but do you apply your mind, and ponder with me upon what has been stated.

Lac. Let it be so, if it seems to you to be necessary.

Soc. Nay, but it does seem. And do you, Nicias, tell us again from the beginning. You know that⁷⁴ [at the begin-⁷⁰ Lamachus was one of the three generals of the Athenians united in command with Nicias and Alcibiades, in the Sicilian expedition, where he was killed. Of his answering to his name, which means, "Great-Fighter," a proof is furnished in the Acharnians of Aristophanes.

⁷¹ From hence it would seem that Laches was of the ward of Aixōnes, the people of which were noted for their evil-speaking. A similar character has been given to the locality of Billingsgate in London.

⁷² Instead of οὐδὲ μὴ, which is defended by Hermann, with whom Stalbaum agrees, Jacobs on Athenæus, Indic. p. 393, correctly suggested οὐ δαμῆ.

⁷³ To the attention paid by Prodicus to the different meaning of names Plato has made frequent allusion.

⁷⁴ The words between the brackets are evidently an interpolation.

ning of our conference]⁷⁴ we considered fortitude as a part of virtue.⁷⁵

Nic. Entirely so.

Soc. Did not you answer also, that it was a part, there being likewise other parts, which, taken together, are called virtue?

Nic. How not?

Soc. Are you then speaking of the same⁷⁶ parts as I am? For in addition to fortitude, I call temperance, and justice, and certain other things of such kind, (parts of virtue). Do not you too?

Nic. Entirely so.

Soc. Hold,⁷⁷ then. For in these we agree. But let us consider about things of dread and daring, that you may not think some of them one thing, and we another. What then we consider such, we will state; and do you, if you do not agree with us, instruct us. We consider then those to be things of dread, which occasion fear; but those to be things of daring, which do not occasion fear. Now neither evils past, nor present, occasion fear; but those which are expected: for fear is the expectation of a future evil. Or does it not appear so to you, Laches, likewise?

Lac. Very much so, Socrates.

Soc. You hear then, Nicias, our assertions, that future evils are things of dread; but future things, either not evil or good, are things of daring. On these points say you in this way or in another?

Nic. In this.

Soc. But do you call the science of these things fortitude?

Nic. I do.

[30.] Soc. Let us then still further consider, whether, on the third point, you think with us.

Nic. What is that?

Soc. I will tell you. For it appears to me and to Laches

⁷⁴ Compare The Statesman, § 44, p. 306, B., ἀνδρίαν—μέρος ἐν ἀρετῇ εἶναι.

⁷⁵ Ficinus has "eadem, quas ego, partes." He therefore found in his MS. raṭrà, not raūra.

⁷⁷ Hermann on Viger. n. 252, renders Ἐγὼ, "keep your mind upon what we have said." Heindorf on Gorg. § 35, and Protag. § 96, "Stop here." I have translated, "Hold," as in Shakspeare: "Lay on, Macduff; And damned be he, who first cries, 'Hold, enough.'" here, that of whatever things there is a science, there is not one science of a thing past, ⁷⁸(so as) to know ⁷⁸how it has been, another of things present, (to know) how they are, and another (to know) how that, which has not yet been, may be and will be in the most beautiful manner; but the science is the same. For instance, with respect to healthiness at all times, there is no other than medical science, which, being one, sees what is, and has been, and will be healthy, and how it will be so. And with respect to things constantly ⁷⁹growing out of the earth, agriculture is in a similar state. So too, in warlike concerns, you yourselves would testify that the science of a general thinks beforehand in the most beautiful manner of other things and of what is about to be; nor does it think it ought to be subservient to the prophet's art, but to rule over it, as knowing better what does and will take place in war. And the law enjoins this; not that the prophet shall rule over the general, but the general over the prophet. Shall we say so, Laches?

Lac. We will say so.

Soc. What then, do you agree with us, Nicias, that the same science has a knowledge of the same things, future, and present, and past?

Nic. I do; for so it appears to me, Socrates.

[31.] Soc. Is not then fortitude, as thou, the best of men, sayest, the science of things of dread and daring?

Nic. It is.

Soc. But things of dread and daring have been confessed to relate, the latter to future good, the former to future evil.

Nic. Entirely so.

Soc. But the same science is relating to the same things, and to ⁸⁰[those about to be], ⁸⁰and existing in every way.

⁷⁸⁻⁷⁹ The Greek is εἰδέναι simply, without any thing to govern it; and hence probably it was omitted by Ficinus. Perhaps Plato wrote ὅστις εἰδέναι: for ὅστις might easily have dropt out after γεγονότος.

⁷⁹ Instead of αὐ, the balance of the sentence requires αἰ, to answer to the preceding εἰς πάντας τοὺς χρόνους.

⁸⁰⁻⁸¹ The words within brackets are evidently a partial interpolation; but which was more full in the MS. of Ficinus, as shown by his version, "earundem rerum, præteritarum præsentiumque et futurarum," who however omits καὶ πάντως ἔχόντων. On the other hand, Stalbaum was the first to reject καὶ πάντως ἔχόντων, in the next speech of Socrates.

Nic. It is so.

Soc. Fortitude, then, is not the science of things of dread and daring alone; for it not only has a knowledge of future good and evil, but also of things present and past, [and existing in every way] like the other sciences.

Nic. So it seems.

Soc. You have therefore, Nicias, given us in your answer some third part nearly of fortitude. And yet we asked you what the whole of fortitude is. And now, as it seems, according to your (former)⁸¹ assertion, fortitude is not only the science of things of dread and daring, but, as your present reasoning on the other hand (shows), fortitude would be that which nearly relates to all things good and evil, and⁸² existing in every way.⁸³ ⁸³ To change again thus,⁸³ or how say you, Nicias?

Nic. To me, Socrates, it seems good.

Soc. Does then such a person as this appear to you, blessed man, to be deficient at all in virtue, if he knows every good, and how in every point they are, and will be, and have been, and every evil in the same manner? And do you think that he is wanting in temperance, or justice, or holiness, to whom alone it belongs in matters relating to gods and men to practise caution touching the things of dread and not, and to obtain for himself what is good by knowing how to associate in a proper manner (with others)?

Nic. You appear to me, Socrates, to say something to the purpose.

[32.] Soc. That then which is now, Nicias, adduced by you, would not be a part of virtue, but virtue in general.

Nic. So it seems.

Soc. And yet we said that fortitude is one of the parts of virtue.

⁸¹ The antithesis in νῦν αὖ just afterwards requires us to read here κατὰ τὸν πρῶτον ὁδὸν λόγον, not merely τὸν ὁδόν—

⁸²⁻⁸³ Ficinus has more fully, "omniumque simpliciter quomodolibet sese habentium."

⁸³⁻⁸³ This I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus; whose version is, "Sicne modo an aliter judicas, Nicias." Stalbaum however, after Engelhardt, says that in the Greek, ὁὔτως αὖ μεταρτίζεσθαι ἢ πῶς λέγεις, the infinitive depends upon λέγεις, i. e. "Say you that you change your mind thus, or how?" But he forgot that to a bipartite question there could not be a single answer.

Nic. We said so.

Soc. But that which is now said, does not appear to be so.

Nic. It seems not.

Soc. We have not therefore, Nicias, discovered what fortitude is.

Nic. We do not appear (to have done so).

Lac. And yet I thought, friend Nicias, that you would have discovered it, since you had a contempt for myself, when I answered Socrates; and I had very great hope that you would discover it by the wisdom, which has come from Damon.

Nic. It is an excellent thing indeed, Laches, for you to think it a matter of no moment, that just now you appeared to know nothing about fortitude, and that you are looking to this, whether I shall appear to be another such (ignorant person); and it will be, as it seems, of no consequence for you together with myself to know nothing of things, which it is fitting for a man to have a knowledge of, who thinks himself something. You therefore appear to me to act in reality after the general manner of men, in looking⁸⁴ not to yourself, but to others. I think, however, on the points which he have spoken about, there has been said something in reason; and, if any thing has not been stated sufficiently, it shall be afterwards set to rights, with the assistance both of Damon, whom you somehow fancy you are ridiculing—and this too, although you have never seen him—and of others also; and, when I shall have fortified these assertions, I will instruct you too without grudging; for you appear to me to be in very great need of instruction.

Lac. You are, Nicias, wise indeed; but, however, I advise Lysimachus here and Melesias to bid farewell to you and me concerning the education of youth; but not to dismiss this Socrates, as I said from the first: for I would do the very same thing, if my children were of a proper age.

Nic. I too agree with you in this, to seek no other person, if Socrates is willing to take the lads under his care; since most gladly would I intrust Niceratus⁸⁵ to him, if he is willing; but when I put him in mind at all on this subject, ⁸⁴ I have followed Schleiermacher, who reads βλέπων for βλέπειν: which Stalbaum would defend by quoting Sympos. p. 180, D. But there it is easy to alter φράσαι into φράσας.

⁸⁵ This Niceratus is said to have been subsequently killed by the thirty tyrants. Demosthenes alludes to another in Midian, p. 567, R.

He recommends others to me, and is unwilling to (do aught) himself. But see, Lysimachus, whether Socrates will hearken more to you.

[33.] Lys. This at least, Nicias, is just; since I should be willing to do many things for him, which I would not be very willing to do for many others. How say you then, Socrates? Will you hearken to me and make an effort with us for these lads to become the very best.

Soc. It would certainly be a dreadful thing, Lysimachus, not to be willing ⁸⁶ to make an effort for any to become the best. ⁸⁶ If, therefore, in the conversations just now held, I have appeared to know something, but these not to know, it would be just to invite me especially to this employment; but now (not); for we are all similarly in a doubt. Why then should any one select any of us? To me indeed it seems that (he should select) none. And since this is the case, consider whether I appear to advise you rightly. Now, men, I say it is requisite—for there will be a carrying out into public of our discourse—that we should all of us in common inquire, in the first place, after the best master for ourselves—for we need one—and in the next place for these lads, sparing neither money nor any thing else; but to let ourselves be in the condition we now are, I do not advise. And if any one ridicules us, because at this time of life we think proper to frequent a school, it seems to me that it will be meet to bring forward Homer in our defence, who says, (in Od. xvii. 34,)

“ Shame ill is present to a man in need.”

We therefore, bidding a person go hang, if he says a word against us, let us take care in common of ourselves and the lads.

Lys. To me indeed, Socrates, what you say is very agreeable; and by how much the older I am, by so much the more willing am I to learn together with the youths. Do you then act in this way. Come to-morrow morning early to my house, and do not do otherwise, in order that we may consult about these very things. For the present let us break up the meeting.

Soc. This, Lysimachus, I will do; and, god willing, I will come to you to-morrow morning.

⁸⁶—⁸⁶ The words within numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

INTRODUCTION TO THE MENEXENUS.

ALTHOUGH it is generally a matter of little moment, how the dialogues of Plato follow each other, yet it is not without a purpose that I have placed the Menexenus after the Laches. For while in the one there is a discussion on Fortitude considered abstractedly, in the other are to be found convincing proofs of the manner in which the Athenians conducted themselves, when their Fortitude was put to the severest test, during their wars abroad, and dissensions at home; and when, like some states of modern times, they met, after a series of victories, with signal reverses, and found their very capital in the hands of their enemies, and a new form of government imposed upon them by the victors.

The object of the dialogue, or rather of the oration contained in it, is to celebrate the country, and the deeds of those who were to be honoured by a public funeral, after they had fallen in the fight that took place near Nemea, according to Xenophon in H. Gr. iv. 2, 8, and to which Demosthenes alludes in Leptin. § 41, as the great battle near Corinth.

But as that event occurred after the death of Socrates, Plato has, it would seem with the view of showing that the whole is a fiction, put the speech into the mouth of his master, and feigned, as in the case of Diotima in the Banquet, that the philosopher had been the pupil of Aspasia, and merely repeated what he had learnt as a lesson from her.

With regard to the details of a public funeral at Athens, it will be sufficient to refer to Thucydides ii. 34., who has there attributed to Pericles what he had written, no doubt, himself, just as Plato has done in the case of Socrates.

According to Dionysius, the Athenians commenced the practice of pronouncing funeral orations at the close of the Persian invasion under Xerxes: and if any reliance is to be placed on Philostratus, Gorgias wrote the one spoken over those who had fallen at Salamis. And it was perhaps with the view of showing himself, if not superior, at least equal, to that celebrated Sophist, that Plato was induced to compose his own speech; from the perusal of which Cicero was led to declare, that had the philosopher chosen to become a pleader, his style would have been at once fluent and grave.

Despite however the testimony of the Roman orator, who has on various occasions alluded to this speech, and translated even a portion of it, Schleiermacher, with whom Ast and Goettling on Aristotle's Polit. ii. 6, p. 328, agree, has ventured to call in question its genuineness by arguments, to which Loers has in his edition given a full and, as I conceive, a satisfactory reply. But as the discussion is too long, even if it were requisite, for insertion here, it will be sufficient to state, that, as the dialogue is twice referred to by Aristotle, if it be not Plato's, it must be the production of some unknown writer, who, living between the time of Plato and Aristotle, was clever enough to imitate so completely the style of a man generally considered inimitable, as to deceive not only his most ardent admirer Cicero, but his perpetual opponent Aristotle.

With respect to one of the grounds on which the accusation of spuriousness rests, that Plato has made some statements at variance with the truth of history, Stalbaum acutely observes that such a step was doubtless taken designedly; for Plato would otherwise have failed to preserve the correctness of his ridicule of the orators; who, with the view of tickling the ears of their audience, were guilty of similar aberrations from the strict line of truth, as seems to have been proved by Cæcilius in his lost work, mentioned by Suidas, Περὶ τῶν κατὰ ἱστορίαν ἢ κατὰ ἱστορίαν εἰρημίων τοῖς ῥήτορας—"On the statements made by the orators according to history, or contrary to it."

The first translation of the dialogue into English was by Gilbert West, in 1749, which Taylor says he has followed, except where it was not sufficiently close. The second was by myself anonymously, printed at Cambridge in 1835, to which I added a few notes on the Greek text. A portion of it was translated likewise by Mitchell in the Quarterly Review, No. 54, p. 399; and the commencement of it, up to the speech itself, by Shelley, is given in his posthumous Essays and Letters, Ed. Lond. 1845.

MENEXENUS.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND MENEXENUS.

SOCRATES.

[1.] FROM the Forum,¹ or from whence,² Menexenus?³

Men. From the Forum, Socrates, and from the Council-Hall.⁴

Soc. What business had you especially at the Council-Hall? Or is it indeed evident that you deem yourself to have finished your course of learning and philosophy,⁵ and as being now all-sufficient,⁶ you think of turning yourself to matters of greater moment, and to become, O wonderful man, a ruler at your age over us your elders,⁷ so that your family may never fail in supplying us⁸ with some person as a guardian?⁹

¹ Although "Forum" is a Latin rather than an English word, yet it has become almost naturalized, as answering the best to the Greek ἀγορά.

² This ellipse of ἐλ, is similar to that of "es," in Horace, "Unde et quo, Catius?"

³ Of this Menexenus nothing more is known than that he was a friend of the Ctesippus mentioned in the Euthydemus, and very captious in argument, and that both of them visited Socrates when in prison. See Lysis, p. 206, D., 211, B., and Phædo, p. 59, B.

⁴ The Council-Hall was near the Forum, as stated by Pseudo-Plutarch in ii. p. 842.

⁵ By παίδευσις καὶ φιλοσοφία were meant all that a youth or man had learnt, or ought to know.

⁶ A similar sarcasm is in Clitophon, p. 407, B., directed against those, who, having gone through the education of a youth, fancy themselves to be quite sufficient for the duties of a life of virtue.

⁸ According to Lucretius in i. 43, "Memmi clara propago," seems "nunquam communi deesse saluti."

⁹ The sneer in the word ἐπιμελητής will be best understood by a passage

Men. If you, Socrates, will permit it, and advise me how to rule, I should be ready to do so; but if otherwise, not. However I went just now to the Council-Hall, on hearing that the Council were about to select¹⁰ the party who is to speak (an oration) over the dead. For you know they are about to ordain a public funeral.

Soc. (I know it) very well. And whom have they selected?

Men. Not one. But they have put it off till to-morrow. I think, however, Archinus¹¹ or Dion will be selected.

[2.] Soc. In good truth, Menexenus, it appears on many accounts to be very nearly a beautiful thing to fall in battle.¹² For if a person dies so, although poor, he meets with a fine and gorgeous burial, and with praise, if he be a person of no mark,¹³ from men at once clever, and not extolling at random; but who, having had their speeches prepared for a long time, eulogise so very beautifully that, by saying what is and is not to the purpose upon each point, and making a beautiful tissue of words, they bewitch our very souls, pouring forth in every way encomiums upon the state, and upon those who have died during the war, and upon all¹⁴ [our ancestors],¹⁴ who have lived before us, and¹⁵ [bestowing praise]¹⁵ upon us ourselves, who are still living, so that I feel myself, Menexenus, vastly ennobled in being praised by them, and I stand constantly on tip-toe,¹⁶ and am charmed; fancying that I have bein Aristophanes Plut. 908, Πῶς οὖν δειλὴς ἢ πόθεν, μηδὲν ποιῶν; Τῶν τῆς πόλεως ἐμ' ἐπιμηλητῆς πραγμάτων καὶ τῶν ἰδίων πάντων. Σὺ; τί παθὼν; Βούλομαι.

¹⁰ According to Demosthenes, Περὶ Στεφάν. p. 321, the people at large, and not the Council alone, selected the speaker.

¹¹ On this Archinus see Valesius on Harpocration, p. 253. Photius, on Bibliothec. cod. 240, says that Isocrates introduced into his Panegyric much from a funeral oration of Archinus; while Dionysius Halic. p. 1027, ed. R., asserts that Plato imitated those two orators.

¹² So Horace, "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori."

¹³ Compare Cicero Pro Quinctio, § 15, "Mors honesta turpem vitam exornat:" and Shakspeare, Henry V., "For he, who sheds this day his blood with us, Shall be my brother, be he ne'er so vile."

^{14—15} The words within brackets, τοὺς προγόνους, are evidently an interpolation of τοὺς ἐμπροσθεν. In like manner προγόνων has been inserted after τῶν ἀνωθεν ἐνι in § 5.

^{15—16} The word ἐκπαινούντες is perfectly unnecessary after the preceding ἐγκωμάζοντες.

¹⁶ I have adopted αἰσιχόμενος for ἀπρώμενος, the splendid restoracome on the instant ¹⁷taller, and nobler, and handsomer (than before); ¹⁷ and as is wont, ever some strangers accompany me, and are fellow-hearers; to whom I appear to be immediately a greater object of respect. For they too seem to be affected in the same way as I am, both towards myself and the rest of the state, being persuaded by the speaker that it is more worthy of wonder than before. And this feeling of self-importance remains with me for more than three days; so greatly does the speech and even the tone of the orator ring in and sink into my ears, that scarcely on the fourth or fifth day do I recollect myself, and perceive where upon earth I am; and for awhile fancy myself only not living in the isles of the blessed.¹⁸ So clever are our orators!

[3.] Men. You are always, Socrates, making fun with the orators. For the present however I think the person selected will have no easy task, for the choice is made altogether on a sudden, so that the orator will be compelled to speak perhaps off-hand.

Soc. How so, my good (friend)? The speeches of each of these are ready prepared. Besides it is not difficult to speak tion of Valckenaer on Callimach. p. 244, who refers to § 20, where αλωπειραι is used in a sense not very dissimilar. With regard to the idea, compare Eurip. Ion, 1180, ἐν δ' ἄκροισι βᾶς ποσίν. El. 845, ὄνυχας ἐπ' ἄκρους στάς. Soph. Aj. 1239, Ὑψήλ' ἐκόμπεις κάπ' ἄκρων ὠδοιπόρους:

where Musgrave quotes Libanius, i. p. 326, ἐπ' ἄκρων πορεύεσθαι δακ-τύλων: and Aristoph. Ἀχ. 581, κάπειδ' τοῦτό τις εἶποι, Εὐθὺς διὰ τοὺς στεφάνους ἐπ' ἄκρων τῶν πυγιδίων ἐκάθησθε: where the Scholiast observes that οἱ ἐπαίνων εἰς ἑαυτοὺς γινόμενων ἀκούοντες εἰώθασιν τὴν πυγὴν, τῆς καθίδρας ἐξαίρειν. Compare too Lucillius, Sat. viii. "Gallinaceu quum victor se gallus in hostem Sustulit in digitos, primoresque erigit ungues:" and Virgil, "Constitit in digitos arrectus." But the most apposite passages are in Shakspeare, Henry V., "He that outlives this day, and comes safe home, Shall stand on tip-toe, when this day is named." So too in Troilus and Cressida, "'Tis he, I ken the manner of his gait; He rises on the toe; that spirit of his In aspiration lifts him from the earth." Stalbaum defends ἀπροώμνος by translating ἴστηκα,
"I stand astonished." But such is the meaning of ἐξίστηκα alone, which is found here in a solitary MS.

¹⁷—¹⁷ This is well put into the mouth of Socrates, who was of small stature, ignoble birth, and ugly face.

¹⁸ This idea Plato got from Aristophanes in Σφηκ. 640, ὥστ' ἔγωγ' ἡξάνομην ἀκούων, κἀν μακάρων δικάζειν αὐτὸς ἰδοῦσα νήσοις, ἡδόμενος ἄλγοντι: while Plato himself was probably in the mind of Milton, who says in Comus—"Who, as they sang, would take the prison'd soul, And lap it in Elysium."

off-hand upon such topics. But if it were requisite to speak well of the Athenians amongst Peloponnesians, or of Peloponnesians amongst Athenians, there would be need of a good speaker to persuade (others) and gain (for himself) renown. But when a man enters upon such a contest before those whom he is praising, it seems not a great thing to speak well.

Men. Do you think it is not, Socrates?

Soc. It is not, by Zeus.

Men. Do you think that you would be able to speak yourself, if it were requisite, and the Council were to select you?

Soc. It would, Menexenus, be nothing wonderful, if even I were able to speak, whose teacher happens to be a woman by no means contemptible in oratory; but who has made many other persons good speakers, and, one superior to (all)¹⁹ the Greeks, Pericles,²⁰ the son of Xanthippus.

Men. Who is she? Or (rather), it is plain that you mean Aspasia.²¹

Soc. I do mean her; and Connus too,²² the son of Metrobius. For these two are my masters, he in music, and she in oratory. Now that a man thus educated should be a skilful speaker is nothing wonderful; since even he, who has been worse educated than myself, ²³[having learnt]²³ music from Lamprus,²⁴ and oratory from Antipho²⁵ of Rhamnous,²⁶ would be able to gain a reputation by praising Athenians, at least in the presence of Athenians.

[4.] Men. And what would you have to say, were it requisite to speak?

Soc. Myself perhaps nothing from myself. But only yes-

¹⁹ Ficinus alone has "Græcorum omnium."

²⁰ Respecting the oratorical powers of Pericles, see the commentators on Phædrus, p. 269, E., Aristoph. Ach. 476, Eupolis Δήμους Fr. vii., and Quintilian x. 1, 82.

²² Connus is again mentioned in Euthyd. p. 272, C., as the music-master of Socrates.

²³ The word παίδευσις is evidently unnecessary after ἐκπαίδευσθαι.

²⁴ Of Lamprus little is known except what is to be gathered from C. Nepos in Epaminond. § 2, Plutarch ii. p. 1142, and Athenæus ii. p. 44.

²⁵ Respecting this orator, see Ruhnken's "Dissertat. de Antiphonte." According to Thucydides viii. 68, "he was the best to think upon a question, and, what he had thought upon, to express."

²⁶ This was one of the wards of Athens.

terday I heard Aspasia going through a funeral oration on these very persons. For she had heard what you tell me, that the Athenians were going to choose the person to speak. And then she went through partly on the instant what it would be proper to say, and partly what she had formerly thought of, when it seems she was composing the funeral oration that Pericles pronounced,²⁷ and was glueing together some scraps from that.

Men. Could you remember what she said?

Soc. Unless I do her wrong. At least I learnt it from her, and I almost received some cuffs, because I was forgetting it.

Men. Why then do you not repeat it?

Soc. (I fear) my mistress may be offended, if I make her discourse public.²⁸

Men. (Fear) not, Socrates, at all; but tell it, and you will gratify me greatly, whether you choose to call it the speech of Aspasia, or of any one else; only speak it.

Soc. But you will perhaps laugh at me, if I, an elderly man, appear to be still acting the boy.

Men. Not at all, Socrates: but do speak it by all means.

[5.] Soc. Since then I must gratify you,²⁹ so as even, should you order me, to undress myself and dance,³⁰ I will gratify you; since we are alone.³¹ Listen then; for she spoke, commencing, as I think, with the mention of the dead themselves in this manner.

As regards our acts, these here have received all the honours due to them; and after receiving them, are now proceeding on their fated road, having been sent onward by the state in ²⁷ To this passage is to be traced the notion of Synesius, that the funeral oration put into the mouth of Pericles by Thucydides, ii. 35, was the production of Aspasia.

²⁸ On this use of ἐκρίπειν, see Fischer on Xenophon K. II., vi. 1, 5, τοῦτο ἐρόλησσε ἐξενεγκεῖν. The Latin word is "efferre." Cicero de Orator. § 24, "Petamque a vobis ne has meas ineptias efferatis." There is an allusion here to the secrets of the Mysteries. See Lucian in Νεκρομαχ. § 2.

²⁹ This is said because Socrates feigned himself to be unable to resist the charms of beauty in young persons. Compare Meno, § 9.

³⁰ On the dancing of Socrates see Lucian Περὶ Ὀρχησ. § 25, and Xenophon, M. S., quoted by Athenæus i. p. 21.

³¹ This formula is found in Aristoph. Thesm. 472, and in Plato, Parmen. p. 137, A.

common, and individually by their families and friends. But as regards our words, the honour still left undone the law enjoins us to pay to the men; and it is meet to do so. For of deeds performed nobly the remembrance by a well-spoken speech is an honour paid to those, who have acted, from those who hear. There is need then of such a discourse, as shall praise sufficiently the dead, and kindly advise the living, by exhorting the descendants and brethren of the dead to imitate their valour, and by comforting their fathers and their mothers, and whoever of their ancestors more remote are still alive. How then shall such an oration present itself? Or from whence shall we rightly begin to praise those brave men, who, when living, delighted their friends with their valour, and bartered their death for the safety of those who survive.

To me it seems that we must praise them on the ground of their nature, as they were by nature good. Now they were good by being sprung from the good.³² Let us then celebrate, in the first place, their noble birth; in the second, their nurture and education; and afterwards let us show forth their conduct, in practice, how they proved it to be honourable and worthy of those³³ (advantages). [6.] In the first place, the commencement of their nobility was in the birth of their ancestors, not being in-comers, nor exhibiting their descendants as foreign settlers in the land, ³⁴[themselves coming from elsewhere,]³⁴ but sprung from the earth,³⁵ and dwelling and living in their own country really; (and) nursed, not like other nations, by a step-mother,³⁶ but a parent, the very land which they inhabited, and in which they now lie dead; in the ³² So Horace, "Fortes creantur fortibus."

³⁴⁻³⁵ To the words ἄλλοθεν σφῶν ἡκόντων Dionysius was the first to object. They are perfectly useless after ἐπηλυς.

³⁶ A similar distinction between a mother and step-mother, as applied to a country, is found in Plutarch, Apophthegm. p. 760, ed. R., Velleius Pat. ii. 5, and Petronius, quoted by Gottleber.

places³⁷ of the mother which begat and nursed them, and received them (again) beneath her.³⁸ Most just then is it to celebrate first the mother herself; for thus at the same time it results that the noble birth of these here is made their adornment.

[7.] And worthy is this land to be praised by all men, and not by ourselves alone, on many other grounds, but on this the first and greatest, that she has the good fortune to be loved by the gods. And to this my assertion the quarrel of the gods,³⁹ who contended for her, and their decision, bear testimony. Whom then the gods have praised, how is it not just for her to be praised by all mankind? Her second praise would be justly this, that at the very time when the whole earth sent up and produced animals of all kinds, both wild beasts and cattle, this land of ours was seen to be unprolific of, and free from, savage beasts; and of all animals selected and produced man, who surpasses all the others in intellect, and alone acknowledges Justice and the Gods.⁴⁰ Now of this assertion there is a great proof in that this land has produced the ancestors of these men, and ours also. Now every

³⁷ In lieu of τόποις, Ficinus has "visceribus;" which led West to translate "bosom," and myself to read κόλποις: which is put beyond all doubt by the Epigram in Demosth. Περὶ Στεφάν. § 289, Γαῖα δὲ πατρὶς ἔχ' ἐν κόλποις τῶν πλείστα καμόντων Σώματα. Erycius Epigr. 12, Χθὼν μὲ καὶ ἡ κόλποις ὕστατα δεξαμένη. Epigr. Inc. 544, Γαῖα μὲν ἐν κόλποις κρύπτει τόδε σῶμα Πλάτωνος. Chrysostom. Homil. vi. p. 80, E., ἡ κοινὴ πάντων ἡμῶν μήτηρ τοὺς κόλπους ἀπλώσασα. Meleager Epigr., Γᾶ—τὰν πανόδυτον Ἑρέμα σοῖς κόλποις, μάτερ, ἐναγκαλίσαι. So too in the Latin Epitaph on Publ. Scipio, "Quare libens te in gremium recepit Terra;" and Pliny, H. N. ii. 63, "Terræ propter eximia merita cognomen inditum maternæ venerationis—Quæ nos nascentes excipit; natos alit; editos (read, 'adultos') sustinet; novissime complexa gremio—ut mater operiens."

³⁹ On this contest between Athéné and Poseidon, see Ovid. Metam. vi. 70.

⁴⁰ So Cicero Legg. ii. 8, "Nullum est animal præter hominem, quod habeat notitiam dei."

thing that brings forth, possesses food fitted for that which it may bring forth; by which fact is clearly shown what woman is really the mother, and who is not, but merely a supposititious one, should she not possess the fountain⁴¹ of nourishment for the child. This very sufficient proof does our land and mother afford of her having produced men; for at that time she alone and first brought forth the corn of wheat and barley,⁴² as the food of man, and by which the human race is nourished in the best and easiest⁴³ manner, as having in reality produced that very animal. And such proofs it is fitting to receive rather in favour of the earth than of the woman. For the earth did not in conceiving and producing imitate woman, but woman imitated the earth; neither did this land enviously withhold these her fruits, but distributed them to others. In the next place, she sent up for her offspring the olive, an assistance in toil;⁴⁴ and after she had nourished and reared them up to manhood, she introduced to them gods⁴⁵ for their rulers and teachers, whose names it is fitting upon such an occasion⁴⁶ to omit. For we know who have given the materials for life, by teaching us first⁴⁷ the arts requisite for our daily subsistence, and instructed us in the acquirement and the use of arms for the protection of our country.

[8.] Thus born, and educated, lived the ancestors of these persons, after having framed a polity, which it is well to bring in a few words to your recollection. For a polity is the nurse of men; a good one of good men, and the contrary of bad. It is necessary then to show, that our ancestors were brought up under a good polity, through which both they became good, and those also who are now; amongst whom

⁴² This story is repeated by Lucretius, vi. 1.

⁴³ To avoid perhaps an hendyadis, Ficinus has "commodissime." Plato wrote, I suspect, κάλλιστα καὶ ῥᾶστα, not καὶ ἀριστα—

⁴⁴ So in Protag. p. 334, B., τὸ ἐλαιον—σώματι ἀρωγόν.

⁴⁵ The gods alluded to are Athéné, Ares, and Hephæstos, as shown by Legg. p. 920, D.

⁴⁶ During a funeral; as is shown by Demosthenes in Timocrat, τῆς δὲ (Σεμίλης) υἱὸν ὄντα οὐ πρόπον ἵσθιν ἐπὶ τοῦδε τοῦ τάφου ὀνομάζειν.

⁴⁷ The word πρώτους, which is an evident corruption, is omitted by Ficinus.

the dead here happen to be a part. The same polity was then, as it now is, an aristocracy; under which we still live as citizens, and for the most part (have done so) from that time to this. One person calls it a democracy, another by another name, such as he pleases. But it is in truth ⁴⁸ a government by the best, combined with a good opinion of the people.⁴⁹ For kings have ever existed with us, at one time hereditary, at another elected,⁵⁰ but the people possessing for the most part the power of the state, has delegated the offices and government to those, who were successively deemed to be the best; and no man has ever been excluded from the want of influence or wealth,⁵⁰ or his ignorance of his parentage,⁵¹ nor held in honour for the contrary qualities, as is done in other cities; but there was only one limitation; that he, who was deemed to be wise and good, should possess the power and office. Now the cause of this polity is the equality of birth. For other states are made up of men of every country, and of unequal conditions; so that their polities, as well tyrannies as oligarchies, are of unequal character. They therefore live, some considering each other as slaves, and some as masters. But we and ours, born all brethren, from one mother, consider ourselves neither the slaves nor the lords of each other; but that the equality of our births, according to nature, compel us to seek an equality of government, according to law, and to yield to each other upon no other ground, except the reputation of valour and of mind. [9.] Hence it is that the fathers of these men, and ours also, and themselves too, being thus nurtured in all freedom, and nobly born, have exhibited before all men many and glorious deeds, both in private and public, deeming it their duty to fight for freedom and in behalf of Greeks even against Greeks, and against ⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹ Such seems to be the meaning of the words μετ' εὐδοξίας πλήθος, ἀριστοκρατία. Compare Thucyd. ii. 65, ἐγίνετό τε λόγῳ μὲν δη-μοκρατία, ἔργῳ δὲ ὑπὸ τοῦ πρώτου (or rather ἀρίστου) ἀνδρός ἀρχή; and Aristotle Polit. iii. 3, εἰ τις ἐστίν, ἣν καλοῦμεν ἀριστοκρατίαν, ἐν ᾗ κατ'ἀρετὴν αἱ τιμαὶ δίδονται καὶ κατ' ἀξίαν.

⁵⁰ This alludes to the second Archon, called Βασιλεὺς, "king."

⁵¹ The same fact is mentioned by Thucyd. ii. 37. According to Plu-tarch, Aristides was the person, who got a law passed to enable the Archons to be selected from the poorer people, as well as the richer.

⁵² To such ignorance Juvenal alludes—"Vos humiles, inquis, vulgi pars barbarians in defence of Greeks combined. But how when Eumolpus and the Amazons⁵² brought an army against the country, and enemies even still before them, they defended themselves, and how they defended the Argives against the Cadmeans,⁵³ and the Heracleidæ against the Argives,⁵⁴ the time is too short to relate worthily; and poets too have already hymned sufficiently their valour in verse, and pointed it out to all; and should we now attempt to adorn the same subject in a prose discourse, we should perhaps appear to be only second to them. For such reasons then it seems right to pass over these matters, especially since they have received their due. But such acts, as no poet has yet thrown round⁵⁵ them a renown suited to their worth, and which are still in remembrance, all these it seems I ought by praising to call to mind, and by introducing them to others make them a subject for songs and other kind of poetry in a manner becoming the actors. Now of those to which I am alluding, the chief are these. When the Persians were taking the lead in Asia and attempting to enslave Europe, the children of this soil and our forefathers arrested their course; whom it is both just and necessary to remember first and to praise their valour. He however who would praise it properly, ought to have been born in word,⁵⁶ and lived an eye-witness at that very period, ⁵² Valckenaer on Eurip. Phœn. 541, observes that Plato has been here guilty of an anachronism. For the Amazons invaded Attica not in the time of Eumolpus, but of Theseus, by whom they were conquered; whereas it was against Erechtheus that Eumolpus was engaged in war, as stated by Thucydides, ii. 15. Isocrates has taken especial care to avoid the anachronism in Panegyr. § 19, Ἠλθον εἰς τὴν χώραν ἡμῶν Θράκες μὲν μετ' Εὐμόλπου τοῦ Ποσειδῶνος, Σκύθαι δὲ μετ' Ἀμαζόνων, τῶν Ἀρεως θυγατέρων, οὐ κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν χρόνον: who has however in § 18 alluded to the story of the Amazons, which Strabo, in xi. p. 770, considers to be merely a fable.

⁵³ The story alluded to is told briefly by Herodotus, ix. 27, and by Isocrates, in Panegyr. § 15, and rather differently in Panathen. p. 524. For the length of time doubtless made it difficult to arrive at the truth.

⁵⁴ On this story see the Heracleidæ of Euripides.

⁵⁶ In lieu of λόγῳ, omitted by Ficinus, Stephens suggested λέγω, with which may be compared φημι in § 10, and λέγω in § 12.

when the whole of Asia was subject to its then third monarch. The first of these was Cyrus ; who after effecting the freedom of the Persians, his countrymen, did through his high spirit reduce the Medes his (former) masters to slavery, and became the ruler of the rest of Asia, as far as Egypt. His son (Cambyses) subdued Egypt, and as much of Libya as it was possible to march against. The third, Darius, made Scythia the boundary of his empire by land, and by his fleet commanded the sea and islands, so that no one presumed to be his opponent. The very thoughts of all men were enslaved ; so many, and great, and warlike nations did the Persian power reduce to subjection.

[10.] Now Darius having accused us and the Eretrians of plotting against Sardis,⁵⁷ made it a pretence for sending an army of five hundred thousand men⁵⁸ ⁵⁹ in ships and transports, and a fleet⁵⁹ of three hundred sail, and ordered Datis, their commander, to return and bring back the Eretrians and Athenians captive, if he wished to keep his own head on. Datis sailing to Eretria against a people, who amongst the Greeks of that time were in the highest repute for the affairs of war, and not few in number, got these very men into his power in three days ;⁶⁰ and that none might escape, he searched through the whole country after this fashion. His troops having marched to the boundaries of Eretria, and extending themselves from sea to sea, they joined their hands, and thus went through the country, that they might be able to say to the king, that not a person had escaped. With the same design they sailed down from Eretria to Marathon, as being an easy thing for them to unite in the same fate the Athenians with the Eretrians, and to carry them off. During these transactions, some of which were done and others attempted, none of the Greeks gave any assistance to the Eretrians ; nor, except the Lacedæmonians, to the Athenians ; and they did not arrive till the day after the battle.⁶¹ All the rest, struck with terror, and ⁵⁷ See Herodotus, v. 101.

⁵⁸ Cornelius Nepos says there were only 200,000 foot and 10,000 horse. Pausanias and Valerius Max. 300,000 foot.

⁵⁹—⁶⁰ This repetition of ἐν ταῖς πλοίοις καὶ ναυσὶ, ναῦς δὲ τριακοσίας, does not look like Plato's style; to say nothing of πλοῖα in the sense of "transports." The passage is evidently corrupt.

(for)⁶⁴ the safety of Greece; in which the Lacedæmonians and Athenians had a common share. Now this the greatest and most difficult exploit did they all assist;⁶⁵ and for this their valour they are both now celebrated by us, and will be by those hereafter in the time to come. Subsequent to this, many states of Greece still sided with the Barbarian; and the king himself was reported to have a design of making an attempt once more upon the Greeks.

[12.] It is just then for us to bear in remembrance those, who to the exploits of their forefathers put the finish in our deliverance, by clearing themselves from, and driving away, the whole Barbarian power from the sea. Now these were they, who fought in the naval battle at Eurymedon,⁶⁶ and they, who were in the expedition to Cyprus,⁶⁷ and who sailed to Egypt,⁶⁸ and to many other places. Of these we ought to have a recollection, and to acknowledge our thanks to them; because they caused the king⁶⁹ to fear for, and to attend to, his own safety, and not to be plotting for the destruction of the Greeks. Now (the whole of)⁷⁰ this war was endured to the end⁷¹ by the whole power of the state in behalf of ourselves and others, speaking a common language, in opposition to the Barbarians. But when peace⁷² was made, and the city held in honour, there fell, as is wont, upon the successful, first rivalry from men, and after rivalry envy, which placed

⁶⁷ On these combined expeditions, see Thucyd. i. 94 and 104, and Diodor. Sic. xi. p. 459, ed. Wess.

⁶⁹ Before πάσῃ, Stalbaum ingeniously conjectures that πᾶς has dropt out.

⁷¹ With διηνικήθη ὁ πόλεμος compare "bella exhausta" in Virgil.

⁷² This is generally supposed to be the peace made by Cimon with the Persians, to which there is an allusion in Isocrates, Aristides, and Plutarch. Some, however, of the scholars of Germany have asserted that no such peace was ever made.

this city, although unwilling, in a state of hostility with the Greeks. [13.] Hereupon a war breaking out, the Athenians came in collision with the Lacedæmonians at Tanagra, and fought in defence of the liberties of Bœotia; and as the battle was undecisive,⁷² the action afterwards⁷³ brought matters to a decided issue. For some went away, leaving the Bœotians,⁷⁴ whom they had been assisting; while our troops, after obtaining a victory, on the third day,⁷⁵ at CEnophyta, justly brought back those, who had been unjustly driven out. These then were the first after the Persian war, who, in behalf of liberty, gave their assistance to Greeks against Greeks; and being men of bravery, they freed those whom they were assisting; and, held in honour by the state, were buried in this cemetery here the first. After this, a great war arose, and all the Greeks brought an army against us, ravaged our country, and unworthily repaid the obligation they owed to the state. But our troops, after defeating them in a sea-fight, and taking the Lacedæmonian⁷⁶ leaders prisoners in the island of Sphagia,⁷⁷ did, when it was in their power to destroy, spare and give them up, and made a peace, conceiving that in a war with a fellow-tribe⁷⁸ one ought to carry on the contest only to the point of victory, and not, through the resentment of a particular state, to destroy the common interest of Greece; but against the Barbarians to war even to utter destruction. Fitting then is it to praise such men, who after being engaged in that war, now lie buried here; because they showed that, ⁷² Thucydides says, in i. 108, that the victory was on the side of the Lacedæmonians.

⁷³ This alludes to the battle of CEnophyta, where the Athenians gained the day.

⁷⁴ Bekker would expunge Βοιωτῶς entirely. For the Lacedæmonians assisted the Thebans, and not the Bœotians.

⁷⁵ According to Thucydides, it was the sixty-second day. Hence in lieu of τρίτη, Clinton, in Fest. Hellenic. p. 256, proposed to read τρίτη ξ', i. e. "sixty-third."

⁷⁷ This island near Pylus is more commonly called Σφακτηρία—and so read seven MSS. at least.

⁷⁸ How the Athenians and Lacedæmonians could be called τὸ ὁμόφυλον, I cannot understand. The sense requires rather τὸ ὁμόφωνον—as in § 12.

if any one doubted whether in the former war against the Barbarians some others were (or not) superior to the Athenians, he doubted without reason. For they there proved, when Greece was in a state of dissension, their superiority in war, by their getting into their hands even those, who had stood forward in defence of the other Greeks, and by defeating single-handed those, with whom formerly they had conjointly overcome the Barbarians. [14.] After this peace,⁷⁹ there was a third war, unexpected and terrible, in which many brave men fell, who lie buried here; and many too about Sicily, after they had erected very many ⁸⁰trophies in behalf of the liberty of the Leontines, to assist whom in accordance with their oaths⁸¹ they sailed to those regions; but when, through the length of the voyage, the state was in difficulties, and unable to minister to their wants, their hearts failed them, and they were unsuccessful; ⁸²of whose temperate conduct and valour their enemies and antagonists have poured forth greater praise than have friends on the conduct of the others.⁸² Many likewise (fell) in the Hellespont,⁸³ after having taken all the ships of the enemy in one day, and gaining many other ⁷⁹ This peace of one year is mentioned by Thucyd. iv. 117.

⁸⁰ These, says Stalbaum, were the victories at Myle and Syracuse, mentioned by Thucydides and Diodorus. But they were too few in number to be called πλεῖστα. I suspect however that Plato wrote κάλλιστα—For though not many, they were still most honourable.

⁸¹ This refers to the fact stated by Thucyd. in iii. 86, and vi. 19.

⁸²⁻⁸³ Loers and Stalbaum agree in rejecting all the words between the numerals as an interpolation. I trust however I restored the author to himself, in my edition of the Greek text, by simply altering ἔχουσι into χίονσι—where χίον is applied to praise, as “fundere” is to “laudes” by Lucretius. The origin of the metaphor is to be traced to Homer; who has in Od. A. 432, ἀλσχος ἔχουσι: in Od. E. 38, ἰλεγχίην κατέχοντας: in Od. X. 469, κατ’ οὐκείδα χεῖαν. So too Æschylus—εὐκραῖα χεούσας in Suppl. 631, and Εὐδοίαν—χίονεν in Glauc. Fr. Pindar likewise in Pyth. x. 86, ὅπα—προχέοντων: in Isthm. viii. 128, Θρήνον—ἔχεναν, after the Homeric χίει πολύγηρυν ἀοιδήν: from whence Fritzsche has happily corrected ἰάν χίων for ἰαχίων in Ced. T. 1222. With regard to the sentiment, compare Suidas in Κράτερος—Κράτιστος δ’ ἄρ’ οὗτος, δρου τὰ τῆς ἀρετῆς ἔργα καὶ παρὰ τοῖς ἐναντίοις τῷ ἱπαινῷ συμφωνούσης ἔχει. With respect to τοῖς ἄλλοις, the allusion is to the Lacedæmonians, who had assisted the Syracusans, but had probably given offence by the austerity of their manners to the more luxurious inhabitants of Sicily.

⁸³ Engelhardt refers this to the naval engagement at Cyzicum, (a. c. 410,) mentioned by Xenophon, Hellen. i. 1, 18.

victories. But what I said as to the terrible and unexpected nature of the war, by that I mean, that the other Greeks carried to such an extent their feeling of animosity to this state, as to dare to make overtures by an embassy to the king of Persia,⁸⁴ their greatest foe, and to bring in again for their particular interests that person against the Greeks, whom they had, in common with us, driven out, and to collect an allied army of all⁸⁵ the Greeks and Barbarians against this city. Upon which occasion the strength and valour of the state became very conspicuous. For when our enemies fancied it to be already beaten down in war, and had intercepted⁸⁶ our ships at Mitylene, then did these men, confessedly the bravest, go in person on board the vessels, and giving assistance with sixty sail, gained a victory⁸⁷ over the enemy, and delivered their own friends; but meeting with unmerited misfortune in not having their bodies picked up at sea,^{88 89} they lie where they ought not.⁸⁹ These it is our duty ever to remember and to praise. For by their valour we were victorious, not in that engagement only, but through the rest of the war; for through them the state gained the reputation, that it would not be beaten down in war,⁹⁰ not even by all men (combined).

⁸⁴ This was Darius Nothus; whose name is not mentioned by Thucydides in viii. 18, where the terms of the alliance are given.

⁸⁵ As the Athenians were themselves Greeks, the word πάντας would include them too amongst the others. Perhaps Plato wrote ἐπιόντας—For it was not sufficient merely to collect an army; but it should be stated likewise that the troops marched against the city; and it was to fill up this idea that Ficinus translated “ad hanc urbem obsidendam colligere.”

⁸⁶ By the Spartan admiral Callicratidas. See Xenophon Hellen. i. 6, 24.

⁸⁷ This was gained B. C. 406, near Arginusæ, a small island between Lesbos and the continent. Above seventy triremes were taken or destroyed, and of the ten Lacedæmonian vessels only one escaped.

⁸⁸ As the bodies were not recovered, they were left without the rites of burial, which the Greeks held to be a great misfortune; and hence, for their neglect, the Athenian commanders were tried, and six of them executed.

^{89 89} The Greek is κείναι ἐνθάδε. But as the bodies were not picked up at all, they could not be lying at Athens. Hence Wesseling wished to read οὐ κείναι ἐνθάδε: in lieu of which I suggested, sixteen years ago, κείναι, ἐνθ' οὐ δεῖ, as I have translated. To meet the difficulty, Stalbaum considers the words οὐκ ἀναιρεθέντες ἐκ τῆς θαλάττης an interpolation.

⁹⁰ This could hardly be said with truth in the face of the victory gained by

And the reputation was founded in truth. We have been beaten by our dissensions, not by others. By them at least we are even now unsubdued. But we have subdued ourselves, and (in turn) have been subdued. After these transactions a calm ensuing, and peace made⁹¹ with all the others, a domestic war⁹² was carried on in such a manner, that were it fated for men to fall into dissensions, every person would pray that his country might be no otherwise in disorder. For how delightedly and familiarly did the people of the Piræus, and those of the city, mingle with each other! And contrary to the expectations of the other Greeks, with how much moderation⁹³ did they lay aside their hostility against those at Eleusis! And for all these acts there was no other cause than their real consanguinity, producing a firm friendship and clanship, not in words, but deeds.

[15.] It is meet then to hold in remembrance those too who died in that war by each other's hands, and to reconcile them, as we best can, by offering prayers and sacrifices on these occasions to the deities,⁹⁴ who now have them in their power, forasmuch as we ourselves are also reconciled. For not through malice and hatred did they lay hands upon each other, but through their evil fortune. And of these facts we are ourselves the living witnesses; for, being of the same family with them, we have forgiven each other for what we have done and suffered. After this the city had rest, and enjoyed a profound peace, pardoning the Barbarians, who, having been ill enough⁹⁵ treated by this state,

Lysander at Ægos-Potamos, and which led to the occupation of Athens itself by the successful Spartan commander—events on which Plato has very cleverly said nothing.

⁹¹ This alludes to the peace made with Lysander, by which the Athenians were forced to destroy the long walls that united the city with the sea.

⁹² This refers to the period, when Thrasybulus acted against the thirty so-called tyrants, appointed by Lysander to govern the city.

⁹³ Of the moderation shown by the people towards the partisans of the thirty tyrants who had retired to Eleusis, Cornel. Nep. in Thrasybul. § 2, gives a remarkable proof, by stating that when the peace was made, it was agreed that no one but the thirty tyrants should suffer in person or in purse.

⁹⁴ The deities were the powers below. Compare Eurip. Alc. 257.

defended themselves not insufficiently; but she felt a resentment against the Greeks, when she remembered what a return they had made, after they had been well treated by her, by uniting with the Barbarians, and depriving us of the very fleet, which had formerly saved them, and by pulling down our walls, by which⁹⁶ we had prevented their own from falling. The city then having determined not to assist Greeks, enslaved by each other or the Barbarians, remained thus.⁹⁷ While then we were in this mood, the Lacedæmonians, fancying that we, the aiders of freedom, were fallen, and that now was the time for them to enslave the rest, attempted to do so. [16.] But what need is there to be prolix? For I should speak of subsequent events that are not of old date,⁹⁸ nor before the time of many men still living.⁹⁹ For we know that, to obtain the aid of this city, there came terror-struck the leading men amongst the Greeks, Argives, and Bœotians, and Corinthians; and, what was the greatest miracle⁹⁹ of all, how even the king came into such a difficulty, as to think there was no safety from any other quarter than from this very city, which he had¹⁰⁰ previously, with great eagerness,¹⁰⁰ attempted to destroy. And indeed, should any one wish to accuse the state on just grounds, he would rightly accuse her by stating this alone; that she is ever too full of pity, and the hand-maid of the weaker party. For at that very time she was not able to be firm, and to keep to her resolution, of not assisting those, when in the act of being enslaved, who had injured her own citizens:¹ but she was bent from her purpose, and did give assist-

⁹⁷ Instead of οὕτως, I have suggested αὐτως, "at leisure." Compare Hom. Il. A. 133, αὐτὰρ ἐμ' αὐτως ἦσθαι δεινόμενον.

⁹⁸⁻⁹⁹ The MSS. vary between οὐδὲ πρὸ πολλῶν ἐτῶν and οὐδὲ πολλῶν ἀνθρώπων. Heindorf on Gorg. p. 448, A. § 3, suggested οὐδὲ πολλῶν ἀνθρώπων. Bekker, οὐδ' ἐπ' ἄλλων—By uniting the readings of the MSS., I elicited, sixteen years ago, οὐδὲ πρὸ πολλῶν ἀνθρώπων ἐπὶ ὄντων, as I have translated.

¹⁰⁰ This is the best rendering of θεῖον, by which was meant a thing sent by a divine power, or was the work of one.

¹⁰⁰⁻¹⁰⁰ In lieu of προθύμως, Stalbaum has adopted πρόσθεν from two MSS. Plato probably wrote both, as I have translated.

¹ The pronouns σφᾶς αὐτοῦς are to be referred to πολῖτας, which is to be obtained from πόλις.

ance; and by such aid so delivered them from slavery, that they were free men, until they again made themselves slaves. She did not however dare to assist the king, through a feeling of reverence for the trophies of Marathon, and Salamis, and Plataea; but, by permitting merely the exiles² and volunteers to assist, she did confessedly preserve him; and after building her walls and fleets, and undertaking a war, when compelled to do so, she carried on hostilities with the Lacedæmonians for the protection of the people of Paros.³

[17.] The king however being afraid of the city, when he saw the Lacedæmonians declining a war by sea, and desirous to withdraw himself, made a demand⁴ for the Greek colonists on the continent, whom the Lacedæmonians had previously consented to give up,⁵ if he were to join with us and our allies in war; conceiving that, as we should not comply with it, there would be a pretence for withdrawing himself. In the case of the other allies he was deceived; for the Corinthians, and Argives, and Bœotians, were willing to give them up,⁶ and entered into a treaty, and confirmed it by oaths, ⁷[to give up the Greeks on the continent,]⁷ if he would furnish the money supplies. But we alone did not dare to give them up, nor to be a party to the oaths. To such an extent was carried the noble and liberal conduct of the state, at once solid and ² This alludes to Conon, who, after the destruction of the Athenian fleet at Ægos-Potamos, fled to Euagoras, the ruler of Salamis in Cyprus; by whom other exiles from Greece and Athens especially were favourably received, as we learn from Isocrates in Euag. p. 302.

³ Of the war undertaken by the Athenians in defence of the Parians nothing is told elsewhere. Krüger, in Histor. Philolog. Studien. p. 225, would read 'Ποδίων', referring to Xenophon Hellen. iv. 8, 20—25, and Diodor. xiv. 94—97. Bentham thinks the allusion is to a naval victory, gained by Chabrias over the Lacedæmonians between Naxos and Paros, as mentioned by Xenophon, Hellen. v., and Diodorus, xv.

⁴ See Thucyd. viii. 56.

⁵ This was actually done subsequently at the peace of Antalcidas. See Xenophon Hellen. v. 1. But the chronological order of events which Plato has generally followed; makes such an allusion to be here out of place.

⁷— The words within brackets are evidently superfluous.

sound, and naturally a hater of Barbarians, through our being of pure Greek blood, with no mixture of Barbarian. For neither the ⁸ Pelopæes, Cadmuses, Egyptuses, Danauses,⁹ and many others, Barbarians by birth, but Greeks by law, are dwelling with us; but we are very Greeks; not a mixed Barbarian breed; and hence the genuine hatred of a foreign nature has been instilled into the state. Designedly,⁹ then, we were again¹⁰ left alone, from our unwillingness to do a deed disgraceful and unholy by giving up Greeks to Barbarians. Returning then to the same condition as when we were formerly beaten down in war, we did, with a god's assistance, lay down hostilities more successfully than at that period. For we were freed from it, possessing ships, and walls, and our own colonies; and so too,¹¹ contentedly, were our enemies freed from it. We lost, however, in this war some brave men, who met with a difficult country¹² in Corinth, and with treachery at Lechæum. Brave, too, were those, who freed the king, and drove the Lacedæmonians from the sea.¹³ These are the men I am bringing to your recollection; and such as these it becomes all of you to join in praising and investing with honours.

[18.] Such were the exploits of the men who lie buried here, and of the rest, who have died for the state. But though many and honourable are the deeds already related, still many more and more honourable are those, that have been left (untold); for many days and nights would not suffice¹⁴ for him,

⁸ On the use of these plural proper names Loers quotes Theæt. p. 169, B., Ἡρακλῆες τε καὶ Θησίες. Add Phædr. p. 229, D., Γοργόνων καὶ Πηγάδων. Lucian, in Micyll., Κίεροπας—ἡ Σισύφους ἡ Τηλείφους. So Shakspeare, "I think there be six Richmonds in the field:" and Milton, "Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimeras dire."

⁹ In lieu of ὁμῶς, which I cannot understand, Plato wrote, I suspect, as I have here translated, ἐννόως.

¹⁰ It is not easy to state what was the previous occasion.

¹¹ Instead of οὕτως, the sense requires, as I have translated, ὡσαύτως.

¹³ These were the troops, military and naval, under Conon, as shown by Xenophon in Hellen. iv. 8.

who should go through them all. It is the duty then of every man to bear those deeds in mind; and, as in battle, to exhort the offspring of such men not to leave the ranks¹⁵ of their ancestors, nor, yielding to cowardice, to retire rearwards. And I do myself both now exhort you, the children of brave men, and shall hereafter, wherever I may meet with any of you, remind and exhort you to be ever ready to be the bravest of men. But for the present, I feel justified in telling you what the fathers of these men enjoined me to proclaim to their survivors, if they themselves suffered aught, when they had determined to encounter danger. I will tell you then what I heard¹⁶ from them, and what, if they possessed the power, they would now gladly say to you themselves, as I conjecture from what they said then. Imagine, then, you hear them speaking what I now relate as their messenger. These were their words.

[19.] O children! that ye are indeed the offspring of courageous fathers the present deed itself declares. For when it was in our power to live with dishonour, we chose to die with honour, rather than bring you and those after you into disgrace, and shame our own fathers and all our ancestors,¹⁷ conceiving that to him, who dishonours his family, life is no life; and that to such a fellow there is no man or god upon earth a friend, while (living),¹⁸ nor under it, when dead. It behoves you then to keep these our words in remembrance; and if you practise any thing else, to practise it with valour, well knowing that, deficient in this, all other possessions and pursuits are base and wrong. For neither does wealth bring honour¹⁹ to him, who possesses it with a want of manliness, since such a one is rich for another and not for himself; nor do beauty and strength of body, when they dwell with the coward and the knave, appear becoming, but unbecoming

¹⁵ Compare Herodot. vii. 10; ix. 48, Thucyd. ii. 87, and Demosth. Ol. iii.

¹⁷ There is a similar sentiment in Homer, Il. Z. 209, Μηδὲ γένος πατέρων ἀλσχύνεμεν.

¹⁸ To preserve the balance of the sentence, ὄντι must be inserted between οὗτι and ἐπὶ—

¹⁹ So I have translated to prevent the repetition of κάλλος. For Plato wrote, I suspect; πλοῦτος καλὸν φέρει τι—

(rather), and make the possessor more conspicuous, and show off his cowardice. Moreover, all knowledge, when separated from justice and the other (parts) of virtue, appears to be knavery²⁰ and not wisdom. On this account then endeavour to have, as the first and last aim, through all time and by all means, every readiness to surpass to the utmost ourselves and ancestors in glory. For if not, rest assured that, should we conquer you in valour, the victory brings disgrace upon us; but defeat, if we are defeated, a state of blessedness. Now we shall be vanquished the most, and you obtain the victory, if you prepare yourselves not to abuse the glory of your ancestors, nor to expend it wastefully; being convinced that, for a person who thinks himself to be something, there is nothing more disgraceful, than to exhibit himself as held in honour, not on his own account, but the renown of his forefathers.²¹ For hereditary honour²² is to descendants a treasure honourable and magnificent. But to use up the treasure of riches and renown, and from the want of one's own wealth and good repute, ²³not to hand it down to posterity is an act both disgraceful and unmanly.²³ Should you then pursue these objects, you will come to us as friends to friends, whenever your destined fate shall bring you below; but if you disregard them and become debased, not one of us will receive you kindly. Thus much let it be told to our children. [20.] But our fathers and mothers, that are surviving,²⁴ it is very meet to soothe into the supporting as easily as possible their calamity, should any such happen to arise, and not to lament with them—for they do not need any thing to pain them—for their present misfortune is sufficient to produce

²² Cicero Offic. i. 23, "Optima hæreditas a patribus traditur liberis—gloria virtutis."

^{23—24} A similar sentiment is to be found in Thucyd. i. 71, ii. 62, and Arist. Polit. v. 11.

²⁴ Instead of οἱς εἰσὶ, where there is no syntax, one MS. has οἱοι εἰσὶ, which leads to ἄσοι οἷοι εἰσὶ—

that—but to heal and mitigate their sorrow, by reminding them, that the gods have hearkened to what they especially prayed for. ²⁵ Since they did not pray for their children to be immortal, but to be brave and renowned, ²⁵ both of which, the greatest of all blessings, they have obtained; although it is not easy for every thing to turn out in the case of a mortal in this life according to his wishes. By bearing too their misfortunes like men, they will be thought to be in reality the parents of manly children, and to be such themselves; whereas by giving way they will raise a suspicion that they are none of ours, or that the persons who praise us are telling an untruth; neither of which things ought to be; but they ought rather to be themselves our eulogizers, exhibiting by their acts ²⁶ themselves as seeming to be in reality ²⁶ the fathers, men of men. ²⁷ For the old proverb, “Nothing too much,” ²⁸ seems to be well said; and in fact is well said. ²⁹ For by what person so ever all that leads to happiness, or nearly so, is made to depend upon himself, and not upon others, by whose well or ill doing his own acts are compelled to waver, by such a one has the best preparation been made for living (well). ³⁰ This is the man of moderation; ³¹ this the man of courage and prudence; ³¹ and this is he, who, whether his property and children exist or are destroyed, will best obey the proverb; for through trusting to himself, he will be seen to indulge neither in joy nor sorrow overmuch. ²⁹ Such men do we hold, and wish, and assert our relatives to be; and such we now exhibit ourselves, by not feeling too much of reluctance, nor

^{25—26} So Xenophon, on hearing of the death of his son, said, “I have prayed to the gods not for my son to be immortal, but to be brave,”—as we learn from Plutarch. Hence Addison makes Cato say, on a similar occasion, “The gods be thanked; my boy has done his duty.”

^{25—26} The Greek is αὐτοὺς φαινόμενους τῇ ὄντι πατέρας ὄντας—where Engelhardt alone has seen that φαινόμενους and ὄντας could not be thus united. Plato wrote, I suspect—αὐτοὺς, οὐ τοὺς φαινόμενους, τῇ δὲ ὄντι—i. e. “themselves not the seeming, but being in reality—” Compare Aristoph. Ach. 416, Εἶναι μὲν, ὅσπερ εἶμι, φαίνεσθαι δὲ μὴ.

²⁷ On this collocation of words see Heusde Specim. Crit. p. 129.

²⁸ The same proverb is alluded to in Charmid. § 27.

^{29—30} The whole of this passage is translated by Cicero in Tuscul. v. 12, and alluded to in part in Epist. Famil. v. 13.

³⁰ Between ζῆν and οὕτως I suspect εὖ has dropped.

too much of fear, should it be needful to die on the instant.³² We entreat then both our fathers and mothers to pass the remainder of their lives in adopting the very same sentiment ; and to be assured that they will gratify us the most by not lamenting and bewailing us ; and that if the dead have any feeling³³ for the living, they will be the least agreeable to us by disfiguring³⁴ themselves and bearing ill their misfortunes, but that they will please us the most by supporting them lightly and with moderation. For our state is about to have³⁵ an end, which is the most honourable among men ; so that it is becoming rather to glorify than to lament it. By acting then as guardians and nurses to our wives and children, and by turning their minds to such employments, they will in the best way become forgetful of their misfortune, and lead a life more honourable and more correct, and more agreeable to us. Such does it suffice to tell our relatives from us. But we would exhort the state to be the guardian of our parents and children, by giving to the youth of the latter a well-regulated education, and to the old age of the former a worthy support ; although we are well assured, that even if we did not so exhort, there would be taken a sufficient care.

[21.] Such then, ye children and parents of the dead, did they enjoin us to tell you ; and I have, with the greatest readiness possible, told you their message. And I do myself beseech some of you to imitate your relatives, and others to feel a confidence in yourselves, that we are all, in our private and public capacities, about to support the old age of some, and to be the guardians of others, wherever each one may meet with any of them. And surely ye know yourselves the carefulness

³² This sentiment is strangely put into the mouth of those already dead. Instead then of εἰ δεῖ τελευτᾶν, one would have expected εἰ δεῖ δις τελευτᾶν, "if it were needful to die twice." See myself on Crito, § 6, n. 4, and the Commentators on "bis patiar mori" in Horace.

³³ A similar sentiment is to be found in Isocrates Euagor. p. 368, Plataic. § 24, Lycurgus in Leocrat. § 136, Hyperides, quoted by Stobæus, p. 618, Galen. Protrept. § 7, and Sulpicius in Cicero. Epist. Famil. iv. 5.

³⁴ This alludes to the custom of women especially, disfiguring their persons, and beating their breasts, and tearing their hair, under the influence of excessive grief for the death of those dear to them.

of the state, how that by laying down laws³⁶ respecting those who have died in war, it takes charge of their parents and children; and how it has been enjoined upon the magistracy, that is the greatest,³⁷ to watch over them especially, above all the other citizens, so that the fathers and mothers of such may receive no injury; while it brings up together³⁸ the children, through its great desire that their orphanhood may be as little conspicuous as possible; since it stands in the place of a father to them, while they are still children; and when they come to man's estate, sends them to their own homes,³⁹ having first dressed them in a complete suit of armour, thus pointing out and reminding them of the pursuits of their fathers, and giving them the instruments of their fathers' valour; and at the same time, by way of a good omen, (bidding them)⁴⁰ commence their return to the paternal hearth, about to command⁴¹ with strength, as having been decked in arms. The dead too it never fails to honour, by performing each year the established rites for all in common, which have taken place, as is fitting,⁴² individually for each; and in addition to this, by appointing games both gymnastic and equestrian, and of all kinds of poetry; and by standing really in the place of an heir and son to the dead, and in that of a father to children, and in that of a guardian to parents and such-like relatives, it takes upon itself all care of all for all time. Keeping then these things in mind, you ought to bear

³⁹ As the pronoun σφίτερας is reflective, it cannot be applied with propriety to the homes of the youths. Æschines, in Ctesiph. § 154, has more correctly ἀφίησι τρίπεςθαι, ἐπὶ τὰ ἑαυτῶν.

⁴⁰ Ficinus has alone, what the sense requires, "jubet."

⁴¹ I cannot understand ἀρξοντα. I could have understood πράξοντα τι, "about to do something."

⁴² The Greek is ἰδίᾳ ἐκάστῳ ἰδία · where Bekker would expunge the second ἰδία; which I would alter into οἷα δεῖ, as I have translated.

your calamity more lightly; for thus you will be the most dear to the dead and living, and most ready to give and to receive comfort. And now do you and all the rest, having in common, according to custom, wept fully the dead, depart.

[22.] Such, Menexenus, is the speech of Aspasia of Miletus.

Men. By Zeus, Socrates, you proclaim Aspasia to be a happy person, if, being a woman, she is able to compose such speeches as these.

Soc. If you do not credit it, follow me, and you shall hear her speak it herself.

Men. I have often, Socrates, met with her, and know what kind of woman she is.

Soc. What then, do you not admire her, and owe you no thanks to her for this oration?

Men. I owe indeed, Socrates, many thanks either to her or to him, whoever was the person who told it you; and before all others, to him who has now spoken it.

Soc. All will be well; but see that you do not say a word against me, in order that I may hereafter tell you many and beautiful discourses on state affairs.

Men. Be full of confidence. I will say nothing. Do you only tell them.

Soc. So shall it be.

INTRODUCTION TO THE HIPPIAS MAJOR.

Of all the dialogues of Plato, the Hippias Major is perhaps the one best calculated to give a correct idea of the easy and playful manner, in which Socrates, who confessed he knew nothing, was accustomed to confute those, who pretended to know every thing. But it is to be lamented that Plato should have done here, as elsewhere, an injury to the cause he was espousing, by not keeping strictly to the line of truth. For, as remarked by Ast, Hippias the wise is represented as a very silly person; since such alone would think of giving the absurd definitions of beauty put into the mouth of Hippias. But in this very conduct of the writer, we have an internal proof in favour of the genuineness of the dialogue, which some have called in question. For in consequence of similar misrepresentations, Gorgias called him "the modern Archilochus;" and even Socrates himself, after hearing the Lysias, exclaimed, "Ye gods, what lies this young man tells." It is possible, however, that Hippias had in reality given some definitions of beauty, similar to those which are here attributed to him, but which were wanting in the precision of language, that alone gives value to a definition. For unless this had been the case, the whole of the ridicule would have been like the dart of Priam, "telum imbelli, sine ictu."

Hence too I was led to suggest, that in the examples of beauty selected by Plato, there was a parody of those which Hippias had given, with the view of showing, what Sydenham was the first to remark, that the Sophists intended to exhibit a gradation in four different forms of beauty, of which the first was rational; the second irrational; the third affecting the mind, through the medium of the body; and the last affecting the body alone: and thus while the speculative philosophers defined Beauty as existing, first, in the Mind; secondly, in the Body; thirdly, in Morals; and lastly, in Arts; the practical philosopher, Socrates, said, as shown by Xenophon, in M. S. iii. 8. 4—10, and iv. 6. 9, that Beauty consisted in utility and the fitness of things to their proposed ends; but that of Beauty in the abstract we know nothing, as remarked by Plato in the Parmenides, p. 134, C.

With regard to the theories of modern metaphysicians, viewed either abstractedly, or with reference to objects of Nature and Art, the inquisitive reader may turn to Burke "On the Sublime and Beautiful;" and Payne Knight's "Principles of Taste;" and Alison's "Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste."

To the editions of this dialogue by Heindorf and Stalbaum, is to be added my own, published anonymously in 1831, under the title of "Plato's Four Dialogues, the Crito, Hippias, Alcibiades, and Sisyphus, with English Notes;" to which I have referred in difficult and doubtful passages, or where the Notes were too long or too learned to be given here entire, or even to be abridged without detriment to their utility.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND HIPPIAS.

SOCRATES.

[1.] Ο ΤΗΟΥ, the handsome² and clever³ Hippias, after how long a time⁴ hast thou now again⁵ arrived at Athens!

Hip. I have had no leisure time, Socrates. For when Elis wants to transact any business with any other⁶ state, she always comes to me the first, selecting me as an ambassador from the

¹ This dialogue is called "major," to distinguish it from another shorter one called "minor." It is feigned, as remarked by Stalbaum, to have taken place, probably when Hippias, according to Xenophon, in M. S. iv. 4, 5, had, on his return to Athens after a long absence, a conversation with Socrates.

² Sydenham refers the appellation of καλός to the beauty of Hippias' apparel, mentioned in § 25, Hipp. Min., p. 568, B., and Ælian. Var. Histor. xii. 32; but Heindorf says it was merely a common form of address. It seems however never to have been adopted except towards those, who were remarkable for the beauty of their person or dress.

³ Heindorf says that by σοφός is meant a sophist. But as Socrates held the sophists in little estimation, he would rather address Hippias by the name of "wise;" and thus ironically put him even above Pythagoras, who was content to call himself φιλόσοφος, "a lover of wisdom," rather than σοφός, positively "wise."

⁵ Ficinus, unable to understand ἡμῖν, has omitted it altogether. Perhaps it conceals αὐτῶν, as I have translated:

⁶ The Greek is τινα τῶν πόλεων. Ficinus has "externis gentibus," as if he had found in his MS. either τιν' ἀλλοδαπῶν πόλεων, or τιν' ἄλλων πόλεων—

sound, and naturally a hater of Barbarians, through our being of pure Greek blood, with no mixture of Barbarian. For neither the ⁸ Pelopseas, Cadmuses, Ægyptuses, Danauses,⁸ and many others, Barbarians by birth, but Greeks by law, are dwelling with us; but we are very Greeks; not a mixed Barbarian breed; and hence the genuine hatred of a foreign nature has been instilled into the state. Designedly,⁹ then, we were again¹⁰ left alone, from our unwillingness to do a deed disgraceful and unholy by giving up Greeks to Barbarians. Returning then to the same condition as when we were formerly beaten down in war, we did, with a god's assistance, lay down hostilities more successfully than at that period. For we were freed from it, possessing ships, and walls, and our own colonies; and so too,¹¹ contentedly, were our enemies freed from it. We lost, however, in this war some brave men, who met with a difficult country¹² in Corinth, and with treachery at Lechæum. Brave, too, were those, who freed the king, and drove the Lacedæmonians from the sea.¹³ These are the men I am bringing to your recollection; and such as these it becomes all of you to join in praising and investing with honours.

[18.] Such were the exploits of the men who lie buried here, and of the rest, who have died for the state. But though many and honourable are the deeds already related, still many more and more honourable are those, that have been left (untold); for many days and nights would not suffice¹⁴ for him,

⁸—⁸ On the use of these plural proper names Loers quotes Thesæt. p. 169, B., Ἡρακλῆες τε καὶ Θησίεις. Add Phædr. p. 229, D., Γοργόνων καὶ Πηγάσων. Lucian, in Micyll., Κίτροπας—ἡ Σισύφους ἢ Τηλείφους. So Shakspeare, "I think there be six Richmonds in the field:" and Milton, "Gorgons, and Hydras, and Chimeras dire."

⁹ In lieu of ὅμως, which I cannot understand, Plato wrote, I suspect, as I have here translated, ἐννόως.

¹⁰ It is not easy to state what was the previous occasion.

¹¹ Instead of οὕτως, the sense requires, as I have translated, ὡσαύτως.

¹³ These were the troops, military and naval, under Conon, as shown by Xenophon in Hellen. iv. 8.

who should go through them all. It is the duty then of every man to bear those deeds in mind; and, as in battle, to exhort the offspring of such men not to leave the ranks¹⁵ of their ancestors, nor, yielding to cowardice, to retire rearwards. And I do myself both now exhort you, the children of brave men, and shall hereafter, wherever I may meet with any of you, remind and exhort you to be ever ready to be the bravest of men. But for the present, I feel justified in telling you what the fathers of these men enjoined me to proclaim to their survivors, if they themselves suffered aught, when they had determined to encounter danger. I will tell you then what I heard¹⁶ from them, and what, if they possessed the power, they would now gladly say to you themselves, as I conjecture from what they said then. Imagine, then, you hear them speaking what I now relate as their messenger. These were their words.

[19.] O children! that ye are indeed the offspring of courageous fathers the present deed itself declares. For when it was in our power to live with dishonour, we chose to die with honour, rather than bring you and those after you into disgrace, and shame our own fathers and all our ancestors,¹⁷ conceiving that to him, who dishonours his family, life is no life; and that to such a fellow there is no man or god upon earth a friend, while (living),¹⁸ nor under it, when dead. It behoves you then to keep these our words in remembrance; and if you practise any thing else, to practise it with valour, well knowing that, deficient in this, all other possessions and pursuits are base and wrong. For neither does wealth bring honour¹⁹ to him, who possesses it with a want of manliness, since such a one is rich for another and not for himself; nor do beauty and strength of body, when they dwell with the coward and the knave, appear becoming, but unbecoming

¹⁷ There is a similar sentiment in Homer, Il. Z. 209, Μηδὲ γένος πατέρων αἰσχύνεμεν.

¹⁸ To preserve the balance of the sentence, ὄντι must be inserted between οὗτε and ἐπὶ—

¹⁹ So I have translated to prevent the repetition of κάλλος. For Plato wrote, I suspect; πλοῦτος καλὸν φέρει τι—

(rather), and make the possessor more conspicuous, and show off his cowardice. Moreover, all knowledge, when separated from justice and the other (parts) of virtue, appears to be knavery²⁰ and not wisdom. On this account then endeavour to have, as the first and last aim, through all time and by all means, every readiness to surpass to the utmost ourselves and ancestors in glory. For if not, rest assured that, should we conquer you in valour, the victory brings disgrace upon us; but defeat, if we are defeated, a state of blessedness. Now we shall be vanquished the most, and you obtain the victory, if you prepare yourselves not to abuse the glory of your ancestors, nor to expend it wastefully; being convinced that, for a person who thinks himself to be something, there is nothing more disgraceful, than to exhibit himself as held in honour, not on his own account, but the renown of his forefathers.²¹ For hereditary honour²² is to descendants a treasure honourable and magnificent. But to use up the treasure of riches and renown, and from the want of one's own wealth and good repute, ²³not to hand it down to posterity is an act both disgraceful and unmanly.²³ Should you then pursue these objects, you will come to us as friends to friends, whenever your destined fate shall bring you below; but if you disregard them and become debased, not one of us will receive you kindly. Thus much let it be told to our children. [20.] But our fathers and mothers, that are surviving,²⁴ it is very meet to soothe into the supporting as easily as possible their calamity, should any such happen to arise, and not to lament with them—for they do not need any thing to pain them—for their present misfortune is sufficient to produce

²¹ Instead of προγόνων, two MSS. and ed. Bas. 2, offer πρωτόνων; answering to "superiorum" in Ficinus. Perhaps Plato wrote ἐπίων, as opposed to ἐαυτὸν—So Juvenal in vii. 70, "miserum est aliorum incumbere famæ."

²² Cicero Offic. i. 23, "Optima hæreditas a patribus traditur liberis—gloria virtutis."

²³—²⁴ A similar sentiment is to be found in Thucyd. i. 71, ii. 62, and Arist. Polit. v. 11.

that—but to heal and mitigate their sorrow, by reminding them, that the gods have hearkened to what they especially prayed for. ²⁵ Since they did not pray for their children to be immortal, but to be brave and renowned, ²⁵ both of which, the greatest of all blessings, they have obtained; although it is not easy for every thing to turn out in the case of a mortal in this life according to his wishes. By bearing too their misfortunes like men, they will be thought to be in reality the parents of manly children, and to be such themselves; whereas by giving way they will raise a suspicion that they are none of ours, or that the persons who praise us are telling an untruth; neither of which things ought to be; but they ought rather to be themselves our eulogizers, exhibiting by their acts ²⁶ themselves as seeming to be in reality ²⁶ the fathers, men of men. ²⁷ For the old proverb, “Nothing too much,” ²⁸ seems to be well said; and in fact is well said. ²⁹ For by what person so ever all that leads to happiness, or nearly so, is made to depend upon himself, and not upon others, by whose well or ill doing his own acts are compelled to waver, by such a one has the best preparation been made for living (well). ³⁰ This is the man of moderation; ³¹ this the man of courage and prudence; ³¹ and this is he, who, whether his property and children exist or are destroyed, will best obey the proverb; for through trusting to himself, he will be seen to indulge neither in joy nor sorrow overmuch. ²⁹ Such men do we hold, and wish, and assert our relatives to be; and such we now exhibit ourselves, by not feeling too much of reluctance, nor

^{25—26} So Xenophon, on hearing of the death of his son, said, “I have prayed to the gods not for my son to be immortal, but to be brave,”—as we learn from Plutarch. Hence Addison makes Cato say, on a similar occasion, “The gods be thanked; my boy has done his duty.”

^{26—28} The Greek is αὐτοὺς φαίνομένους τῷ ὄντι πατέρας ὄντας—where Engelhardt alone has seen that φαίνομένους and ὄντας could not be thus united. Plato wrote, I suspect—αὐτοὺς, οὐ τοὺς φαίνομένους, τῷ δὲ ὄντι—i. e. “themselves not the seeming, but being in reality—” Compare Aristoph. Ach. 416, Εἶναι μὲν, ὅσπερ εἶμι, φαίνεσθαι δὲ μὴ.

²⁷ On this collocation of words see Heusde Specim. Crit. p. 129.

²⁸ The same proverb is alluded to in Charmid. § 27.

^{29—30} The whole of this passage is translated by Cicero in Tuscul. v. 12, and alluded to in part in Epist. Famil. v. 13.

³⁰ Between ζῆν and οὐτως I suspect εὖ has dropt.

too much of fear, should it be needful to die on the instant.³² We entreat then both our fathers and mothers to pass the remainder of their lives in adopting the very same sentiment; and to be assured that they will gratify us the most by not lamenting and bewailing us; and that if the dead have any feeling³³ for the living, they will be the least agreeable to us by disfiguring³⁴ themselves and bearing ill their misfortunes, but that they will please us the most by supporting them lightly and with moderation. For our state is about to have³⁵ an end, which is the most honourable among men; so that it is becoming rather to glorify than to lament it. By acting then as guardians and nurses to our wives and children, and by turning their minds to such employments, they will in the best way become forgetful of their misfortune, and lead a life more honourable and more correct, and more agreeable to us. Such does it suffice to tell our relatives from us. But we would exhort the state to be the guardian of our parents and children, by giving to the youth of the latter a well-regulated education, and to the old age of the former a worthy support; although we are well assured, that even if we did not so exhort, there would be taken a sufficient care.

[21.] Such then, ye children and parents of the dead, did they enjoin us to tell you; and I have, with the greatest readiness possible, told you their message. And I do myself beseech some of you to imitate your relatives, and others to feel a confidence in yourselves, that we are all, in our private and public capacities, about to support the old age of some, and to be the guardians of others, wherever each one may meet with any of them. And surely ye know yourselves the carefulness

³² This sentiment is strangely put into the mouth of those already dead. Instead then of εἰ δεῖ τελευτᾶν, one would have expected εἰ δεῖ δις τελευτᾶν, "if it were needful to die twice." See myself on Crito, § 6, n. 4, and the Commentators on "bis patiar mori" in Horace.

³³ A similar sentiment is to be found in Isocrates Euagor. p. 368, Plataic. § 24, Lycurgus in Leocrat. § 136, Hyperides, quoted by Stobæus, p. 618, Galen. Protrept. § 7, and Sulpicius in Ciceron. Epist. Famil. iv. 5.

³⁴ This alludes to the custom of women especially, disfiguring their persons, and beating their breasts, and tearing their hair, under the influence of excessive grief for the death of those dear to them.

of the state, how that by laying down laws³⁶ respecting those who have died in war, it takes charge of their parents and children; and how it has been enjoined upon the magistracy, that is the greatest,³⁷ to watch over them especially, above all the other citizens, so that the fathers and mothers of such may receive no injury; while it brings up together³⁸ the children, through its great desire that their orphanhood may be as little conspicuous as possible; since it stands in the place of a father to them, while they are still children; and when they come to man's estate, sends them to their own homes,³⁹ having first dressed them in a complete suit of armour, thus pointing out and reminding them of the pursuits of their fathers, and giving them the instruments of their fathers' valour; and at the same time, by way of a good omen, (bidding them)⁴⁰ commence their return to the paternal hearth, about to command⁴¹ with strength, as having been decked in arms. The dead too it never fails to honour, by performing each year the established rites for all in common, which have taken place, as is fitting,⁴² individually for each; and in addition to this, by appointing games both gymnastic and equestrian, and of all kinds of poetry; and by standing really in the place of an heir and son to the dead, and in that of a father to children, and in that of a guardian to parents and such-like relatives, it takes upon itself all care of all for all time. Keeping then these things in mind, you ought to bear

³⁷ That is the first Archon, according to Meier, De Lite Attica, p. 44. But Pseud-Ulpian, in Demosthen. Timocrat. p. 445, says it was the third Archon, called Πολέμαρχος.

³⁹ As the pronoun σφέτερας is reflective, it cannot be applied with propriety to the homes of the youths. Æschines, in Ctesiph. § 154, has more correctly ἀφίησι τρέψεσθαι ἐπὶ τὰ ἑαυτῶν.

⁴⁰ Ficinus has alone, what the sense requires, "jubet."

⁴¹ I cannot understand ἀρξονται. I could have understood πράξοντά τε, "about to do something."

⁴² The Greek is ἰδίᾳ ἐκάστῳ ἰδία · where Bekker would expunge the second ἰδία; which I would alter into οἷα δεῖ, as I have translated.

your calamity more lightly; for thus you will be the most dear to the dead and living, and most ready to give and to receive comfort. And now do you and all the rest, having in common, according to custom, wept fully the dead, depart.

[22.] Such, Menexenus, is the speech of Aspasia of Miletus.

Men. By Zeus, Socrates, you proclaim Aspasia to be a happy person, if, being a woman, she is able to compose such speeches as these.

Soc. If you do not credit it, follow me, and you shall hear her speak it herself.

Men. I have often, Socrates, met with her, and know what kind of woman she is.

Soc. What then, do you not admire her, and owe you no thanks to her for this oration?

Men. I owe indeed, Socrates, many thanks either to her or to him, whoever was the person who told it you; and before all others, to him who has now spoken it.

Soc. All will be well; but see that you do not say a word against me, in order that I may hereafter tell you many and beautiful discourses on state affairs.

Men. Be full of confidence. I will say nothing. Do you only tell them.

Soc. So shall it be.

INTRODUCTION TO THE HIPPIAS MAJOR.

Of all the dialogues of Plato, the Hippias Major is perhaps the one best calculated to give a correct idea of the easy and playful manner, in which Socrates, who confessed he knew nothing, was accustomed to confute those, who pretended to know every thing. But it is to be lamented that Plato should have done here, as elsewhere, an injury to the cause he was espousing, by not keeping strictly to the line of truth. For, as remarked by Ast, Hippias the wise is represented as a very silly person; since such alone would think of giving the absurd definitions of beauty put into the mouth of Hippias. But in this very conduct of the writer, we have an internal proof in favour of the genuineness of the dialogue, which some have called in question. For in consequence of similar misrepresentations, Gorgias called him "the modern Archilochus;" and even Socrates himself, after hearing the Lysias, exclaimed, "Ye gods, what lies this young man tells." It is possible, however, that Hippias had in reality given some definitions of beauty, similar to those which are here attributed to him, but which were wanting in the precision of language, that alone gives value to a definition. For unless this had been the case, the whole of the ridicule would have been like the dart of Priam, "telum imbelles, sine ictu."

Hence too I was led to suggest, that in the examples of beauty selected by Plato, there was a parody of those which Hippias had given, with the view of showing, what Sydenham was the first to remark, that the Sophists intended to exhibit a gradation in four different forms of beauty, of which the first was rational; the second irrational; the third affecting the mind, through the medium of the body; and the last affecting the body alone: and thus while the speculative philosophers defined Beauty as existing, first, in the Mind; secondly, in the Body; thirdly, in Morals; and lastly, in Arts; the practical philosopher, Socrates, said, as shown by Xenophon, in M. S. iii. 8. 4—10, and iv. 6. 9, that Beauty consisted in utility and the fitness of things to their proposed ends; but that of Beauty in the abstract we know nothing, as remarked by Plato in the Parmenides, p. 134, C.

With regard to the theories of modern metaphysicians, viewed either abstractedly, or with reference to objects of Nature and Art, the inquisitive reader may turn to Burke "On the Sublime and Beautiful;" and Payne Knight's "Principles of Taste;" and Alison's "Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste."

To the editions of this dialogue by Heindorf and Stalbaum, is to be added my own, published anonymously in 1831, under the title of "Plato's Four Dialogues, the Crito, Hippias, Alcibiades, and Sisyphus, with English Notes;" to which I have referred in difficult and doubtful passages, or where the Notes were too long or too learned to be given here entire, or even to be abridged without detriment to their utility.

HIPPIAS MAJOR.¹

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND HIPPIAS.

SOCRATES.

[1.] Ο ΤΗΟΥ, the handsome² and clever³ Hippias, after how long a time⁴ hast thou now again⁵ arrived at Athens!

Hip. I have had no leisure time, Socrates. For when Elis wants to transact any business with any other⁶ state, she always comes to me the first, selecting me as an ambassador from the ¹ This dialogue is called "major," to distinguish it from another shorter one called "minor." It is feigned, as remarked by Stalbaum, to have taken place, probably when Hippias, according to Xenophon, in M. S. iv. 4, 5, had, on his return to Athens after a long absence, a conversation with Socrates.

² Sydenham refers the appellation of καλός to the beauty of Hippias' apparel, mentioned in § 25, Hipp. Min., p. 568, B., and Ælian. Var. Histor. xii. 32; but Heindorf says it was merely a common form of address. It seems however never to have been adopted except towards those, who were remarkable for the beauty of their person or dress.

³ Heindorf says that by σοφός is meant a sophist. But as Socrates held the sophists in little estimation, he would rather address Hippias by the name of "wise;" and thus ironically put him even above Pythagoras, who was content to call himself φιλόσοφος, "a lover of wisdom," rather than σοφός, positively "wise."

⁵ Ficinus, unable to understand ἤμῃν, has omitted it altogether. Perhaps it conceals αὖ νῦν, as I have translated:

⁶ The Greek is τινα τῶν πόλεων. Ficinus has "externis gentibus," as if he had found in his MS. either τιν' ἀλλοδαπῶν πόλεων, or τιν' ἄλλων πόλεων—

citizens, from her conceiving that I am the most competent to be a judge of the arguments urged by each of the states, and to report upon them. Hence I have often gone to other cities as an ambassador, but most frequently and on points the most in number and of greatest importance to Lacedæmon. Hence it is why, as regards your question, I do not often come to these parts.

[2.] Soc. This it is,⁷ Hippias, to be a person truly wise and accomplished. For, as a private individual, you are able to obtain no little money from young men, and to impart more benefit than you receive; and as a public man are able⁸ to do your own state good service, as he should do, who would not be held in contempt, but be in good repute with the many. But, Hippias, what is the reason why those men of the olden time, whose names are so renowned for wisdom, Pittacus, and Bias, and Thales of Miletus, and his disciples,⁹ and those who come after, down to Anaxagoras, appear all, or most of them, to have kept aloof¹⁰ from public affairs?

Hip. What else, Socrates, can you suppose than that they were unable or not sufficiently fit to reach by their intellect to both subjects, public and private?

[3.] Soc. Shall we then, by Zeus, affirm, that as the other arts have improved, and the operatives of former times were of no mark as compared with those of the present, so the art of you, sophists, has improved likewise; and that those of the ancients, who were engaged in the study of wisdom, were persons of no mark in comparison with you?

Hip. You speak perfectly correctly.

⁷ Ficinus omits μύρον, which he could not understand; nor can I. Perhaps Plato wrote μὲν τὸν—with the usual ellipse of θεῖον, or κύνα—

⁸ The repeated ικανός is omitted by Ficinus. One MS. has ικανώς: which would lead to διανεώς, "perpetually," found in § 48.

⁹ Both Sydenham here, and Matthiæ in Gr. Gr., § 583, and Stalbaum, take the expression τῶν ἀμφοτέρων—Θαλήν as applied to Thales and his disciples; Heindorf, to Thales alone.

¹⁰ Cicero however says, De Rep. i. 7, "Eos septem, quos Græci sapientes nominaverunt, omnes pœne video in media republica esse versatos:" where "omnes pœne" answers to πάντες ἢ οἱ πολλοί in Plato. So too De Oratore iii. 34, "Septem fuisse dicuntur—sapientes—hi omnes, præter Milesium Thalen civitatibus suis præfuerunt." See likewise Ælian Var. Hist. iii. 17, where it is stated that all the philosophers of antiquity took a part in public affairs.

Soc. If then, Hippias, were Bias to come now to life again, he would be exposed to ridicule, as compared with you; just as our modern statuaries assert that Dædalus, were he alive to execute such works as those from which he gained his great name, would become ridiculous.

Hip. It is as you say, Socrates. I am however accustomed myself to praise highly the men of the olden time, or even our immediate predecessors before,¹¹ and more than the moderns, acting with a feeling of caution as regards the envy of the living, and of fear as regards the anger of the dead.¹²

Soc. Correctly, Hippias, as it seems to me, are you¹³ thinking upon and considering¹³ the matter. And I too can testify that you are speaking the truth, and that your art has in reality improved in enabling you to transact public affairs conjointly with private. [4.] For Gorgias,¹⁴ the great sophist of Leontium, came hither on an embassy¹⁵ from his country, as being the man most competent among the Leontines to transact public affairs, and was thought to speak the best before the people here; and at the same time, by making a display of his powers in pri-

¹¹ Instead of πρωτότερον, I formerly suggested πρωτίως, which the sense requires; and so I have translated.

¹³ Apparently to avoid the tautology in νομίζων τε καὶ διανοούμενος. Ficinus has "et sentire et loqui;" unless it be said that he found in his MS. διαλεγόμενος. But as thirteen MSS. read ὀνομάζων, and one ὀνομάζονται without τε, Plato wrote, I suspect, τὰ νομιζόμενα εἰ διανοούμενος, i. e. "you are thinking upon what has been established by law."

¹⁴ The character of Gorgias is painted by Plato at full length in a dialogue inscribed with his name. It will be sufficient for our present purpose to observe, that Gorgias was by profession, like Hippias, an orator as well as sophist, and set up teaching both philosophy and the art of rhetoric. S.

vate, and associating with young men, he gained¹⁶ and carried away great sums of money from this city. Or, if you wish for another instance, our friend,¹⁷ Prodicus himself, has frequently come hither in a public capacity from elsewhere:¹⁸ but on arriving the last time, not long since, [publicly]¹⁹ from Cora, and speaking before the Council, he was held in high repute; and by making a display of his powers in private, and associating with young men, he gained a wonderful heap of money.²⁰ But of these ancient sages, not one ever thought proper to demand money by way of a fee for making a display of their wisdom before persons of all climes. Such simpletons²¹ were they, and so completely did it escape them, that money was a thing of great value. Whereas each of the preceding²² made more money from his wisdom, than has any operative²³ in whatever trade you will; and even prior to these did Protagoras.

¹⁶ The price, which Gorgias demanded from each of his scholars, was 100 minæ, equal to £322 18s. 4d. S.

¹⁷ Socrates calls himself here the friend of Prodicus, as he does in Protar. p. 311, A., Meno, p. 96, D., and Cratyl. p. 384, § 2. HAJER.

¹⁸ The antithesis in ἐκ Κόρας evidently requires ἀλλοθεν, an adverb of place, not ἀλλοτε, of time.

¹⁹ This repeated δημοσίᾳ is an evident interpolation.

²⁰ The price paid by each of his auditors was fifty δράχμας, or £1 12s. 3d. See Plat. in Cratyl. p. 384, and Aristot. Rhet. l. iii. c. 14. S.

²¹ Such a simpleton too was Socrates himself, who gave instruction gratis, as we learn from Xenophon.

²⁴ The Greek is τῶν καλῶν περὶ τούτων. But in the first place περὶ ought to follow rather than precede τούτων. And, secondly, as nothing has been said as yet about things or persons of beauty, I suspect there is a lacuna here, in which was originally found the connexion of ideas wanting at present. It is true indeed that τούτων is found in the two best MSS. alone in lieu of τούτο: which is omitted entirely in another. But from this nothing is gained. Ficinus has "Nihil egregium hac in re nosti." Some however will be perhaps content to render καλῶν "fine," without any reference to beauty.

And I almost think I have made more money than any two sophists together, whom you choose to name.

[6.] Soc. You bring forward, Hippias, truly a good and great proof, both of your own wisdom, and of the men of the present day, how superior they are as compared with those of the olden time. For of your predecessors, down to Anaxagoras,²⁸ great is proclaimed the folly, according to your statement. For to Anaxagoras, they say, happened the very opposite to what has befallen you. For of the great wealth left him he took no care, and lost it all; in so silly a manner did he act the sophist. And of the other ancient sages other stories of a similar kind are told. You seem then to produce this as a good proof of the wisdom of the moderns, as compared with the ancients. And many indeed agree with you, that²⁹ the wise man should be wise for himself especially;²⁹ and of such a person this is the one³⁰ definition—He who can make the most money. [7.] Let this then suffice. And now tell ²⁵ Equal to £484 7s. 6d. English money. S.

²⁸ The Greek is περὶ Ἀναξαγόρου: where Sydenham was the first to reject Ἀναξαγόρου: whom Heind. and others have followed. Plato wrote, I suspect, μέχρι Ἀναξαγόρου, as in § 2.

me from which of the cities, whither you went, did you gain the greatest money? Is it not plain it was from Sparta, whither you went the oftener?

Hip. Not, by Zeus, from thence, Socrates.

Soc. How say you? The least then?

Hip. Never any thing at all.

Soc. A monstrous and marvellous account you are giving, Hippias. But tell me, has not that wisdom of yours the power to make those ³¹ who associate with you and learn it ³¹ better as regards virtue.

Hip. Yes, very much so, Socrates.

Soc. Were you then able to make the sons of the Inycians better, but unable to make the sons of the Spartans?

Hip. Far from it. ³²

Soc. Are the Siciliotes desirous of becoming better, but the Spartans not?

Hip. The Lacedæmonians are, Socrates, very (desirous)?

Soc. Was it then from their want of money that they shunned your society?

Hip. By no means; for they have enough of it.

[8.] Soc. What then could it be, that although they were desirous of virtue, and had money, and you were able to benefit them to the greatest extent, they did not send you away loaded with wealth? Was it that the Lacedæmonians can educate their sons better than you? Shall we say this? and do you concede it is so?

Hip. By no manner of means.

Soc. Were you then unable to persuade the young men at Lacedæmon, that by associating with you they would make a greater progress in virtue than by associating with their own people? Or were you unable to persuade their fathers that they ought to hand over their children to you rather than take that care upon themselves, if they had any regard for ³¹⁻³² The Greek is τοὺς συνόντας αὐτῇ καὶ μαθάνοντας—I have translated as if it were τοὺς σοὶ συνόντας καὶ αὐτὴν μαθάνοντας. For thus σοὶ συνόντας is similar to συνὼν τοῖς νέοις twice in § 4, and to σοὶ—συνόντας in § 8.

³² To a bipartite question there could not be a single answer. There is a lacuna here, to be supplied from Suidas, Πολλοὺ δὲ δῖω καὶ λέγειν σιωπῶ: where, if we read γε for καί, we shall have an expression similar to οὐκ ἂν φαίην ἔγωγε in § 9, explained by σιωπῶ.

Hip. I do not think they felt any grudge.

Soc. In good truth Lacedæmon is a well-regulated city.

Hip. How not?

Soc. Now in well-regulated cities virtue is most highly prized.

Hip. Certainly.

[9.] Soc. And to impart this to another you know the best of all men.

Hip. By much so, Socrates.

Soc. Now would not the man, who could best impart the art of horsemanship, be the most honoured, and acquire the most wealth in Thessaly,³³ or wherever else in Greece³⁴ this art is cultivated the most?

Hip. It is likely.

Soc. Will he then, who can impart instruction of the greatest value with respect to virtue, be honoured the most, and make the most money if he wishes it, not at Lacedæmon and any other of the well-regulated states in Greece, but in Sicily³⁵ rather, as you think, my friend, or at Inycum? Shall we, Hippias, give credit to this? for if you command, I must (do so).

Hip. It is not, Socrates, the custom of the country for the Lacedæmonians to disturb their laws, nor to educate their children³⁶ contrary to established usages.

Soc. How say you? Think you³⁷ that it is the custom of the country for the Lacedæmonians not to act correctly, but to do wrong?

Hip. I would not say so, Socrates.

Soc. Would they not do right then to educate their sons in the better way, and not in the worse?

them to give a foreign education. Since, rest assured that if any one else ever took away money from thence by teaching, I should have taken by much the most. For they delight greatly³⁸ in listening to me, and give me praise. ³⁹ But what I am saying is not law.³⁹

Soc. Say you, Hippias, that the law is an injury or a benefit to a state?

Hip. It is enacted, I presume, for a benefit; but sometimes the law, when improperly enacted, does an injury.

Soc. What then, do not they who enact a law, lay it down as the greatest good to a state? For without law it is impossible to live in a state of good government.

Hip. You speak the truth.

Soc. When, therefore, they who undertake to frame laws, fail in procuring a good, they have missed ⁴⁰ what is lawful and law.⁴⁰ Or how say you?

Hip. Accurately speaking, Socrates, such is the case; but men are not used to give that name.⁴¹

Soc. Do you mean, Hippias, those, who know the truth, or who do not know it?

Hip. I mean the many.

Soc. Are the many then those, who know the truth?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. But surely they, who do know it, do in reality conceive that what is to all men more beneficial is more agreeable to law than what is less beneficial. Or do not you grant this?

Hip. I grant that (they do hold so) in reality.

Soc. ⁴² Do not (things) exist, and are in the state,⁴² as those, who are knowing, conceive?

Hip. Undoubtedly.

[11.] Soc. Now it is, as you assert, more beneficial for the

³⁸ In lieu of χαίρουσι γούν, where γούν is useless, I have translated as if the Greek were χαίρουσ' ἀγαν—

³⁹⁻³⁹ Such is the literal version of the Greek ἀλλ' ὃ λέγω οὐ νόμος. By comparing however Protag. § 80, it would not be difficult to recover what Plato probably wrote.

⁴⁰⁻⁴⁰ I cannot understand νομίμου καὶ νόμου— The natural train of ideas would lead to, "they fail in that, for which laws are laid down"—

⁴²⁻⁴² The Greek is, Οὐκ οὖν ἔστι γὰρ καὶ ἔχει οὕτως. To avoid the tautology I suggested Οὐκ οὖν ἂν ἔστι γὰρ, ἔχει οὕτως. Stalb. has edited ἔστι γὰρ, from the two best MSS.

Lacedæmonians to receive a foreign education under yourself, than after the system of their own country.

Hip. And I assert the truth.

Soc. Because what is more beneficial is more conformable to law. And this, Hippias, do you say?

Hip. I have so said.

Soc. According then to your reasoning, it is more conformable to law for the sons of the Lacedæmonians to be instructed by Hippias, and less so by their fathers, if perchance they shall in reality be more benefited under you.

Hip. And benefited they would be, Socrates.

Soc. The Lacedæmonians then act contrary to law, in not giving you their gold, and committing their sons to your care.

Hip. In this I agree with you: for you seem to produce an argument in my favour, and there is no need for me to oppose it.

Soc. We find then, my friend, the Lacedæmonians to act contrary to law, and this too in matters of the greatest moment; they who are thought to be most observant of law. And yet, by the gods, did they praise you, and were delighted at hearing—what? Or is it not evident that the subjects were those which you know the best, relating to the stars and celestial events?⁴³

Hip. Not at all. Such subjects they cannot endure.

Soc. But they delight in hearing something about geometry.

Hip. Not at all; for many of them know not, so to say, even how to reckon.

[12.] Soc. They are then far from enduring you, while making a display on the keeping of accounts.⁴⁴

Hip. Very far indeed, by Zeus.

Soc. But the subjects then were those, in which you can the most accurately of (all⁴⁵) men draw distinctions, respecting the powers of letters and syllables, and rhythms and harmonies.

Hip. What harmonies, or letters, my good man?

Soc. What then are the subjects, which they gladly hear from you, and commend? Tell me yourself, since I cannot find them.

Hip. Respecting the genealogies,⁴⁶ Socrates, of their heroes and men, and settlements (of tribes), (and)⁴⁷ how cities were founded of old, and, in a word, to every thing relating to archæology, they listen with the greatest pleasure; so that I was forced to learn my lesson myself thoroughly for their sakes, and to practise myself well on those points.

Soc. By Zeus, Hippias, you were fortunate in that the Lacedæmonians did not take a delight in hearing a man who could reckon up our archons from the time of Solon. For otherwise you would have had some trouble in learning the list.

Hip. How so, Socrates? Upon hearing fifty names only once, I can repeat them from memory.

[13.] Soc. You speak the truth; but I did not bear in mind that you had a system of mnemonics;⁴⁸ so that I understand⁴⁹ why, reasonably enough, the Lacedæmonians are pleased with you, as being a person who knows many things, and they make use of you, as children do of old women, to tell them pretty stories.

Hip. And by Zeus, Socrates, I was lately in high repute there by going through a lecture upon the honourable pursuits to which a young person should devote himself. For I have by me a very beautiful discourse upon that subject,⁵⁰ well put together in other respects, and in the words.⁵⁰ The form and ⁴⁶ There is an article by Osann in the Rheinische Museum for 1843, p. 495—501, on the archæological writings of Hippias.

⁴⁷ I suspect ὥς has dropt out after καὶ—

⁵⁰ The Greek is καὶ ἄλλως εὖ διακειμένος καὶ τοῖς ὀνόμασι. But διακειμένος could hardly follow συγκείμενος; and if it could, it would not be united to the dative ὀνόμασι. Besides, it is not easy to say, to what ἄλλως can be referred, as opposed to ὀνόμασι. Ficinus has “verborum elegantia pellet”—from which I formerly elicited εὖ διακοσμούμενος; but I would now prefer διασκευασμένος, similar to λόγοι παρεσκευασμένοι in Menex. p. 235, D., while in καὶ ἄλλως and καὶ τοῖς lie hid, I suspect, καὶ Λυσίου—καλλίστοις ὀνόμασι. For thus Lysias would be praised here ironically, as he is in the Phædrus.

commencement of the discourse is something of this kind.—“After Troy was taken, the story goes, that Neoptolemus inquired of Nestor what were the honourable pursuits a young man should follow to gain a good name. Upon this Nestor is the speaker, and suggests a great many and very excellent precepts laid down by law.” [14.] Of this dissertation⁵¹ I made a display there; and on the third day hence I intend to display it here and several other pieces of mine, worth the hearing, in the school of Philostratus.⁵² For so has Eudicus, the son of Apēmantus, requested. See then that you are present yourself, and bring with you others, who on hearing will be competent to decide upon what is then said.

Soc. This, if a god is willing, Hippias, shall be. But at present answer me a short question relating to it.⁵³ For you have opportunely put me in mind of it. A certain person, has, thou best of men, very lately, during some conversations, thrown me into a difficulty—when I was finding fault with some things as being ugly, and praising others as being beautiful—by asking me, in a very saucy manner, “From whence do you, Socrates, know, said he, what things are beautiful, and what ugly?”⁵⁴ Come then, tell me,⁵⁴ if you can say a word, what is the beautiful?” And I, through my want of wit, was at a loss, and had it not in my power to answer him with propriety. [15.] So, quitting his company, I grew angry with, and vented reproaches upon, myself, and threatened that the first time I met with any of you wise men, I would hear (his opinion) and learn it; and after studying

⁵¹ According to Philostratus in the life of Hippias, p. 495, the dissertation was in the form of a dialogue. Its title was Τρωικά or Ἡρωικά—For these two words are constantly confounded, as remarked by G. C. Lewis in Cl. Jl. No. 76, p. 277, and No. 78, p. 190. So too in Schol. Od. A. 546, instead of ὑπὸ ὀπότερου τῶν Τρώων, Bentley would read Ἡρώων in his letter to Davies, first published in the Monthly Review, vol. xiv. p. 202.

⁵³ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῦ can be referred, Plato wrote, I suspect, περὶ γὰρ του, “about something.”

³⁵ On the luxury of the Sicilians Sydenham refers to the Greek proverb, Σικελικὴ τράπεζα in Plato, Legg. iii. p. 404, D., and the "Siculus dapes" in Horace.

them to give a foreign education. Since, rest assured that if any one else ever took away money from thence by teaching, I should have taken by much the most. For they delight greatly³⁸ in listening to me, and give me praise.³⁹ But what I am saying is not law.³⁹

Soc. Say you, Hippias, that the law is an injury or a benefit to a state?

Hip. It is enacted, I presume, for a benefit; but sometimes the law, when improperly enacted, does an injury.

Soc. What then, do not they who enact a law, lay it down as the greatest good to a state? For without law it is impossible to live in a state of good government.

Hip. You speak the truth.

Soc. When, therefore, they who undertake to frame laws, fail in procuring a good, they have missed⁴⁰ what is lawful and law.⁴⁰ Or how say you?

Hip. Accurately speaking, Socrates, such is the case; but men are not used to give that name.⁴¹

Soc. Do you mean, Hippias, those, who know the truth, or who do not know it?

Hip. I mean the many.

Soc. Are the many then those, who know the truth?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. But surely they, who do know it, do in reality conceive that what is to all men more beneficial is more agreeable to law than what is less beneficial. Or do not you grant this?

Hip. I grant that (they do hold so) in reality.

*Soc.*⁴² Do not (things) exist, and are in the state,⁴² as those, who are knowing, conceive?

Hip. Undoubtedly.

³⁸ In lieu of χαίρουσι γούν, where γούν is useless, I have translated as if the Greek were χαίρουσι ἄγαν—

³⁹⁻⁴⁰ Such is the literal version of the Greek ἀλλ' ὃ λέγω οὐ νόμος. By comparing however Protag. § 80, it would not be difficult to recover what Plato probably wrote.

⁴⁰⁻⁴¹ I cannot understand νομίμων καὶ νόμον— The natural train of ideas would lead to, "they fail in that, for which laws are laid down"—

⁴²⁻⁴³ The Greek is, ὅτι οὐν ἔστι γε καὶ ἔχει οὕτως. To avoid the tautology I suggested ὅτι οὐν ἔστι γε, ἔχει οὕτως. Stalb. has edited ἔστι γε, from the two best MSS.

Lacedæmonians to receive a foreign education under yourself, than after the system of their own country.

Hip. And I assert the truth.

Soc. Because what is more beneficial is more conformable to law. And this, Hippias, do you say?

Hip. I have so said.

Soc. According then to your reasoning, it is more conformable to law for the sons of the Lacedæmonians to be instructed by Hippias, and less so by their fathers, if perchance they shall in reality be more benefited under you.

Hip. And benefited they would be, Socrates.

Soc. The Lacedæmonians then act contrary to law, in not giving you their gold, and committing their sons to your care.

Hip. In this I agree with you : for you seem to produce an argument in my favour, and there is no need for me to oppose it.

Soc. We find then, my friend, the Lacedæmonians to act contrary to law, and this too in matters of the greatest moment ; they who are thought to be most observant of law. And yet, by the gods, did they praise you, and were delighted at hearing—what ? Or is it not evident that the subjects were those which you know the best, relating to the stars and celestial events ?⁴³

Hip. Not at all. Such subjects they cannot endure.

Soc. But they delight in hearing something about geometry.

Hip. Not at all ; for many of them know not, so to say, even how to reckon.

[12.] Soc. They are then far from enduring you, while making a display on the keeping of accounts.⁴⁴

Hip. Very far indeed, by Zeus.

Soc. But the subjects then were those, in which you can the most accurately of (all⁴⁵) men draw distinctions, respecting the powers of letters and syllables, and rhythms and harmonies.

Hip. What harmonies, or letters, my good man ?

Soc. What then are the subjects, which they gladly hear from you, and command? Tell me yourself, since I cannot find them.

⁴³ The Greek is πάθη. Ficinus has "progressus."

⁴⁵ Ficinus alone has "omnium hominum—"

Hip. Respecting the genealogies,⁴⁶ Socrates, of their heroes and men, and settlements (of tribes), (and)⁴⁷ how cities were founded of old, and, in a word, to every thing relating to archaeology, they listen with the greatest pleasure; so that I was forced to learn my lesson myself thoroughly for their sakes, and to practise myself well on those points.

Soc. By Zeus, Hippias, you were fortunate in that the Lacedæmonians did not take a delight in hearing a man who could reckon up our archives from the time of Solon. For otherwise you would have had some trouble in learning the list.

Hip. How so, Socrates? Upon hearing fifty names only once, I can repeat them from memory.

[13.] Soc. You speak the truth; but I did not bear in mind that you had a system of mnemonics;⁴⁸ so that I understand⁴⁹ why, reasonably enough, the Lacedæmonians are pleased with you, as being a person who knows many things, and they make use of you, as children do of old women, to tell them pretty stories.

Hip. And by Zeus, Socrates, I was lately in high repute there by going through a lecture upon the honourable pursuits to which a young person should devote himself. For I have by me a very beautiful discourse upon that subject,⁵⁰ well put together in other respects, and in the words.⁵¹ The form and ⁴⁶ There is an article by Osann in the Rheinische Museum for 1843, p. 495—501, on the archaeological writings of Hippias.

⁴⁷ I suspect εἰς has dropt out after καὶ—

⁴⁹ The Greek is οὐκ ἔννοον—which seems rather strange after οὐκ ἔννοον. Ficinus has “jam intelligo”—which leads to εἰς τὸ οὖν δ' ἔννοον—

⁵⁰ The Greek is καὶ ἄλλως εἰ διακείμενος καὶ τοῖς δνόμασι. But διακείμενος could hardly follow συγκείμενος; and if it could, it would not be united to the dative δνόμασι. Besides, it is not easy to say, to what ἄλλως can be referred, as opposed to δνόμασι. Ficinus has “verborum elegantia pellet”—from which I formerly elicited εἰ διακοσμούμενος; but I would now prefer διοικητασμίνο, similar to λόγοι παρεσκευασμένοι in Menex. p. 235, D., while in καὶ ἄλλως and καὶ τοῖς lie hid, I suspect, καὶ Ἀσίου—καλλίστοις δνόμασι. For thus Lysias would be praised here ironically, as he is in the Phædrus.

commencement of the discourse is something of this kind.—

“After Troy was taken, the story goes, that Neoptolemus inquired of Nestor what were the honourable pursuits a young man should follow to gain a good name. Upon this Nestor is the speaker, and suggests a great many and very excellent precepts laid down by law.” [14.] Of this dissertation⁵¹ I made a display there; and on the third day hence I intend to display it here and several other pieces of mine, worth the hearing, in the school of Philostratus.⁵² For so has Eudicus, the son of Apēmantus, requested. See then that you are present yourself, and bring with you others, who on hearing will be competent to decide upon what is then said.

Soc. This, if a god is willing, Hippias, shall be. But at present answer me a short question relating to it.⁵³ For you have opportunely put me in mind of it. A certain person, has, thou best of men, very lately, during some conversations, thrown me into a difficulty—when I was finding fault with some things as being ugly, and praising others as being beautiful—by asking me, in a very saucy manner, “From whence do you, Socrates, know, said he, what things are beautiful, and what ugly?”⁵⁴ Come then, tell me,⁵⁴ if you can say a word, what is the beautiful?” And I, through my want of wit, was at a loss, and had it not in my power to answer him with propriety. [15.] So, quitting his company, I grew angry with, and vented reproaches upon, myself, and threatened that the first time I met with any of you wise men, I would hear (his opinion) and learn it; and after studying

⁵¹ According to Philostratus in the life of Hippias, p. 495, the dissertation was in the form of a dialogue. Its title was Τρωικά or Ἡρωικά—For these two words are constantly confounded, as remarked by G. C. Lewis in Cl. Jl. No. 76, p. 277, and No. 78, p. 190. So too in Schol. Od. A. 546, instead of ὑπὸ ὀπορίου τῶν Τρώων, Bentley would read Ἡρώων in his letter to Davies, first published in the Monthly Review, vol. xiv. p. 202.

⁵³ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῦ can be referred, Plato wrote, I suspect, περί γὰρ του, “about something.”

it thoroughly, that I would return to my questioner, and fight out again the matter with him. Now, therefore, as I said, you are come opportunely; and do you instruct me sufficiently what is beauty in the abstract, and endeavour to give me as accurately as possible your answers; in order that I may not be confuted a second time, and pay the penalty of a laugh against myself. For assuredly you know it quite clearly, and it would be but a mite of the learning, with which you are conversant on so many⁵⁵ points.

Hip. By Zeus, a mite indeed, Socrates; and, so to say, of no value at all.

Soc. Easily then shall I learn it; and no one will hereafter confute me.

[16.] Hip. Not one indeed. For otherwise mean would be my profession, and suited to a common person.

Soc. By Juno, Hippias, you speak bravely, if we shall get the man into our clutches. ⁵⁶ But shall I be any hindrance by imitating him, if I lay hold of your arguments, while answering me, in order that you may exercise me the most. For I am nearly skilful in laying hold (of arguments).⁵⁶ If then it makes no difference to you, I am willing to lay hold of them, in order that I may learn⁵⁷ with greater strength.

Hip. Take hold then: for, as I said just now, the question is not a great one; and I will teach you to answer questions much more difficult than this, so that not a single person will be ever able to confute you.

Soc. Ye gods,⁵⁸ how bravely you talk! But come, since you bid me, I will become him, and, as well as I can, try to question you. Now, if you shall give the lecture you men-

⁵⁵ To avoid the incorrect Greek in ὧν σὺ τῶν πολλῶν, we must read ὧν σὺ οὕτω πολλῶν— The critics quoted by Stalbaum neither do, nor pretend to, defend this union of the relative pronoun with the definite article.

⁵⁶—⁵⁶ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. But how Socrates could, by imitating the nameless saucy fellow, be any hindrance to Hippias, I cannot understand.

⁵⁷ In lieu of μάθω, which I cannot understand, I have suggested μυχθῶ. For the idea of "mingling in fight" here correctly coincides with the preceding ἀναμαχοῦμενος. Others perhaps would prefer ἰπρωμενίστηρον με θῶ, i. e. "make myself of greater strength."

⁵⁸ Instead of φεῦ, which never, I think, precedes ὥς εὖ λέγεις, I have translated as if the Greek were ὦ θεοί.

tion, upon beautiful pursuits, he will, after hearing it, when you have ceased speaking, inquire about nothing else except about the beautiful—for such a habit he has—and he will say, “Art not, (say) thou stranger from Elis, the just just through justness?” Answer now, Hippias, as if he were questioning you.

Hip. I answer,⁵⁹ through justness.

[17.] Soc. There is then such a thing as justness?

Hip. Clearly so.

Soc. Are not then the wise wise through wisdom? and all that is good good through goodness?

Hip. How not?

Soc. By those things existing really; for it is not surely by their non-existing.

Hip. By their existing really.

Soc. Are not all things, that are beautiful, beautiful through beauty?

Hip. Yes, through beauty.

Soc. By such a thing existing?

Hip. By its existing. For what should it be?

Soc. Tell me now, stranger, he will say, what is this beauty?

Hip. Does he, who asks this question, want to know what is a beautiful thing?

Soc. I think not, Hippias: but what is beauty.

Hip. How does this differ from that?

Soc. Seems there to you no (difference)?

Hip. There is not any difference.

Soc. But, however,⁶⁰ it is evident that you know better.

⁵⁹ I have adopted ἀποκρίνομαι, found in one MS., in lieu of ἀποκρινοῦμαι. Ficinus omits the word entirely.

⁶⁰ The Greek is Ἄλλὰ μὲντοι δῆλον, where I cannot understand μὲντοι: nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is “Constat autem.” Hence I suggested, many years ago, Ἄλλὰ μύοντι τῷ, “But to any one blinking,” an expression similar to the Latin, “conniventibus oculis,” and to the English, “with half an eye.” The phrase in Aristoph. Plut. 49, is δῆλον τυφλῷ, quoted by the Schol. on Plato, Sophist. p. 241, D., φαίνεται καὶ, τὸ λεγόμενον δὲ, τυφλῷ: and is found in Rep. iii. p. 465, D., and viii. p. 550, D. With regard to the verb μύειν, which Plato has used in Sophist. p. 239, E., δόξει τοι μύειν ἢ πα- ἀπασιν οὐκ ἔχειν ὁμματα, and elsewhere, see Creuzer on Plotinus, Περὶ Κάλλους, p. 357.

Consider, however, good sir, the question (well).⁶¹ For he asks you, not what is a beautiful thing, but what is beauty.

Hip. I understand you, good sir. And I will answer his question, "What is beauty?" nor shall I ever be confuted.⁶² For rest assured, Socrates, if the truth must be told, that a beautiful maiden is a beautiful thing.⁶³

[18.] Sac. By the dog,⁶⁴ you have answered, Hippias, beautifully and gloriously.⁶⁵ Shall I then, when I answer thus, have answered the question correctly? and shall I never be refuted?

Hip. For how could you be refuted, Socrates, on that point which seems correct to all the world; and where all who hear you will testify in your favour that you are speaking properly?

Sac. Be it so then, by all means. But come, Hippias, let me consider again with myself what you are saying. For the man will question me in some such manner as this: "Come, Socrates, answer me, "if beauty exists in the abstract, all

And to the passages there quoted add Lucian in Rhetor. Præcept. § 11, αὐτὸν μὲν οὐκ—αἰσίου τις. Shakspeare says in Lear, "A man may see how this world goes with no eyes."

⁶¹ After αἰσίου, it is pretty evident that αὐτὸν has dropt out.

⁶² By comparing the expression of Socrates, οὐ μή ποτε ἡλεγχθῶ, it is quite certain that Hippias said οὐ μή ποτε ἡλεγχθῆς.

⁶³ Ficinus has "virginem pulchram ipsum pulchrum esse," as if his MS. read παρθένος καλὴ τὸ καλόν, not παρθένος καλὴ καλόν.

⁶⁴ This was one of the oaths adopted by Socrates; another was, "by the plane-tree," as in Phædrus, p. 236, D., and the third was, "by the goose," as we learn from the Scholiast on Aristoph. Ὀρν. 521. To these might be added "the goat," as appears from Tertullian Apolog. 14, quoted by Gottleber on Phædo, p. 99, A. "Socrate contentus, qui in contumeliam deorum, quercum et hircum et canem dejerabat." Of the different reasons assigned for such strange forms of adjuration an account is to be found in the notes of Menage on Diogen. Laert. p. 92. But as none of them are satisfactory, the truth remains to be still found, if worth the search, elsewhere.

⁶⁵ The Greek is εὐδόξως: which is never, I believe, thus connected with the idea of an answer. I suggested long ago οὐ λοξῶς, i. e. "not obliquely," referring to Suidas, Λοξά' σκόλια, καμπύλα, οὐκ ἐξ εὐθείας γινόμενα: and to Lucian, Vit. Auct. § 14, ὥσπερ ὁ Λοξίας οὐδὲν ἀποσαφείς. Dialog. Deor. xvi. § 1, Λοξά—πρὸς ἑκάτερον τῆς ἐρωτήσεως ἀποκρινομενος. Alexandr. § 10, ἀμφιβόλους καὶ λοξοὺς χρησμούς συγγραῶν: and I will now add in Jov. Confut. § 14, λοξὰ καὶ ἱπαμφοτερίζοντα. See too Boissonad. in Eunap. p. 162, and 564.

⁶⁶—⁶⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek text. But the train of thought requires, "Come now, Socrates, and answer me this correctly. All these things which you say are beautiful, would these be beautiful?"⁶¹ And I will then say that, "if a beautiful maiden be a beautiful thing, through which the things would be beautiful."⁶⁷

Hip. Think you then that he will still attempt to confute you, (by asserting) that what you say is beautiful, is not so? or that, should he attempt it, he will not be laughed down?

Soc. That he will, thou wondrous man, I am well assured; but whether, after making the attempt, he will be laughed down, the thing itself will show. However,⁶⁸ I wish to tell you what he will say.

Hip. Tell it then.

[19.] Soc. What a sweet⁶⁹ creature, Socrates! he will say, you are. Is not a beautiful mare, which even a god has praised in an oracle,⁷⁰ a beautiful thing? What shall we answer, Hippias? Shall we say aught else than that⁷¹ the the things which you say are beautiful, if there be such a thing as beauty in the abstract, would they not be beautiful?" This in Greek would be "Ἰθι μοι ὦ Σώκρατες, ἀποκρίναι τοῦτ' ἐγώ. Τὰ πάντα, δ' φῆς καλὰ εἶναι, εἴ τι ἐστι αὐτὸ τὸ καλόν, οὐ ταῦτ' ἄν εἴη καλὰ; Ficinus however has "Age, responde mihi, Socrates, Quid est ipsum pulchrum? quod si sit, hæc omnia, quæ pulchra dicuntur, per ipsum pulchra sunt," which it is uncertain whether he did or did not find in his MS. Sydenham however was led from thence to suspect that δι' ὃ had dropt out between τὸ καλόν and ταῦτ' ἄν—and so was Schleiermacher after him.

⁶⁷—⁶⁷ The Greek is 'Εγὼ δὲ δὴ ἐρῶ, ὅτι εἰ παρθένος καλὴ καλὸν ἐστὶ, δι' ὃ ταῦτ' ἄν εἴη καλὰ. But the sense evidently requires us to expunge the word εἰ before παρθένος, and to read ὅτι παρθένος καλὴ καλὸν ἐστὶ, κ. τ. λ. S. Heindorf says we must omit εἰ, or all the words after καλόν. But the train of argument leads to something of this kind—"If there be such a thing as a beautiful maiden, there must be the beautiful, by which all the things beautiful would exist"—in Greek, Εἰ παρθένος καλὸν ἐστὶ, ἔστι τὸ καλόν, δι' ὃ πάντ' ἄν εἴη καλὰ, as I stated many years ago.

⁶⁹ Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 132, says that γλυκὺς and ἡδύς were used ironically as a polite way of calling a person a simpleton.

⁷⁰ The oracle alluded to has been preserved entire by the Schol. on Theocritus, Id. xiv. 48, and by Tzetzes, in Chil. ix. 291, and x. 330, and partially by Euseb. Præp. Evang. v. 29. For when the people of Megara had inquired of the god to whom the palm of superiority was to be assigned, they were told, amongst other things, that the mares of Thrace, or, as Tzetzes testifies, of Thessaly, were the best.

⁷¹ The Greek is τὴν ἵππον καλὴν εἶναι τὴν γε καλὴν. And so me from which of the cities, whither you went, did you gain the greatest money? Is it not plain it was from Sparta, whither you went the oftenest?

Hip. Not, by Zeus, from thence, Socrates.

Soc. How say you? The least then?

Hip. Never any thing at all.

Soc. A monstrous and marvellous account you are giving, Hippias. But tell me, has not that wisdom of yours the power to make those ³¹ who associate with you and learn it ³¹ better as regards virtue.

Hip. Yes, very much so, Socrates.

Soc. Were you then able to make the sons of the Inycians better, but unable to make the sons of the Spartans?

Hip. Far from it.³²

Soc. Are the Siciliotes desirous of becoming better, but the Spartans not?

Hip. The Lacedæmonians are, Socrates, very (desirous)?

Soc. Was it then from their want of money that they shunned your society?

Hip. By no means; for they have enough of it.

[8.] Soc. What then could it be, that although they were desirous of virtue, and had money, and you were able to benefit them to the greatest extent, they did not send you away loaded with wealth? Was it that the Lacedæmonians can educate their sons better than you? Shall we say this? and do you concede it is so?

Hip. By no manner of means.

Soc. Were you then unable to persuade the young men at Lacedæmon, that by associating with you they would make a greater progress in virtue than by associating with their own people? Or were you unable to persuade their fathers that they ought to hand over their children to you rather than take that care upon themselves, if they had any regard for their children? For surely they did not grudge their sons becoming as virtuous as possible.

³¹⁻³¹ The Greek is τοὺς συνόντας αὐτῇ καὶ μαθάνοντας—I have translated as if it were τοὺς σοὶ συνόντας καὶ αὐτὴν μαθάνοντας. For thus σοὶ συνόντας is similar to συνὼν τοῖς νίοις twice in § 4, and to σοὶ—συνόντες in § 8.

³² To a bipartite question there could not be a single answer. There is a lacuna here, to be supplied from Suidas, Πολλοὺ δὲ δῖω καὶ λέγειν σιωπῶν: where, if we read γε for καὶ, we shall have an expression similar to οὐκ ἂν φαίην ἔγωγε in § 9, explained by σιωπῶν.

Hip. I do not think they felt any grudge.

Soc. In good truth Lacedæmon is a well-regulated city.

Hip. How not?

Soc. Now in well-regulated cities virtue is most highly prized.

Hip. Certainly.

[9.] Soc. And to impart this to another you know the best of all men.

Hip. By much so, Socrates.

Soc. Now would not the man, who could best impart the art of horsemanship, be the most honoured, and acquire the most wealth in Thessaly,³³ or wherever else in Greece³⁴ this art is cultivated the most?

Hip. It is likely.

Soc. Will he then, who can impart instruction of the greatest value with respect to virtue, be honoured the most, and make the most money if he wishes it, not at Lacedæmon and any other of the well-regulated states in Greece, but in Sicily³⁵ rather, as you think, my friend, or at Inycum? Shall we, Hippias, give credit to this? for if you command, I must (do so).

Hip. It is not, Socrates, the custom of the country for the Lacedæmonians to disturb their laws, nor to educate their children³⁶ contrary to established usages.

Soc. How say you? Think you³⁷ that it is the custom of the country for the Lacedæmonians not to act correctly, but to do wrong?

Hip. I would not say so, Socrates.

Soc. Would they not do right then to educate their sons in the better way, and not in the worse?

[10.] Hip. (They would do) right; but it is not lawful for

from you, and commend? Tell me yourself, since I cannot find them.

Hip. Respecting the genealogies,⁴⁶ Socrates, of their heroes and men, and settlements (of tribes), (and)⁴⁷ how cities were founded of old, and, in a word, to every thing relating to archæology, they listen with the greatest pleasure; so that I was forced to learn my lesson myself thoroughly for their sakes, and to practise myself well on those points.

Soc. By Zeus, Hippias, you were fortunate in that the Lacedæmonians did not take a delight in hearing a man who could reckon up our archons from the time of Solon. For otherwise you would have had some trouble in learning the list.

Hip. How so, Socrates? Upon hearing fifty names only once, I can repeat them from memory.

[13.] Soc. You speak the truth; but I did not bear in mind that you had a system of mnemonics;⁴⁸ so that I understand⁴⁹ why, reasonably enough, the Lacedæmonians are pleased with you, as being a person who knows many things, and they make use of you, as children do of old women, to tell them pretty stories.

Hip. And by Zeus, Socrates, I was lately in high repute there by going through a lecture upon the honourable pursuits to which a young person should devote himself. For I have by me a very beautiful discourse upon that subject,⁵⁰ well put together in other respects, and in the words.⁵⁰ The form and

⁴⁷ I suspect ὥς has dropt out after καί—

⁴⁹ The Greek is ὥστ' ἔννοω—which seems rather strange after οὐκ ἔνευόησα. Ficinus has “jam intelligo”—which leads to εἰς τὸ νῦν δ' ἔννοω—commencement of the discourse is something of this kind.—“After Troy was taken, the story goes, that Neoptolemus inquired of Nestor what were the honourable pursuits a young man should follow to gain a good name. Upon this Nestor is the speaker, and suggests a great many and very excellent precepts laid down by law.” [14.] Of this dissertation⁵¹ I made a display there; and on the third day hence I intend to display it here and several other pieces of mine, worth the hearing, in the school of Philostratus.⁵² For so has Eudicus, the son of Apēmantus, requested. See then that you are present yourself, and bring with you others, who on hearing will be competent to decide upon what is then said.

Soc. This, if a god is willing, Hippias, shall be. But at present answer me a short question relating to it.⁵³ For you have opportunely put me in mind of it. A certain person, has, thou best of men, very lately, during some conversations, thrown me into a difficulty—when I was finding fault with some things as being ugly, and praising others as being beautiful—by asking me, in a very saucy manner, “From whence do you, Socrates, know, said he, what things are beautiful, and what ugly?”⁵⁴ Come then, tell me,⁵⁴ if you can say a word, what is the beautiful?” And I, through my want of wit, was at a loss, and had it not in my power to answer him with propriety. [15.] So, quitting his company, I grew angry with, and vented reproaches upon, myself, and threatened that the first time I met with any of you wise men, I would hear (his opinion) and learn it; and after studying

⁵¹ According to Philostratus in the life of Hippias, p. 495, the dissertation was in the form of a dialogue. Its title was Τρωικά or Ἡρώικα—For these two words are constantly confounded, as remarked by G. C. Lewis in Cl. Jl. No. 76, p. 277, and No. 78, p. 190. So too in Schol. Od. A. 546, instead of ὑπὸ ὀπορίου τῶν Τρώων, Bentley would read Ἡρώων in his letter to Davies, first published in the Monthly Review, vol. xiv. p. 202.

⁵² I have adopted Φιλοστράτου, found in the two best MSS., in lieu of Φειδοστράτου—a word that seems scarcely compounded correctly. On the other hand, the Philostratus here mentioned is probably the same as the person nicknamed Κυναλώπηξ by Aristophanes in Ἰππ. 1066.

⁵³ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῦ can be referred, Plato wrote, I suspect, περὶ γὰρ του, “about something.”

it thoroughly, that I would return to my questioner, and fight out again the matter with him. Now, therefore, as I said, you are come opportunely; and do you instruct me sufficiently what is beauty in the abstract, and endeavour to give me as accurately as possible your answers; in order that I may not be confuted a second time, and pay the penalty of a laugh against myself. For assuredly you know it quite clearly, and it would be but a mite of the learning, with which you are conversant on so many⁵⁵ points.

Hip. By Zeus, a mite indeed, Socrates; and, so to say, of no value at all.

Soc. Easily then shall I learn it; and no one will hereafter confute me.

[16.] Hip. Not one indeed. For otherwise mean would be my profession, and suited to a common person.

Soc. By Juno, Hippias, you speak bravely, if we shall get the man into our clutches. ⁵⁶ But shall I be any hindrance by imitating him, if I lay hold of your arguments, while answering me, in order that you may exercise me the most. For I am nearly skilful in laying hold (of arguments).⁵⁶ If then it makes no difference to you, I am willing to lay hold of them, in order that I may learn⁵⁷ with greater strength.

Hip. Take hold then: for, as I said just now, the question is not a great one; and I will teach you to answer questions much more difficult than this, so that not a single person will be ever able to confute you.

Soc. Ye gods,⁵⁸ how bravely you talk! But come, since you bid me, I will become him, and, as well as I can, try to question you. Now, if you shall give the lecture you men-

⁵⁵ To avoid the incorrect Greek in ὅν ἐδ ῥῶν πολλῶν, we must read ὅν ἐδ εἴρω πολλῶν— The critics quoted by Stalbaum neither do, nor pretend to, defend this union of the relative pronoun with the definite article.

⁵⁶—⁵⁷ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. But how Socrates could, by imitating the nameless saucy fellow, be any hindrance to Hippias, I cannot understand.

⁵⁸ Instead of φεῦ, which never, I think, precedes ὥς ἐδ λίγαις, I have translated as if the Greek were ὦ θεοί.

tion, upon beautiful pursuits, he will, after hearing it, when you have ceased speaking, inquire about nothing else except about the beautiful—for such a habit he has—and he will say, “Art not, (say) thou stranger from Elis, the just just through justness?” Answer now, Hippias, as if he were questioning you.

Hip. I answer,⁵⁹ through justness.

[17.] Soc. There is then such a thing as justness?

Hip. Clearly so.

Soc. Are not then the wise wise through wisdom? and all that is good good through goodness?

Hip. How not?

Soc. By those things existing really; for it is not surely by their non-existing.

Hip. By their existing really.

Soc. Are not all things, that are beautiful, beautiful through beauty?

Hip. Yes, through beauty.

Soc. By such a thing existing?

Hip. By its existing. For what should it be?

Soc. Tell me now, stranger, he will say, what is this beauty?

Hip. Does he, who asks this question, want to know what is a beautiful thing?

Soc. I think not, Hippias: but what is beauty.

Hip. How does this differ from that?

Soc. Seems there to you no (difference)?

Hip. There is not any difference.

Soc. But, however,⁶⁰ it is evident that you know better.

⁵⁹ I have adopted ἀποκρίνομαι, found in one MS., in lieu of ἀποκρίνομαι. Ficinus omits the word entirely.

⁶⁰ The Greek is ἄλλὰ μίνοι δῆλον, where I cannot understand μίνοι: nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is “Constat autem.” Hence I suggested, many years ago, ἄλλὰ μύοντι τῷ, “But to any one blinking, an expression similar to the Latin, “conniventibus oculis,” and to the English, “with half an eye.” The phrase in Aristoph. Plut. 49, is δῆλον τυφλῷ, quoted by the Schol. on Plato, Sophist, p. 241, D., φαίνεται καὶ, τὸ λεγόμενον δῆ, τυφλῷ: and is found in Rep. iii. p. 465, D., and viii. p. 550, D. With regard to the verb μύειν, which Plato has used in Sophist. p. 239, E., δόξει τοι μύειν ἢ παῖ ἀπασιν οὐκ ἔχειν δμματα, and elsewhere, see Creuzer on Plotinus, Περὶ Κάλλους, p. 357.

Consider, however, good sir, the question (well).⁶¹ For he asks you, not what is a beautiful thing, but what is beauty.

Hip. I understand you, good sir. And I will answer his question, "What is beauty?" nor shall I ever be confuted.⁶² For rest assured, Socrates, if the truth must be told, that a beautiful maiden is a beautiful thing.⁶³

[18.] Soc. By the dog,⁶⁴ you have answered, Hippias, beautifully and gloriously.⁶⁵ Shall I then, when I answer thus, have answered the question correctly? and shall I never be refuted?

Hip. For how could you be refuted, Socrates, on that point which seems correct to all the world; and where all who hear you will testify in your favour that you are speaking properly?

Soc. Be it so then, by all means. But come, Hippias, let me consider again with myself what you are saying. For the man will question me in some such manner as this: "Come, Socrates, answer me, ⁶⁶if beauty exists in the abstract, all

And to the passages there quoted add Lucian in Rhetor. Præcept. § 11, κάν μύοντι—εἰποι τις. Shakspeare says in Lear, "A man may see how this world goes with no eyes."

⁶¹ After ἄθρει, it is pretty evident that εὖ has dropt out.

⁶² By comparing the expression of Socrates, οὐ μή ποτε ἡλεγχθῶ, it is quite certain that Hippias said οὐ μή ποτε ἡλεγχθῆς.

⁶⁴ This was one of the oaths adopted by Socrates; another was, "by the plane-tree," as in Phædrus, p. 236, D., and the third was, "by the goose," as we learn from the Scholiast on Aristoph. 'Ορν. 521. To these might be added "the goat," as appears from Tertullian Apolog. 14, quoted by Gottleber on Phædo, p. 99, A. "Socrate contentus, qui in contumeliam deorum, quercum et hircum et canem dejerabat." Of the different reasons assigned for such strange forms of adjuration an account is to be found in the notes of Menage on Diogen. Laert. p. 92. But as none of them are satisfactory, the truth remains to be still found, if worth the search, elsewhere.

⁶⁵ The Greek is εὐδόξως: which is never, I believe, thus connected with the idea of an answer. I suggested long ago οὐ λοξῶς, i. e. "not obliquely," referring to Suidas, Λοξά' σκόλια, καμπύλα, οὐκ ἐξ εὐθείας γινόμενα: and to Lucian, Vit. Auct. § 14, ὥσπερ ὁ Λοξίας οὐδὲν ἀποσαφείς. Dialog. Deor. xvi. § 1, Λοξά—πρὸς ἑκάτερον τῆς ἐρωτήσεως ἀποκρινομενος. Alexandr. § 10, ἀμφιβόλους καὶ λοξοὺς χρησμοὺς συγγραφήν: and I will now add in Jov. Confut. § 14, Λοξά καὶ ἐκαμφοτερίζοντα. See too Boissonad. in Eunap. p. 162, and 564.

⁶⁶—⁶⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek text. But the train of thought requires, "Come now, Socrates, and answer me this correctly. All those things which you say are beautiful, would these be beautiful?"⁶⁵ And I will then say that, ⁶⁷if a beautiful maiden be a beautiful thing, through which the things would be beautiful."⁶⁷

Hip. Think you then that he will still attempt to confute you, (by asserting) that what you say is beautiful, is not so? or that, should he attempt it, he will not be laughed down?

Soc. That he will, thou wondrous man, I am well assured; but whether, after making the attempt, he will be laughed down, the thing itself will show. However,⁶⁸ I wish to tell you what he will say.

Hip. Tell it then.

[19.] Soc. What a sweet⁶⁹ creature, Socrates! he will say, you are. Is not a beautiful mare, which even a god has praised in an oracle,⁷⁰ a beautiful thing? What shall we answer, Hippias? Shall we say aught else than that ⁷¹the

the things which you say are beautiful, if there be such a thing as beauty in the abstract, would they not be beautiful?" This in Greek would be "Ἰθι μοι ὦ Σώκρατες, ἀπόκριναι τοῦτ' ἐγώ. Τὰ πάντα, ἃ φης καλὰ εἶναι, εἴ τι ἐστὶ αὐτὸ τὸ καλόν, οὐ ταῦτ' ἀν εἶη καλὰ; Ficinus however has "Age, responde mihi, Socrates, Quid est ipsum pulchrum? quod si sit, hæc omnia, quæ pulchra dicuntur, per ipsum pulchra sunt," which it is uncertain whether he did or did not find in his MS. Sydenham however was led from thence to suspect that δὲ ὅ had dropt out between τὸ καλόν and ταῦτ' ἀν—and so was Schleiermacher after him.

⁶⁷—⁶⁷ The Greek is 'Εγὼ δὲ δὴ ἐγώ, ὅτι εἰ παρθένος καλὴ καλὸν ἐστὶ, δὲ δὲ ταῦτ' ἀν εἶη καλὰ. But the sense evidently requires us to expunge the word εἰ before παρθένος, and to read ὅτι παρθένος καλὴ καλὸν ἐστὶ, κ. τ. λ. S. Heindorf says we must omit εἰ, or all the words after καλόν. But the train of argument leads to something of this kind—"If there be such a thing as a beautiful maiden, there must be the beautiful, by which all the things beautiful would exist"—in Greek, Εἰ παρθένος καλὸν ἐστὶ, ἐστὶ τὸ καλόν, δὲ δὲ πάντα ἀν εἶη καλὰ, as I stated many years ago.

⁶⁸ The origin of this proverb is told by the Scholiast on Theætet. p. 200, E., who says, that when some person was going to cross a river, he asked his guide whether it was deep; to which the latter replied, "The event itself will show."

⁶⁹ Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 132, says that γλυκὺς and ἡδύς were used ironically as a polite way of calling a person a simpleton.

⁷⁰ The oracle alluded to has been preserved entire by the Schol. on Theocritus, Id. xiv. 48, and by Tzetzes, in Chil. ix. 291, and x. 330, and partially by Euseb. Præp. Evang. v. 29. For when the people of Megara had inquired of the god to whom the palm of superiority was to be assigned, they were told, amongst other things, that the mares of Thrace, or, as Tzetzes testifies, of Thessaly, were the best.

⁷¹ The Greek is τὴν ἵππον καλὴν εἶναι τὴν γε καλὴν. And so me from which of the cities, whither you went, did you gain the greatest money? Is it not plain it was from Sparta, whither you went the oftenest?

Hip. Not, by Zeus, from thence, Socrates.

Soc. How say you? The least then?

Hip. Never any thing at all.

Soc. A monstrous and marvellous account you are giving, Hippias. But tell me, has not that wisdom of yours the power to make those ³¹ who associate with you and learn it ³¹ better as regards virtue.

Hip. Yes, very much so, Socrates.

Soc. Were you then able to make the sons of the Inycians better, but unable to make the sons of the Spartans?

Hip. Far from it.³²

Soc. Are the Siciliotes desirous of becoming better, but the Spartans not?

Hip. The Lacedæmonians are, Socrates, very (desirous)?

Soc. Was it then from their want of money that they shunned your society?

Hip. By no means; for they have enough of it.

[8.] Soc. What then could it be, that although they were desirous of virtue, and had money, and you were able to benefit them to the greatest extent, they did not send you away loaded with wealth? Was it that the Lacedæmonians can educate their sons better than you? Shall we say this? and do you concede it is so?

Hip. By no manner of means.

Soc. Were you then unable to persuade the young men at Lacedæmon, that by associating with you they would make a greater progress in virtue than by associating with their own people? Or were you unable to persuade their fathers that they ought to hand over their children to you rather than take that care upon themselves, if they had any regard for their children? For surely they did not grudge their sons becoming as virtuous as possible.

³² To a bipartite question there could not be a single answer. There is a lacuna here, to be supplied from Suidas, Πολλοὺ δὴ δῖω καὶ λίγειν σιωπῶ: where, if we read γε for καὶ, we shall have an expression similar to οὐκ ἂν φαίην ἔγωγε in § 9, explained by σιωπῶ.

Hip. I do not think they felt any grudge.

Soc. In good truth Lacedæmon is a well-regulated city.

Hip. How not?

Soc. Now in well-regulated cities virtue is most highly prized.

Hip. Certainly.

[9.] Soc. And to impart this to another you know the best of all men.

Hip. By much so, Socrates.

Soc. Now would not the man, who could best impart the art of horsemanship, be the most honoured, and acquire the most wealth in Thessaly,³³ or wherever else in Greece³⁴ this art is cultivated the most?

Hip. It is likely.

Soc. Will he then, who can impart instruction of the greatest value with respect to virtue, be honoured the most, and make the most money if he wishes it, not at Lacedæmon and any other of the well-regulated states in Greece, but in Sicily³⁵ rather, as you think, my friend, or at Inycum? Shall we, Hippias, give credit to this? for if you command, I must (do so).

Hip. It is not, Socrates, the custom of the country for the Lacedæmonians to disturb their laws, nor to educate their children³⁶ contrary to established usages.

Soc. How say you? Think you³⁷ that it is the custom of the country for the Lacedæmonians not to act correctly, but to do wrong?

Hip. I would not say so, Socrates.

Soc. Would they not do right then to educate their sons in the better way, and not in the worse?

³³ See Meno, § 1. S.

³⁴ As there is nothing on which τῆς Ἑλλάδος can depend, I have translated as if the Greek were ἡ τῆς Ἑλλάδος ἀλλοθι—not τῆς Ἑλλάδος—καὶ ἀλλοθι.

³⁵ On the luxury of the Sicilians Sydenham refers to the Greek proverb, Σικελικὴ τράπεζα in Plato, Legg. iii. p. 404, D., and the "Siculæ dapes" in Horace.

³⁶ Instead of νιους the two best MSS. have υἱς, similar to "filios," in Ficinus.

³⁷ The two best MSS. have preserved οἷα, wanting in all the rest.

them to give a foreign education. Since, rest assured that if any one else ever took away money from thence by teaching, I should have taken by much the most. For they delight greatly³⁸ in listening to me, and give me praise.³⁹ But what I am saying is not law.³⁹

Soc. Say you, Hippias, that the law is an injury or a benefit to a state?

Hip. It is enacted, I presume, for a benefit; but sometimes the law, when improperly enacted, does an injury.

Soc. What then, do not they who enact a law, lay it down as the greatest good to a state? For without law it is impossible to live in a state of good government.

Hip. You speak the truth.

Soc. When, therefore, they who undertake to frame laws, fail in procuring a good, they have missed⁴⁰ what is lawful and law.⁴⁰ Or how say you?

Hip. Accurately speaking, Socrates, such is the case; but men are not used to give that name.⁴¹

Soc. Do you mean, Hippias, those, who know the truth, or who do not know it?

Hip. I mean the many.

Soc. Are the many then those, who know the truth?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. But surely they, who do know it, do in reality conceive that what is to all men more beneficial is more agreeable to law than what is less beneficial. Or do not you grant this?

Hip. I grant that (they do hold so) in reality.

*Soc.*⁴² Do not (things) exist, and are in the state,⁴² as those, who are knowing, conceive?

Hip. Undoubtedly.

³⁸ In lieu of χαίρουσι γούν, where γούν is useless, I have translated as if the Greek were χαίρουσ' ἄγαν—

^{39—39} Such is the literal version of the Greek ἀλλ' ὃ λίγω οὐ νόμος. By comparing however Protag. § 80, it would not be difficult to recover what Plato probably wrote.

^{40—40} I cannot understand νομίμων καὶ νόμον— The natural train of ideas would lead to, "they fail in that, for which laws are laid down"—

⁴¹ Here again I am at a loss, unless we read νομίζεῖν, "to think," in lieu of ὀνομάζειν, "to name," as I suggested long ago.

^{42—42} The Greek is, ὅτι οὐν ἔστι γε καὶ ἔχει οὕτως. To avoid the tautology I suggested ὅτι οὐν ἂν ἔστι γε, ἔχει οὕτως. Stalb. has edited ἔστι γε, from the two best MSS.

Lacedæmonians to receive a foreign education under yourself, than after the system of their own country.

Hip. And I assert the truth.

Soc. Because what is more beneficial is more conformable to law. And this, Hippias, do you say?

Hip. I have so said.

Soc. According then to your reasoning, it is more conformable to law for the sons of the Lacedæmonians to be instructed by Hippias, and less so by their fathers, if perchance they shall in reality be more benefited under you.

Hip. And benefited they would be, Socrates.

Soc. The Lacedæmonians then act contrary to law, in not giving you their gold, and committing their sons to your care.

Hip. In this I agree with you: for you seem to produce an argument in my favour, and there is no need for me to oppose it.

Soc. We find then, my friend, the Lacedæmonians to act contrary to law, and this too in matters of the greatest moment; they who are thought to be most observant of law. And yet, by the gods, did they praise you, and were delighted at hearing—what? Or is it not evident that the subjects were those which you know the best, relating to the stars and celestial events?⁴³

Hip. Not at all. Such subjects they cannot endure.

Soc. But they delight in hearing something about geometry.

Hip. Not at all; for many of them know not, so to say, even how to reckon.

[12.] Soc. They are then far from enduring you, while making a display on the keeping of accounts.⁴⁴

Hip. Very far indeed, by Zeus.

Soc. But the subjects then were those, in which you can the most accurately of (all⁴⁵) men draw distinctions, respecting the powers of letters and syllables, and rhythms and harmonies.

Hip. What harmonies, or letters, my good man?

Soc. What then are the subjects, which they gladly hear

⁴³ The Greek is πάθη. Ficinus has "progressus."

⁵¹ According to Philostratus in the life of Hippias, p. 495, the dissertation was in the form of a dialogue. Its title was Τρωικά or Ἡρωικά—For these two words are constantly confounded, as remarked by G. C. Lewis in Cl. Jl. No. 76, p. 277, and No. 78, p. 190. So too in Schol. Od. A. 546, instead of ὑπὸ ὀποτέρου τῶν Τρώων, Bentley would read Ἡρώων in his letter to Davies, first published in the Monthly Review, vol. xiv. p. 202.

⁵² I have adopted Φιλοστράτου, found in the two best MSS., in lieu of Φειδοστράτου—a word that seems scarcely compounded correctly. On the other hand, the Philostratus here mentioned is probably the same as the person nicknamed Κυναλώπηξ by Aristophanes in Ἰππ. 1066.

⁵³ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῦ can be referred, Plato wrote, I suspect, περί γέ του, “about something.”

it thoroughly, that I would return to my questioner, and fight out again the matter with him. Now, therefore, as I said, you are come opportunely; and do you instruct me sufficiently what is beauty in the abstract, and endeavour to give me as accurately as possible your answers; in order that I may not be confuted a second time, and pay the penalty of a laugh against myself. For assuredly you know it quite clearly, and it would be but a mite of the learning, with which you are conversant on so many⁵⁵ points.

Hip. By Zeus, a mite indeed, Socrates; and, so to say, of no value at all.

Soc. Easily then shall I learn it; and no one will hereafter confute me.

[16.] Hip. Not one indeed. For otherwise mean would be my profession, and suited to a common person.

Soc. By Juno, Hippias, you speak bravely, if we shall get the man into our clutches. ⁵⁶ But shall I be any hindrance by imitating him, if I lay hold of your arguments, while answering me, in order that you may exercise me the most. For I am nearly skilful in laying hold (of arguments).⁵⁶ If then it makes no difference to you, I am willing to lay hold of them, in order that I may learn⁵⁷ with greater strength.

Hip. Take hold then: for, as I said just now, the question is not a great one; and I will teach you to answer questions much more difficult than this, so that not a single person will be ever able to confute you.

Soc. Ye gods,⁵⁸ how bravely you talk! But come, since you bid me, I will become him, and, as well as I can, try to question you. Now, if you shall give the lecture you men-

⁵⁵ To avoid the incorrect Greek in ὧν σὲ τῶν πολλῶν, we must read ὧν σὲ οὕτω πολλῶν— The critics quoted by Stalbaum neither do, nor pretend to, defend this union of the relative pronoun with the definite article.

⁵⁶⁻⁵⁸ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. But how Socrates could, by imitating the nameless saucy fellow, be any hindrance to Hippias, I cannot understand.

⁵⁷ In lieu of μάθω, which I cannot understand, I have suggested μυχθῶ. For the idea of "mingling in fight" here correctly coincides with the preceding ἀναμαχοῦμενος. Others perhaps would prefer ἔρρωμενίστερον με θῶ, i. e. "make myself of greater strength."

⁵⁸ Instead of φεῦ, which never, I think, precedes ὥς εὖ λέγεις, I have translated as if the Greek were ὦ θεοί.

tion, upon beautiful pursuits, he will, after hearing it, when you have ceased speaking, inquire about nothing else except about the beautiful—for such a habit he has—and he will say, “Art not, (say) thou stranger from Elis, the just just through justness?” Answer now, Hippias, as if he were questioning you.

Hip. I answer,⁵⁹ through justness.

[17.] Soc. There is then such a thing as justness?

Hip. Clearly so.

Soc. Are not then the wise wise through wisdom? and all that is good good through goodness?

Hip. How not?

Soc. By those things existing really; for it is not surely by their non-existing.

Hip. By their existing really.

Soc. Are not all things, that are beautiful, beautiful through beauty?

Hip. Yes, through beauty.

Soc. By such a thing existing?

Hip. By its existing. For what should it be?

Soc. Tell me now, stranger, he will say, what is this beauty?

Hip. Does he, who asks this question, want to know what is a beautiful thing?

Soc. I think not, Hippias: but what is beauty.

Hip. How does this differ from that?

Soc. Seems there to you no (difference)?

Hip. There is not any difference.

Soc. But, however,⁶⁰ it is evident that you know better.

⁵⁹ I have adopted ἀποκρίνομαι, found in one MS., in lieu of ἀποκρινοῦμαι. Ficinus omits the word entirely.

⁶⁰ The Greek is Ἄλλὰ μίντοι δῆλον, where I cannot understand μίντοι: nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is “Constat autem.” Hence I suggested, many years ago, Ἄλλὰ μύοντι τῷ, “But to any one blinking,” an expression similar to the Latin, “conniventibus oculis,” and to the English, “with half an eye.” The phrase in Aristoph. Plut. 49, is δῆλον τυφλῷ, quoted by the Schol. on Plato, Sophist. p. 241, D., φαίνεται καὶ, τὸ λεγόμενον δῆ, τυφλῷ: and is found in Rep. iii. p. 465, D., and viii. p. 550, D. With regard to the verb μύειν, which Plato has used in Sophist. p. 239, E., δόξει τοι μύειν ἢ παρ’ ἀπασιν οὐκ ἔχειν ὁμματα, and elsewhere, see Creuzer on Plotinus, Περὶ Κάλους, p. 357.

Consider, however, good sir, the question (well).⁶¹ For he asks you, not what is a beautiful thing, but what is beauty.

Hip. I understand you, good sir. And I will answer his question, "What is beauty?" nor shall I ever be confuted.⁶² For rest assured, Socrates, if the truth must be told, that a beautiful maiden is a beautiful thing.⁶³

[18.] Soc. By the dog,⁶⁴ you have answered, Hippias, beautifully and gloriously.⁶⁵ Shall I then, when I answer thus, have answered the question correctly? and shall I never be refuted?

Hip. For how could you be refuted, Socrates, on that point which seems correct to all the world; and where all who hear you will testify in your favour that you are speaking properly?

Soc. Be it so then, by all means. But come, Hippias, let me consider again with myself what you are saying. For the man will question me in some such manner as this: "Come, Socrates, answer me, ⁶⁶if beauty exists in the abstract, all

And to the passages there quoted add Lucian in Rhetor. Præcept. § 11, ἐὰν μύοντι—εἰποι τις. Shakspeare says in Lear, "A man may see how this world goes with no eyes."

⁶¹ After ἄθρει, it is pretty evident that εὖ has dropt out.

⁶² By comparing the expression of Socrates, οὐ μὴ ποτε ἐλεγχθῶ, it is quite certain that Hippias said οὐ μὴ ποτε ἐλεγχθῆς.

⁶⁴ This was one of the oaths adopted by Socrates; another was, "by the plane-tree," as in Phædrus, p. 236, D., and the third was, "by the goose," as we learn from the Scholiast on Aristoph. 'Ορν. 521. To these might be added "the goat," as appears from Tertullian Apolog. 14, quoted by Gottleber on Phædo, p. 99, A. "Socrate contentus, qui in contumeliam deorum, quercum et hircum et canem dejerabat." Of the different reasons assigned for such strange forms of adjuration an account is to be found in the notes of Menage on Diogen. Laert. p. 92. But as none of them are satisfactory, the truth remains to be still found, if worth the search, elsewhere.

these things which you say are beautiful, would these be beautiful?"⁶¹ And I will then say that, ⁶⁷if a beautiful maiden be a beautiful thing, through which the things would be beautiful."⁶⁷

Hip. Think you then that he will still attempt to confute you, (by asserting) that what you say is beautiful, is not so? or that, should he attempt it, he will not be laughed down?

Soc. That he will, thou wondrous man, I am well assured; but whether, after making the attempt, he will be laughed down, the thing itself will show. However,⁶⁸ I wish to tell you what he will say.

Hip. Tell it then.

[19.] Soc. What a sweet⁶⁹ creature, Socrates! he will say, you are. Is not a beautiful mare, which even a god has praised in an oracle,⁷⁰ a beautiful thing? What shall we answer, Hippias? Shall we say aught else than that ⁷¹the

the things which you say are beautiful, if there be such a thing as beauty in the abstract, would they not be beautiful?" This in Greek would be "Ἰθι μοι ὦ Σώκρατες, ἀποκρίναι τοῦτ' ἐγώ. Τὰ πάντα, δ' φησὶ καλὰ εἶναι, εἴ τι ἔστι αὐτὸ τὸ καλόν, οὐ ταῦτ' ἀν εἰη καλὰ; Ficinus however has "Age, responde mihi, Socrates, Quid est ipsum pulchrum? quod si sit, hæc omnia, quæ pulchra dicuntur, per ipsum pulchra sunt," which it is uncertain whether he did or did not find in his MS. Sydenham however was led from thence to suspect that δὲ δ' had dropt out between τὸ καλόν and ταῦτ' ἀν—and so was Schleiermacher after him.

⁶⁷—⁶⁷ The Greek is Ἐγὼ δὲ δὴ ἱρῶ, ὅτι εἰ παρθένος καλὴ καλόν ἔστι, δὲ δ' ταῦτ' ἀν εἰη καλὰ. But the sense evidently requires us to expunge the word εἰ before παρθένος, and to read ὅτι παρθένος καλὴ καλόν ἔστι, κ. τ. λ. S. Heindorf says we must omit εἰ, or all the words after καλόν. But the train of argument leads to something of this kind—"If there be such a thing as a beautiful maiden, there must be the beautiful, by which all the things beautiful would exist"—in Greek, Εἰ παρθένος καλόν ἔστι, ἔστι τὸ καλόν, δὲ δ' πάντ' ἀν εἰη καλὰ, as I stated many years ago.

⁶⁸ The origin of this proverb is told by the Scholiast on Theætet. p. 200, E., who says, that when some person was going to cross a river, he asked his guide whether it was deep; to which the latter replied, "The event itself will show."

⁶⁹ Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 132, says that γλυκὺς and ἡδύς were used ironically as a polite way of calling a person a simpleton.

⁷⁰ The oracle alluded to has been preserved entire by the Schol. on Theocritus, Id. xiv. 48, and by Tzetzes, in Chil. ix. 291, and x. 330, and partially by Euseb. Præp. Evang. v. 29. For when the people of Megara had inquired of the god to whom the palm of superiority was to be assigned, they were told, amongst other things, that the mares of Thrace, or, as Tzetzes testifies, of Thessaly, were the best.

⁷¹ The Greek is τὴν ἵππον καλὴν εἶναι τὴν γε καλὴν. And so mare is beautiful? at least the beautiful.⁷¹ For how should we dare to deny that a beautiful thing is beautiful?

Hip. You speak, Socrates, what is true,⁷² especially since the god rightly said it;⁷³ for with us there are mares very beautiful.⁷³

Soc. Be it so, he will say; but what, is not a beautiful lyre a beautiful thing? Shall we allow it, Hippias?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. And after this he will say—as, guessing from his usual manner, I nearly know full well—My excellent fellow, is not a beautiful soup-dish a beautiful thing?

Hip. Who is this man, Socrates? What an uneducated fellow! who thus presumes to express himself in words so low in an affair so solemn.

Soc. Such is the fellow, Hippias, not a fine gentleman, but a man of the mob, who cares for nothing but truth. He must however have an answer; ⁷⁴and I appear speaking for him ⁷⁴—

Ficinus, "Pulchram equam nonne pulchram esse." This, says Heindorf, might stand; but καλὸν εἶναι, suggested by Cornarius, is preferable. He did not however perceive that, as the article could not be thus repeated, it must be omitted before ἴππων; nor that γε Θεσσαλὴν lie hid in γε καλὴν, to answer to the Thessalian mare, mentioned in the oracle, according to Tzetzes; and hence just before in lieu of θήλεια one would prefer Θεσσαλῆ, as I remarked many years ago.

⁷²⁻⁷³ Such is the literal version of the Greek; which I confess I cannot understand. For Socrates did not say what was true, because the oracle spoke truth; nor did the oracle speak truth, because there were beautiful mares in Elis. What Hippias meant to say is, that, as the oracle had spoken of the beauty of mares, it had spoken of what an Elean, who was a judge of such matters, would confess to be beautiful. Plato therefore wrote perhaps, as I suggested many years ago,—ἰεῖροι καὶ, δ ὁρθῶς ὁ θεὸς εἶπεν, εἶπον δὲ αὐτός, "since, what the god has correctly said, I would have said myself;" a sentiment that exhibits the vanity of Hippias in a marked manner, as he thus puts himself upon an equality with the god.

⁷³ As the chariot-races in the Olympic games were run in the country of Elis, the people there had an opportunity of seeing the best horses, and of becoming, like persons living at Newmarket and Doncaster in England, the best judges of horse-flesh; while from the number of prizes gained by mares, it was found that the female was better suited than the male for a long race, as remarked by Servius on Virgil, Georg. i. 59.

⁷⁴⁻⁷⁶ The Greek is καὶ ἔγωγε προαποφαίνομαι: which would mean "I give my opinion the first," as shown by Ὁ Πρόδικε, προαπόφηναι τὴν σὴν γνώμην in Protag. p. 340, A. Ficinus has "Præfabor." But this could be said only if Socrates were going to reply, not to put a question. Plato wrote, I suspect, καὶ λέγων γε πρὸ αὐτοῦ φαίνομαι, as I partly suggested many years ago, when I should have quoted Alcest. 336, πρὸ τούτων—λέγειν.

If the soup-dish be made by a skilful potter, smooth and round, and well baked, like some of the beautiful soup-dishes with two handles, containing six choes,⁷⁵ very beautiful,⁷⁶ if he inquires about such a soup-dish, we must confess it to be beautiful. For how could we say that what is beautiful, is not beautiful?

Hip. Not at all, Socrates.

Soc. Is not a beautiful soup-dish then, he will say, a beautiful thing? Answer.

[20.] Hip. But, Socrates, the case is, I think, this; even such a vessel, when beautifully made, is a beautiful thing. But this taken as a whole does not deserve to be considered as beautiful, as compared with a mare, and a maiden, and the other things of beauty.

Soc. Be it so. I understand you, Hippias, that we must thus reply to the person who puts such a question. You are ignorant, my man, that correct is the saying of Heracleitus, That the most beautiful ape, as compared with another kind,⁷⁷ is ugly; and that the most beautiful of soup-dishes is ugly as compared with the maiden-kind; as says Hippias the wise. Is it not so, Hippias?

Hip. You have answered, Socrates, quite correctly.

Soc. Hear then—for I know well he will say after this—What then, Socrates, should any one compare maiden-kind ⁷⁵ According to Arbuthnot's computation, the Attic χοῦς contained three quarts. S.

⁷⁷ The Greek is ἄλλῃ γίνοι. But we ought to read ἀνθρωπίνῃ γίνοι, as is evident from what is quoted presently after from the same Heracleitus, ἀνθρώπων ὁ σοφώτατος πρὸς θεὸν πίθηκος φανείται. For however dark his writings were, there is no reason to think he wrote absurdly. The absurdity is owing to the transcribers, who instead of ἀνῶ, an abbreviated form for ἀνθρωπίνῃ, wrote ἄλλῃ. S. This correction, or rather ἀνθρωπείῃ, which is more after Plato's manner, appears to be indubitable; for we have thus a climax of ideas—"The most beautiful monkey is ugly, as compared with a man: and the man most wise, as compared with a god." HEIND., who, in ed. 2, prefers ἀνθρώπων, as Bekker does likewise. But a single monkey would scarcely be compared with the whole race of man. The true reading is probably ἀνῶ ἐνὶ γῆ, i. e. "to even a single man." On a similar allusion to the monkey, see my note on The Statesman, § 9, p. 205.

them to give a foreign education. Since, rest assured that if any one else ever took away money from thence by teaching, I should have taken by much the most. For they delight greatly³⁸ in listening to me, and give me praise.³⁹ But what I am saying is not law.³⁹

Soc. Say you, Hippias, that the law is an injury or a benefit to a state?

Hip. It is enacted, I presume, for a benefit; but sometimes the law, when improperly enacted, does an injury.

Soc. What then, do not they who enact a law, lay it down as the greatest good to a state? For without law it is impossible to live in a state of good government.

Hip. You speak the truth.

Soc. When, therefore, they who undertake to frame laws, fail in procuring a good, they have missed⁴⁰ what is lawful and law.⁴⁰ Or how say you?

Hip. Accurately speaking, Socrates, such is the case; but men are not used to give that name.⁴¹

Soc. Do you mean, Hippias, those, who know the truth, or who do not know it?

Hip. I mean the many.

Soc. Are the many then those, who know the truth?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. But surely they, who do know it, do in reality conceive that what is to all men more beneficial is more agreeable to law than what is less beneficial. Or do not you grant this?

Hip. I grant that (they do hold so) in reality.

*Soc.*⁴² Do not (things) exist, and are in the state,⁴² as those, who are knowing, conceive?

Hip. Undoubtedly.

³⁸ In lieu of χαίρουσι γούν, where γούν is useless, I have translated as if the Greek were χαίρουσι' αγαυ—

^{39—39} Such is the literal version of the Greek ἀλλ' ὃ λίγω οὐ νόμος. By comparing however Protag. § 80, it would not be difficult to recover what Plato probably wrote.

^{40—40} I cannot understand νομίμων καὶ νόμον—The natural train of ideas would lead to, "they fail in that, for which laws are laid down"—

^{42—42} The Greek is, ὅτι οὐν ἔστι γε καὶ ἔχει οὕτως. To avoid the tautology I suggested ὅτι οὐν ἔστι γε, ἔχει οὕτως. Stalb. has edited ἔστι τε, from the two best MSS.

Lacedæmonians to receive a foreign education under yourself, than after the system of their own country.

Hip. And I assert the truth.

Soc. Because what is more beneficial is more conformable to law. And this, Hippias, do you say?

Hip. I have so said.

Soc. According then to your reasoning, it is more conformable to law for the sons of the Lacedæmonians to be instructed by Hippias, and less so by their fathers, if perchance they shall in reality be more benefited under you.

Hip. And benefited they would be, Socrates.

Soc. The Lacedæmonians then act contrary to law, in not giving you their gold, and committing their sons to your care.

Hip. In this I agree with you: for you seem to produce an argument in my favour, and there is no need for me to oppose it.

Soc. We find then, my friend, the Lacedæmonians to act contrary to law, and this too in matters of the greatest moment; they who are thought to be most observant of law. And yet, by the gods, did they praise you, and were delighted at hearing—what? Or is it not evident that the subjects were those which you know the best, relating to the stars and celestial events?⁴³

Hip. Not at all. Such subjects they cannot endure.

Soc. But they delight in hearing something about geometry.

Hip. Not at all; for many of them know not, so to say, even how to reckon.

[12.] Soc. They are then far from enduring you, while making a display on the keeping of accounts.⁴⁴

Hip. Very far indeed, by Zeus.

Soc. But the subjects then were those, in which you can the most accurately of (all⁴⁵) men draw distinctions, respecting the powers of letters and syllables, and rhythms and harmonies.

Hip. What harmonies, or letters, my good man?

Soc. What then are the subjects, which they gladly hear from you, and commend? Tell me yourself, since I cannot find them.

⁴³ The Greek is πράθη. Ficinus has "progressus."

⁴⁴ Ficinus, uncertain how to translate λογισμῶν, has "ratiocinationes computationesque;" and hence Sydenham, "of numbers and accounts."

⁴⁵ Ficinus alone has "omnium hominum—"

Hip. Respecting the genealogies,⁴⁶ Socrates, of their heroes and men, and settlements (of tribes), (and)⁴⁷ how cities were founded of old, and, in a word, to every thing relating to archæology, they listen with the greatest pleasure; so that I was forced to learn my lesson myself thoroughly for their sakes, and to practise myself well on those points.

Soc. By Zeus, Hippias, you were fortunate in that the Lacedæmonians did not take a delight in hearing a man who could reckon up our archons from the time of Solon. For otherwise you would have had some trouble in learning the list.

Hip. How so, Socrates? Upon hearing fifty names only once, I can repeat them from memory.

[13.] Soc. You speak the truth; but I did not bear in mind that you had a system of mnemonics;⁴⁸ so that I understand⁴⁹ why, reasonably enough, the Lacedæmonians are pleased with you, as being a person who knows many things, and they make use of you, as children do of old women, to tell them pretty stories.

Hip. And by Zeus, Socrates, I was lately in high repute there by going through a lecture upon the honourable pursuits to which a young person should devote himself. For I have by me a very beautiful discourse upon that subject,⁵⁰ well put together in other respects, and in the words.⁵⁰ The form and

⁴⁷ I suspect ὥς has dropt out after καί—

⁴⁹ The Greek is ὥστ' ἐννοῶ—which seems rather strange after οὐκ ἐνενόησα. Ficinus has “jam intelligo”—which leads to εἰς τὸ νῦν δ' ἐννοῶ—

⁵⁰ The Greek is καὶ ἄλλως εὖ διακειμένος καὶ τοῖς δνόμασι. But διακειμένος could hardly follow συγκεείμενος: and if it could, it would not be united to the dative δνόμασι. Besides, it is not easy to say, to what ἄλλως can be referred, as opposed to δνόμασι. Ficinus has “verborum elegantia pcellet”—from which I formerly elicited εὖ διακοσμούμενος: but I would now prefer διεσκευασμένος, similar to λόγοι παρεσκευασμένοι in Menex. p. 235, D., while in καὶ ἄλλως and καὶ τοῖς lie hid, I suspect, καὶ Λυσίου—καλλίστοις δνόμασι. For thus Lysias would be praised here ironically, as he is in the Phædrus.

commencement of the discourse is something of this kind.—“After Troy was taken, the story goes, that Neoptolemus inquired of Nestor what were the honourable pursuits a young man should follow to gain a good name. Upon this Nestor is the speaker, and suggests a great many and very excellent precepts laid down by law.” [14.] Of this dissertation⁵¹ I made a display there; and on the third day hence I intend to display it here and several other pieces of mine, worth the hearing, in the school of Philostratus.⁵² For so has Eudicus, the son of Apēmantus, requested. See then that you are present yourself, and bring with you others, who on hearing will be competent to decide upon what is then said.

Soc. This, if a god is willing, Hippias, shall be. But at present answer me a short question relating to it.⁵³ For you have opportunely put me in mind of it. A certain person, has, thou best of men, very lately, during some conversations, thrown me into a difficulty—when I was finding fault with some things as being ugly, and praising others as being beautiful—by asking me, in a very saucy manner, “From whence do you, Socrates, know, said he, what things are beautiful, and what ugly?”⁵⁴ Come then, tell me,⁵⁴ if you can say a word, what is the beautiful?” And I, through my want of wit, was at a loss, and had it not in my power to answer him with propriety. [15.] So, quitting his company, I grew angry with, and vented reproaches upon, myself, and threatened that the first time I met with any of you wise men, I would hear (his opinion) and learn it; and after studying

⁵¹ According to Philostratus in the life of Hippias, p. 495, the dissertation was in the form of a dialogue. Its title was Τρωικὴ or Ἡρωικὴ—For these two words are constantly confounded, as remarked by G. C. Lewis in Cl. Jl. No. 76, p. 277, and No. 78, p. 190. So too in Schol. Od. A. 546, instead of ὑπὸ ὁποτέρου τῶν Τρώων, Bentley would read Ἡρώων in his letter to Davies, first published in the Monthly Review, vol. xiv. p. 202.

⁵² I have adopted Φιλοστράτου, found in the two best MSS., in lieu of Φειδοστράτου—a word that seems scarcely compounded correctly. On the other hand, the Philostratus here mentioned is probably the same as the person nicknamed Κυναλώπηξ by Aristophanes in Ἰππ. 1066.

⁵³ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῦ can be referred, Plato wrote, I suspect, περί γέ του, “about something.”

it thoroughly, that I would return to my questioner, and fight out again the matter with him. Now, therefore, as I said, you are come opportunely; and do you instruct me sufficiently what is beauty in the abstract, and endeavour to give me as accurately as possible your answers; in order that I may not be confuted a second time, and pay the penalty of a laugh against myself. For assuredly you know it quite clearly, and it would be but a mite of the learning, with which you are conversant on so many⁵⁴ points.

Hip. By Zeus, a mite indeed, Socrates; and, so to say, of no value at all.

Soc. Easily then shall I learn it; and no one will hereafter confute me.

[16.] Hip. Not one indeed. For otherwise mean would be my profession, and suited to a common person.

Soc. By Juno, Hippias, you speak bravely, if we shall get the man into our clutches. ⁵⁵ But shall I be any hindrance by imitating him, if I lay hold of your arguments, while answering me, in order that you may exercise me the most. For I am nearly skilful in laying hold (of arguments).⁵⁶ If then it makes no difference to you, I am willing to lay hold of them, in order that I may learn⁵⁷ with greater strength.

Hip. Take hold then: for, as I said just now, the question is not a great one; and I will teach you to answer questions much more difficult than this, so that not a single person will be ever able to confute you.

Soc. Ye gods,⁵⁸ how bravely you talk! But come, since you bid me, I will become him, and, as well as I can, try to question you. Now, if you shall give the lecture you men-

⁵⁴ To avoid the incorrect Greek in ὧν σὸ τῶν πολλῶν, we must read ὧν σὸ ὅσων πολλῶν— The critics quoted by Stalbaum neither do, nor pretend to, defend this union of the relative pronoun with the definite article.

⁵⁵⁻⁵⁶ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. But how Socrates could, by imitating the nameless saucy fellow, be any hindrance to Hippias, I cannot understand.

⁵⁸ Instead of φεῦ, which never, I think, precedes ὡς εἰ λέγεις, I have translated as if the Greek were ὦ θεοί.

tion, upon beautiful pursuits, he will, after hearing it, when you have ceased speaking, inquire about nothing else except about the beautiful—for such a habit he has—and he will say, “Art not, (say) thou stranger from Elis, the just just through justness?” Answer now, Hippias, as if he were questioning you.

Hip. I answer,⁵⁹ through justness.

[17.] Soc. There is then such a thing as justness?

Hip. Clearly so.

Soc. Are not then the wise wise through wisdom? and all that is good good through goodness?

Hip. How not?

Soc. By those things existing really; for it is not surely by their non-existing.

Hip. By their existing really.

Soc. Are not all things, that are beautiful, beautiful through beauty?

Hip. Yes, through beauty.

Soc. By such a thing existing?

Hip. By its existing. For what should it be?

Soc. Tell me now, stranger, he will say, what is this beauty?

Hip. Does he, who asks this question, want to know what is a beautiful thing?

Soc. I think not, Hippias: but what is beauty.

Hip. How does this differ from that?

Soc. Seems there to you no (difference)?

Hip. There is not any difference.

Soc. But, however,⁶⁰ it is evident that you know better.

⁵⁹ I have adopted ἀποκρίνομαι, found in one MS., in lieu of ἀποκρίνομαι. Ficinus omits the word entirely.

⁶⁰ The Greek is Ἄλλὰ μέντοι δῆλον, where I cannot understand μέντοι: nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is “Constat autem.” Hence I suggested, many years ago, Ἄλλὰ μόνον τῷ, “But to any one blinking,” an expression similar to the Latin, “conviventibus oculis,” and to the English, “with half an eye.” The phrase in Aristoph. Plut. 49, is δῆλον τυφλῷ, quoted by the Schol. on Plato, Sophist. p. 241, D., φαίνεται καὶ τὸ λεγόμενον δῆ, τυφλῷ: and is found in Rep. iii. p. 465, D., and viii. p. 550, D. With regard to the verb οὐκ εἶχεν ὁμαρα, and elsewhere, see Creuzer on Plotinus, Περὶ Κάλλους, p. 357.

Consider, however, good sir, the question (well).⁶¹ For he asks you, not what is a beautiful thing, but what is beauty.

Hipp. I understand you, good sir. And I will answer his question, "What is beauty?" nor shall I ever be confuted.⁶² For rest assured, Socrates, if the truth must be told, that a beautiful maiden is a beautiful thing.⁶³

[13.] Soc. By the dog,⁶⁴ you have answered, Hippias, beautifully and gloriously.⁶⁵ Shall I then, when I answer thus, have answered the question correctly? and shall I never be refuted?

Hipp. For how could you be refuted, Socrates, on that point which seems correct to all the world; and where all who hear you will testify in your favour that you are speaking properly?

Soc. Be it so then, by all means. But come, Hippias, let me consider again with myself what you are saying. For the man will question me in some such manner as this: "Come, Socrates, answer me, ⁶⁶if beauty exists in the abstract, all

And to the passages there quoted add Lucian in Rhetor. Præcept. § 11, αὐτὸν μόνον—εἶναι τὸν. Shakspeare says in Lear, "A man may see how this world goes with no eyes."

⁶¹ After αἴθερ, it is pretty evident that εἰ has dropt out.

⁶² By comparing the expression of Socrates, εἰ μὴ ποτε ἀλεγχθῶ, it is quite certain that Hippias said εἰ μὴ ποτε ἀλεγχθῆς.

⁶³ Ficinus has "virginem pulchram ipsum pulchrum esse," as if his MS. read καλὸς καλὴ καλόν, not καλός καλὴ καλόν.

⁶⁴ This was one of the oaths adopted by Socrates; another was, "by the plane-tree," as in Phædrus, p. 236, D., and the third was, "by the goose," as we learn from the Scholiast on Aristoph. Ὀρν. 521. To these might be added "the goat," as appears from Tertullian Apolog. 14, quoted by Gottleber on Phædo, p. 99, A. "Socrate contentus, qui in contumeliam deorum, quercum et hircum et canem dejerabat." Of the different reasons assigned for such strange forms of adjuration an account is to be found in the notes of Menage on Diogen. Laert. p. 92. But as none of them are satisfactory, the truth remains to be still found, if worth the search, elsewhere.

⁶⁵ The Greek is εὐδόξως: which is never, I believe, thus connected with the idea of an answer. I suggested long ago οὐ λοξῶς, i. e. "not obliquely," referring to Suidas, Λοξά: σκόλια, καμπύλα, οὐκ ἐξ ἐνθείας γινόμενα: and to Lucian, Vit. Auct. § 14, ὥσπερ ὁ Λοξίας οὐδὲν ἀποσπᾷ. Dialog. Deor. xvi. § 1, Λοξά—πρὸς ἑκάτερον τῆς ἐρωτήσεως ἀποκρινόμενος. Alexandr. § 10, ἀμφιβάλους καὶ λοξοὺς χρησμούς συγγράφων: and I will now add in Jov. Confut. § 14, λοξὰ καὶ ἐκαμφοτερίζοντα. See too Boissonad. in Eunap. p. 162, and 564.

these things which you say are beautiful, would these be beautiful?"⁶⁵ And I will then say that, ⁶⁷if a beautiful maiden be a beautiful thing, through which the things would be beautiful."⁶⁷

Hip. Think you then that he will still attempt to confute you, (by asserting) that what you say is beautiful, is not so? or that, should he attempt it, he will not be laughed down?

Soc. That he will, thou wondrous man, I am well assured; but whether, after making the attempt, he will be laughed down, the thing itself will show. However,⁶⁸ I wish to tell you what he will say.

Hip. Tell it then.

[19.] Soc. What a sweet⁶⁹ creature, Socrates! he will say, you are. Is not a beautiful mare, which even a god has praised in an oracle,⁷⁰ a beautiful thing? What shall we answer, Hippias? Shall we say aught else than that ⁷¹the

the things which you say are beautiful, if there be such a thing as beauty in the abstract, would they not be beautiful?" This in Greek would be "Ἰθι μοι ὦ Σώκρατες, ἀπόκριναι τοῦτ' εὔ. Τὰ πάντα, δ φῆς καλὰ εἶναι, εἴ τι ἔστι αὐτὸ τὸ καλόν, οὐ ταῦτ' ἂν εἴη καλὰ; Ficinus however has "Age, responde mihi, Socrates, Quid est ipsum pulchrum? quod si sit, hæc omnia, quæ pulchra dicuntur, per ipsum pulchra sunt," which it is uncertain whether he did or did not find in his MS. Sydenham however was led from thence to suspect that δι' ὃ had dropt out between τὸ καλόν and ταῦτ' ἂν—and so was Schleiermacher after him.

"—⁶⁷ The Greek is Ἐγὼ δὲ δὴ ἱρώ, ὅτι εἰ παρθένος καλὴ καλόν ἔστι, δι' ὃ ταῦτ' ἂν εἴη καλὰ. But the sense evidently requires us to expunge the word εἰ before παρθένος, and to read ὅτι παρθένος καλὴ καλόν ἔστι, κ. τ. λ. S. Heindorf says we must omit εἰ, or all the words after καλόν. But the train of argument leads to something of this kind—"If there be such a thing as a beautiful maiden, there must be the beautiful, by which all the things beautiful would exist"—in Greek, Εἰ παρθένος καλὴ ἔστι, ἔστι τὸ καλόν, δι' ὃ πάντα ἂν εἴη καλὰ, as I stated many years ago.

⁶⁹ Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 132, says that γλυκὺς and ἡδὺς were used ironically as a polite way of calling a person a simpleton.

⁷⁰ The oracle alluded to has been preserved entire by the Schol. on Theocritus, Id. xiv. 48, and by Tzetzes, in Chil. ix. 291, and x. 330, and partially by Euseb. Præp. Evang. v. 29. For when the people of Megara had inquired of the god to whom the palm of superiority was to be assigned, they were told, amongst other things, that the mares of Thrace, or, as Tzetzes testifies, of Thessaly, were the best.

^{72—73} Such is the literal version of the Greek; which I con

If the soup-dish be made by a skilful potter, smooth and round, and well baked, like some of the beautiful soup-dishes with two handles, containing six choes,⁷⁵ very beautiful,⁷⁶ if he inquires about such a soup-dish, we must confess it to be beautiful. For how could we say that what is beautiful, is not beautiful?

Hip. Not at all, Socrates.

Soc. Is not a beautiful soup-dish then, he will say, a beautiful thing? Answer.

[20.] Hip. But, Socrates, the case is, I think, this; even such a vessel, when beautifully made, is a beautiful thing. But this taken as a whole does not deserve to be considered as beautiful, as compared with a mare, and a maiden, and the other things of beauty.

Soc. Be it so. I understand you, Hippias, that we must thus reply to the person who puts such a question. You are ignorant, my man, that correct is the saying of Heracleitus, That the most beautiful ape, as compared with another kind,⁷⁷ is ugly; and that the most beautiful of soup-dishes is ugly as compared with the maiden-kind; as says Hippias the wise. Is it not so, Hippias?

Hip. You have answered, Socrates, quite correctly.

Soc. Hear then—for I know well he will say after this—What then, Socrates, should any one compare maiden-kind ⁷⁵ According to Arbuthnot's computation, the Attic χοῦς contained three quarts. S.

⁷⁷ The Greek is ἄλλῳ γίνεαι. But we ought to read ἀνθρωπίνῳ γίνεαι, as is evident from what is quoted presently after from the same Heracleitus, ἀνθρώπων δὲ σοφώτατος πρὸς θεὸν πίθηκος φαίνεται. For however dark his writings were, there is no reason to think he wrote absurdly. The absurdity is owing to the transcribers, who instead of ἀνθρ, an abbreviated form for ἀνθρωπίνῳ, wrote ἄλλῳ. S. This correction, or rather ἀνθρωπείῳ, which is more after Plato's manner, appears to be indubitable; for we have thus a climax of ideas—"The most beautiful monkey is ugly, as compared with a man: and the man most wise, as compared with a god." HEIND., who, in ed. 2, prefers ἀνθρώπων, as Bekker does likewise. But a single monkey would scarcely be compared with the whole race of man. The true reading is probably ἀνθρ ἐνὶ γε, i. e. "to even a single man." On a similar allusion to the monkey, see my note on The Statesman, § 9, p. 205.

with god-kind, would he not be in the same case, as a maiden-kind was compared to the soup-dish kind? not the most beautiful maiden appear ugly? [21.] not Heracleitus, whom⁷⁸ you bring forward,⁷⁸ say⁷⁹ the same thing,⁷⁹ that the wisest of men, when compared with god, appears an ape in wisdom and beauty, and even else?⁸⁰ Shall we confess, Hippias, the most beautiful is ugly as compared with the god-kind?⁸¹

Hip. Yes; for who, Socrates, would gainsay this?

Soc. Should however we confess this, he will laugh at you. Do you then remember, Socrates, what you wanted to say? I shall reply, I do; (it was this,) What is beauty in the abstract? Whereupon he will rejoin—When you are asked about beauty in the abstract, you answer (by me)⁸² that which happens to be, as you say yourself, not more beautiful than ugly.⁸² So, it seems, I shall say. Or what would your friend, do you advise me to say?

Hip. This (I advise) you; ⁸³ For that the human is compared with the gods, is not beautiful,⁸³ he will say to you.

Soc. If I had asked you at the outset, he will say, you ^{78—78} Here is evidently a slip on the part of Plato. For, as by Sydenham, it was not Hippias, but Socrates himself, who has put forward the dictum of Heracleitus; unless we are to understand Heindorf, that the reference to Heracleitus must be supposed to be by the fictitious speaker, and not by Socrates. But this is at variance with the preceding narrative. There is some disorder here which might perhaps be able to cure; but the remedy, I am afraid, is considered too violent.

^{79—79} As "this very same thing" is different from the preceding, we must read τοιούτων τι ἐπιλέγει, "says in addition something as this," in lieu of ταύτων τοῦτο λέγει.

⁸⁰ In this apophthegm of Heracleitus is to be found the original idea in Pope—

Superior beings, when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all nature's law,
Admired such wisdom in an earthly shape,
And showed a Newton, as we show an ape. S.

⁸¹ To avoid the impropriety of a single maiden being compared with the race of the gods, it is easy to read πρὸς θεάν γ' ὁμοίως, i. e. "as compared with a goddess," instead of πρὸς θεῶν γένος—

^{82—82} i. e. "that which is beautiful or ugly according to its own nature."

^{83—83} This I do not very well understand. For in the preceding mention of Socrates by the fictitious person, nothing is said of a comparison of beauty or not, as compared with the gods.

thing beautiful and ugly, had you answered me as you have done just now, would you not⁸⁴ have answered correctly? And still⁸⁵ does it seem to you that the beautiful itself, by which every thing else is decorated, and looks beautiful; whenever that species (of beauty) is present to it, is a maiden, or a mare, or a lyre?

[22.] Hip. If this, Socrates, he is seeking, it is of all things the easiest for me⁸⁶ to tell him in answer what is that beauty, by which all other things are decorated, and by which being present they appear beautiful. ⁸⁷The man is the greatest simpleton, and knows nothing about beautiful chatelets.⁸⁷ For if you tell him in answer, that the beautiful about which he is inquiring, is nothing else than gold; he will be in a difficulty, and not attempt to confute you. For we all surely know that wherever gold is present to a thing, how ugly soever it may have seemed before, it will appear beautiful, when it is decorated at least with gold.

Soc. You have no experience of the man, Hippias, how difficult he is, and admitting nothing easily.

Hip. What matters it, Socrates? For what is correctly asserted he must admit; or, not admitting it, be laughed at.

Soc. And yet he will not only not admit this answer, thou best of men; but he will treat me with derision, and say, O thou, puffed up with conceit, thinkest thou that Phidias was a bad workman? And I shall reply, I think so by no manner of means.

Hip. And you will answer rightly, Socrates.

[23.] Soc. Rightly indeed. Hereupon when I have con-

⁸⁴ Ficinus; displeased perhaps, as Heindorf was, with the interrogation, omits ἀπα οὐκ—while to meet the difficulty Ast would read ἀπ' οὐν—But ἀπ' οὐν always, I think, begins a sentence. Plato wrote, I suspect, μὴδ' αὖτε οὐκ ἂν τι ἐκίπιοι' οὐν, i. e. "you would have been correctly judged to be still a stripling." See § 31, n. 17.

⁸⁵ Instead of ἐν, the two best MSS. read ἐν. The sense seems to require, "But tell me, child," in Greek εἰπέ δέ, καί, which differs but little from ἐν δέ καί—For it would thus be seen that Socrates was in the eye of the fictitious person, not even a stripling, but only a child. On the confusion of καί and καί see Porson Orest. 614.

⁸⁶ In lieu of μύητοι, Plato wrote ἱποὶ ἐνιστοι, as I guess.

⁸⁷ Instead of κρημάρων, five MSS. offer ἱπποκρημάρων: which led me to suspect many years ago, as I still do now, the existence of a lacuna. At all events the words between the numerals would be said better by Socrates, who knew the fictitious person, than by Hippias, who did not.

from you, and commend? Tell me yourself, since I find them.

Hip. Respecting the genealogies,⁴⁶ Socrates, of their and men, and settlements (of tribes), (and)⁴⁷ how cities founded of old, and, in a word, to every thing relating chæology, they listen with the greatest pleasure; so was forced to learn my lesson myself thoroughly for sakes, and to practise myself well on those points.

Soc. By Zeus, Hippias, you were fortunate in that the dæmonians did not take a delight in hearing a man who reckon up our archons from the time of Solon. For wise you would have had some trouble in learning the Hip. How so, Socrates? Upon hearing fifty names once, I can repeat them from memory.

[13.] Soc. You speak the truth; but I did not mind that you had a system of mnemonics;⁴⁸ so that I understand⁴⁹ why, reasonably enough, the Lacedæmonians pleased with you, as being a person who knows many, and they make use of you, as children do of old women, tell them pretty stories.

Hip. And by Zeus, Socrates, I was lately in high there by going through a lecture upon the honourable path to which a young person should devote himself. For by me a very beautiful discourse upon that subject,⁵⁰ was together in other respects, and in the words.⁵⁰ The fo ⁴⁶ There is an article by Osann in the Rheinische Museum p. 495—501, on the archæological writings of Hippias.

⁴⁷ I suspect ὧς has dropt out after καὶ—

⁴⁹ The Greek is ὥστ' ἐννοῶ—which seems rather strange and ἐνενόησα. Ficinus has “jam intelligo”—which leads to εἰς τὸ ἐννοῶ—

^{50—50} The Greek is καὶ ἄλλως εὖ διακείμενος καὶ τοῖς ὀνόμασι διακείμενος could hardly follow συγκείμενος; and if it could, it would be united to the dative ὀνόμασι. Besides, it is not easy to say, ἄλλως can be referred, as opposed to ὀνόμασι. Ficinus has “v. elegantia pellet”—from which I formerly elicited εὖ διακοσμούμενος. I would now prefer διεσκευασμένος, similar to λόγοι παρεσκευασμένοι. Menex. p. 235, D., while in καὶ ἄλλως and καὶ τοῖς lie hid, I suspect Ἀυσίου—καλλίστοις ὀνόμασι. For thus Lysias would be praised ironically, as he is in the Phædrus.

commencement of the discourse is something of this kind.—“After Troy was taken, the story goes, that Neoptolemus inquired of Nestor what were the honourable pursuits a young man should follow to gain a good name. Upon this Nestor is the speaker, and suggests a great many and very excellent precepts laid down by law.” [14.] Of this dissertation⁵¹ I made a display there; and on the third day hence I intend to display it here and several other pieces of mine, worth the hearing, in the school of Philostratus.⁵² For so has Eudicus, the son of Apēmantus, requested. See then that you are present yourself, and bring with you others, who on hearing will be competent to decide upon what is then said.

Soc. This, if a god is willing, Hippias, shall be. But at present answer me a short question relating to it.⁵³ For you have opportunely put me in mind of it. A certain person, has, thou best of men, very lately, during some conversations, thrown me into a difficulty—when I was finding fault with some things as being ugly, and praising others as being beautiful—by asking me, in a very saucy manner, “From whence do you, Socrates, know, said he, what things are beautiful, and what ugly?”⁵⁴ Come then, tell me,⁵⁴ if you can say a word, what is the beautiful?” And I, through my want of wit, was at a loss, and had it not in my power to answer him with propriety. [15.] So, quitting his company, I grew angry with, and vented reproaches upon, myself, and threatened that the first time I met with any of you wise men, I would hear (his opinion) and learn it; and after studying

⁵¹ According to Philostratus in the life of Hippias, p. 495, the dissertation was in the form of a dialogue. Its title was Τρωικά or Ἡρωικά—For these two words are constantly confounded, as remarked by G. C. Lewis in Cl. Jl. No. 76, p. 277, and No. 78, p. 190. So too in Schol. Od. A. 546, instead of ὑπὸ ὁμοτίμου τῶν Τρώων, Bentley would read Ἡρώων in his letter to Davies, first published in the Monthly Review, vol. xiv. p. 202.

⁵² I have adopted Φιλοστράτου, found in the two best MSS., in lieu of Φειδοστράτου—a word that seems scarcely compounded correctly. On the other hand, the Philostratus here mentioned is probably the same as the person nicknamed Κυνναλώπηξ by Aristophanes in Ἰππ. 1066.

⁵³ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῦ can be referred, Plato wrote, I suspect, περί γέ του, “about something.”

it thoroughly, that I would return to my questioner, and fight out again the matter with him. Now, therefore, as I said, you are come opportunely; and do you instruct me sufficiently what is beauty in the abstract, and endeavour to give me as accurately as possible your answers; in order that I may not be confuted a second time, and pay the penalty of a laugh against myself. For assuredly you know it quite clearly, and it would be but a mite of the learning, with which you are conversant on so many⁵⁵ points.

Hip. By Zeus, a mite indeed, Socrates; and, so to say, of no value at all.

Soc. Easily then shall I learn it; and no one will hereafter confute me.

[16.] Hip. Not one indeed. For otherwise mean would be my profession, and suited to a common person.

Soc. By Juno, Hippias, you speak bravely, if we shall get the man into our clutches. ⁵⁶ But shall I be any hindrance by imitating him, if I lay hold of your arguments, while answering me, in order that you may exercise me the most. For I am nearly skilful in laying hold (of arguments).⁵⁶ If then it makes no difference to you, I am willing to lay hold of them, in order that I may learn⁵⁷ with greater strength.

Hip. Take hold then: for, as I said just now, the question is not a great one; and I will teach you to answer questions much more difficult than this, so that not a single person will be ever able to confute you.

Soc. Ye gods,⁵⁸ how bravely you talk! But come, since you bid me, I will become him, and, as well as I can, try to question you. Now, if you shall give the lecture you men-

⁵⁵ To avoid the incorrect Greek in ὦν σὺ τῶν πολλῶν, we must read ὦν σὺ οὕτω πολλῶν— The critics quoted by Stalbaum neither do, nor pretend to, defend this union of the relative pronoun with the definite article.

⁵⁶⁻⁵⁸ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. But how Socrates could, by imitating the nameless saucy fellow, be any hindrance to Hippias, I cannot understand.

⁵⁷ In lieu of μάθω, which I cannot understand, I have suggested μιχθῶ. For the idea of "mingling in fight" here correctly coincides with the preceding ἀναμαχοῦμενος. Others perhaps would prefer ἱπρωμνίστηκεν με θῶ, i. e. "make myself of greater strength."

⁵⁸ Instead of φεῦ, which never, I think, precedes ὡς εὖ λέγεις, I have translated as if the Greek were ὦ θεοί.

tion, upon beautiful pursuits, he will, after hearing it, when you have ceased speaking, inquire about nothing else except about the beautiful—for such a habit he has—and he will say, “Art not, (say) thou stranger from Elis, the just just through justness?” Answer now, Hippias, as if he were questioning you.

Hip. I answer,⁵⁹ through justness.

[17.] Soc. There is then such a thing as justness?

Hip. Clearly so.

Soc. Are not then the wise wise through wisdom? and all that is good good through goodness?

Hip. How not?

Soc. By those things existing really; for it is not surely by their non-existing.

Hip. By their existing really.

Soc. Are not all things, that are beautiful, beautiful through beauty?

Hip. Yes, through beauty.

Soc. By such a thing existing?

Hip. By its existing. For what should it be?

Soc. Tell me now, stranger, he will say, what is this beauty?

Hip. Does he, who asks this question, want to know what is a beautiful thing?

Soc. I think not, Hippias: but what is beauty.

Hip. How does this differ from that?

Soc. Seems there to you no (difference)?

Hip. There is not any difference.

Soc. But, however,⁶⁰ it is evident that you know better.

⁵⁹ I have adopted ἀποκρίνομαι, found in one MS., in lieu of ἀποκρίνομαι. Ficinus omits the word entirely.

⁶⁰ The Greek is ἅλλὰ μίντοι δῆλον, where I cannot understand μίντοι: nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is “Constat autem.” Hence I suggested, many years ago, ἅλλὰ μόντι τῷ, “But to any one blinking, an expression similar to the Latin, “conniventibus oculis,” and to the English, “with half an eye.” The phrase in Aristoph. Plut. 49, is δῆλον τυφλῷ, quoted by the Schol. on Plato, Sophist. p. 241, D., φαίνεται καὶ, τὸ λεγόμενον δῆ, τυφλῷ: and is found in Rep. iii. p. 465, D., and viii. p. 550, D. With regard to the verb μένιν, which Plato has used in Sophist. p. 239, E., δόξει τοι μένιν ἢ παῖ ἀπασιν οὐκ ἔχειν ὁμματα, and elsewhere, see Creuzer on Plotinus, Περὶ Κάλλους, p. 357.

Consider, however, good sir, the question (well).⁶¹ For he asks you, not what is a beautiful thing, but what is beauty.

Hip. I understand you, good sir. And I will answer his question, "What is beauty?" nor shall I ever be confuted.⁶² For rest assured, Socrates, if the truth must be told, that a beautiful maiden is a beautiful thing.⁶³

[18.] Soc. By the dog,⁶⁴ you have answered, Hippias, beautifully and gloriously.⁶⁵ Shall I then, when I answer thus, have answered the question correctly? and shall I never be refuted?

Hip. For how could you be refuted, Socrates, on that point which seems correct to all the world; and where all who hear you will testify in your favour that you are speaking properly?

Soc. Be it so then, by all means. But come, Hippias, let me consider again with myself what you are saying. For the man will question me in some such manner as this: "Come, Socrates, answer me, ⁶⁶if beauty exists in the abstract, all

And to the passages there quoted add Lucian in Rhetor. Præcept. § 11, κάν μύοντι—σίποι τις. Shakspeare says in Lear, "A man may see how this world goes with no eyes."

⁶¹ After ἀθρει, it is pretty evident that εἰ has dropt out.

⁶⁴ This was one of the oaths adopted by Socrates; another was, "by the plane-tree," as in Phædrus, p. 236, D., and the third was, "by the goose," as we learn from the Scholiast on Aristoph. 'Ορν. 521. To these might be added "the goat," as appears from Tertullian Apolog. 14, quoted by Gottleber on Phædo, p. 99, A. "Socrate contentus, qui in contumeliam deorum, quercum et hircum et canem dejerabat." Of the different reasons assigned for such strange forms of adjuration an account is to be found in the notes of Menage on Diogen. Laert. p. 92. But as none of them are satisfactory, the truth remains to be still found, if worth the search, elsewhere.

⁶⁵ The Greek is εὐδόξως: which is never, I believe, thus connected with the idea of an answer. I suggested long ago οὐ λοξῶς, i. e. "not obliquely," referring to Suidas, Λοξά: σκόλια, καμπύλα, οὐκ ἐξ εὐθείας γινόμενα: and to Lucian, Vit. Auct. § 14, ὥσπερ ὁ Λοξίας οὐδὲν ἀποσαφείς. Dialog. Deor. xvi. § 1, Λοξά—πρὸς ἑκάτερον τῆς ἐρωτήσεως ἀποκρινόμενος. Alexandr. § 10, ἀμφιβόλους καὶ λοξούς χρησμούς συγγράφων: and I will now add in Jov. Confut. § 14, λοξὰ καὶ ἐπαμφοτερίζοντα. See too Boissonad. in Eunap. p. 162, and 564.

⁶⁶—⁶⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek text. But the train of thought requires, "Come now, Socrates, and answer me this correctly. All these things which you say are beautiful, would these be beautiful?"⁶⁵ And I will then say that, ⁶⁷if a beautiful maiden be a beautiful thing, through which the things would be beautiful."⁶⁷

Hip. Think you then that he will still attempt to confute you, (by asserting) that what you say is beautiful, is not so? or that, should he attempt it, he will not be laughed down?

Soc. That he will, thou wondrous man, I am well assured; but whether, after making the attempt, he will be laughed down, the thing itself will show. However,⁶⁸ I wish to tell you what he will say.

Hip. Tell it then.

[19.] Soc. What a sweet⁶⁹ creature, Socrates! he will say, you are. Is not a beautiful mare, which even a god has praised in an oracle,⁷⁰ a beautiful thing? What shall we answer, Hippias? Shall we say aught else than that ⁷¹the

the things which you say are beautiful, if there be such a thing as beauty in the abstract, would they not be beautiful?" This in Greek would be "Ἰθί μοι ὦ Σώκρατες, ἀποκρίναι τοῦτ' εὖ. τὰ πάντα, ἃ φης καλὰ εἶναι, εἴ τι ἐστὶ αὐτὸ τὸ καλόν, οὐ ταῦτ' ἂν εἴη καλὰ; Ficinus however has "Age, responde mihi, Socrates, Quid est ipsum pulchrum? quod si sit, hæc omnia, quæ pulchra dicuntur, per ipsum pulchra sunt," which it is uncertain whether he did or did not find in his MS. Sydenham however was led from thence to suspect that δι' ὃ had dropt out between τὸ καλόν and ταῦτ' ἂν—and so was Schleiermacher after him.

⁶⁵—⁶⁷ The Greek is Ἐγὼ δὲ δὴ ἱρῶ, ὅτι εἰ παρθένος καλὴ καλὸν ἐστὶ, δι' ὃ ταῦτ' ἂν εἴη καλὰ. But the sense evidently requires us to expunge the word εἰ before παρθένος, and to read ὅτι παρθένος καλὴ καλὸν ἐστὶ, κ. τ. λ. S. Heindorf says we must omit εἰ, or all the words after καλόν. But the train of argument leads to something of this kind—"If there be such a thing as a beautiful maiden, there must be the beautiful, by which all the things beautiful would exist"—in Greek, Εἰ παρθένος καλὸν ἐστὶ, ἐστὶ τὸ καλόν, δι' ὃ πάντ' ἂν εἴη καλὰ, as I stated many years ago.

⁶⁸ The origin of this proverb is told by the Scholiast on Theætet. p. 200, E., who says, that when some person was going to cross a river, he asked his guide whether it was deep; to which the latter replied, "The event itself will show."

⁶⁹ Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 132, says that γλυκὺς and ἡδὺς were used ironically as a polite way of calling a person a simpleton.

⁷⁰ The oracle alluded to has been preserved entire by the Schol. on Theocritus, Id. xiv. 48, and by Tzetzes, in Chil. ix. 291, and x. 330, and partially by Euseb. Præp. Evang. v. 29. For when the people of Megara had inquired of the god to whom the palm of superiority was to be assigned, they were told, amongst other things, that the mares of Thrace, or, as Tzetzes testifies, of Thessaly, were the best.

mare is beautiful? at least the beautiful.⁷¹ For how dare we deny that a beautiful thing is beautiful?

Hip. You speak, Socrates, what is true,⁷² especially god rightly said it;⁷³ for with us there are mares very beautiful.

Soc. Be it so, he will say; but what, is not a beautiful thing? Shall we allow it, Hippias?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. And after this he will say—as, guessing in usual manner, I nearly know full well—My excellence is not a beautiful soup-dish a beautiful thing?

Hip. Who is this man, Socrates? What an unbecoming fellow! who thus presumes to express himself in so low an affair so solemn.

Soc. Such is the fellow, Hippias, not a fine gentleman a man of the mob, who cares for nothing but truth. However, I have an answer;⁷⁴ and I appear speaking for Ficinus, "Pulchram equam nonne pulchram esse." This, say, might stand; but καλὸν εἶναι, suggested by Cornarius, is preferred, did not however perceive that, as the article could not be thus, it must be omitted before ἵππον; nor that γε Θεσσαλήν lie hid, λήν, to answer to the Thessalian mare, mentioned in the oracle to Tzetzes; and hence just before in lieu of θήλεια one would say Θεσσαλή, as I remarked many years ago.

^{72—73} Such is the literal version of the Greek; which I confess I do not understand. For Socrates did not say what was true, because he spoke truth; nor did the oracle speak truth, because there were no beautiful mares in Elis. What Hippias meant to say is, that, as he had spoken of the beauty of mares, it had spoken of what an excellent judge was a judge of such matters, would confess to be beautiful. Porphyry wrote perhaps, as I suggested many years ago, —ἐπεὶ τοι καὶ ὁ θεὸς εἶπεν, εἶπον δὲ αὐτός, "since, what the god has corrected, would have said myself;" a sentiment that exhibits the vanity of man in a marked manner, as he thus puts himself upon an equality with god.

⁷³ As the chariot-races in the Olympic games were run in the plain of Elis, the people there had an opportunity of seeing the best horses and of becoming, like persons living at Newmarket and Doncaster in England, the best judges of horse-flesh; while from the number of mares gained by mares, it was found that the female was better suited to the male for a long race, as remarked by Servius on Virgil, Georg. 3.

^{74—74} The Greek is καὶ ἐγὼ γε προαποφαίνομαι: which would give my opinion the first," as shown by Ὁ Πρόδικε, προαπόφηναι γνώμην in Protag. p. 340, A. Ficinus has "Præfabor." But he should be said only if Socrates were going to reply, not to put a question. I wrote, I suspect, καὶ λέγων γε πρὸ αὐτοῦ φαίνομαι, as I partly did many years ago, when I should have quoted Alcest. 336, πρὸ λέγειν,

If the soup-dish be made by a skilful potter, smooth and round, and well baked, like some of the beautiful soup-dishes with two handles, containing six choes,⁷⁵ very beautiful,⁷⁶ if he inquires about such a soup-dish, we must confess it to be beautiful. For how could we say that what is beautiful, is not beautiful?

Hip. Not at all, Socrates.

Soc. Is not a beautiful soup-dish then, he will say, a beautiful thing? Answer.

[20.] Hip. But, Socrates, the case is, I think, this; even such a vessel, when beautifully made, is a beautiful thing. But this taken as a whole does not deserve to be considered as beautiful, as compared with a mare, and a maiden, and the other things of beauty.

Soc. Be it so. I understand you, Hippias, that we must thus reply to the person who puts such a question. You are ignorant, my man, that correct is the saying of Heracleitus, That the most beautiful ape, as compared with another kind,⁷⁷ is ugly; and that the most beautiful of soup-dishes is ugly as compared with the maiden-kind; as says Hippias the wise. Is it not so, Hippias?

Hip. You have answered, Socrates, quite correctly.

Soc. Hear then—for I know well he will say after this—What then, Socrates, should any one compare maiden-kind ⁷⁵ According to Arbuthnot's computation, the Attic χοῦς contained three quarts. S.

⁷⁷ The Greek is ἄλλω γίνεαι. But we ought to read ἀνθρωπίνῳ γίνεαι, as is evident from what is quoted presently after from the same Heracleitus, ἀνθρώπων δὲ σοφώτατος πρὸς θεὸν πίθηκος φανίται. For however dark his writings were, there is no reason to think he wrote absurdly. The absurdity is owing to the transcribers, who instead of ἀνῶ, an abbreviated form for ἀνθρωπίνῳ, wrote ἄλλω. S. This correction, or rather ἀνθρωπείῳ, which is more after Plato's manner, appears to be indubitable; for we have thus a climax of ideas—"The most beautiful monkey is ugly, as compared with a man: and the man most wise, as compared with a god." HEIND., who, in ed. 2, prefers ἀνθρώπων, as Bekker does likewise. But a single monkey would scarcely be compared with the whole race of man. The true reading is probably ἀνῶ ἐνὶ γῆ, i. e. "to even a single man." On a similar allusion to the monkey, see my note on The Statesman, § 9, p. 205.

with god-kind, would he not be in the same case, as when the maiden-kind was compared to the soup-dish kind? Would not the most beautiful maiden appear ugly? [21.] Or does not Heracleitus, whom⁷⁸ you bring forward,⁷⁸ say⁷⁹ this very same thing,⁷⁹ that the wisest of men, when compared with a god, appears an ape in wisdom and beauty, and every thing else?⁸⁰ Shall we confess, Hippias, the most beautiful maiden is ugly as compared with the god-kind?⁸¹

Hip. Yes; for who, Socrates, would gainsay this at least?

Soc. Should however we confess this, he will laugh and say, Do you then remember, Socrates, what you was asked? I shall reply, I do; (it was this,) What is beauty in the abstract? Whereupon he will rejoin—When you are asked about beauty in the abstract, you answer (by mentioning)⁸² that which happens to be, as you say yourself, not more beautiful than ugly.⁸² So, it seems, I shall say. Or what else, my friend, do you advise me to say?

Hip. This (I advise) you; ⁸³For that the human kind, as compared with the gods, is not beautiful,⁸³ he will say the truth.

Soc. If I had asked you at the outset, he will say, what is a ^{78—79} Here is evidently a slip on the part of Plato. For, as remarked by Sydenham, it was not Hippias, but Socrates himself, who had brought forward the dictum of Heracleitus; unless we are to understand with Heindorf, that the reference to Heracleitus must be supposed to be made by the fictitious speaker, and not by Socrates. But this is at variance with the preceding narrative. There is some disorder here, which I might perhaps be able to cure; but the remedy, I am afraid, would be considered too violent.

^{79—79} As "this very same thing" is different from the preceding dictum, we must read τοιούτων τι ἐπιλέγει, "says in addition some such thing as this," in lieu of ταῦτον τοῦτο λέγει.

⁸⁰ In this apophthegm of Heracleitus is to be found the original of the idea in Pope—

Superior beings, when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all nature's law,
Admired such wisdom in an earthly shape,
And showed a Newton, as we show an ape. S.

⁸¹ To avoid the impropriety of a single maiden being compared with the race of the gods, it is easy to read πρὸς θεάν γ' ὁμοίως, i. e. "similarly as compared with a goddess," instead of πρὸς θεῶν γένος—

^{82—82} i. e. "that which is beautiful or ugly according as it may happen."

^{83—83} This I do not very well understand. For in the preceding questioning of Socrates by the fictitious person, nothing is said of a man being beautiful or not, as compared with the gods.

thing beautiful and ugly, had you answered me as you have done just now, would you not⁸⁴ have answered correctly? And still⁸⁵ does it seem to you that the beautiful itself, by which every thing else is decorated, and looks beautiful; whenever that species (of beauty) is present to it, is a maiden, or a mare, or a lyre?

[22.] Hip. If this, Socrates, he is seeking, it is of all things the easiest for me⁸⁶ to tell him in answer what is that beauty, by which all other things are decorated, and by which being present they appear beautiful. ⁸⁷The man is the greatest simpleton, and knows nothing about beautiful chateaux.⁸⁷ For if you tell him in answer, that the beautiful about which he is inquiring, is nothing else than gold; he will be in a difficulty, and not attempt to confute you. For we all surely know that wherever gold is present to a thing, how ugly soever it may have seemed before, it will appear beautiful, when it is decorated at least with gold.

Soc. You have no experience of the man, Hippias, how difficult he is, and admitting nothing easily.

Hip. What matters it, Socrates? For what is correctly asserted he must admit; or, not admitting it, be laughed at.

Soc. And yet he will not only not admit this answer, thou best of men; but he will treat me with derision, and say, O thou, puffed up with conceit, thinkest thou that Phidias was a bad workman? And I shall reply, I think so by no manner of means.

Hip. And you will answer rightly, Socrates.

[23.] Soc. Rightly indeed. Hereupon when I have con-

⁸⁴ Ficinus; displeased perhaps, as Heindorf was, with the interrogation, omits ἀπα οὐκ—while to meet the difficulty Ast would read ἀπ' οὖν—But ἀπ' οὖν always, I think, begins a sentence. Plato wrote, I suspect, μὴδ' αὖτε οὐκ ἂν τι ἐκίχησ' οὖν, i. e. "you would have been correctly judged to be still a stripling." See § 31, n. 17.

⁸⁵ Instead of ἐνι, the two best MSS. read ὅτι. The sense seems to require, "But tell me, child," in Greek ἐνι δὲ, καὶ, which differs but little from ἐνι δὲ καὶ—For it would thus be seen that Socrates was in the eye of the fictitious person, not even a stripling, but only a child. On the confusion of καὶ and καί see Porson Orest. 614.

⁸⁶ In lieu of μίνοι, Plato wrote ἐμοί ἐνισσι, as I guess.

⁸⁷—⁸⁷ Instead of κτημάτων, five MSS. offer ἐρωτημάτων: which led me to suspect many years ago, as I still do now, the existence of a lacuna. At all events the words between the numerals would be said better by Socrates, who knew the fictitious person, than by Hippias, who did not.

fessed that Phidias was a good workman, he will say, Do you imagine then that Phidias was ignorant of that, which you call the beautiful?—Why (say you) this especially? I shall reply.—Because, he will rejoin, if⁸⁸ Phidias has made the eyes of Athéné not of gold, nor yet the rest of her face, nor the feet, nor even the hands—since a thing of gold⁸⁹ would have looked the most beautiful—but (not) of ivory,⁹⁰ it is evident that he erred in this through ignorance, not knowing that gold is that, which makes all things beautiful, wherever it is present. When he says this, what answer, Hippias, shall we give him?

Hip. The answer is not difficult. For we will say that he acted rightly; for ivory is, I presume, beautiful likewise.

Soc. Why then, he will rejoin, did he not make the middle part of the eyes of ivory, but of stone? having found in the stone a similarity as great as was possible to ivory. Or is a beautiful stone a beautiful thing? Shall we say so, Hippias?⁹¹

Hip. We will say so, if it be becoming.

Soc. But, where it is unbecoming, it is ugly. Shall I confess it, or not?

Hip. Confess; at least when it (the stone) is not becoming.

[24.] Soc. What then, he will say; do not ivory and gold, thou wiseacre, when they are becoming, cause things to appear beautiful; but when not, ugly? Shall we deny this, or acknowledge the man to be in the right?

Hip. We must acknowledge this, at least, that whatever is becoming to any individual thing, causes it to appear beautiful.

Soc. When then, he will say, some one shall have cooked the beautiful soup-dish, of which we have been speaking, full ⁸⁸ To avoid the difficulty in the text, of which Heindorf justly complains, I have translated as if ei had dropt out after ipsi.

⁸⁹ Kühner, in Gr. Gr., says that χρυσούν is to be referred to πρόσωπον. But one noun could not be thus selected out of five, to all of which the same epithet is equally applicable. Plato wrote, I suspect, εἴπερ χρυσούν γίγεται δὴ—and ἀλλ' ἐλεφάντινον οὐ, as I have translated.

⁹⁰ All the other parts, not here mentioned, were of massive gold; as we collect from Pliny's Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 6. S. Respecting this statue, see Junius Catalog. Art. Veter. p. 157, and Davis on Cicero Tusc. i. 15. HEIND. To this union of gold, ivory, and marble, Virgil alludes in Æn. i. 593, "Quale manus addunt ebor decus, aut ubi flavo Argentum Pariusve lapis circumdatur auro."

⁹¹ The sense requires, "Shall we say it, or not?" in Greek, φήσομεν ἢ οὐ; of beautiful porridge,⁹² whether does a ladle of gold become it, or one of fig-tree wood?⁹³

Hip. By Hercules! of what kind of fellow, Socrates, are you speaking? Will you not tell me who he is?

Soc. No; for you would not know him, should I tell you his name.⁹⁴

Hip. But I know already that he is some ignorant fellow.

Soc. He is a man of much thought, Hippias. But, however, what shall we say? Which of the two ladles becomes the porridge and the soup-dish? Or is it clearly the one of fig-tree wood; for this makes the porridge of a pleasanter flavour; and at the same time, my friend, it would not by breaking the soup-dish let the porridge run out, and extinguish the fire, and cause the guests, just about to feast on it, to be without a very noble dish.⁹⁵ But all this the one of gold would do.

⁹² According to Athenæus, ix. p. 406, the Athenians were wont to bring to table the very vessels in which the more exquisite soups were cooked. The material of such vessels was a kind of porcelain, and their form not unlike our tureens. The composition of some of their soups is to be found in Athenæus and Apicius Cælius, v. 3. S.

⁹³ The Greek is σικίνη; but we ought rather to read σικαμίνη; for the wood of the fig-tree was so unfit for any use, that Horace calls it "inutile," useless; whereas the wood of the sycamore-tree, σικάμινος, is said by Theophrastus to be ξύλον πρὸς πολλὰ χρήσιμον, Hist. Plant. iv. 2. S. "But," asks Heindorf, "is the wood of the fig-tree unfit for making a soup-ladle? On the contrary, on account of its softness, and, as Plato says, its sweet smell, I believe it was most useful. At all events a wood of the least value ought to be mentioned, as opposed to gold." But so far from the mention of any wood being requisite here, it is evident, from the words οὐκ ἂν συντρίψασα τὴν χύτραν, that the soup-stirring instrument was made of something that would not readily break the vessel. What Plato really wrote and meant, is detailed in the Excursus on Χύτρα, appended to my anonymous edition of "The Four Dialogues of Plato."

⁹⁴ "How could Socrates be sure of that? Hippias might still have known the man, if he really existed. There is probably here an obliterated allusion to Homer's Οὔτις, the name assumed by Ulysses, when he deceived Polyphemus. If so, Plato would have written Οὐ γὰρ ἂν γνῶις, εἰ σοι εἶποιμι Οὔτιν τοῦνομα, i. e. No; for you would not know him if I were to tell his name, No-man." Such was the note I printed many years ago. And I will now add that the same word, Οὔτις, has been corrupted likewise in Alcibiad. ii. § 23, and is there restored by myself.

⁹⁵ Ficinus renders δψου πάνυ γενναίου by "obsouio pretioso." But as such is not the meaning of γενναῖος elsewhere, I still adhere to the opinion I have ever entertained, that the reading γενναίου is corrupt, although it seems similar to γενναῖα σῦκα in Legg, p. 844, E., and may be compared with γενναῖον κρίας in Aristoph. 'Ιππ. 455.

So that it seems to me, we ought to say that the one of fig-tree wood is more becoming than the one of gold; unless indeed you say otherwise.

[25.] Hip. It is indeed, Socrates, more becoming. But, for my part, I would not converse with a fellow, who asked such questions as these.

Soc. And rightly so, my friend; for it would not become you to be polluted with such dirty words, you in a dress so beautiful,⁹⁶ and with such beautiful sandals, and in such high repute amongst all the Greeks for wisdom. But for me, it is nothing to mix myself up with the dirt of the man. Teach me then beforehand; and for my sake give a reply. For the man will say, If the ladle of fig-tree wood be indeed more becoming than the one of gold, is it not more beautiful? especially since you have confessed that the becoming is more beautiful than the unbecoming. Shall we confess that the ladle of fig-tree wood is more beautiful than the one of gold?

Hip. Do you wish me, Socrates, to say that, by saying which, I think,⁹⁷ you will free yourself from his much talking?

Soc. By all means; but not before you tell me which of the two ladles, that we have been speaking of, is the (more)⁹⁸ becoming and more beautiful.

[26.] Hip. Well then, if you will, tell him in answer, that it is the one made from the fig-tree.

Soc. Now say what you was just about to say. For in this answer, by which I assert that gold is the beautiful, gold⁹⁹ will not, as it seems to me, appear to be at all a thing more beautiful than fig-tree wood. But what do you now say is the beautiful?

⁹⁶ The dress in which Hippias appeared at the Olympic games, is related by Plato in Hipp. Min. p. 368, B., who says that Hippias had made himself every thing he then wore. Ælian too, Var. Hist. xii. 32, tells us, that whenever the sophist appeared abroad he wore a scarlet dress; where Kuhn refers to Apuleius Florid. ii. S.

⁹⁷ As the infinitive εἶναι has nothing to depend upon, it is probably a corruption of οἶμαι.

⁹⁸ Ficinus has "decentiorem," as if he had found in his MS. μᾶλλον before πρέπονσαν, to answer to καλλίω.

⁹⁹ But the last assertion was, not that gold, but that the becoming was the beautiful. There is therefore probably some error here.

Hip. I will tell you. For you seem to me to seek to answer a question of this kind—what is that beauty, which at no time and in no place will appear ugly to any one.

Soc. By all means, Hippias. And now you understand me perfectly well.

Hip. Listen then. For rest assured, that if any man has any thing to say against this, I will say that I know¹⁰⁰ nothing whatever.

Soc. By the gods, then, tell it as quickly as possible.

Hip. I assert then, that it is at all times, and to all persons, and in all places, the most beautiful thing for a man, in wealth, health,¹ and in honour amongst Greeks, and having reached old age, and having laid his deceased parents handsomely in the grave, to be buried himself by his own children in a handsome and splendid manner.

Soc. Capital! Hippias. How wondrous well, and gorgeously, and how worthy of yourself, have you spoken! and by Juno I am delighted with you for the good-will with which, as far as you can, you assist me. But we do not as yet² reach the man's mind.² But he will laugh the most at us, rest assured.

[27.] Hip. Truly a silly laugh, Socrates. For when he shall have nothing to say against this, and merely laugh, he ¹⁰⁰ Instead of ἰπαινεῖν, acknowledged by "laudaturum" in Ficinus, Cornarius and Muretus suggested ἰκαται, subsequently confirmed by two MSS.

² So Stalbaum renders τοῦ ἀνδρός οὐ τυγχάνομεν. But the fictitious person had explained himself so clearly, that Socrates had no reason to make such an assertion. Ficinus has "virum nondum comprehendimus," which is similar to Stalbaum's version, if "comprehendimus" is to be taken in a mental sense; but if in a bodily one, it seems still more strange; for the man was not going to run away. Sydenham's version is, "We reach not the point." But τοῦ ἀνδρός could not mean "a point." I suggested many years ago, what I still adhere to, τοῦ ἀνδρός οὐ τι ἱγχνάνοιμ' ἂν, i. e. "I shall not grin at the man." For there is thus a proper antithesis between τοῦ ἀνδρός ἱγχνάνοιμ' ἂν and ἡμῶν καταγελάσεται, as in Protag. p. 357, D., νῦν δέ, ἂν ἡμῶν καταγελάτῃ, καὶ ὑμῶν αὐτῶν καταγελάσειθε. With regard to ἱγχνάνειν, it is found at least five times in Aristophanes, and once in a fragment probably of Ælian, quoted by Suidas in Μέλιτος.

will laugh at himself, and be the laughing-stock of (all)³ who are present.

Soc. Such perhaps will be the case ; perhaps, however, after such an answer, there will be a danger, as I prophesy, of his not merely laughing at me.

Hip. What then ?

Soc. That, should he happen to have a staff in his hand, unless I escape from him by flight, he will endeavour to reach me with a smart blow.

Hip. How say you ? Is the man a master of yours ? and will he not, for having done so, be brought to trial, and pay damages ? Or is your state not under the laws of justice, and permits the citizens to beat each other unjustly ?

Soc. By no manner of means does it permit them.

Hip. Will he then not suffer punishment, for striking you unjustly ?

Soc. I think not, Hippias ; not at all ; if I gave such an answer ; but justly, as it seems to me.

Hip. It seems then so to me, Socrates ; especially since you are of that opinion yourself.

Soc. Shall I then state why I think I should be justly beaten, on giving such an answer ? Or will you too beat⁴ me without a trial ? or will you receive a reason ?

Hip. It would be hard indeed, Socrates, if I did not receive it. But how say you ?

[28.] Soc. I will speak to you in the same manner as I did just now, when imitating that person, in order that I may not say to you, what he will to me, words both harsh and producing an angry feeling. For rest assured he will say, Tell me, Socrates, do you think a person would receive blows unjustly, who should chaunt such a long rigmarole, little in unison with, and far distant from, the question proposed ?—How so ? I shall reply. How ? he will rejoin ; cannot you remember that I asked you what is the beauty, that enables⁵ every thing, to which it is present, to become beautiful, be it stone, or wood, or man, or god, or any act, or any science.

³ Ficinus alone has "omnium—"

⁴ This "beat" seems strange ; as if Hippias were likely to do, what he had reprobated in the case of the fictitious personage.

⁵ Instead of ὑπάρχει, Ficinus found in his MS. παρίχει, what the sense requires, as shown by his version, "efficient."

For I am asking, man, what is beauty in the abstract; and yet I am no more able to bawl⁶ any thing into you, than if you were lying by my side a stone, and this too a mill-stone,⁷ without ears and brains. Now, Hippias, would not you be annoyed, if I, in a fright, were to say after this (abuse), Nay, it was Hippias who said that this was the beautiful; although I asked him, as you do me, what is the beautiful to all persons and things, and at all times?—What say you? will you not be annoyed if I say so?

[29.] Hip. I am quite certain, Socrates, that what I said is the beautiful in every case, will appear so.

Soc. But will it be so? he will say; for surely the beautiful must always be beautiful.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. And always was so, he will say.

Hip. It was.

Soc. Did the Elean stranger assert, he will say, that it was a beautiful thing for Achilles to be buried after his progenitors, and for his grandfather Æacus, and the others born of the gods, and even the gods themselves?

Hip. What is this! ⁸ Hurl him to the blessed (land)! ⁸ Such questions as these of the fellow, Socrates, are not to be spoken even, as being of ill omen.

Soc. How so? It is surely no very ill-omened speech,

* Ficinus has, "tu vero non magis audisti"—as if he did not know the meaning of γεγωνεῖν, which is rarely found except in poetry; for the prosaic word is γεγωνίσκειν, found in Thucyd. vii. 76. See Heringa, Observ. Crit. p. 64.

⁷ The Greek is καὶ οὗτος μύλιας. But a mill-stone, as I remarked many years ago, is no more able to hear than any other stone. Plato wrote ἡ καὶ ὄνος τις μύλιας: where ὄνος μύλιας means "an ass working at a mill," that becomes deaf and more stupid than other asses by the noise of the mill. There is too a kind of pun in λίθος and ὄνος—a word by which the upper or lower mill-stone (for Helladius differs from other lexicographers in this respect) was designated. Compare Soph. Ced. T. 379, τυφλὸς γὰρ ὦτα, τὸν τε νοῦν γὰρ ὁμματ' εἰ.

⁸ Of the different explanations given of this proverb, the one most simple is that by Timæus; who says that as the dead were called "the blessed," the land of the dead or blessed would be the grave. A similar expression was εἰς ὀλβίαν, explained by Photius, εἰς μακαρίαν. The Schol. on Aristoph. Ἰππ. 1148, compares βαλλ' εἰς μακαρίαν with Ἀπ' εἰς μακαρίαν, and Ἐπ' εἰς μακαρίαν. Sydenham prefers the novel interpretation suggested by Erasmus in Adag. ii. l. 98, and which, he says, Schottus has given as his own in Schol. on Zenob. p. 42.

when one person asks a question, (for the other⁹) to say—Such is the fact.

Hip. Perhaps so.

Soc. Perhaps then you are the man, he will say, who asserts that it is a beautiful thing for every person, and at all times, to be buried by his descendants, and to bury his parents. Now was not Hercules one of the all? and those too whom we have just now mentioned?

Hip. But I did not say it was so for the gods.

Soc. Nor for the heroes, as it seems.

Hip. Nor for such as were children of the gods.

Soc. But for such only as were not.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. According to your reasoning then, it seems, that amongst the heroes it was a grievous and unholy thing for Tantalus, and Dardanus, and Zethus; but to Pelops, and to the others so born,¹⁰ it was a beautiful thing.

Hip. So it seems to me.

[30.] Soc. It seems then to you, he will say, what you have lately denied, that to some persons and at some times, it is not a beautiful thing after burying¹¹ their progenitors to be buried by their progeny; and further, as it seems, that this cannot take place to all, and be a beautiful thing. So that this very thing is in the same case as those before, namely, the maiden and the soup-dish: and still more ridiculously, to some it is a beautiful thing, but to others it is not beautiful: and even today, he will say, you are unable, Socrates, to answer the question, touching the beautiful, what it is. In these or such-like terms will he reproach me justly, should I answer him in this manner. For very nearly after this fashion, Hippias, does he for the most part converse. Sometimes, however, as if in pity for my want of skill and learning, he proposes a problem, and asks if such a thing as this seems to be the beautiful;¹² or he (talks) upon any other subject which he happens to have heard, and about which there is a talk.

⁹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἱπομίνου ἱρίπου ἱρίπον φάναι, not ἱπρωμίνου ἱρίπου φάναι: where ἱπομίνου is due to the Bipont editor, who elicited that reading from "percontante" in Ficinus; while ἱρίπον, evidently required by ἱρίπου, might easily have been lost when following its correlative.

¹⁰ By οὕτω γεγονόσι Heindorf understands those born of mortal parents, but οὕτω could not have such a meaning. Besides, there is nothing to which τοῖς ἄλλοις can be referred. Perhaps Plato wrote τοῖς ἄλλοις πως ἀπό του—i. e. "for those born in any other way from some one—"

¹¹ The Greek is θάψαντι, which is without regimen. The syntax requires θάψασι to agree with ἐνίοις.

Hip. How say you, Socrates, this?

[31.] Soc. I will tell you.—Thou godlike Socrates, says he, do cease to give such answers and on such grounds; for they are very silly, and easily confuted. But consider now, whether the beautiful¹³ be something of that kind, which we just now touched upon in the answer, when we said of gold, that where it is becoming it is beautiful; but where not, it is not so, and of all the rest likewise, to which the becoming may be present. On the becoming then itself, and on its nature, do you reflect becomingly,¹⁴ whether this happens to be the beautiful. Now, I am accustomed in such matters to assent on every occasion. For I know not what to object.¹⁵ But does it seem to you that the becoming is the beautiful?¹⁶

Hip. Assuredly, completely so, Socrates.

Soc. Let us reflect;¹⁷ lest we be cheated like children merely.¹⁷

Hip. It is meet to reflect.

Soc. Observe then. Do we call the becoming that which, by its presence, causes each of those things, to which it may be present, to appear beautiful? or that which causes them to be so really?¹⁸ Or neither of these?

¹² On this difficulty see the note in my edition.

¹³ Ficinus has "ipsum pulchrum," in Greek τὸ καλόν, not καλόν—

¹⁵ Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "quid objiciam." He therefore found in his MS. ὅτι ἀντιλέγω, not ὅτι λέγω.

¹⁶ Here again Ficinus has correctly, "ipsum pulchrum," in Greek τὸ καλόν, not καλόν.

¹⁷ The Greek, μή πη ἄρα ἐξαπατώμεθα. Ἀλλὰ χρὴ σκοπεῖν. Now although πη ἄρα might be defended, the subsequently ἀλλὰ could not. Plato wrote, as I remarked many years ago, μὴ παιδάρια ἐξαπατώμεθα ἄλλως. Χρὴ σκοπεῖν. For παιδάρια ἄλλως mean "children merely." Compare Protag. p. 342, E., ὥστε φαίνεσθαι—παιδὸς μὴδὲν βελτίω: where Heindorf quotes Theæt. p. 177, C., ὥστε παιδων μὴδὲν διαφέρειν. Add Crito, § 10, παιδων οὐδὲν διαφέροντες. So μειράκιον has been before corrupted into ἄρα οὐκ ἂν, as I have shown in § 21, n. 84.

¹⁸ A gross blunder, unnoticed by all the translators, has corrupted

Hip. It appears so to me.

Soc. Whether¹⁸ that which causes things to appear beautiful? as when a person puts on clothes or shoes, which fit him, he looks more beautiful, although he is a laughing-stock.¹⁹ [32.] Now, if the becoming causes things to appear more beautiful than they really are, the becoming must be a deception with regard to the beautiful; and it would not be that, which we are seeking, Hippias. For we are in search of that, by which all things beautiful are beautiful; as in the case of the surpassing,²⁰ by which all things are great.²¹ [For by this all things are great,]²¹ and though they may not appear so, yet, if they do surpass, they must of necessity be great. So we say of the beautiful, by which all things are beautiful, whether they appear to be so or not. Now this cannot be the becoming. For the becoming causes things to appear more beautiful than they really are, as your reasoning (says), and does not suffer them to appear as they are. But, as I said just now, that which causes them to be really beautiful, whether they appear so or not, this we must endeavour to tell what it is; for this we are seeking, if we are seeking the beautiful.

Hip. But the becoming, Socrates, causes by its presence things both to be and to appear beautiful.

Soc. It is impossible then for things really beautiful not to appear to be beautiful; at least when that is present, which causes them to appear so.

Hip. It is impossible.

the Greek text in οὐδέτερα, instead of which we ought to read ἀμφοτέρα. S. This alteration, says Heindorf, is of no value, although it is confirmed by § 32; while to avoid the incongruity of a single answer to a tripartite question, he suggests a new arrangement of the speeches; and so too does Stalbaum by reading, ΙΠΠ. ἔμοιγε δοκεῖ ἀμφοτέρα. ΣΩ. ἀρ' ὃ ποιεῖ—φαίνεται. ΙΠΠ. ναί. ΣΩ. οὐκοῦν. But this does not meet the difficulty in οὐδέτερα. Perhaps Plato wrote, what I partly suggested many years ago, ἡ ὁδὸς ἐτέρα τούτων ἦν, i. e. Or is there a road different from these?

¹⁸ Ficinus, doubtless perceiving the incongruity here of γελοῖος, translated, perhaps designedly, "deformis." I once thought that Plato wrote καὶ ἡ γελοῖος κολοῖδος, in allusion to the Æsopic story of the daw with borrowed feathers. But I now think that Ficinus found his MS. κολοβός, i. e. "dwarfish" or "mutilated."

²¹ The words within brackets are evidently an interpolation.

[33.] Soc. Shall we then, Hippias, confess that all things really beautiful, both institutions and pursuits truly beautiful, are reputed to be beautiful, and appear so always to all men? Or,²³ (must we say) quite the contrary, that they are unknown, and that dissension and contest take place respecting these points most of all, both amongst individuals privately and publicly amongst states?

Hip. In this way²³ rather, Socrates, that they are unknown.

Soc. This would not (have been unknown)²⁴ ²⁵ if the appearing to be beautiful had been added to the reality:²⁵ and added it would have been, had the becoming been the beautiful, and had caused things not only to be beautiful, but to appear so likewise: so that the becoming, if it were that, which causes things to be beautiful, would be that beauty in the abstract, of which we are in search, and not which causes things to appear beautiful. But if, on the other hand, the becoming merely causes things to appear only beautiful, it cannot be the beautiful, of which we are in search; for this causes them to be so really. Now to cause things to appear to be beautiful, and to be really so, is not in the power of the same thing, nor of any thing else whatever. Let us then choose, whether you think the becoming causes things to appear beautiful, or to be so really.

Hip. I think, Socrates, to appear so.

Soc. Alas! gone and fled away from us, Hippias, has the knowledge of what the beautiful is; especially since the becoming has been seen to be a thing different from the beautiful.

Hip. So, by Zeus, it has, Socrates, and to me at least very unexpectedly.²⁶

[34.] Soc. But let us not, my friend, give up seeking²⁷ for ²³ The two best MSS. read διαλίγεσθαι instead of ἀγνοεῖσθαι: from which, many years ago, I elicited δεῖ λίσγειν, ἀγνοεῖσθαι, as I have here translated.

²⁴ In lieu of οὕτω, correct Greek would require Τοῦτο—

²⁵ Ficinus supplies the ellipse by his “ignoraretur—”

²⁶⁻²⁷ So Sydenham translates the Latin of Ficinus, “si, ut pulchra sunt, ita pulchra etiam apparerent,” as if he had found in his MS. εἰ γέ που καὶ τὸ φαίνεσθαι καλοῖς οὖσιν αὐτοῖς προσῆν, not εἰ γέ που τὸ φαίνεσθαι αὐτοῖς προσῆν.

²⁸ I have adopted ἀσκόπως, found in three MSS., in lieu of ἀτόπως. Compare ἀσκήτως in § 48.

²⁷ In μύντοι lies hid, I suspect, ματεύοντε, as I have translated.

it. For I have still some hope that what the beautiful is will appear again.²⁸

Hip. Altogether assuredly,²⁹ Socrates: for it is not difficult to find. At least I know well that, were I to retire into solitude for a little time and commune with myself, I should describe it to you more accurately than accuracy itself.³⁰

Soc. Hold! Hippias, talk not so big—you see what trouble it has given us already—lest it should grow angry³¹ with us, and run away still further than before. And yet I am saying nothing to the purpose; for you will, I think, easily find it out, when you come to be alone. And do, by the gods,³² find it out in my presence; but if you are willing, seek it as now with me.³³ And if we find it, it will be the best of all; but, if we do not, I shall be content, I think, with my misfortune; while you going away will find it easily. But if we find it now, depend upon it, I shall not trouble you by inquiring what that was, which you had discovered by yourself.³³ For the present consider it, if it seems to you to be the beau-

²⁸ In lieu of ἐκφανήσεσθαι, the train of ideas leads to αὐτὸ φανήσεσθαι. On the confusion of ἐκ and αὐ, see at Prometh. 229.

³⁰ The Greek is τῆς ἀπάσης. But in this formula, where a personification takes place, the language requires αὐτῆς τῆς—See Porson on Hec. 779, and myself on Æsch. Eum. 865. To the passages there quoted I could now add many more.

^{32—33} These words are strangely put together. "Find it—if you will—seek it with me." But if Hippias found it, he need not seek for it with Socrates. The words should have been, "Find it—but, failing, be willing to seek it with me," in Greek, εἴθευσι εἰ δὲ μὴ, βούλου—συνζητεῖν. There is moreover a difficulty in ὥσπερ νῦν, for which Ficinus found in his MS. ὡς πρὶν, καὶ αὐτὸ, as shown by his version, "ut hactenus, sic deinceps."

^{33—33} I cannot understand αὐτὸ—Heindorf explains it by ἑαυτοῦ. But that is, to myself at least, equally unintelligible. For both αὐτὸ and ἑαυτοῦ are applied to something already spoken of; whereas Socrates is about to enter upon a new subject. The sense required is evidently to tiful. I say that it is. But keep your eye on me,³³ and give me all your attention, that I may not say any thing silly. Let then that which is useful, be for us the beautiful. And this I say from thinking on these points. The eyes, we say, are beautiful, not when they seem to be such, but are unable to see, but when they are able and useful for seeing. Is it not so?

Hip. It is.

[35.] Soc. Say we not then of the whole body thus, that one part of it is beautiful for running, another for wrestling? and further, that all the animal kind, as a beautiful³⁴ horse, and a cock, and a quail, and all utensils, and vehicles, for land and sea, [ships and triremes,]³⁵ and all instruments both for music and the other arts, and pursuits and laws, and nearly every thing we call beautiful, are in the same position; and looking to each of them, in what way it has been born, made, or laid down,³⁶ we speak of a thing which is useful, as being beautiful in what it is useful, and for what it is useful, and when it is useful; but another thing, which is entirely useless, we call not beautiful. Does it not so seem to you, Hippias?

Hip. To me it does.

Soc. Correctly then do we now say, that the useful happens to be more than all beautiful.

Hip. Correctly, Socrates.

Soc. Now is not each thing, which is able to effect any thing, useful, so far as it is able? but that, which is unable, useless?

Hip. Entirely so.

[36.] Soc. Power then is beautiful, and want of power is not beautiful.

Hip. Very much so. And the rest of things, Socrates, this effect, "Do you then consider well, whether the beautiful seems to you to be, what I say it is; and what I shall say, do you look into thoroughly—" But whether Plato really wrote so, is another question.

³³ Instead of καλὸν, which is here out of place, I suggested many years ago, καὶ κυνίδιον. For Plutarch combines the same four animals in ii. p. 471, E., κύνας—καὶ ἵππους καὶ ὄρνυγας καὶ ἀλεκτρούνας—quoted by Heind. on Lys. p. 211, E., ὄρνυγα ἢ ἀλεκτρούνα—ἢ ἵππον ἢ κύνα.

³⁴ The words πλοῖά τε καὶ τριήρεις are evidently an interpretation of δχήματα—τὰ ἐν τῇ θαλάττῃ. Plato had probably a recollection of θαλασσοπλάγκτα—ναυτίλων δχήματα in Prometh. 477.

testify in our favour that such is the case, but particularly as regards matters of state. For of all things it is the most beautiful for a person to be powerful in state-affairs, and in his own city; but to be powerless, the least so.

Soc. You say well. By the gods then, Hippias, is not wisdom on this account the most beautiful of all things, and ignorance the least so?

Hip. What else³⁷ do you think, Socrates?

Soc. Softly, my dear friend; since I have a fear about what I am saying.

Hip. What do you fear, Socrates? For your reasoning has proceeded very beautifully at present.

Soc. I wish it had. But do you consider this with me. Could a person do any thing, of which he knows nothing, and for which he has no power?

Hip. By no means. For how could he do that, for which he has no power?

Soc. Are then they, who err, and act wrong, and do a thing unwillingly, ³⁸ other than those, who³⁹ would not have so acted, unless they had possessed the power?

Hip. It is evident.

[37.] Soc. But, however, they who are powerful are powerful through power; for assuredly it is not through want of power.

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. All then, who do any thing, are able to do what they do.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. And all men, beginning from boyhood, do many more evil things than good, and err unwillingly.

Hip. The fact is so.

Soc. What then, shall we say that this power and these means, however useful they may be for the doing evil, are beautiful? or do they want much of being so?

Hip. (They want) much,³⁹ in my opinion, Socrates.

Soc. The powerful then and the useful, Hippias, are not, it seems, the beautiful.

³⁷ I have translated, as if the Greek were 'ἄλλο τι οἶσι, not 'ἄλλα τι οἶσι.

³⁸⁻³⁹ The Greek is ἄλλο τι οὐτοί, εἰ—which I long ago corrected, as the sense requires, into ἄλλο τι οὐτοί ἢ οἶ, εἰ—

³⁹ After δαί at the end of the question, has dropt out δαί in the commencement of the answer.

Hip. If⁴⁰ indeed, Socrates, it has power to do good, or is useful for things of that kind.

Soc. Away then has fled⁴¹ that thing, at once the powerful and the useful, as being⁴² without exception beautiful. Now this was that very thing, Hippias, which our soul⁴³ meant to say, that the beautiful consists in utility and the power to produce some good.

Hip. So it seems to me.

Soc. Now this is the advantageous. Is it not?

Hip. It is.

[38.] Soc. Thus then beautiful bodies, and beautiful institutions, and wisdom, and all these things we just now mentioned, are beautiful, because advantageous.

Hip. Evidently so.

Soc. The advantageous then appears to be, Hippias, to us, the beautiful.

Hip. Entirely so, Socrates.

Soc. But the advantageous is that, which effects a good.

Hip. It is.

Soc. Now that, which effects, is nothing else than a cause. Is it not?

Hip. It is so.

Soc. The beautiful therefore is a cause of the good.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Now the cause, Hippias,⁴⁴ and that of which it is the cause, are different.⁴⁵ For the cause cannot surely be a ⁴⁰ Instead of "If," the sense requires "Unless." In Greek not ἐάν, but ἀν μή, as I remarked long ago.

⁴¹ In τοίνυν lies ἡδὲ πρᾶμενον. Compare Legg. iii. p. 686, A., ταῦτα δὴ τὰ μέγιστα—διέπτει: and οἷχεται ἀποπτάμενος in Sympos. p. 183, E.

⁴² This use of εἶναι after οἷχεται seems scarcely correct Greek.

⁴³ Although the power of speech is given to the soul in Sympos. p. 192, D., ἡ ψυχὴ—δύναται εἰπεῖν, and in Soph. Antig. 227, ψυχὴ—ἡῦδα: yet as nothing has been said of the soul, unless we adopt the reading of the two best MSS. in § 34, of ψυχῇ for τύχῃ, but a great deal about χύτρα, it is evident, as I remarked long ago, that Plato wrote here χύτρα, and there χύτρα.

⁴⁴ The Greek is καὶ οὐδὲν αἴτιον ὃ τὸ αἴτιον, i. e. "and that, of which the cause is a cause." But the sense requires, "and that of which it is the cause;" in Greek, καὶ οὐδὲν ὃ τὸ αἴτιον. Correctly then has Ficinus, "Aliud vero est causa; aliud id, cujus causa est."

⁴⁵ The Greek is τὸ γὰρ αἴτιον αἴτιον αἴτιον. But Ficinus, "causa ipsius causæ causa:" from whence Sydenham, "the cause—the cause of cause of a cause.⁴⁵ Consider it in this way. Did not the cause appear to be a maker?

Hip. Clearly.

Soc. That, which is made by the maker, is nothing else but the produced; but is not itself the maker.

Hip. Such is the fact.

Soc. The produced then is one thing, and the producer is another.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. ⁴⁶The producer then is not the cause of itself,⁴⁶ but of that, which is produced by it.

Hip. Entirely so.

Soc. If then the beautiful is the cause of a good, such a good must be produced by the beautiful; and for this reason, as it seems, we attend to intelligence, and all other beautiful things, because their work and issue are worthy of attention, as being the good; and from what we are discovering, the beautiful is near to being in the form (as it were)⁴⁷ of a father to the good.

Hip. Entirely so. For you speak beautifully, Socrates.

[39.] Soc. Say I not this too beautifully, that neither is the father the son, nor is the son the father?

Hip. Beautifully indeed.

Soc. Nor is the cause the thing produced; nor is, on the other hand, the thing produced the cause.

Hip. You say what is true.

Soc. By Zeus then, thou best of men, neither is the beautiful the good, nor is the good the beautiful. Or does it seem to you from what has been said, that it is possible?

itself," as if he wished to read αὐτοῦ in lieu of αἰτίου. But the train of thought requires, "that, of which there is a cause, cannot be itself a cause;" in Greek, Ὅτι γὰρ πᾶσι, ὅπου γ' ἔστιν αἰτίον τι, αὐτὸ τὸ αἰτίον ἂν εἴη: where ὅπου for οὐτινος has been, as usual, the cause of error; as I showed in my note printed many years ago, to which I will here refer the inquisitive reader.

⁴⁷ In τινός εἰ λόγα, found in the two best MSS., lies hid τινός ἐκείνῃ, as I remarked long ago.

Hip. By Zeus, it appears to me not possible.

Soc. Does it then please us, and are we willing to assert, that the beautiful is not good, nor the good beautiful?

Hip. By Zeus, it does not please me at all.

Soc. And, by Zeus, Hippias, to me too it pleases the least of all the assertions we have made.

Hip. And reasonably so.

Soc. The assertion then, which just now appeared the most correct of all, that the advantageous and the useful and the powerful to do some good, was the beautiful, runs the risk of not being so; but if possible, of being more ridiculous than the first (mentioned), in which we conceived the maiden, and each of the things before mentioned, to be the beautiful.

Hip. It seems so, indeed.

[40.] Soc. And I too, Hippias, have no longer where to turn myself, but am at a loss. Have you any thing to say?

Hip. Not at least for the present. But, as I said just now, I know well that on reflection I shall find it out.

Soc. But, through my eagerness to know, I seem to myself unable to wait your delay. ⁴⁸ For after being somewhat in doubt, ⁴⁸ I think I have just now found out a way. For consider, if we call that beautiful, which causes us to be delighted, —I do not mean all pleasures,—but that which arises through the hearing and the sight, ⁴⁹ how and for what could we contend? ⁴⁹ For surely beautiful men, Hippias, and embroidery of all kinds, and pictures of animals, and earthenware, do, when they are beautiful, delight us, while we look upon them; ⁵⁰ and so likewise do beautiful sounds, ⁵⁰ and music in general, and conversations, and story-telling produce the very same effect. So that should we say in reply to that swaggering follow—My man of mettle, the beautiful is that, which produces pleasure through the hearing, and the sight—think you that we should restrain him from his swaggering?

⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹ The Greek is kai γάρ οὖν δὴ τε καὶ—an accumulation of particles, which defy an exact translation. Plato probably wrote Kai γάρ ἀπορῶν δὴ τε, as I have translated.

⁵²⁻⁵³ The Greek is kai oi φθογγοὶ οἱ καλοὶ—But the balance of the sentence requires—kai oi φθογγοὶ αὐ καλοὶ to answer to—οἱ καλοὶ ἄνθρωποι.

Hip. What the beautiful is seems, Socrates, to me at least, to be well defined.

[41.] Soc. What then shall we say, Hippias, that pursuits⁵¹ and institutions being pleasant through the hearing, or through the sight, are beautiful? or have they some other kind (of beauty)?

Hip. These beautiful things will, perhaps, Socrates, lie hid from the man.

Soc. (But)⁵² by the dog, not from the person, Hippias, before whom I should be the most ashamed to trifle, and to pretend to say something to the purpose, when I was saying nothing.

Hip. Who is he?

Soc. The son of Sophroniscus; who would no more suffer me to⁵³ say off-hand⁵³ what has not been investigated, than to speak, as if I knew what I did not know.

Hip. To myself too it appears, since you have mentioned it, that the case is different as regards institutions.

Soc. Softly, Hippias. For we have fallen into the very same difficulty respecting the beautiful, as we were in just now; and we are in danger of conceiving ourselves to be in a pretty⁵⁴ easy road.

⁵¹ After ἡμιπρόσωπα is inserted τὰ καλὰ, at variance with the language and logic. On the other hand, τὰ καλὰ have dropt out in the answer of Hippias, where instead of καὶ we must read τὰ καλὰ δὲ—and so I have translated.

⁵² "Before μὰ is manifestly required ἀλλὰ: for otherwise Socrates would seem to indicate that he was himself the fictitious person. On the other hand, to the remark of Hippias, 'This will perhaps lie hid from the man,' Socrates would well reply, 'But not from the person before whom I should be the most ashamed to talk nonsense.'" Such was the note I printed many years ago, knowing that AAAA might easily have been lost before MA. And thus we are relieved from the necessity of considering with Schleiermacher, whom Stalbaum follows, the question of Hippias and the reply of Socrates, as interpolations. Of this passage Cicero had perhaps a recollection when he wrote, "Hunc autem esse unum hominem ex omnibus, quo præsente, ego ineptus esse minime vellem." De Orator. § 24.

⁵³—⁵³ Pichinus has "facile judicarem," as if his MS. read κρίνειν, not λέγειν.

⁵⁴ The Greek is οἰσθαι ἐν ἄλλῃ τινὶ εὐπορίᾳ εἶναι. But ἄλλῃ εὐπορίᾳ could not be opposed to ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ἀπορίᾳ. Heindorf once considered

Hip. How say you so, Socrates?

Soc. I will state what to me ⁵⁵ appears to be beautiful, if indeed I am saying any to the purpose. That which relates to institutions and pursuits would perhaps appear to be not removed from the sensations which arise through the hearing and sight. But let us abide awhile by the definition, that what is through those senses pleasant, is beautiful, without bringing before us the question relating to institutions. [42.] Now should the man I mentioned, or any one else, ask us—Why have ye, Hippias and Socrates, separated from the pleasant in general that species of it, in which ye say consists the beautiful, and yet deny that what relates to the other sensations (connected with) ⁵⁶ food and drink and sexual intercourse, and all the rest of such a kind, are beautiful? Or do ye assert that (these) ⁵⁷ are not pleasant, and that there are no pleasures at all in such sensations, nor in any thing else except seeing and hearing? What shall we say, Hippias?

Hip. We will say by all means, Socrates, that in the other things likewise there are very great pleasures.

Soc. Why then, he will say, do ye take away from (these) ⁵⁸ pleasures, really existing no less than those, their very name, and deprive them of the property of being beautiful? Because, we will say, there is not one, who would not laugh at us, were we to say that to eat is not a pleasant, but a beautiful thing, and to smell sweet not a pleasant thing, but beautiful. [43.] But with regard to sexual intercourse, all would surely admit ⁵⁹ that it is to us a thing the most pleasant; but it is meet so to carry it on, if a person will do it, as that no εὐπορία an interpolation; but subsequently interpreted ἐν ἄλλῃ τινι by "rursus in alia." But that would be ἐν ἄλλῃ αὐτῇ, or rather without ἄλλῃ: for which I would now read καλῇ, with a play on the word καλῇ, just as in πρεπόντως in § 31. Ficinus has "dum putamus quiddam certi nos habere," and thus avoids all the difficulties of the text.

⁵⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἃ γ' ἐμοὶ καλὰ φαίνεσθαι, not ὃ γὰρ μοι καταφαίνεται. See the reasons for the change in my edition.

⁵⁶ To avoid the strange expression αἰσθήσεως σίτων, we may insert ἔναικα between ποτῶν and καὶ—

⁵⁷ Ficinus has "dulcia hæc," as if he had found in his MS. οὐδὲ τὰδε ἡδία οὐδὲ—

⁵⁸ Before ἡδονὰς the antithesis in ἐκείνας requires τάσδε—

one see him; since it is a deed the most disgraceful to behold.⁵⁹ On our saying this, Hippias, he will perhaps remark,—I now perceive that you have been of old ashamed to say that these pleasures are beautiful, because they do not seem so to men. Now I did not ask what seems to be beautiful to the multitude, but what is so in reality. Whereupon we shall, I presume, state in reply, that we asserted that this part of the pleasant, arising from the sight and hearing, was a beautiful thing. ⁶⁰But have you it in your power to use the reasoning for any thing?⁶¹ Or shall we, Hippias, say any thing else?

Hip. Against what has been urged, Socrates, it is necessary to say no other than this.

Soc. Truly do ye say well, he will reply. If then the pleasure, coming through the sight and hearing, be a beautiful thing, that which does not happen to be a part of such⁶¹ pleasant sensations, it is clear cannot be beautiful. Shall we confess it?

Hip. Yes.

[44.] Soc. Is then that which is pleasurable, he will say, through the sight, pleasurable through the sight and hearing (conjointly)?⁶² Or that which is pleasurable through the hearing, pleasurable through the hearing and the sight (conjointly)?⁶³ By no means, we shall answer, would that which exists through either, exist through both; for this you seem to us to say; whereas we assert, that each of these pleasurable things would be beautiful, taken by themselves and both together. Should we not answer thus?

⁵⁹ Shakespeare—"He loved the deed of darkness; but he blushed To own it." Compare Phileb. p. 66, A. § 158. Plutarch Sympos. ii. p. 654, B.; Cicero de Offic. i. 35; Pythagor. Fr. p. 710, ed. Gale.

⁶¹ The Greek is δ μὴ τοῦτο τυγχάνει ἐν τῶν ἡδέων. But Ficinus has "quod per alium sensum delectat," from which Stephens would elicit τούτῳ. He should have suggested τούτων—as I have translated.

^{62, 63} The word ἄμ' has twice dropt out between ἴστιν and ἡδύ.

Hip. By all means.

Soc. ⁶⁴Does then, he will say, any pleasure whatever differ from any other pleasure whatever in this, namely, in being a pleasure? For (I ask not) whether any pleasure is greater or less, or more or less; but whether any one differs by this very thing, in one of the pleasures being a pleasure, but the other not a pleasure. Does it not seem so to us?

Hip. For it does not seem so.⁶⁴

Soc. For some other reason then, he will say, than because they are pleasures, have ye selected these from all the rest; and having some such view with regard to both, that they differ in some respect from the rest, did ye not, looking to this, say that they are beautiful? For seeing is surely not a beautiful thing on this account, that it is through seeing. For, if this were the reason of its being beautiful, the other pleasure ⁶⁵[that through hearing]⁶⁵ would not be beautiful, ⁶⁶as not partaking of that which is peculiar to the sense of seeing.⁶⁶ Shall we say, you speak the truth?

Hip. We will.

[45.] Soc. Nor, on the other hand, is the pleasure through the hearing beautiful on this account, that it is through hearing. For then that through seeing would not be beautiful, ⁶⁷as not partaking of that which is peculiar to the sense of hearing.⁶⁷ Shall we say, Hippias, that the man, in speaking so, speaks correctly?

Hip. Yes, correctly.

Soc. But both, he will rejoin, are beautiful, as you assert. For so we say.

⁶⁴⁻⁶⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which is manifestly corrupt.

⁶⁵⁻⁶⁵ The words within brackets, ἡ διὰ τῆς ἀκοῆς, are evidently an explanation of ἱρία.

⁶⁷⁻⁶⁷ See the preceding note.

Hip. We do.

Soc. They have then something in common and the same, which causes them to be beautiful, and which belongs to both conjointly, and severally to each. For otherwise they would not be beautiful conjointly and severally. Give to me a reply, as if to him.

Hip. I answer, that it appears to me as you say.

Soc. If then these pleasures, taken conjointly, are affected by any circumstance, but not so, if taken separately, they could not, at least under that circumstance, be beautiful.

Hip. How could it be possible, Socrates, that when neither are affected by any circumstance whatever, that both should be affected by that ⁶⁸[by which neither is affected]? ⁶⁸

Soc. You think it is impossible.

Hip. ⁶⁹Yes; for a great want of acquaintance with the nature of those things would possess me, and of speaking the present speeches. ⁶⁹

[46.] Soc. (You speak) pleasantly, Hippias. ⁷⁰ For I am in danger equally of fancying I see something so circumstanced, as you aver to be impossible; but yet I see nothing (clearly). ⁷¹

Hip. You are in no danger, Socrates; but you very readily look aside. ⁷²

⁶⁸⁻⁶⁹ The words within brackets are an evident interpolation, and were properly omitted by Ficinus in his version, "ut, quod neutra illarum patitur, ambæ perpetiantur." Nor is this the only error here. For in one of the best MSS. are found the remains of the following words, which ought to close the next speech of Hippias: Εἰ γὰρ ἕκασται, δὴλον ὅτι καὶ ἀμφοτέραι πεπονθυῖαι ἂν εἴεν, i. e. For if each had been so circumstanced, it is evident both would have been.

⁷¹ The Greek is ὁρῶ δὲ οὐδὲν. Perhaps δ' εἰ should be read for δὲ. Compare Eurip. Phœn. 165, Ὅρῶ δ' ἤτ' οὐ σαφῶς ὁρῶ δὲ πῶς. Heracl. 495, λείγει μὲν οὐ σαφῶς, λείγει δὲ πῶς.

⁷² Here again I have restored in my edition what Plato probably wrote. Stalbaum's version is, "you purposely neglect the true reason;" but ἰτροίμως does not mean "purposely;" nor is there any thing in the Greek to answer to "true reason."

Soc. ⁷³ And yet many things of such a kind appear to me before my soul.⁷³ But I distrust them; because they do not present themselves to you, who have made the most money of all now famed for wisdom, but only to myself, who have never made any. And I have an idea, my friend, that you are playing with me, ⁷⁴and are willingly deceiving me; such strong and so many.⁷⁴

Hip. No one will know better than yourself, Socrates, whether I am playing with you or not, if you will only endeavour to tell me, what are those things that have presented themselves to you. For you will be seen to say nothing to the purpose. For you will never find that both of us have been affected by circumstances together, by which neither you nor I have been separately.

Soc. How say you, Hippias? But perhaps you are speaking something to the purpose, and I do not understand it. Do you then hear from me what I wish to state more clearly.⁷⁵ For it appears to me, that what neither I have been under the circumstance of being, nor am, nor, on the other hand, what you are under such a circumstance, it is possible for both to be; and on the other hand, that other things, which both of us are under the circumstance of being, neither of us are.⁷⁵

[47.] Hip. You appear to me, Socrates, to exhibit in your answers again⁷⁶ still greater wonders than when you answered before. For just consider, if both of us were just, would not each of us be so? or if each unjust, would not both be so? if both were in health, would not each be so? or if each were wearied, or wounded, or struck, or were affected in any other way whatever, would not both of us be affected in the same⁷⁷ way? Still further, if both of us happened to be made of gold, or silver, or ivory, or if you will, well-born, or wise, or held in honour, or old, or [young],⁷⁸ or in any state you will, incident to man, is there not a great necessity for each to be so?

⁷³⁻⁷⁵ and ⁷⁴⁻⁷⁶ On both of these passages I must again refer the reader to the notes in my edition. For they are too long, and perhaps too learned, for the present work; especially as I could now add not a little to confirm the views there brought forward.

⁷⁵⁻⁷⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek, with which Stalbaum, in ed. 2, is satisfied; although, in ed. 1, he had transcribed Heindorf's note, who saw with Sydenham that there was something wrong here. But they do not appear to have seen that the train of ideas was originally something to this effect: "For it appears to me that, what neither I nor you have suffered, and what neither I am nor you are, this it is possible for both of us to suffer and to be; and on the other hand, what both of us have suffered and are, for neither of us to have suffered and to be."

Soc. Most assuredly.

[48.] Hip. But neither do you, Socrates, consider things as wholes, nor do they, with whom you are wont to converse. For taking separately the beautiful and each of things existing, you discuss it in your discourses, cutting it into fractions; and hence things of great size, and of continuous⁷⁹ length escape your observation. And to such an extent have they escaped you now, that you conceive there is something, either circumstance or being, which, as regards two things taken jointly, does exist, but does not, as regards them taken singly; or on the other hand, does exist, as regards each, taken singly, but not as regards both, taken jointly. So illogically, and inconsiderately, and sillily, and unreflectingly, do you conduct yourselves.

Soc. Such is our condition, Hippias. It is not what a man wishes, say the persons using every where the proverb,⁸⁰ but what he can. But⁸¹ you are always assisting us with your admo-

⁷⁷ The Greek is τοῦτο—But “idem,” in Ficinus, leads to ταὐτό—

⁷⁸ “The words ἡ νῆος are omitted by three MSS. correctly; for neither Socrates nor Hippias were young when the dialogue is supposed to have taken place. Should it however be said that the qualities, thus brought forward as examples, have been taken at random, it may be replied that Plato is not wont to speak without some definite design. In the words χρυσοί, ἀργυροί, and ἐλεφάντινοι there is an allusion to the subjects discussed in § 23; while in the words γενναῖοι, σοφοί, τίμιοι, γέροντες, Hippias alludes to himself as being of a good family, wise, honoured, and aged.” Such is the note I wrote many years ago. But instead of rejecting ἡ νῆος entirely, I would now consider γέροντες νῆος as an explanation of ἡμῶν γέροντες, restored again to Plato in Euthyd. p. 272, § 3, by myself in Poppo’s Prolegom. p. 219.

⁷⁹ “In considering any subject, Plato is wont to speak of it in general terms, and then to divide it into its several species; and after distinguishing each species by its peculiar character, to arrive at the real nature of the thing in question.” So remarks Sydenham; who might have referred for a notable instance of this method, to the Sophist and Statesman throughout, but more especially the latter, p. 258, B. § 2.

⁸⁰ The proverb in Greek was—Ζῶμεν γὰρ οὐχ ὥς θέλομεν ἀλλ’ ὥς δυνάμεθα, translated by Terence, “Ut quimus, aiunt; quando, ut volumus, non licet.”

⁸¹ I confess I cannot perceive here the requisite train of thought.

nitions. Since even now, ⁸² before I had been thus admonished by you how sillily we conduct ourselves, shall I give ⁸³ you still a plainer proof, by stating what were our thoughts upon those points? or shall I not?

Hip. You will speak to one who knows already, Socrates. For I am conversant with each one of those who are engaged in disputations, and how they are situated. Still, if it is more agreeable to yourself, say on.

Soc. To me indeed it will be more agreeable. For we were, thou best of men, so silly before you said so of us, as to conceive with regard to myself and you, that each of us was one person, and that both could not be what each was; for we are not one, but two persons. Such a simpleton was I! [49.] But now we have been taught the contrary, that if both together are two persons, each of us also is of necessity two; and that if each of us be one, it is necessary for both of us to be one. For by a continuous argument (respecting) being, ⁸³ it is not possible, according to Hippias, for it to be otherwise; but now having been persuaded by you, that whatever both of two things are, this too each of them is, I sit down here.⁸⁴ But first remind⁸⁵ me, Hippias, whether you and I are one, you and I together; or you are two, and I two.

Hip. What mean you, Socrates?

Soc. What I say. For I am afraid to speak plainly to you,⁸⁶ because you are harsh with me, whenever you seem to yourself ⁸⁷ to speak something to the purpose.⁸⁷ But

^{82—82} This is rather strange language, "Before I had—shall I." There is some error here. Perhaps Plato—ἵν' ἂν τὸ πρὶν ὑπὸ σοῦ ταῦτ' εὖ νοουθετηθῇναι φανῶ, i. e. "in order that I may be shown to have been properly admonished thus by you."

⁸³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, διανεκεῖ λόγῳ τῆς οὐσίας. But Sydenham's, though less literal, is more intelligible, "by reason of the continuity of being."

⁸⁴ Between ἐνθάδε and κάθημαι has dropt out, I suspect, κάνθων, "a pannier'd ass." The word is found in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 179, and Εἰρ. 81, while its synonyme ὄνος is seen in the proverb alluded to in Plato Theætet. p. 146, A., ὁ δὲ ἀμαρτῶν καὶ δεῖ ἂν αἰεὶ ἀμαρτάνῃ, καθιθεῖται, ὥσπερ φασὶν οἱ παῖδες οἱ σφαιρίζοντες, ὄνος.

⁸⁵ Instead of ὑπόμνησον, which can hardly suit with πότερον, I suggested long ago ὑπομνήνυσον, similar to "memora," in Ficinus.

⁸⁶ In lieu of σε Heindorf suggested σοί, answering to "coram te," in Ficinus.

^{87—87} But this could be no reason for Hippias having a harsh feeling towards Socrates. What Plato probably wrote may be seen in my edition.

fellow—My man of mettle, the beautiful is that, which produces pleasure through the hearing, and the sight—think you that we should restrain him from his swaggering?

Hip. What the beautiful is seems, Socrates, to me at least, to be well defined.

⁵⁶ To avoid the strange expression αἰσθήσεις σίτων, we may insert ἐνεκα between ποτῶν and καὶ—

⁵⁷ Ficinus has "dulcia hæc," as if he had found in his MS. οὐδὲ τὰδε ἡδία οὐδὲ—

⁵⁸ Before ἡδονὰς the antithesis in ἐκείνας requires τάσδε—

one see him; since it is a deed the most disgraceful to behold.⁵⁹ On our saying this, Hippias, he will perhaps remark,—I now perceive that you have been of old ashamed to say that these pleasures are beautiful, because they do not seem so to men. Now I did not ask what seems to be beautiful to the multitude, but what is so in reality. Whereupon we shall, I presume, state in reply, that we asserted that this part of the pleasant, arising from the sight and hearing, was a beautiful thing. ⁶⁰But have you it in your power to use the reasoning for any thing?⁶⁰ Or shall we, Hippias, say any thing else?

Hip. Against what has been urged, Socrates, it is necessary to say no other than this.

Soc. Truly do ye say well, he will reply. If then the pleasure, coming through the sight and hearing, be a beautiful thing, that which does not happen to be a part of such⁶¹ pleasant sensations, it is clear cannot be beautiful. Shall we confess it?

Hip. Yes.

[44.] Soc. Is then that which is pleasurable, he will say, through the sight, pleasurable through the sight and hearing (conjointly)?⁶² Or that which is pleasurable through the hearing, pleasurable through the hearing and the sight (conjointly)?⁶³ By no means, we shall answer, would that which exists through either, exist through both; for this you seem to us to say; whereas we assert, that each of these pleasurable things would be beautiful, taken by themselves and both together. Should we not answer thus?

⁵⁹ Shakspeare—"He loved the deed of darkness; but he blushed To own it." Compare Phileb. p. 66, A. § 158. Plutarch Sympos. ii. p. 654, B.; Cicero de Offic. i. 35; Pythagor. Fr. p. 710, ed. Gale.

⁶¹ The Greek is δ μὴ τοῦτο τυγχάνει δν τῶν ἡδίων. But Ficinus has "quod per alium sensum delectat," from which Stephens would elicit τούτῳ. He should have suggested τούτων—as I have translated.

^{62, 63} The word αἴμα has twice dropt out between ἴστω and ἡδὺ.

Hip. By all means.

Soc. ⁶⁴ Does then, he will say, any pleasure whatever differ from any other pleasure whatever in this, namely, in being a pleasure? For (I ask not) whether any pleasure is greater or less, or more or less; but whether any one differs by this very thing, in one of the pleasures being a pleasure, but the other not a pleasure. Does it not seem so to us?

Hip. For it does not seem so.⁶⁴

Soc. For some other reason then, he will say, than because they are pleasures, have ye selected these from all the rest; and having some such view with regard to both, that they differ in some respect from the rest, did ye not, looking to this, say that they are beautiful? For seeing is surely not a beautiful thing on this account, that it is through seeing. For, if this were the reason of its being beautiful, the other pleasure ⁶⁵ [that through hearing] ⁶⁵ would not be beautiful, ⁶⁶ as not partaking of that which is peculiar to the sense of seeing.⁶⁶ Shall we say, you speak the truth?

Hip. We will.

[45.] Soc. Nor, on the other hand, is the pleasure through the hearing beautiful on this account, that it is through hearing. For then that through seeing would not be beautiful, ⁶⁷ as not partaking of that which is peculiar to the sense of hearing.⁶⁷ Shall we say, Hippias, that the man, in speaking so, speaks correctly?

Hip. Yes, correctly.

Soc. But both, he will rejoin, are beautiful, as you assert. For so we say.

^{64—64} Such is the literal version of the Greek, which is manifestly corrupt.

^{65—65} The words within brackets, ἡ διὰ τῆς ἀκοῆς, are evidently an explanation of ἱρίπα.

^{66—66} So Sydenham; thus adopting the correction of Cornarius, οὐκ οὐσα ἱρί γε, which was suggested, probably, by the version of Ficinus, "cum per visum nequaquam efficiatur." The Greek is, καλή· οὐκ οὖν ἱστί γε δι' ὁψαὺς ἡδονή: from whence it is easy to elicit, as I did many years ago, what the sense requires, καλή· ἢ οὐ κοινόν ἱστί τι τῇ τε δι' ὁψαὺς ἡδονῇ, i. e. "to which there is nothing in common with the pleasure of sight:" and a similar correction is requisite in § 45, where a similar idea occurs.

^{67—67} See the preceding note.

Hip. We do.

Soc. They have then something in common and the same, which causes them to be beautiful, and which belongs to both conjointly, and severally to each. For otherwise they would not be beautiful conjointly and severally. Give to me a reply, as if to him.

Hip. I answer, that it appears to me as you say.

Soc. If then these pleasures, taken conjointly, are affected by any circumstance, but not so, if taken separately, they could not, at least under that circumstance, be beautiful.

Hip. How could it be possible, Socrates, that when neither are affected by any circumstance whatever, that both should be affected by that ⁶⁵[by which neither is affected] ? ⁶⁶

Soc. You think it is impossible.

Hip. ⁶⁷Yes; for a great want of acquaintance with the nature of those things would possess me, and of speaking the present speeches. ⁶⁸

[46.] Soc. (You speak) pleasantly, Hippias. ⁷⁰ For I am in danger equally of fancying I see something so circumstanced, as you aver to be impossible; but yet I see nothing (clearly). ⁷¹

Hip. You are in no danger, Socrates; but you very readily look aside. ⁷²

⁶⁵⁻⁶⁶ The words within brackets are an evident interpolation, and were properly omitted by Ficinus in his version, "ut, quod neutra illarum patitur, ambæ perpetuantur." Nor is this the only error here. For in one of the best MSS. are found the remains of the following words, which ought to close the next speech of Hippias: Εἰ γὰρ ἕκασται, δῆλον ὅτι καὶ ἀμφοτέραι πεπονθῆναι δύνασθαι, i. e. For if each had been so circumstanced, it is evident both would have been.

⁶⁷⁻⁶⁸ Such is the literal version of the Greek; for which I think I have suggested something more worthy of Plato in my edition.

⁷¹ The Greek is ὁρῶ δὲ οὐδέν. Perhaps δ' εἰ should be read for δὲ. Compare Eurip. Phœn. 165, Ὀρῶ δ' ἤτ' οὐ σαφῶς ὁρῶ δὲ πως. Heracl. 495, λέγει μὲν οὐ σαφῶς, λέγει δὲ πως.

⁷² Here again I have restored in my edition what Plato probably wrote. Stalbaum's version is, "you purposely neglect the true reason;" but ἰτροίμως does not mean "purposely;" nor is there any thing in the Greek to answer to "true reason."

Soc. ⁷³ And yet many things of such a kind appear to me before my soul.⁷³ But I distrust them; because they do not present themselves to you, who have made the most money of all now famed for wisdom, but only to myself, who have never made any. And I have an idea, my friend, that you are playing with me,⁷⁴ and are willingly deceiving me; such strong and so many.⁷⁴

Hip. No one will know better than yourself, Socrates, whether I am playing with you or not, if you will only endeavour to tell me, what are those things that have presented themselves to you. For you will be seen to say nothing to the purpose. For you will never find that both of us have been affected by circumstances together, by which neither you nor I have been separately.

Soc. How say you, Hippias? But perhaps you are speaking something to the purpose, and I do not understand it. Do you then hear from me what I wish to state more clearly.⁷⁵ For it appears to me, that what neither I have been under the circumstance of being, nor am, nor, on the other hand, what you are under such a circumstance, it is possible for both to be; and on the other hand, that other things, which both of us are under the circumstance of being, neither of us are.⁷⁵

[47.] Hip. You appear to me, Socrates, to exhibit in your answers again⁷⁶ still greater wonders than when you answered before. For just consider, if both of us were just, would not each of us be so? or if each unjust, would not both be so? if both were in health, would not each be so? or if each were wearied, or wounded, or struck, or were affected in any other way whatever, would not both of us be affected in the ⁷³⁻⁷⁴ and ⁷⁴⁻⁷⁵ On both of these passages I must again refer the reader to the notes in my edition. For they are too long, and perhaps too learned, for the present work; especially as I could now add not a little to confirm the views there brought forward.

⁷⁵⁻⁷⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek, with which Stalbaum, in ed. 2, is satisfied; although, in ed. 1, he had transcribed Heindorf's note, who saw with Sydenham that there was something wrong here. But they do not appear to have seen that the train of ideas was originally something to this effect: "For it appears to me that, what neither I nor you have suffered, and what neither I am nor you are, this it is possible for both of us to suffer and to be; and on the other hand, what both of us have suffered and are, for neither of us to have suffered and to be."

same⁷⁷ way? Still further, if both of us happened to be made of gold, or silver, or ivory, or if you will, well-born, or wise, or held in honour, or old, or [young],⁷⁸ or in any state you will, incident to man, is there not a great necessity for each to be so?

Soc. Most assuredly.

[48.] Hip. But neither do you, Socrates, consider things as wholes, nor do they, with whom you are wont to converse. For taking separately the beautiful and each of things existing, you discuss it in your discourses, cutting it into fractions; and hence things of great size, and of continuous⁷⁹ length escape your observation. And to such an extent have they escaped you now, that you conceive there is something, either circumstance or being, which, as regards two things taken jointly, does exist, but does not, as regards them taken singly; or on the other hand, does exist, as regards each, taken singly, but not as regards both, taken jointly. So illogically, and inconsiderately, and sillily, and unreflectingly, do you conduct yourselves.

Soc. Such is our condition, Hippias. It is not what a man wishes, say the persons using every where the proverb,⁸⁰ but what he can. But⁸¹ you are always assisting us with your admo-

⁷⁷ The Greek is reûro—But “idem,” in Ficinus, leads to ταὐτό—

⁷⁸ “The words ἡ νῆος are omitted by three MSS. correctly; for neither Socrates nor Hippias were young when the dialogue is supposed to have taken place. Should it however be said that the qualities, thus brought forward as examples, have been taken at random, it may be replied that Plato is not wont to speak without some definite design. In the words χρυσοί, ἀργυροί, and ἐλεφάντιναι there is an allusion to the subjects discussed in § 23; while in the words γενναῖοι, σοφοί, τίμιοι, γίγοντες, Hippias alludes to himself as being of a good family, wise, honoured, and aged.” Such is the note I wrote many years ago. But instead of rejecting ἡ νῆος entirely, I would now consider γίγοντες νῆος as an explanation of ἐμογιγοντες, restored again to Plato in Euthyd. p. 272, § 3, by myself in Poppo’s Prolegom. p. 219.

⁷⁹ “In considering any subject, Plato is wont to speak of it in general terms, and then to divide it into its several species; and after distinguishing each species by its peculiar character, to arrive at the real nature of the thing in question.” So remarks Sydenham; who might have referred for a notable instance of this method, to the Sophist and Statesman throughout, but more especially the latter, p. 258, B. § 2.

⁸⁰ The proverb in Greek was—Ζῶμεν γὰρ οὐχ ὥς θέλομεν ἀλλ’ ὥς δυνάμεθα, translated by Terence, “Ut quimus, aiunt; quando, ut volumus, non licet.”

⁸¹ I confess I cannot perceive here the requisite train of thought.

nitions. Since even now, ⁸² before I had been thus admonished by you how sillily we conduct ourselves, shall I give ⁸³ you still a plainer proof, by stating what were our thoughts upon those points? or shall I not?

Hip. You will speak to one who knows already, Socrates. For I am conversant with each one of those who are engaged in disputations, and how they are situated. Still, if it is more agreeable to yourself, say on.

Soc. To me indeed it will be more agreeable. For we were, thou best of men, so silly before you said so of us, as to conceive with regard to myself and you, that each of us was one person, and that both could not be what each was; for we are not one, but two persons. Such a simpleton was I! [49.] But now we have been taught the contrary, that if both together are two persons, each of us also is of necessity two; and that if each of us be one, it is necessary for both of us to be one. For by a continuous argument (respecting) being, ⁸³ it is not possible, according to Hippias, for it to be otherwise; but now having been persuaded by you, that whatever both of two things are, this too each of them is, I sit down here. ⁸⁴ But first remind ⁸⁵ me, Hippias, whether you and I are one, you and I together; or you are two, and I two.

Hip. What mean you, Socrates?

Soc. What I say. For I am afraid to speak plainly to you, ⁸⁶ because you are harsh with me, whenever you seem to yourself ⁸⁷ to speak something to the purpose. ⁸⁷ But

⁸²⁻⁸³ This is rather strange language, "Before I had—shall I." There is some error here. Perhaps Plato—ἵν' ἂν τὸ πρὶν ὑπὸ σοῦ ταῦτ' εὖ νοουμένηθῇναι φανῶ, i. e. "in order that I may be shown to have been properly admonished thus by you."

⁸³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, διανεκεῖ λόγῳ τῆς οὐσίας. But Sydenham's, though less literal, is more intelligible, "by reason of the continuity of being."

⁸⁴ Between ἐνθάδε and κάθημαι has dropt out, I suspect, κάνθων, "a pannier'd ass." The word is found in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 179, and Εἰρ. 81, while its synonyme ὄνος is seen in the proverb alluded to in Plato Theætet. p. 146, A., ὁ δὲ ἀμαρτῶν καὶ θεὸς ἂν αἰεὶ ἀμαρτάνῃ, καθεδεῖται, ὥσπερ φασὶν οἱ παῖδες οἱ σφαιρίζοντες, ὄνος.

⁸⁵ Instead of ὑπόμνησον, which can hardly suit with πότερον, I suggested long ago ὑπομνήσσον, similar to "memora," in Ficinus.

⁸⁶ In lieu of σε Heindorf suggested σοι, answering to "coram te," in Ficinus.

⁸⁷⁻⁸⁷ But this could be no reason for Hippias having a harsh feeling towards Socrates. What Plato probably wrote may be seen in my edition.

however tell me, is not each of us one? and so affected as to be one?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. If then each of us be one, each of us must be also odd. Or think you that one is not an odd number?

Hip. I think it is.

Soc. Are we then both odd, being two?

Hip. This, Socrates, could not be.

Soc. But both together are even. Is it not so?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. Now, because both together are even, is each of us on this account even?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. It is not then necessary, as you said just now, that what we both are together, we should be singly; and that, what each is, we should both be.

Hip. Not in these cases, but in those I spoke of before.

[50.] Soc. These are sufficient, Hippias; for we must be content with these, since it appears that some things are so, but others not. For I stated, if you remember, at the point from whence this conversation diverged,⁸⁸ that the pleasures through the sight, and through hearing, could not be beautiful in that, by which each happened to be affected (singly) and not both (jointly), or both (jointly) and not each (singly), but by what they were affected jointly and singly. And hence you admitted that both together and each singly were beautiful. On this account then I conceived that, by the existence which follows upon both, they ought, if both were beautiful, to be themselves⁸⁹ beautiful; but not by the existence wanting to the other.⁹⁰ And I think so still. But tell me, as if at the beginning (of our inquiry), if the pleasure through the sight and that through hearing are beautiful, both (jointly) and each (singly), does not that, which makes them so, follow on both (jointly) and each (singly).

Hip. Certainly.

⁸⁸ The MSS. vary between ἀλλήθως, ἀλλήλως, and ἀλλήθως. Plato wrote, as I have translated, ἐπ' ἀλλήλως.

⁸⁹ Instead of αὐτὰ the train of thought evidently requires ἑαυτὰ, "each."

⁹⁰ In lieu of ἑαυτὰ, Sydenham correctly suggested ἐκάστω. Stalbaum translates ἑαυτὰ "alterutrum." But such is not its meaning in correct Greek.

Soc. Is it then because each singly is a pleasure, and both too jointly, that they are beautiful? Or on this account alone,⁹¹ because all the other pleasures would be in no respect less beautiful? For, if you remember, the latter were shown to be pleasures no less than the former.

Hip. I remember it well.

[51.] Soc. But because these are through the sight and hearing, on that account it was asserted they were beautiful.

Hip. It was so asserted.

Soc. See now, whether I speak the truth. It was stated, as my memory serves me, not that the pleasurable of every kind was beautiful; but such as was through the sight and hearing.

Hip. It is true.

Soc. Does not this circumstance then attend on both taken together? but not on each taken singly? ⁹²For by no means does each of them, as was said before, exist through both, but both through both, and each not.⁹² Is it so?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Each of them is not beautiful through that which does not attend each. For the both does not attend upon (the) either.⁹³ So that we can by the hypothesis call both beautiful, but we cannot (call) either so. Or how say we? Is it not of necessity so?

Hip. So it appears.

[52.] Soc. Shall we then say that both are beautiful, but deny that each is so?

Hip. What is to prevent it?

Soc. This seems to me, my friend, to prevent it; ⁹⁴because there were to us some things so appertaining to each, that, if they appertained to both, (they would appertain)⁹⁴ likewise

⁹¹ Instead of μὲν, which has no meaning here, Plato doubtless wrote μόνον—

⁹²—⁹³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which is evidently corrupt.

⁹³ Before ἐκαστῶν the article τῶν has dropt. Compare § 52, τὸ ἐκάτερον καὶ τὸ ἀμφοτέρων.

⁹⁴—⁹⁴ Ficinus has—"ut, si ambobus adsunt, adsint et singulis"—thus showing that he found supplied in his MS. the very words requisite for the sense and syntax—εἴπερ—ἐπιγίγνυντο, ἐπιγίγνυντ' ἄν—

to each; and, if to each,⁹⁵ to both likewise—all such you went through.⁹⁶ Is it not so?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. ⁹⁶But what I went through, (were) not so; of which was itself the each and the both.⁹⁶ Is it so?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Of what kind then, Hippias, does the beautiful seem to you? whether, as you asserted, that if I and you are strong, both are so; and if I and you are just, both are so; and if both, so too is each; and similarly, if I and you are beautiful, both are so; and if both, so too is each? Or is there nothing to prevent it; as (in the case of numbers, where) some things taken together being even, may be, when taken ⁹⁸singly, odd, and perhaps even:⁹⁷ or, when each, being taken separately, is perhaps irrational, but taken both together may be rational, or perhaps irrational,⁹⁸ and there are other things of this kind infinite in number, which I said presented themselves to me. [53.] Now, on which side do you place the beautiful? On that, as it appears to me, or to yourself. For it appears to me a great absurdity, for both of us to be beautiful, yet each of us not so; or for each to be beautiful, yet both not so; or as regards any other thing whatever of such a kind. Do you choose (to say)⁹⁹ in this way or that?

Hip. In this way, Socrates.

Soc. And you do wisely, Hippias, in order that we may be freed from a further search. For, if any of these things is the beautiful, the pleasurable, which comes through the sight and hearing, would no longer be the beautiful; for (the plea-

⁹⁵⁻⁹⁶ The error in these words is corrected in the notes to my edition.

⁹⁶⁻⁹⁸ To point out all the difficulties in the words between the numerals, and how they might be overcome, would require a longer note than is suited to this place.

⁹⁷ For instance, the two odd numbers, seven and three, together make the even number, ten; and the two even numbers, six and four, make the very same number. S.

⁹⁸⁻⁹⁹ "Surd." quantities are called in Greek ἀρρητα or ἄλογα, and in Latin "irrationales." To illustrate this passage Heindorf justly says that $\sqrt{3}$ and $\sqrt{6}$ are ἀρρητα; but $\sqrt{3} + \sqrt{6}$ is ρητόν. Sydenham, he observes, translated ρητόν and ἀρρητα by "commensurable and incommensurable;" but that would be in Greek σύμμετρα and ἀσύμμετρα.

⁹⁹ Instead of αἰσεί, the two best MSS. read ἰσεί, which leads to αἰσεί ἰσείν—surable)¹ that comes through the sight and hearing, causes both, taken together, to be beautiful; but not either singly. This however cannot be, as I and you, Hippias, have agreed.

Hip. We have agreed.

Soc. It is impossible then for that, which is pleasurable through the sight and hearing, to be the beautiful; since a thing being produced as beautiful exhibits something of the impossible.

Hip. Such is the case.

Soc. Say then again from the beginning, he will say, since you have erred in this, what, say you, is that beauty, which (attends) upon both these pleasures, for the sake of which you honoured them before the others, and called them beautiful? [54.] To me, Hippias, there seems a necessity to say, that these are of all pleasures the most harmless,² and the best, taken together and singly. Or have you to state any thing else, by which they are different from other pleasures?

Hip. By no means: for they are in reality the best.

Soc. This then, he will say, do you now assert the beautiful to be, namely, pleasure that is advantageous? So it seems, I shall answer. But what you?

Hip. I too (the same).

Soc. Is not then, he will say, the advantageous that, which is the efficient of good? Now the efficient, as shown lately, is a thing different from the effect; and the reasoning has now ³come to you to the former reasoning;³ for neither would the good be a beautiful thing, nor would the beautiful be a good thing; since each of these ⁴is something else.⁴ This we shall more than all assert, if, Hippias, we are of sound mind. For it is surely not just not to agree with him, who speaks correctly.

¹ The word ἡδὺς has probably dropt out between τὸ and δι', as is shown by the train of thought.

² What are here called ἀσινίσταται are described as ἀβλαβεῖς in Rep. ii: p. 257, D., and καθαρὰι in Phileb. p. 66, C.

³ Ficinus has "relabimur," in Greek ἀνήκει: while in ἡκεῖ ὁμῖν lies hid ἡκεῖ κυκλοῦμενος, as in English, "reasoning in a circle."

⁴ This is the literal version of the Greek. But Sydenham has what the sense requires, "each of these being different from the other."

one see him; since it is a deed the most disgraceful to behold.⁵⁹ On our saying this, Hippias, he will perhaps remark,—I now perceive that you have been of old ashamed to say that these pleasures are beautiful, because they do not seem so to men. Now I did not ask what seems to be beautiful to the multitude, but what is so in reality. Whereupon we shall, I presume, state in reply, that we asserted that this part of the pleasant, arising from the sight and hearing, was a beautiful thing. ⁶⁰But have you it in your power to use the reasoning for any thing?⁶⁰ Or shall we, Hippias, say any thing else?

Hip. Against what has been urged, Socrates, it is necessary to say no other than this.

Soc. Truly do ye say well, he will reply. If then the pleasure, coming through the sight and hearing, be a beautiful thing, that which does not happen to be a part of such⁶¹ pleasant sensations, it is clear cannot be beautiful. Shall we confess it?

Hip. Yes.

[44.] Soc. Is then that which is pleasurable, he will say, through the sight, pleasurable through the sight and hearing (conjointly)?⁶² Or that which is pleasurable through the hearing, pleasurable through the hearing and the sight (conjointly)?⁶³ By no means, we shall answer, would that which exists through either, exist through both; for this you seem to us to say; whereas we assert, that each of these pleasurable things would be beautiful, taken by themselves and both together. Should we not answer thus?

⁵⁹ Shakspeare—"He loved the deed of darkness; but he blushed To own it." Compare Phileb. p. 66, A. § 158. Plutarch Sympos. ii. p. 654, B.; Cicero de Offic. i. 35; Pythagor. Fr. p. 710, ed. Gale.

^{60, 61} This is the literal version of the Greek, ἅλλ' ἔχεις τι χρῆσθαι τῷ λόγῳ: which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus, whose version is, "Tu vero, Hippias, quò te vertis?" as if he had found in his MS. ἅλλ' ἔχεις δ, τι χρῆσθαι τῷ λόγῳ, similar to δ, τι χρῆσθαι τῷ λόγῳ in Crito, § 4. But the balance of the sentence requires τούτῳ τῷ λόγῳ, to answer to μὴ ἀλλὰ—ἢ ταῦτα in the reply of Hippias. Compare Demosth. p. 590, ed. Wolf, ἐγὼ δὲ οὐκ ἔχω τι χρῆσθαι τοῖς τούτου μάρτυσι, quoted by Zeune on Viger. p. 323.

⁶² The Greek is δ μὴ τοῦτο τυχάνει δν τῶν ἡδίων. But Ficinus has "quod per alium sensum delectat," from which Stephens would elicit τούτῳ. He should have suggested τούτων—as I have translated.

⁶³ The word ἀμ' has twice dropt out between ἴστω and ἡδὺ.

Hip. By all means.

Soc. ⁶⁴ Does then, he will say, any pleasure whatever differ from any other pleasure whatever in this, namely, in being a pleasure? For (I ask not) whether any pleasure is greater or less, or more or less; but whether any one differs by this very thing, in one of the pleasures being a pleasure, but the other not a pleasure. Does it not seem so to us?

Hip. For it does not seem so.⁶⁴

Soc. For some other reason then, he will say, than because they are pleasures, have ye selected these from all the rest; and having some such view with regard to both, that they differ in some respect from the rest, did ye not, looking to this, say that they are beautiful? For seeing is surely not a beautiful thing on this account, that it is through seeing. For, if this were the reason of its being beautiful, the other pleasure ⁶⁵ [that through hearing] ⁶⁵ would not be beautiful, ⁶⁶ as not partaking of that which is peculiar to the sense of seeing.⁶⁶ Shall we say, you speak the truth?

Hip. We will.

[45.] Soc. Nor, on the other hand, is the pleasure through the hearing beautiful on this account, that it is through hearing. For then that through seeing would not be beautiful, ⁶⁷ as not partaking of that which is peculiar to the sense of hearing.⁶⁷ Shall we say, Hippias, that the man, in speaking so, speaks correctly?

Hip. Yes, correctly.

Soc. But both, he will rejoin, are beautiful, as you assert. For so we say.

^{64—64} Such is the literal version of the Greek, which is manifestly corrupt.

^{65—65} The words within brackets, ἡ διὰ τῆς ἀκοῆς, are evidently an explanation of ἑρίπα.

^{66—66} So Sydenham; thus adopting the correction of Cornarius, οὐκ οὐσα ἑρί γε, which was suggested, probably, by the version of Ficinus, "cum per visum nequaquam efficiatur." The Greek is, καλή· οὐκ οὖν ἔστι γε δι' ὁψews ἡδονή: from whence it is easy to elicit, as I did many years ago, what the sense requires, καλή· ἢ οὐ κοινόν ἐστὶ τι τῇ τε δι' ὁψews ἡδονῇ, i. e. "to which there is nothing in common with the pleasure of sight:" and a similar correction is requisite in § 45, where a similar idea occurs.

^{67—67} See the preceding note.

Hip. We do.

Soc. They have then something in common and the same, which causes them to be beautiful, and which belongs to both conjointly, and severally to each. For otherwise they would not be beautiful conjointly and severally. Give to me a reply, as if to him.

Hip. I answer, that it appears to me as you say.

Soc. If then these pleasures, taken conjointly, are affected by any circumstance, but not so, if taken separately, they could not, at least under that circumstance, be beautiful.

Hip. How could it be possible, Socrates, that when neither are affected by any circumstance whatever, that both should be affected by that ⁶⁶[by which neither is affected] ? ⁶⁸

Soc. You think it is impossible.

Hip. ⁶⁹Yes; for a great want of acquaintance with the nature of those things would possess me, and of speaking the present speeches. ⁶⁹

[46.] Soc. (You speak) pleasantly, Hippias. ⁷⁰ For I am in danger equally of fancying I see something so circumstanced, as you aver to be impossible; but yet I see nothing (clearly). ⁷¹

Hip. You are in no danger, Socrates; but you very readily look aside. ⁷²

⁶⁶⁻⁶⁸ The words within brackets are an evident interpolation, and were properly omitted by Ficinus in his version, "ut, quod neutra illarum patitur, ambæ perpetiantur." Nor is this the only error here. For in one of the best MSS. are found the remains of the following words, which ought to close the next speech of Hippias: Εἰ γὰρ ἕκασται, δῆλον ὅτι καὶ ἀμφοτέραι πεπονθυῖαι ἀν εἰεν, i. e. For if each had been so circumstanced, it is evident both would have been.

⁷² The Greek is ὁρῶ δὲ οὐδέν. Perhaps δ' εἰ should be read for δὲ. Compare Eurip. Phœn. 165, Ὅρῶ δ' ἤτ' οὐ σαφῶς ὁρῶ δὲ πως. Heracl. 495, λέγει μὲν οὐ σαφῶς, λέγει δὲ πως.

⁷³ Here again I have restored in my edition what Plato probably wrote. Stalbaum's version is, "you purposely neglect the true reason;" but ἰτοίμως does not mean "purposely;" nor is there any thing in the Greek to answer to "true reason."

Soc. ⁷³ And yet many things of such a kind appear to me before my soul.⁷³ But I distrust them; because they do not present themselves to you, who have made the most money of all now famed for wisdom, but only to myself, who have never made any. And I have an idea, my friend, that you are playing with me, ⁷⁴ and are willingly deceiving me; such strong and so many.⁷⁴

Hip. No one will know better than yourself, Socrates, whether I am playing with you or not, if you will only endeavour to tell me, what are those things that have presented themselves to you. For you will be seen to say nothing to the purpose. For you will never find that both of us have been affected by circumstances together, by which neither you nor I have been separately.

Soc. How say you, Hippias? But perhaps you are speaking something to the purpose, and I do not understand it. Do you then hear from me what I wish to state more clearly.⁷⁵ For it appears to me, that what neither I have been under the circumstance of being, nor am, nor, on the other hand, what you are under such a circumstance, it is possible for both to be; and on the other hand, that other things, which both of us are under the circumstance of being, neither of us are.⁷⁵

[47.] Hip. You appear to me, Socrates, to exhibit in your answers again⁷⁶ still greater wonders than when you answered before. For just consider, if both of us were just, would not each of us be so? or if each unjust, would not both be so? if both were in health, would not each be so? or if each were wearied, or wounded, or struck, or were affected in any other way whatever, would not both of us be affected in the same⁷⁷ way? Still further, if both of us happened to be made of gold, or silver, or ivory, or if you will, well-born, or wise, or held in honour, or old, or [young],⁷⁸ or in any state you will, incident to man, is there not a great necessity for each to be so?

⁷³⁻⁷⁵ and ⁷⁴⁻⁷⁶ On both of these passages I must again refer the reader to the notes in my edition. For they are too long, and perhaps too learned, for the present work; especially as I could now add not a little to confirm the views there brought forward.

⁷⁶⁻⁷⁸ Such is the literal version of the Greek, with which Stalbaum, in ed. 2, is satisfied; although, in ed. 1, he had transcribed Heindorf's note, who saw with Sydenham that there was something wrong here. But they do not appear to have seen that the train of ideas was originally something to this effect: "For it appears to me that, what neither I nor you have suffered, and what neither I am nor you are, this it is possible for both of us to suffer and to be; and on the other hand, what both of us have suffered and are, for neither of us to have suffered and to be."

Soc. Most assuredly.

[48.] Hip. But neither do you, Socrates, consider things as wholes, nor do they, with whom you are wont to converse. For taking separately the beautiful and each of things existing, you discuss it in your discourses, cutting it into fractions; and hence things of great size, and of continuous⁷⁹ length escape your observation. And to such an extent have they escaped you now, that you conceive there is something, either circumstance or being, which, as regards two things taken jointly, does exist, but does not, as regards them taken singly; or on the other hand, does exist, as regards each, taken singly, but not as regards both, taken jointly. So illogically, and inconsiderately, and sillily, and unreflectingly, do you conduct yourselves.

Soc. Such is our condition, Hippias. It is not what a man wishes, say the persons using every where the proverb,⁸⁰ but what he can. But⁸¹ you are always assisting us with your admo-

⁷⁷ The Greek is εὐθὺς—But “idem,” in Ficinus, leads to ταὐτὸ—

⁷⁸ “The words ἡ νῆος are omitted by three MSS. correctly; for neither Socrates nor Hippias were young when the dialogue is supposed to have taken place. Should it however be said that the qualities, thus brought forward as examples, have been taken at random, it may be replied that Plato is not wont to speak without some definite design. In the words χρυσοί, ἀργυροί, and ἐλεφάντινοι there is an allusion to the subjects discussed in § 23; while in the words γενναῖοι, σοφοί, τίμιοι, γέροντες, Hippias alludes to himself as being of a good family, wise, honoured, and aged.” Such is the note I wrote many years ago. But instead of rejecting ἡ νῆος entirely, I would now consider γέροντες νῆος as an explanation of ἡμογέροντες, restored again to Plato in Euthyd. p. 272, § 3, by myself in Poppo’s Prolegom. p. 219.

⁷⁹ “In considering any subject, Plato is wont to speak of it in general terms, and then to divide it into its several species; and after distinguishing each species by its peculiar character, to arrive at the real nature of the thing in question.” So remarks Sydenham; who might have referred for a notable instance of this method, to the Sophist and Statesman throughout, but more especially the latter, p. 258, B. § 2.

⁸⁰ The proverb in Greek was—Ζῶμεν γὰρ οὐχ ὥς θέλομεν ἀλλ’ ὥς δυνάμεθα, translated by Terence, “Ut quimus, aiunt; quando, ut volumus, non licet.”

⁸¹ I confess I cannot perceive here the requisite train of thought.

nitions. Since even now, ⁸² before I had been thus admonished by you how sillily we conduct ourselves, shall I give ⁸² you still a plainer proof, by stating what were our thoughts upon those points? or shall I not?

Hip. You will speak to one who knows already, Socrates. For I am conversant with each one of those who are engaged in disputations, and how they are situated. Still, if it is more agreeable to yourself, say on.

Soc. To me indeed it will be more agreeable. For we were, thou best of men, so silly before you said so of us, as to conceive with regard to myself and you, that each of us was one person, and that both could not be what each was; for we are not one, but two persons. Such a simpleton was I! [49.] But now we have been taught the contrary, that if both together are two persons, each of us also is of necessity two; and that if each of us be one, it is necessary for both of us to be one. For by a continuous argument (respecting) being, ⁸³ it is not possible, according to Hippias, for it to be otherwise; but now having been persuaded by you, that whatever both of two things are, this too each of them is, I sit down here. ⁸⁴ But first remind ⁸⁵ me, Hippias, whether you and I are one, you and I together; or you are two, and I two.

Hip. What mean you, Socrates?

Soc. What I say. For I am afraid to speak plainly to you, ⁸⁶ because you are harsh with me, whenever you seem to yourself ⁸⁷ to speak something to the purpose. ⁸⁷ But

⁸³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, διανεκεῖ λόγῳ τῆς οὐσίας. But Sydenham's, though less literal, is more intelligible, "by reason of the continuity of being."

⁸⁴ Between ἐνθάδε and κάθημαι has dropt out, I suspect, κάνθων, "a pannier'd ass." The word is found in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 179, and Εἰρ. 81, while its synonyme ὄνος is seen in the proverb alluded to in Plato Theæt. p. 146, A., ὃ δὲ ἀμαρτῶν καὶ θεῶν ἂν ἀσι ἀμαρτάνῃ, καθιδέεται, ὡς περ φασὶν οἱ παῖδες οἱ σφαιρίζοντες, ὄνος.

⁸⁵ Instead of ὑπόμνησον, which can hardly suit with πότερον, I suggested long ago ὑπομήνυσον, similar to "memora," in Ficinus.

⁸⁶ In lieu of σε Heindorf suggested σοί, answering to "coram te," in Ficinus.

⁸⁷⁻⁸⁷ But this could be no reason for Hippias having a harsh feeling towards Socrates. What Plato probably wrote may be seen in my edition.

however tell me, is not each of us one? and so affected as to be one?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. If then each of us be one, each of us must be also odd. Or think you that one is not an odd number?

Hip. I think it is.

Soc. Are we then both odd, being two?

Hip. This, Socrates, could not be.

Soc. But both together are even. Is it not so?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. Now, because both together are even, is each of us on this account even?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. It is not then necessary, as you said just now, that what we both are together, we should be singly; and that, what each is, we should both be.

Hip. Not in these cases, but in those I spoke of before.

[50.] Soc. These are sufficient, Hippias; for we must be content with these, since it appears that some things are so, but others not. For I stated, if you remember, at the point from whence this conversation diverged,⁸⁸ that the pleasures through the sight, and through hearing, could not be beautiful in that, by which each happened to be affected (singly) and not both (jointly), or both (jointly) and not each (singly), but by what they were affected jointly and singly. And hence you admitted that both together and each singly were beautiful. On this account then I conceived that, by the existence which follows upon both, they ought, if both were beautiful, to be themselves⁸⁹ beautiful; but not by the existence wanting to the other.⁹⁰ And I think so still. But tell me, as if at the beginning (of our inquiry), if the pleasure through the sight and that through hearing are beautiful, both (jointly) and each (singly), does not that, which makes them so, follow on both (jointly) and each (singly).

Hip. Certainly.

⁸⁸ The MSS. vary between ἐλίσθη, ἐλίσθη, and ἐλίσθη. Plato wrote, as I have translated, ἐπλάγχθη.

⁸⁹ Instead of αὐτὰ the train of thought evidently requires ἑαυτὰ, "each."

⁹⁰ In lieu of ἑαυτὰ, Sydenham correctly suggested ἑκάτερα. Stalbaum translates ἑαυτὰ "alterutrum." But such is not its meaning in correct Greek.

Soc. Is it then because each singly is a pleasure, and both too jointly, that they are beautiful? Or on this account alone,⁹¹ because all the other pleasures would be in no respect less beautiful? For, if you remember, the latter were shown to be pleasures no less than the former.

Hip. I remember it well.

[51.] Soc. But because these are through the sight and hearing, on that account it was asserted they were beautiful.

Hip. It was so asserted.

Soc. See now, whether I speak the truth. It was stated, as my memory serves me, not that the pleasurable of every kind was beautiful; but such as was through the sight and hearing.

Hip. It is true.

Soc. Does not this circumstance then attend on both taken together? but not on each taken singly? ⁹² For by no means does each of them, as was said before, exist through both, but both through both, and each not.⁹² Is it so?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Each of them is not beautiful through that which does not attend each. For the both does not attend upon (the) either.⁹³ So that we can by the hypothesis call both beautiful, but we cannot (call) either so. Or how say we? Is it not of necessity so?

Hip. So it appears.

[52.] Soc. Shall we then say that both are beautiful, but deny that each is so?

Hip. What is to prevent it?

Soc. This seems to me, my friend, to prevent it; ⁹⁴ because there were to us some things so appertaining to each, that, if they appertained to both, (they would appertain)⁹⁴ likewise

⁹¹ Instead of μὲν, which has no meaning here, Plato doubtless wrote μόνον—

⁹²⁻⁹³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which is evidently corrupt.

⁹³ Before ἐκάρτεω the article τῷ has dropt. Compare § 52, τὸ ἐκάρτεον καὶ τὸ ἀμφοτέρων.

⁹⁴⁻⁹⁴ Ficinus has—"ut, si ambobus adsunt, adsint et singulis"—thus showing that he found supplied in his MS. the very words requisite for the sense and syntax—εἴπερ—ἐπιγίγνυντο, ἐπιγίγνυντ' ἀν—

to each; and, if to each,⁹⁵ to both likewise—all such you went through.⁹⁶ Is it not so?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. ⁹⁶ But what I went through, (were) not so; of which was itself the each and the both.⁹⁶ Is it so?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Of what kind then, Hippias, does the beautiful seem to you? whether, as you asserted, that if I and you are strong, both are so; and if I and you are just, both are so; and if both, so too is each; and similarly, if I and you are beautiful, both are so; and if both, so too is each? Or is there nothing to prevent it; as (in the case of numbers, where) some things taken together being even, may be, when taken ⁹⁶ singly, odd, and perhaps even:⁹⁷ or, when each, being taken separately, is perhaps irrational, but taken both together may be rational, or perhaps irrational,⁹⁸ and there are other things of this kind infinite in number, which I said presented themselves to me. [53.] Now, on which side do you place the beautiful? On that, as it appears to me, or to yourself. For it appears to me a great absurdity, for both of us to be beautiful, yet each of us not so; or for each to be beautiful, yet both not so; or as regards any other thing whatever of such a kind. Do you choose (to say)⁹⁹ in this way or that?

Hip. In this way, Socrates.

Soc. And you do wisely, Hippias, in order that we may be freed from a further search. For, if any of these things is the beautiful, the pleasurable, which comes through the sight and hearing, would no longer be the beautiful; for (the plea-

⁹⁵⁻⁹⁶ The error in these words is corrected in the notes to my edition.

⁹⁶⁻⁹⁸ To point out all the difficulties in the words between the numerals, and how they might be overcome, would require a longer note than is suited to this place.

⁹⁷ For instance, the two odd numbers, seven and three, together make the even number, ten; and the two even numbers, six and four, make the very same number. S.

⁹⁸⁻⁹⁹ "Surd" quantities are called in Greek ἀρρητα or ἀλογα, and in Latin "irrationales." To illustrate this passage Heindorf justly says that $\sqrt{3}$ and $\sqrt{6}$ are ἀρρητα; but $\sqrt{3+6}$ is ρητόν. Sydenham, he observes, translated ῥητά and ἀρρητα by "commensurable and incommensurable;" but that would be in Greek σύμμετρα and ἀσύμμετρα.

⁹⁹ Instead of αἰπεῖ, the two best MSS. read ἱπεῖ, which leads to αἰπεῖ ἱπεῖν—surable)¹ that comes through the sight and hearing, causes both, taken together, to be beautiful; but not either singly. This however cannot be, as I and you, Hippias, have agreed.

Hip. We have agreed.

Soc. It is impossible then for that, which is pleasurable through the sight and hearing, to be the beautiful; since a thing being produced as beautiful exhibits something of the impossible.

Hip. Such is the case.

Soc. Say then again from the beginning, he will say, since you have erred in this, what, say you, is that beauty, which (attends) upon both these pleasures, for the sake of which you honoured them before the others, and called them beautiful? [54.] To me, Hippias, there seems a necessity to say, that these are of all pleasures the most harmless,² and the best, taken together and singly. Or have you to state any thing else, by which they are different from other pleasures?

Hip. By no means: for they are in reality the best.

Soc. This then, he will say, do you now assert the beautiful to be, namely, pleasure that is advantageous? So it seems, I shall answer. But what you?

Hip. I too (the same).

Soc. Is not then, he will say, the advantageous that, which is the efficient of good? Now the efficient, as shown lately, is a thing different from the effect; and the reasoning has now³ come to you to the former reasoning;³ for neither would the good be a beautiful thing, nor would the beautiful be a good thing; since each of these⁴ is something else.⁴ This we shall more than all assert, if, Hippias, we are of sound mind. For it is surely not just not to agree with him, who speaks correctly.

¹ The word ἡδὺ has probably dropt out between τὸ and δι', as is shown by the train of thought.

² What are here called ἀσινίσταται are described as ἀβλαβεῖς in Rep. ii: p. 257, D., and καθαρὰι in Phileb. p. 66, C.

³ Ficinus has "relabimur," in Greek ἀνήκει: while in ἡκεῖ ὅμιν lies hid ἡκεῖ ἐνελούμενος, as in English, "reasoning in a circle."

[55.] Hip. But what, Socrates, do you conceive to be all this, taken together? They are the parings and snippings, as I said just now, of reasonings, separated into little bits. But that is a thing both beautiful and of great worth, to be able to put together well and beautifully a speech before a court of justice, or the Council-Hall, or any other official tribunal, before whom the speech may be addressed; and after producing conviction, to depart, carrying off not the least, but the greatest, of prizes, in the preservation of oneself and one's own property, and that of one's friends. These then you ought to lay hold of, and to bid adieu to such petty disputes, in order that you may not seem to be a simpleton, by taking, as just now, trifles and inanities in hand.

Soc. You, my dear Hippias, are a happy man; for you know what pursuits a simpleton⁵ should follow, and have followed them, as you say, sufficiently.⁶ But the misfortune of an evil genius, as it seems, lays hold of me, who am wandering continually and in doubt. For when I make a display of my doubts before you wise men, I am ever bespattered with dirt by you⁷ when I make a display. [56.] For ye tell me⁷ what you tell me now, that I busy myself about matters foolish, trivial, and worthless. But when, on the other hand, convinced by you, I say as ye do, that it is by far the best thing to be able to put together well and beautifully a speech, and to go through it before a court of justice, or any other concourse of people, I hear myself ill spoken of in all ways, both by some others here, but especially from that person, who is always confuting me; for he happens to be my nearest of kin, and lives in the same house.⁸ Whenever then I enter

⁷— There are several errors in the words between the numerals.

⁸ Stalbaum justly remarks, that Socrates here discovers himself to be the fictitious person so frequently alluded to. Hence we must read, ἐγγύτατα γίνους καὶ ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ οἰκῇ ἄν: where οἶκος means not only the house for the body, but for the soul likewise; for such the body was supposed to be. See at Phileb. § 54, n. 52. Add Etymol. M. Σῶμα οἰοῖται δῶμα τῆς ψυχῆς.

my dwelling ⁹[at home],⁹ and he hears me talking in this way, he asks me if I do not feel a shame in presuming to converse about beautiful pursuits, after I have been so clearly convicted, that on the subject of the beautiful I do not know what it is in the abstract. And how then, says he, will you know, who has put together a beautiful speech or not, or (done) any other (beautiful) act, while knowing nothing of the beautiful? and when you are in such a situation, think you it is better for you to live than to die? Thus it has happened, as I told you, for me to hear myself ill-spoken of, and reproached by you, and to be abused by him. But, perhaps I must endure all this; for nothing is out of place, if only I am benefited; and benefited, Hippias, I think I am by my intercourse with both of you. For I seem to myself to understand what the proverb¹⁰ means, "difficult are the beautiful."

⁹— The word οἰκᾶς is an evident interpretation of εἰς ἑαυτοῦ.

¹⁰ To this proverb Plato has alluded in Rep. iv. p. 435, C., vi. p. 497, D., and Cratyl. p. 384, A. § 2. But as καλὰ in the proverb means elsewhere "honourable," but here "beautiful," Socrates advisedly says he seems to understand, that which was otherwise plain enough.

same⁷⁷ way? Still further, if both of us happened to be made of gold, or silver, or ivory, or if you will, well-born, or wise, or held in honour, or old, or [young],⁷⁸ or in any state you will, incident to man, is there not a great necessity for each to be so?

Soc. Most assuredly.

⁷⁸ “The words ἡ νέοι are omitted by three MSS. correctly; for neither Socrates nor Hippias were young when the dialogue is supposed to have taken place. Should it however be said that the qualities, thus brought forward as examples, have been taken at random, it may be replied that Plato is not wont to speak without some definite design. But instead of rejecting ἡ νέοι entirely, I would now consider γέροντες νέοι as an explanation of ὁμογέροντες, restored again to Plato in Euthyd. p. 272, § 3, by myself in Poppo’s Prolegom. p. 219.

⁷⁹ “In considering any subject, Plato is wont to speak of it in general terms, and then to divide it into its several species; and after distinguishing each species by its peculiar character, to arrive at the real nature of the thing in question.” So remarks Sydenham; who might have referred for a notable instance of this method, to the Sophist and Statesman throughout, but more especially the latter, p. 258, B. § 2.

⁸⁰ The proverb in Greek was—Ζῶμεν γὰρ οὐχ ὥς θέλομεν ἀλλ’ ὥς δυνάμεθα, translated by Terence, “Ut quimus, aiunt; quando, ut volumus, non licet.”

⁸¹ I confess I cannot perceive here the requisite train of thought.

⁸²⁻⁸³ This is rather strange language, "Before I had—shall I." There is some error here. Perhaps Plato—ἵν' ἂν τὸ πρὶν ὑπὸ σοῦ ταῦτ' εὖ νοουθετηθῇναι φανῶ, i. e. "in order that I may be shown to have been properly admonished thus by you."

⁸³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, διανεκεῖ λόγῳ τῆς οὐσίας. But Sydenham's, though less literal, is more intelligible, "by reason of the continuity of being."

⁸⁴ Between ἐνθάδε and κάθημαι has dropt out, I suspect, κάνθων, "a pannier'd ass." The word is found in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 179, and Εἰρ. 81, while its synonyme ὄνος is seen in the proverb alluded to in Plato Theætet. p. 146, A., ὁ δὲ ἀμαρτὸν καὶ θεὸς ἂν αἰεὶ ἀμαρτάνῃ, καθιδέϊται, ὥσπερ φασὶν οἱ παῖδες οἱ σφαιρίζοντες, ὄνος.

⁸⁵ Instead of ὑπόμνησον, which can hardly suit with πότερον, I suggested long ago ὑπομήνυσον, similar to "memora," in Ficinus.

⁸⁶ In lieu of σε Heindorf suggested σοι, answering to "coram te," in Ficinus.

⁸⁷⁻⁸⁷ But this could be no reason for Hippias having a harsh feeling towards Socrates. What Plato probably wrote may be seen in my edition.

however tell me, is not each of us one? and so affected as to be one?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. If then each of us be one, each of us must be also odd. Or think you that one is not an odd number?

Hip. I think it is.

Soc. Are we then both odd, being two?

Hip. This, Socrates, could not be.

Soc. But both together are even. Is it not so?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. Now, because both together are even, is each of us on this account even?

Hip. Certainly not.

Soc. It is not then necessary, as you said just now, that what we both are together, we should be singly; and that, what each is, we should both be.

Hip. Not in these cases, but in those I spoke of before.

[50.] Soc. These are sufficient, Hippias; for we must be content with these, since it appears that some things are so, but others not. For I stated, if you remember, at the point from whence this conversation diverged,⁸⁸ that the pleasures through the sight, and through hearing, could not be beautiful in that, by which each happened to be affected (singly) and not both (jointly), or both (jointly) and not each (singly), but by what they were affected jointly and singly. And hence you admitted that both together and each singly were beautiful. On this account then I conceived that, by the existence which follows upon both, they ought, if both were beautiful, to be themselves⁸⁹ beautiful; but not by the existence wanting to the other.⁹⁰ And I think so still. But tell me, as if at the beginning (of our inquiry), if the pleasure through the sight and that through hearing are beautiful, both (jointly) and each (singly), does not that, which makes them so, follow on both (jointly) and each (singly).

Hip. Certainly.

⁸⁸ The MSS. vary between ἐλίσθη, ἐλίχθη, and ἡλίσθη. Plato wrote, as I have translated, ἐπλάγχθη.

⁸⁹ Instead of αὐτὰ the train of thought evidently requires ἑαυτὰ, "each."

⁹⁰ In lieu of ἑτερα, Sydenham correctly suggested ἐκἑτερα. Stalbaum translates ἑτερα "alterutrum." But such is not its meaning in correct Greek.

Soc. Is it then because each singly is a pleasure, and both too jointly, that they are beautiful? Or on this account alone,⁹¹ because all the other pleasures would be in no respect less beautiful? For, if you remember, the latter were shown to be pleasures no less than the former.

Hip. I remember it well.

[51.] Soc. But because these are through the sight and hearing, on that account it was asserted they were beautiful.

Hip. It was so asserted.

Soc. See now, whether I speak the truth. It was stated, as my memory serves me, not that the pleasurable of every kind was beautiful; but such as was through the sight and hearing.

Hip. It is true.

Soc. Does not this circumstance then attend on both taken together? but not on each taken singly? ⁹² For by no means does each of them, as was said before, exist through both, but both through both, and each not.⁹² Is it so?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Each of them is not beautiful through that which does not attend each. For the both does not attend upon (the) either.⁹³ So that we can by the hypothesis call both beautiful, but we cannot (call) either so. Or how say we? Is it not of necessity so?

Hip. So it appears.

[52.] Soc. Shall we then say that both are beautiful, but deny that each is so?

Hip. What is to prevent it?

Soc. This seems to me, my friend, to prevent it; ⁹⁴ because there were to us some things so appertaining to each, that, if they appertained to both, (they would appertain)⁹⁴ likewise

⁹¹ Instead of μὲν, which has no meaning here, Plato doubtless wrote μόνον—

⁹²⁻⁹³ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which is evidently corrupt.

⁹³ Before ἐκείνῳ the article τῷ has dropt. Compare § 52, τὸ ἐκείρον καὶ τὸ ἀμφοτέρων.

⁹⁴⁻⁹⁵ Ficinus has—"ut, si ambobus adsunt, adsint et singulis"—thus showing that he found supplied in his MS. the very words requisite for the sense and syntax—εἰπερ—ἐπιγίγνυντο, ἐπιγίγνυντ' ἄν— to each; and, if to each,⁹⁵ to both likewise—all such you went through.⁹⁶ Is it not so?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. ⁹⁶But what I went through, (were) not so; of which was itself the each and the both.⁹⁶ Is it so?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Of what kind then, Hippias, does the beautiful seem to you? whether, as you asserted, that if I and you are strong, both are so; and if I and you are just, both are so; and if both, so too is each; and similarly, if I and you are beautiful, both are so; and if both, so too is each? Or is there nothing to prevent it; as (in the case of numbers, where) some things taken together being even, may be, when taken⁹⁷ singly, odd, and perhaps even:⁹⁷ or, when each, being taken separately, is perhaps irrational, but taken both together may be rational, or perhaps irrational,⁹⁸ and there are other things of this kind infinite in number, which I said presented themselves to me. [53.] Now, on which side do you place the beautiful? On that, as it appears to me, or to yourself. For it appears to me a great absurdity, for both of us to be beautiful, yet each of us not so; or for each to be beautiful, yet both not so; or as regards any other thing whatever of such a kind. Do you choose (to say)⁹⁹ in this way or that?

Hip. In this way, Socrates.

Soc. And you do wisely, Hippias, in order that we may be freed from a further search. For, if any of these things is the beautiful, the pleasurable, which comes through the sight and hearing, would no longer be the beautiful; for (the plea-

⁹⁵⁻⁹⁶ The error in these words is corrected in the notes to my edition.

⁹⁶⁻⁹⁸ To point out all the difficulties in the words between the numerals, and how they might be overcome, would require a longer note than is suited to this place.

⁹⁷ For instance, the two odd numbers, seven and three, together make the even number, ten; and the two even numbers, six and four, make the very same number. S.

⁹⁸⁻⁹⁹ "Surd" quantities are called in Greek ἄρρητα or ἄλογα, and in Latin "irrationales." To illustrate this passage Heindorf justly says that $\sqrt{3}$ and $\sqrt{6}$ are ἄρρητα; but $\sqrt{3} + \sqrt{6}$ is ῥητόν. Sydenham, he observes, translated ῥητόν and ἄρρητα by "commensurable and incommensurable;" but that would be in Greek σύμμετρα and ἀσύμμετρα.

⁹⁹ Instead of αἰεῖ, the two best MSS. read ἐπεῖ, which leads to αἰεῖ ἐπεῖν— surable)¹ that comes through the sight and hearing, causes both, taken together, to be beautiful; but not either singly. This however cannot be, as I and you, Hippias, have agreed.

Hip. We have agreed.

Soc. It is impossible then for that, which is pleasurable through the sight and hearing, to be the beautiful; since a thing being produced as beautiful exhibits something of the impossible.

Hip. Such is the case.

Soc. Say then again from the beginning, he will say, since you have erred in this, what, say you, is that beauty, which (attends) upon both these pleasures, for the sake of which you honoured them before the others, and called them beautiful? [54.] To me, Hippias, there seems a necessity to say, that these are of all pleasures the most harmless,² and the best, taken together and singly. Or have you to state any thing else, by which they are different from other pleasures?

Hip. By no means: for they are in reality the best.

Soc. This then, he will say, do you now assert the beautiful to be, namely, pleasure that is advantageous? So it seems, I shall answer. But what you?

Hip. I too (the same).

Soc. Is not then, he will say, the advantageous that, which is the efficient of good? Now the efficient, as shown lately, is a thing different from the effect; and the reasoning has now ³come to you to the former reasoning;³ for neither would the good be a beautiful thing, nor would the beautiful be a good thing; since each of these ⁴is something else.⁴ This we shall more than all assert, if, Hippias, we are of sound mind. For it is surely not just not to agree with him, who speaks correctly.

¹ The word ἡδὺ has probably dropt out between τὸ and δι', as is shown by the train of thought.

² What are here called ἀσινίσταται are described as ἀβλαβεῖς in Rep. ii: p. 257, D., and καθαπαί in Phileb. p. 66, C.

³ Ficinus has "relabimur," in Greek ἀνήκει: while in ἡκεῖ ὑμῖν lies hid ἡκεῖ κυκλοῦμενος, as in English, "reasoning in a circle."

[55.] Hip. But what, Socrates, do you conceive to be all this, taken together? They are the parings and snippings, as I said just now, of reasonings, separated into little bits. But that is a thing both beautiful and of great worth, to be able to put together well and beautifully a speech before a court of justice, or the Council-Hall, or any other official tribunal, before whom the speech may be addressed; and after producing conviction, to depart, carrying off not the least, but the greatest, of prizes, in the preservation of oneself and one's own property, and that of one's friends. These then you ought to lay hold of, and to bid adieu to such petty disputes, in order that you may not seem to be a simpleton, by taking, as just now, trifles and inanities in hand.

Soc. You, my dear Hippias, are a happy man; for you know what pursuits a simpleton⁵ should follow, and have followed them, as you say, sufficiently.⁶ But the misfortune of an evil genius, as it seems, lays hold of me, who am wandering continually and in doubt. For when I make a display of my doubts before you wise men, I am ever bespattered with dirt by you⁷ when I make a display. [56.] For ye tell me⁷ what you tell me now, that I busy myself about matters foolish, trivial, and worthless. But when, on the other hand, convinced by you, I say as ye do, that it is by far the best thing to be able to put together well and beautifully a speech, and to go through it before a court of justice, or any other concourse of people, I hear myself ill spoken of in all ways, both by some others here, but especially from that person, who is always confuting me; for he happens to be my nearest of kin, and lives in the same house.⁸ Whenever then I enter

⁷— There are several errors in the words between the numerals.

⁸ Stalbaum justly remarks, that Socrates here discovers himself to be the fictitious person so frequently alluded to. Hence we must read, ἑγγύτατα γίνους καὶ ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ οἴκῳ ἄν: where οἶκος means not only the house for the body, but for the soul likewise; for such the body was supposed to be. See at Phileb. § 54, n. 52. Add Etymol. M. Σῶμα· οἶονεῖ δῶμα τῆς ψυχῆς.

my dwelling ⁹[at home],⁹ and he hears me talking in this way, he asks me if I do not feel a shame in presuming to converse about beautiful pursuits, after I have been so clearly convicted, that on the subject of the beautiful I do not know what it is in the abstract. And how then, says he, will you know, who has put together a beautiful speech or not, or (done) any other (beautiful) act, while knowing nothing of the beautiful? and when you are in such a situation, think you it is better for you to live than to die? Thus it has happened, as I told you, for me to hear myself ill-spoken of, and reproached by you, and to be abused by him. But, perhaps I must endure all this; for nothing is out of place, if only I am benefited; and benefited, Hippias, I think I am by my intercourse with both of you. For I seem to myself to understand what the proverb¹⁰ means, "difficult are the beautiful."

⁹— The word oikade is an evident interpretation of εἰς ἑμαυτὸν.

¹⁰ To this proverb Plato has alluded in Rep. iv. p. 435, C., vi. p. 497, D., and Cratyl. p. 384, A. § 2. But as καλὰ in the proverb means elsewhere "honourable," but here "beautiful," Socrates advisedly says he seems to understand, that which was otherwise plain enough.

INTRODUCTION TO THE HIPPIAS MINOR.

AFTER showing, in the Hippias Major, that the very person, who had written and spoken on "the beautiful," had very confused ideas on that question taken in detail, and knew nothing at all of it when considered abstractedly, Plato has, in the Hippias Minor, represented Socrates as pursuing with no less keenness, though with scarcely equal vigour, the same unhappy Sophist, at the very moment when he was thought by his admirers to have made a more than ordinarily brilliant display of his intellectual powers.

Schleiermacher and Ast have condemned this dialogue as spurious; though of the reasons which have led them to this conclusion, I know nothing; nor can I imagine even what they are. They do not appear, however, to have been very convincing; for they have been called in question by Socher, and rejected by Stalbaum. For both these scholars knew, what Sydenham was the first to remark, that Aristotle has alluded, covertly, as usual, to a paralogism introduced into this dialogue; and that Cicero obtained from the same source his knowledge of some circumstances in the life of Hippias, which it is not likely he found elsewhere. And hence it is fair to infer, as I stated in the Introduction to the Menexenus, where something similar occurs, that, if the dialogue were not written by Plato himself, it must be the production of one, who could imitate his style so completely, as to evade detection, till more than two thousand years had elapsed after the commission of the forgery. Winckelmann however conceives that the Hippias Minor was written by Antisthenes, to whom has been attributed the Second Alcibiades; while Zeller, in his "Platonische Studien," Tübing. 1839, agrees with Schleiermacher in considering it as not a genuine production of Plato.

HIPPIAS MINOR.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

EUDICUS, SOCRATES, HIPPIAS.

EUDICUS.

[1.] WHY, Socrates, are you so silent, after Hippias has made such a display? and why do you not either join in the praise of what has been said, or confute it, if he seems to you to have spoken any thing not correctly; especially since we are left by ourselves, we, who would lay an especial claim to share in an exercise relating to philosophy.

Soc. There are indeed, Eudicus, some things, which I would gladly inquire of Hippias, touching the points, of which he has just now been treating, relating to Homer. For I have heard from your father Apēmantus, that the Iliad of Homer is a more beautiful poem than the Odyssey; and so much the more beautiful, as Achilles is a better man than Ulysses; for each of those poems, he said, was composed, one in honour of Ulysses, and the other in that of Achilles. If then it is agreeable to Hippias, I would gladly inquire on this very point, what he thinks of those two persons, and which of them he says was the better man; especially since he has exhibited a great variety of other matter, relating to other poets, and to Homer likewise.

[2.] Eud. Nay, it is evident that Hippias will not grudge you an answer, if you ask him a question. If Socrates puts a question to you, Hippias, will you give him an answer; or how will you act?

Hip. I should act in a shocking manner, Eudicus, were

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

EUDICUS, SOCRATES, HIPPIAS.

EUDICUS.

[1.] WHY, Socrates, are you so silent, after Hippias has made such a display? and why do you not either join in the praise of what has been said, or confute it, if he seems to you to have spoken any thing not correctly; especially since we are left by ourselves, we, who would lay an especial claim to share in an exercise relating to philosophy.

Soc. There are indeed, Eudicus, some things, which I would gladly inquire of Hippias, touching the points, of which he has just now been treating, relating to Homer. For I have heard from your father Apēmantus, that the Iliad of Homer is a more beautiful poem than the Odyssey; and so much the more beautiful, as Achilles is a better man than Ulysses; for each of those poems, he said, was composed, one in honour of Ulysses, and the other in that of Achilles. If then it is agreeable to Hippias, I would gladly inquire on this very point, what he thinks of those two persons, and which of them he says was the better man; especially since he has exhibited a great variety of other matter, relating to other poets, and to Homer likewise.

[2.] Eud. Nay, it is evident that Hippias will not grudge you an answer, if you ask him a question. If Socrates puts a question to you, Hippias, will you give him an answer; or how will you act?

Hip. I should act in a shocking manner, Eudicus, were

I now to fly from a question put by Socrates—I, who, when I go from my home at Elis up to Olympia to the general meeting of the Greeks, at the period of the Olympic games, constantly offer myself at the temple to speak upon any point that any person may wish, relating to the subject which has been prepared for my display, and to give a reply to any one upon any question he may put.

Soc. Your case, Hippias, is a happy one indeed, if at each Olympic festival you arrive at the temple, so full of hope touching the cleverness connected with the soul. For I should marvel much, if any one of those engaged in bodily contests came thither to contend in the body with so little fear, and with so much confidence, as you say you do, in the case of intellect.

Hip. With reason, Socrates, is such my case. For, from the time when I began to contend at Olympia, I have never met with a person my superior in any thing.

[3.] Soc. A beautiful offering, Hippias, do you proclaim your reputation for wisdom¹ to be to both the Elean state and your own parents likewise. But what were you saying to us about Achilles and Ulysses? Which of the two said you was the better man, and for what? For when many were within, and you were making the display, I missed what was said by you; for I feared to put a question, because the crowd was great, and lest I might by asking be an impediment to the display. But as we are now fewer in number, and Eudicus here commands me to ask, state clearly, and instruct us, what you said about those two men, and how you drew a distinction between them.

Hip. Nay, Socrates, I am willing to go through more clearly than I did then, what I said about those men, and others too. I assert then, that Homer has made Achilles the bravest of those who went to Troy, Nestor the wisest, and Ulysses the most versatile.

Soc. Ho! ho! Hippias! will you grant me some such favour as this? not to laugh at me, if I apprehend with difficulty what is said, and ask you frequent questions; and do you endeavour to answer me in a mild and good-tempered manner.

Hip. (I will do so), for it would be, Socrates, a disgraceful thing if I, who instruct others on these very points, and deem myself worthy to receive money on that very account, should, when I am interrogated by you, not show pardon towards you nor answer mildly.

[4.] Soc. You speak very fairly. For when you said that Achilles was represented as the bravest, I seemed to understand what you meant; and (so I did) when (you said) that Nestor was the wisest; but when you said that the poet had represented Ulysses as the most versatile, by this, to tell the truth, I did not thoroughly know what you meant. Tell me then, if I can better understand from this way. Is not Achilles represented by Homer as being versatile?

Hip. The least of all, Socrates, but the most simple. Since in "The Supplications,"² when he represents Achilles and Ulysses conversing with each other, Achilles says to Ulysses,

Son of Laertes, progeny of Jove,
Ulysses, full of many plans, 'tis meet
Curtly a speech to say, as I will do,
And to an end I think it will be brought.
Hateful to me, as are the gates of hell,
Is he, who one thing in his bosom hiding,
Another says. What I say, will be done.

Now in these verses he delineates clearly the habit of each hero; how that Achilles was truthful and simple, but Ulysses versatile and false. For he represents Achilles as speaking these verses to Ulysses.

Soc. Now indeed, Hippias, I am near to understanding what you mean by versatile. For you call, it seems, such a person false.

Hip. Exactly so, Socrates. And such a person has Homer represented Ulysses in many places both of the Iliad and Odyssey.

Soc. By Homer then, it seems, the man of truth was considered as one character, and the man of falsehood another; but not (both)³ the same.

Hip. How should they not, Socrates?

Soc. And are you too of the same opinion, Hippias?

² The books of Homer are quoted by ancient authors with reference to their subjects, not, as now, by their number. See at Cratylus, § 95. The passage here alluded to is in ix. 308.

³ Ficinus has "neque utrumque eundem esse," as if he had found in his MS. ἀλλ' οὐχ ὁ αὐτὸς ἀμφοτέρους.

Hip. Most certainly. For it would be a terrible thing if I were not.

[5.] Soc. Homer, then, let us dismiss; since it is impossible to inquire of what he was thinking, when he composed those verses. But as you appear to take upon yourself his cause, and, what you assert that Homer meant, seems to you likewise, do you answer for Homer and yourself in common.

Hip. So it shall be. Ask then briefly any question you like.

Soc. By men of falsehood do you mean such, as are unable to do a certain act, as persons labouring under sickness, or such as are able.

Hip. I mean such as are very able (to do) many other things, and likewise to put upon persons a deceit.

Soc. The versatile then it seems, according to your account, are men able to do something. Are they not?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is it through silliness and want of intellect that they are versatile and deceivers? or through knavery and a certain kind of intellect?

Hip. Through knavery the most of all, and intellect.

Soc. They are then men of intellect, it seems.

Hip. They are, by Zeus, very much so.

Soc. Since they are men of intellect, are they ignorant of what they are doing? or do they know it?

Hip. They know it very well. And through this they act wickedly.

Soc. Knowing then what they know, are they untaught, or wise?

Hip. Wise on this very point, to deceive.

[6.] Soc. Hold now; let us recollect what you have said. You assert that men of falsehood are men of power, and intellect, and knowledge, and wisdom, on those points where they are men of falsehood.

Hip. I assert it.

Soc. And that men of truth and men of falsehood are different, and opposed to each other.

Hip. This I assert.

Soc. Come then, amongst the men of power and wisdom, some, it seems, are men of falsehood, according to your account.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. When you say that men of falsehood are men of power and wisdom as regards those very things,⁴ do you mean that they are able to be false, if they wish it? or unable as regards those things, in which they are false?

Hip. That they are able.

Soc. To sum up the whole then, have men of falsehood the wisdom and power to be false?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. The man, therefore, who is unable, or has not been taught (to be false), cannot be a man of falsehood.

Hip. Such is the case.

Soc. Each person then, who is able to do what he wishes at the time when he wishes, is a person of power. I am not speaking of a person, prevented by some disease or any other thing of that kind; but, I mean, (that he is able,) as you are, whenever you wish, to write my name. Do you not call the person who is in this state, a person of power?

Hip. I do.

[7.] Soc. Tell me now, Hippias, are you not skilled in numbers and accounts?

Hip. Most especially, Socrates.

Soc. Were a person then to ask you, "What number is thrice seven hundred," you could, if you would, say of all persons the quickest and truest respecting it.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. Is it because you are the man of the greatest power and wisdom on those points?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Are you merely the man of the greatest wisdom and power? or are you the best⁵ likewise with respect to those points, in which you are of the greatest power and wisdom?

Hip. The best assuredly, Socrates.

Soc. You would therefore, upon these subjects, speak the truth with the greatest power possible. Is it not so?

Hip. I think so.

Soc. But what, are you not equally able to speak untruths upon the very same subject? Answer me now, Hippias, as you did before, nobly and with a high bearing. If then a person were to ask you, "How many are thrice seven hundred?" whether would you be false the most, and say always and according to the same circumstance what is false, if you wished to be false, and never at any time to give a true answer? Or would a person unskilled in accounts be better able than yourself, if so inclined, to be false? Would not the person unskilled, although desirous of being false, frequently speak the truth unwillingly, by accident, through his knowing nothing? But you, being wise on those points, could, if you were inclined to be false, be ever and according to the same circumstances false.

⁴ Namely, of falsehood, says Stalbaum. Ficinus has "ad eadem," in Greek εἰς αὐτὰ ταῦτα—

⁵ By "best" Sydenham understands "the most veracious."

Hip. Yes; the case is as you state it.

Soc. Whether then is the person, who is false upon other points, not so in the case of numbers? nor would he be false in numbers?

Hip. By Zeus, in numbers too.

[8.] Soc. Let us then, Hippias, suppose that there is a certain person false upon the subject of numbers and accounts.

Hip. Well.

Soc. Now what kind of person must he be? Must he not, as you yourself just now acknowledged, possess, if he intends to be false, the power to be false? for it was, if you remember, said by you, that he who wants the power to be false would never be false.

Hip. I remember; it was said so.

Soc. Were you not just now shown to possess the greatest power to be false in the case of accounts?

Hip. Yes; and this too was said.

Soc. And do you not possess the greatest power to speak the truth relating to accounts?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. The same person then possesses the greatest power to say what is false and true relating to accounts. ⁶Now he who is the best on such subjects is the accountant.⁶

⁶ The words between the numerals were considered an interpolation by Bekker. But Stalbaum says that to ἀγαθός in this speech of Socrates there is an allusion in the subsequent one of the same speaker; while he compares ἀγαθός—ὁ λογιστικός with "bonos rationatores" in Cicero De Offic. i. 18.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Who else then, Hippias, is the man of falsehood⁷ with regard to accounts, than the good (accountant)? for he is the person of power, and he too of truth.

Hip. So it appears.

Soc. You see then that the same person is on these points both false and true; and that he, who is true, is not a better man than he, who is false: for surely he is the same, and has not, as you just now fancied, qualities the most opposite.

Hip. It appears so in this case at least.

Soc. Are you willing then for us to consider the question on another ground?

Hip. [Otherwise],⁸ if you wish it.

[9.] Soc. Are not you skilled in geometry likewise?

Hip. Yes, I am.

Soc. What then, is it not so in geometry likewise? Is not the same person, who has the greatest power to be false and to speak the truth respecting diagrams, the geometrician?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is there any other, who is good at diagrams?

Hip. No other.

Soc. The good and clever geometrician then has the greatest power in both ways. And, if there be any one else, who is false on the subject of diagrams, it would be the good one: for he has the power; whereas the bad (geometrician) wants the power to be false: so that he, who wants the power, could not be false, as has been admitted already.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Let us now consider further the third instance, that of an astronomer; in which science you conceive yourself still more skilled than in those (mentioned) before. Is it not so, Hippias?

⁷ Aristotle, in Metaphys. v. 29, observes that there is here a paralogism; for by ψευδής, "a man of falsehood," is meant a man δυνάμενος ψεύδεσθαι, "capable of telling a falsehood;" whereas the word properly signifies a man apt to speak falsities through choice, and with the intention to deceive, and to beget in others false notions of things. Aristotle however does not condemn Plato, whose name is not mentioned, as guilty of arguing unfairly; but appeals to this passage as a singular instance of the improper use of the term ψευδής, "false." S.

⁸ Bekker, with whom Stalbaum agrees, would expunge ἄλλως, omitted by Ficinus; whose version is, "ut lubet;" but Graser, in Adversar. p. 99, would retain it. We might perhaps read ἄλλοθι, to answer to the preceding ἄλλοθι.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Do not the very same things hold good in astronomy?

Hip. It is probable, Socrates.

Soc. In astronomy likewise, if there be any one else who is false, the good astronomer will be the man of falsehood, as having the power to be false; for it cannot be the man, who wants the power; for he is unskilled.

Hip. It appears so.

Soc. The same person therefore in astronomy likewise will be the man of truth and falsehood.

Hip. It seems so.

[10.] Soc. Come then, Hippias, and consider freely in this manner through all sciences, whether the case be otherwise than this. Now you are of all men the most skilled in every way in the greatest number of arts,⁹ as I once heard you boasting, when you were detailing your abundant and enviable wisdom in the market-place by the tables of the usurers.¹⁰ For you said you once went to Olympia, having as the work of your own hands all that you wore about your body:¹¹ first, the ring which you had on your finger—for you began with that—was your own work, proving your skill in cutting rings; and you had another¹² seal of your own workmanship, and a strigil,¹³

* The origin of this universal knowledge in arts and sciences, Sydenham conceives is to be traced to the fact mentioned by Iamblichus in his life of Pythagoras, that Hippias was for a short time a disciple of Agesidamus, a Pythagorean philosopher of Metapontum in Lucania; who taught that the perfect man was αὐτάρκης, "self-sufficient." But instead of the mental self-sufficiency, which his master had in mind, Hippias conceived that the doctrine had reference to all the conveniences, and even the ornaments of life, and that the philosopher should know and practise the arts and sciences by which he might become self-sufficient, and attain a resemblance to the deity; for, according to Socrates in Xenophon, Mem. i., "to want nothing is peculiar to the divine nature; and to have the fewest wants is to approach the nearest to it." S.

⁹ Such is Stalbaum's interpretation of ἐν ταῖς τραπέζαις. But I would refer it rather to the tables, which mountebanks made use of to exhibit the tricks of their trade.

¹¹ From this passage Cicero drew the facts mentioned in his De Orator. iii. 32.

¹² Instead of καὶ ἄλλην I should prefer καὶ καλὴν—

and an unguent-box, which you had made yourself; moreover the shoes you then had on, you said you had cut out yourself and made; and that you had woven the upper and the under cloak which you then wore. But what seemed the strangest thing to all, and a proof of the greatest cleverness, was—when you stated that the belt which you wore round your vest—and it was of the costly kind made in Persia—you had plaited yourself; and in addition to all this, you came there bringing your own poems, epic, tragic, and dithyrambic, and many and various compositions in prose; and that in the arts, which I have just now mentioned, you had reached a pre-eminence in skill above all the rest, and in accuracy on points of rhythm and harmony, and grammar; and in addition to these (you spoke of) many other things, as I appear to myself to remember. But I had like to have forgotten, it seems, your art of memory, in which you deem yourself to shine the most; and, I presume, I have forgotten very many others. [11.] But what I mean is this—Do you, turning your eye upon your own (arts)—and they are quite enough—and upon those of others, tell me—if perchance you can discover from what has been acknowledged by myself and you—where is the man of falsehood and the man of truth apart and not the same? Consider the matter in any kind you please, of wisdom, or knavery, or whatever else you delight to call it; and you will never find it, my friend; for it does not exist; but (if it does), do you mention it.

Hip. I am not able, Socrates, thus on the instant, at least.

Soc. Nor will you, as I think, ever be able. If then I am speaking what is true, do you remember, Hippias, what results from the reasoning?

Hip. I do not very well understand, Socrates, what you mean.

Soc. For you do not perhaps at present make use of your art of memory. For it is evident that you think there is no need of it. But I will remind you. You know that you said the strigil, they took a bath, and afterwards anointed themselves, especially about their joints, with some perfumed oil. Thus the skin was cleansed, the blood put into circulation, and the joints made supple and pliant. S. The practice has been introduced from the East into England, under the name of "shampooing." Stalbaum refers to Persius v. 136, "I, puer, et strigiles Crispini ad balnea defer;" and says that Boeckh, in his Domest. Oeconom. Athen. ii. p. 330, explains στλεγγίς by "a comb."

Achilles was a man of truth, but Ulysses a man of falsehood, and versatile.

Hip. I did so.

Soc. But you now perceive, that the man of truth and the man of falsehood have been proved to be the same person; so that, if Ulysses is a man of falsehood, he becomes no less a man of truth: and if Achilles is a man of truth, he (becomes) likewise a man of falsehood; and the men do not differ from, nor are they opposite to, each other, but are similar.

Hip. You are always, Socrates, weaving some discourses of this kind, and, cutting off that portion of the argument which is the most difficult, you lay hold of it in the way of something minute;¹³ but you do not grapple with the question as a whole, respecting which the debate happens to be. For even now, if you wished it, I could show from many proofs in a satisfactory speech, that Homer has represented Achilles as a man of greater bravery than Ulysses, and free from falsehood, but the latter as crafty, and frequently false, and worse than Achilles. And do you, if you will, place (your) reasonings opposite (to mine), (to prove) the other is the better man; and (thus) the persons here will the better know, which of us is the better speaker.

[12.] Soc. I have no doubt, Hippias, of your being cleverer than myself. But I am ever accustomed, when any one says any thing, to give my attention—especially when the speaker seems to be a clever person—as being desirous of learning what he is speaking about, and ask him questions, and I think over the question again, and I put together what has been said, in order that I may understand it. But if the speaker appears to me to be a person of no mark, I neither ask him any questions, nor give myself any thought about what he has been talking. Now by this you may know what persons I consider to be clever. For you will find me solicitous about what has been said by such¹⁴ a person, and making inquiries of him, in order that I may be benefited by learning. Since even now I have been thinking, while you were speaking, that, in the verses, which you just now recited to show that Achilles was speaking, as if he were a cheat, to Ulysses, something appeared to me to be strange; if, what you assert, is the truth, that the versatile Ulysses no where appears to be a man of falsehood, while Achilles appears to be versatile according to your expression; at least he tells a falsehood. For Achilles having spoken those very words, which you have just now recited,

¹⁴ Instead of ροῦρον Ficinus has "illorum," as if he had found in his MS. ροῦρων. Sydenham prefers ροιοῦρον—

Hateful to me, as are the gates of hell,
Is he, who one thing in his bosom hiding,
Another says—

he states shortly afterwards, that he would not be dissuaded (from his purpose) by either Ulysses or Agamemnon; nor would he stay at all in the Trojan land; but he says,

To-morrow, after paying holy rites
To Zeus and all the gods, I will my ships
Load well, and drag them to the deep; and then
Thou'lt see, if such thy wish, and such thy care,
At dawn of day my vessels sailing o'er
The Hellespont fish-feeding, and my sailors
Eager to ply the oar; and should the voyage
Prosperous the god, for shaking earth renowned,
Grant, fertile Phthia reach I the third day:

and still before this he says, while abusing Agamemnon, (in IL. i. 169,)

But now I'll go to Phthia; since 'tis far
Better to homeward wend with ships, ¹⁵ whose sterns
Are rounded; ¹⁵ nor, myself dishonour'd thus,
Think I, that here thou'lt yearly riches gain.

Now though he had said this at one time in the face of the whole army, and at another to his friends, he no where appears to have made any preparations, or even an attempt, towards dragging down his vessels to the sea, as being about to sail homeward, but very ¹⁶ nobly deemed it a little thing to tell the truth.¹⁶ I therefore, Hippias, proposed at the beginning the question, as I was in doubt which of these two had been repre-

^{15—15} Such is the conventional version of νηυσὶ κορωνίσιν. But as κορωνή is a kind of an aquatic bird, it seems more natural to understand by ναυσὶ κορωνίσιν, "ships" shaped like a sea-fowl.

^{16—16} Perhaps Horace had in mind this passage of Plato, when he wrote his "Splendide mendax."

Hip. Most certainly. For it would be a terrible thing if I were not.

[5.] Soc. Homer, then, let us dismiss; since it is impossible to inquire of what he was thinking, when he composed those verses. But as you appear to take upon yourself his cause, and, what you assert that Homer meant, seems to you likewise, do you answer for Homer and yourself in common.

Hip. So it shall be. Ask then briefly any question you like.

Soc. By men of falsehood do you mean such, as are unable to do a certain act, as persons labouring under sickness, or such as are able.

Hip. I mean such as are very able (to do) many other things, and likewise to put upon persons a deceit.

Soc. The versatile then it seems, according to your account, are men able to do something. Are they not?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is it through silliness and want of intellect that they are versatile and deceivers? or through knavery and a certain kind of intellect?

Hip. Through knavery the most of all, and intellect.

Soc. They are then men of intellect, it seems.

Hip. They are, by Zeus, very much so.

Soc. Since they are men of intellect, are they ignorant of what they are doing? or do they know it?

Hip. They know it very well. And through this they act wickedly.

Soc. Knowing then what they know, are they untaught, or wise?

Hip. Wise on this very point, to deceive.

[6.] Soc. Hold now; let us recollect what you have said. You assert that men of falsehood are men of power, and intellect, and knowledge, and wisdom, on those points where they are men of falsehood.

Hip. I assert it.

Soc. And that men of truth and men of falsehood are different, and opposed to each other.

Hip. This I assert.

Soc. Come then, amongst the men of power and wisdom, some, it seems, are men of falsehood, according to your account.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. When you say that men of falsehood are men of power and wisdom as regards those very things,⁴ do you mean that they are able to be false, if they wish it? or unable as regards those things, in which they are false?

Hip. That they are able.

Soc. To sum up the whole then, have men of falsehood the wisdom and power to be false?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. The man, therefore, who is unable, or has not been taught (to be false), cannot be a man of falsehood.

Hip. Such is the case.

Soc. Each person then, who is able to do what he wishes at the time when he wishes, is a person of power. I am not speaking of a person, prevented by some disease or any other thing of that kind; but, I mean, (that he is able,) as you are, whenever you wish, to write my name. Do you not call the person who is in this state, a person of power?

Hip. I do.

[7.] Soc. Tell me now, Hippias, are you not skilled in numbers and accounts?

Hip. Most especially, Socrates.

Soc. Were a person then to ask you, "What number is thrice seven hundred," you could, if you would, say of all persons the quickest and truest respecting it.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. Is it because you are the man of the greatest power and wisdom on those points?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Are you merely the man of the greatest wisdom and power? or are you the best⁵ likewise with respect to those points, in which you are of the greatest power and wisdom?

Hip. The best assuredly, Socrates.

Soc. You would therefore, upon these subjects, speak the truth with the greatest power possible. Is it not so?

Hip. I think so.

Soc. But what, are you not equally able to speak untruths upon the very same subject? Answer me now, Hippias, as you did before, nobly and with a high bearing. If then a person were to ask you, "How many are thrice seven hundred?" whether would you be false the most, and say always and according to the same circumstance what is false, if you wished to be false, and never at any time to give a true answer? Or would a person unskilled in accounts be better able than yourself, if so inclined, to be false? Would not the person unskilled, although desirous of being false, frequently speak the truth unwillingly, by accident, through his knowing nothing? But you, being wise on those points, could, if you were inclined to be false, be ever and according to the same circumstances false.

⁴ Namely, of falsehood, says Stalbaum. Ficinus has "ad eadem," in Greek εἰς αὐτὰ ταῦτα—

⁵ By "best" Sydenham understands "the most veracious."

Hip. Yes; the case is as you state it.

Soc. Whether then is the person, who is false upon other points, not so in the case of numbers? nor would he be false in numbers?

Hip. By Zeus, in numbers too.

[8.] Soc. Let us then, Hippias, suppose that there is a certain person false upon the subject of numbers and accounts.

Hip. Well.

Soc. Now what kind of person must he be? Must he not, as you yourself just now acknowledged, possess, if he intends to be false, the power to be false? for it was, if you remember, said by you, that he who wants the power to be false would never be false.

Hip. I remember; it was said so.

Soc. Were you not just now shown to possess the greatest power to be false in the case of accounts?

Hip. Yes; and this too was said.

Soc. And do you not possess the greatest power to speak the truth relating to accounts?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. The same person then possesses the greatest power to say what is false and true relating to accounts. ⁶Now he who is the best on such subjects is the accountant.⁶

⁶⁻⁶ The words between the numerals were considered an interpolation by Bekker. But Stalbaum says that to ἀγαθός in this speech of Socrates there is an allusion in the subsequent one of the same speaker; while he compares ἀγαθός—ὁ λογιστικός with "bonos rationatores" in Cicero De Offic. i. 18.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Who else then, Hippias, is the man of falsehood⁷ with regard to accounts, than the good (accountant)? for he is the person of power, and he too of truth.

Hip. So it appears.

Soc. You see then that the same person is on these points both false and true; and that he, who is true, is not a better man than he, who is false: for surely he is the same, and has not, as you just now fancied, qualities the most opposite.

Hip. It appears so in this case at least.

Soc. Are you willing then for us to consider the question on another ground?

Hip. [Otherwise],⁸ if you wish it.

[9.] Soc. Are not you skilled in geometry likewise?

Hip. Yes, I am.

Soc. What then, is it not so in geometry likewise? Is not the same person, who has the greatest power to be false and to speak the truth respecting diagrams, the geometrician?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is there any other, who is good at diagrams?

Hip. No other.

Soc. The good and clever geometrician then has the greatest power in both ways. And, if there be any one else, who is false on the subject of diagrams, it would be the good one: for he has the power; whereas the bad (geometrician) wants the power to be false: so that he, who wants the power, could not be false, as has been admitted already.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Let us now consider further the third instance, that of an astronomer; in which science you conceive yourself still more skilled than in those (mentioned) before. Is it not so, Hippias?

⁷ Aristotle, in Metaphys. v. 29, observes that there is here a paralogism; for by ψευδής, "a man of falsehood," is meant a man δυνάμενος ψεύδασθαι, "capable of telling a falsehood;" whereas the word properly signifies a man apt to speak falsities through choice, and with the intention to deceive, and to beget in others false notions of things. Aristotle however does not condemn Plato, whose name is not mentioned, as guilty of arguing unfairly; but appeals to this passage as a singular instance of the improper use of the term ψευδής, "false." S.

⁸ Bekker, with whom Stalbaum agrees, would expunge ἄλλως, omitted by Ficinus; whose version is, "ut lubet;" but Graser, in Adversar. p. 99, would retain it. We might perhaps read ἄλλοθι, to answer to the preceding ἄλλοθι.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Do not the very same things hold good in astronomy?

Hip. It is probable, Socrates.

Soc. In astronomy likewise, if there be any one else who is false, the good astronomer will be the man of falsehood, as having the power to be false; for it cannot be the man, who wants the power; for he is unskilled.

Hip. It appears so.

Soc. The same person therefore in astronomy likewise will be the man of truth and falsehood.

Hip. It seems so.

[10.] Soc. Come then, Hippias, and consider freely in this manner through all sciences, whether the case be otherwise than this. Now you are of all men the most skilled in every way in the greatest number of arts,⁹ as I once heard you boasting, when you were detailing your abundant and enviable wisdom in the market-place by the tables of the usurers.¹⁰ For you said you once went to Olympia, having as the work of your own hands all that you wore about your body:¹¹ first, the ring which you had on your finger—for you began with that—was your own work, proving your skill in cutting rings; and you had another¹² seal of your own workmanship, and a strigil,¹³

* The origin of this universal knowledge in arts and sciences, Sydenham conceives is to be traced to the fact mentioned by Iamblichus in his life of Pythagoras, that Hippias was for a short time a disciple of Agesidamus, a Pythagorean philosopher of Metapontum in Lucania; who taught that the perfect man was αὐτάρκης, "self-sufficient." But instead of the mental self-sufficiency, which his master had in mind, Hippias conceived that the doctrine had reference to all the conveniences, and even the ornaments of life, and that the philosopher should know and practise the arts and sciences by which he might become self-sufficient, and attain a resemblance to the deity; for, according to Socrates in Xenophon, Mem. i., "to want nothing is peculiar to the divine nature; and to have the fewest wants is to approach the nearest to it." S.

¹⁰ Such is Stalbaum's interpretation of ἐπὶ ταῖς τραπέζαις. But I would refer it rather to the tables, which mountebanks made use of to exhibit the tricks of their trade.

¹¹ From this passage Cicero drew the facts mentioned in his De Orator. iii. 32.

¹² Instead of καὶ ἄλλην I should prefer καὶ καλὴν—

and an unguent-box, which you had made yourself; moreover the shoes you then had on, you said you had cut out yourself and made; and that you had woven the upper and the under cloak which you then wore. But what seemed the strangest thing to all, and a proof of the greatest cleverness, was—when you stated that the belt which you wore round your vest—and it was of the costly kind made in Persia—you had plaited yourself; and in addition to all this, you came there bringing your own poems, epic, tragic, and dithyrambic, and many and various compositions in prose; and that in the arts, which I have just now mentioned, you had reached a pre-eminence in skill above all the rest, and in accuracy on points of rhythm and harmony, and grammar; and in addition to these (you spoke of) many other things, as I appear to myself to remember. But I had like to have forgotten, it seems, your art of memory, in which you deem yourself to shine the most; and, I presume, I have forgotten very many others. [11.] But what I mean is this—Do you, turning your eye upon your own (arts)—and they are quite enough—and upon those of others, tell me—if perchance you can discover from what has been acknowledged by myself and you—where is the man of falsehood and the man of truth apart and not the same? Consider the matter in any kind you please, of wisdom, or knavery, or whatever else you delight to call it; and you will never find it, my friend; for it does not exist; but (if it does), do you mention it.

Hip. I am not able, Socrates, thus on the instant, at least.

Soc. Nor will you, as I think, ever be able. If then I am speaking what is true, do you remember, Hippias, what results from the reasoning?

Hip. I do not very well understand, Socrates, what you mean.

Soc. For you do not perhaps at present make use of your art of memory. For it is evident that you think there is no need of it. But I will remind you. You know that you said the strigil, they took a bath, and afterwards anointed themselves, especially about their joints, with some perfumed oil. Thus the skin was cleansed, the blood put into circulation, and the joints made supple and pliant. S. The practice has been introduced from the East into England, under the name of "shampooing." Stalbaum refers to Persius v. 136, "I, puer, et strigiles Crispini ad balnea defer;" and says that Boeckh, in his Domest. Œconom. Athen. ii. p. 330, explains στλεγγίς by "a comb."

Achilles was a man of truth, but Ulysses a man of falsehood, and versatile.

Hip. I did so.

Soc. But you now perceive, that the man of truth and the man of falsehood have been proved to be the same person; so that, if Ulysses is a man of falsehood, he becomes no less a man of truth: and if Achilles is a man of truth, he (becomes) likewise a man of falsehood; and the men do not differ from, nor are they opposite to, each other, but are similar.

Hip. You are always, Socrates, weaving some discourses of this kind, and, cutting off that portion of the argument which is the most difficult, you lay hold of it in the way of something minute;¹³ but you do not grapple with the question as a whole, respecting which the debate happens to be. For even now, if you wished it, I could show from many proofs in a satisfactory speech, that Homer has represented Achilles as a man of greater bravery than Ulysses, and free from falsehood, but the latter as crafty, and frequently false, and worse than Achilles. ¹³ The same complaint is made by the Sophist in Hipp. Maj. p. 301, A. § 48, and p. 304, A. § 55.

¹⁴ Instead of ροῦρον Ficinus has "illorum," as if he had found in his MS. ροῦρων. Sydenham prefers ροιοῦρον—

now I have been thinking, while you were speaking, that, in the verses, which you just now recited to show that Achilles was speaking, as if he were a cheat, to Ulysses, something appeared to me to be strange; if, what you assert, is the truth, that the versatile Ulysses no where appears to be a man of falsehood, while Achilles appears to be versatile according to your expression; at least he tells a falsehood. For Achilles having spoken those very words, which you have just now recited,

Hateful to me, as are the gates of hell,
Is he, who one thing in his bosom hiding,

To Zeus and all the gods, I will my ships
Load well, and drag them to the deep; and then
Thou'lt see, if such thy wish, and such thy care,
At dawn of day my vessels sailing o'er
The Hellespont fish-feeding, and my sailors
Eager to ply the oar; and should the voyage

sented by the poet as the better man ; and deeming both to be very good, it was difficult to decide which was the better, as regards falsehood and truth, and every other virtue ; for in that point likewise both seemed to be nearly on a par.

[13.] Hip. You do not consider the matter, Socrates, correctly. For, though Achilles tells a falsehood, he appears to do so not with any fixed design, but against his inclination ; as he was compelled, by the distresses of the army, to remain and give his assistance. But what Ulysses says falsely, is willingly and with a design.

Soc. My dearest Hippias, you are deceiving me, and are yourself imitating Ulysses.

Hip. By no means, Socrates. But what are you saying, and for what purpose ?

Soc. Because you assert that Achilles told a falsehood not designedly—he, who was such a juggler, and in addition to his vain-boasting, a plotter, as Homer has represented, that he appears to have a higher notion of himself than of Ulysses to such an extent, with regard to lying hid from him while vain-boasting, as to dare in his presence to contradict himself. And lie hid he did from Ulysses. At least Ulysses does not appear to have said any thing to him, as (not)¹⁷ perceiving that Achilles had said what was false.

Hip. What is this that you are speaking of, Socrates ?

Soc. Know you not that, on saying afterwards¹⁸ to Ulysses, that he would set sail in the morning, he says to Ajax, on the other hand, no such thing, but tells him a quite different story.

Hip. Where ?

Soc. Where he says, (Il. ix. 646,)

For of the blood-stain'd war I'll take no thought,
'Till god-like Hector, thoughtful Priam's son,
Shall reach of Myrmidons the tents and ships,
And, Argives slaying, set the fleet on fire.
But round my tent and dark ship Hector coming,
And eager for the fight, I guess, will stop.

[14.] Now do you imagine, Hippias, that the son of Thetis and the pupil of the most clever Chiron was so forgetful, as that, after previously abusing with the extreme of abuse those, who speak what they do not mean, he would immediately say to Ulysses that he would sail away, and then to Ajax, that he would remain, and this too without a fixed design, or holding Ulysses to be a simpleton,¹⁹ and that he should get the better of him by this very trickery and speaking falsely?

Hip. It does not, Socrates, seem so at least to me. But being dissuaded on these points by his own easy temper, he spoke to Ajax in a different manner to what he had done to Ulysses. But Ulysses, whenever he speaks truth, speaks always with a fixed design, and so too, when he speaks a falsehood.

Soc. Ulysses then is a better man, it seems, than Achilles.

Hip. Surely, Socrates, the least of all.

Soc. Why, were not they, who speak false willingly, proved to be better²⁰ than those (who do so) unwillingly?

Hip. But how, Socrates, can they, who do an injury willingly, and plot against a person willingly, and do mischief, be better men than those, who do so unwillingly; to the latter of whom it seems that pardon is greatly due, should any one unconsciously do an injury, or tell a falsehood, or do any other wrong. And even the laws are surely more severe against those, who do evil and tell falsehoods wilfully, than against those, who act so unwillingly.

[15.] Soc. You see, Hippias, that I spoke the truth in saying how pressing I am in regard to putting questions to the clever. And yet I run the risk of possessing this solitary good, the rest that I possess being trifling. For in what manner things are, I am at fault; nor do I know where they are. And of this there is evidence sufficient for myself. For whenever I am in the company of any of you in high repute for your cleverness, and for whom all the Greeks are witnesses of your wisdom, I appear as one knowing nothing; for scarcely on a single point, so to speak, am I of the same opinion with you. And what greater proof can there be of a man's want of instruction, than when he differs from men of wisdom? Yet I have this one wonderful good, which is my preservation; for I am not ashamed to learn; but I make inquiries, and ask questions, and am very thankful to the person, who gives me an answer; nor do I ever deprive any one of the thanks (I owe). For I never deny that I have learnt a thing, by pretending that what I have learnt was a discovery of my own; but I pass encomium upon the person, who has taught me, as being a clever man, by showing forth what I learnt from him. And now I do not agree with what you assert, but differ very greatly. And this, I know well, takes place through myself; because I am such as I am, that I may not speak too highly of myself. To me, Hippias, every thing appears the contrary to what you say. They then who hurt (other) persons, and do an injury, and speak falsehoods, and deceive, and commit a fault willingly, (appear to me)²¹ to be better men than those, (who act so) unwillingly. Sometimes, however, I am of a contrary opinion; and my mind wanders on these points, evidently through my knowing nothing. But at present there has come around me, as it were, the periodical return of my disorder; and they, who commit an error willingly, seem to me to be better than those, who commit it unwillingly. And for this my present state of mind I blame the previous discussion as the cause; so that for the present it appears that they, who do each of these things unwillingly, are more wicked than those who do them willingly. Do then indulge me, nor grudge to heal the disorder of my mind. For you will do me a much greater good by causing my mind to cease from its ignorance, than my body from disease.²² If however you wish to speak a lengthened speech, I tell you beforehand, that you will effect no cure; for I cannot follow you.

¹⁹ The Greek ἀπχαῖος is used similarly in Euthyd. p. 295, C., and Aristoph. Plut. 323.

²⁰ This is another instance, similar to the one noticed by Aristotle, of an argument founded on the ambiguity of an expression. For the truth of the position contended for, has indeed been proved; but Plato applies it in this place to morals, of which it has not been proved, but the direct contrary insinuated. S. We may quote in illustration of the ambiguity of the word "good," the passage in Shakspeare's Merchant of Venice, where on Shylock saying that "Antonio is a good man," Bassanio asks, "Have you heard any imputation to the contrary?" to which the Jew replies, "No, no; my meaning, in saying that he is a good man, is to have you understand me that he is sufficient."

²¹ Stalbaum says that δοκοῦσι is to be supplied here from the preceding δοκῶ, referring very appositely to Apolog. p. 25, B.

²² So Macbeth, in Shakspeare, after inquiring of the Doctor, whether he cannot minister to a mind diseased, and hearing that therein the patient must minister to himself, rejoins, "Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it."

But if you are willing, as lately, to answer my questions, you will benefit greatly myself; nor do I think you will receive any harm. Justly then do I call upon you, son of Apēmantus; for you have urged me to converse with Hippias; and now if Hippias is unwilling to give an answer, do you intercede with him in my behalf.

Eud. There will be, I think, Socrates, no need for my intercession with Hippias. For nothing of such a kind has been previously stated by him; but rather that he never shrunk from the question of any man. Is it not so, Hippias? Was not this what you said?

Hip. I did say so, Eudicus. But Socrates is always making a confusion in the arguments; and he is like to a person who is doing wrong.

[16.] Soc. My very good Hippias, I do it not willingly—for I should then be a clever and terrible fellow according to your account—but unwillingly, so that do you pardon me; for pardon, you say, is due to him who does wrong unwillingly.

Eud. Nay, Hippias, do not act otherwise; but for the sake of me, and of your own words previously spoken, give an answer to whatever Socrates shall ask.

Hip. Well, at your entreaty, I will give an answer. Ask, then, what you like.

[16.] Soc. Truly, Hippias, I am very desirous to consider thoroughly what has been just now mentioned—Which are the better men, they, who err willingly or unwillingly. Now to this inquiry I think we shall arrive by the most direct road thus—and do you give an answer. Do you speak of a runner as being good?²²

Hip. I do.

Soc. And (of one as being) bad?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is not he, who runs well, good? and bad he, who runs badly?

Hip. Yes.

²² In the instances selected by Plato, the four first relate to the acts that depend upon the structure of the body, such as running, wrestling, dancing, and singing. To perform these exercises properly, there are requisite agility, strength, gracefulness, and a musical voice; all of which arise respectively from the elasticity of the fibres, the firmness in the fabric of the bones, the plianthness in the joints, and the expansion and contraction of the lungs and larynx. S.

you did before, nobly and with a high bearing. If then a person were to ask you, "How many are thrice seven hundred?" whether would you be false the most, and say always and according to the same circumstance what is false, if you wished to be false, and never at any time to give a true answer? Or would a person unskilled in accounts be better able than yourself, if so inclined, to be false? Would not the person unskilled, although desirous of being false, frequently speak the truth unwillingly, by accident, through his knowing nothing? But you, being wise on those points, could, if you were inclined to be false, be ever and according to the same circumstances false.

Hip. Yes; the case is as you state it.

Soc. Whether then is the person, who is false upon other points, not so in the case of numbers? nor would he be false in numbers?

Hip. By Zeus, in numbers too.

[8.] Soc. Let us then, Hippias, suppose that there is a certain person false upon the subject of numbers and accounts.

Hip. Well.

Soc. Now what kind of person must he be? Must he not, as you yourself just now acknowledged, possess, if he intends to be false, the power to be false? for it was, if you remember, said by you, that he who wants the power to be false would never be false.

Hip. I remember; it was said so.

Soc. Were you not just now shown to possess the greatest power to be false in the case of accounts?

Hip. Yes; and this too was said.

Soc. And do you not possess the greatest power to speak the truth relating to accounts?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. The same person then possesses the greatest power to say what is false and true relating to accounts. ⁶Now he who is the best on such subjects is the accountant.⁶

⁶—⁶ The words between the numerals were considered an interpolation by Bekker. But Stalbaum says that to ἀγαθός in this speech of Socrates there is an allusion in the subsequent one of the same speaker; while he compares ἀγαθός—ὁ λογιστικός with "bonos rationatores" in Cicero De Offic. i. 18.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Who else then, Hippias, is the man of falsehood⁷ with regard to accounts, than the good (accountant)? for he is the person of power, and he too of truth.

Hip. So it appears.

Soc. You see then that the same person is on these points both false and true; and that he, who is true, is not a better man than he, who is false: for surely he is the same, and has not, as you just now fancied, qualities the most opposite.

Hip. It appears so in this case at least.

Soc. Are you willing then for us to consider the question on another ground?

Hip. [Otherwise],⁸ if you wish it.

[9.] Soc. Are not you skilled in geometry likewise?

Hip. Yes, I am.

Soc. What then, is it not so in geometry likewise? Is not the same person, who has the greatest power to be false and to speak the truth respecting diagrams, the geometrician?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is there any other, who is good at diagrams?

Hip. No other.

Soc. The good and clever geometrician then has the greatest power in both ways. And, if there be any one else, who is false on the subject of diagrams, it would be the good one: for he has the power; whereas the bad (geometrician) wants the power to be false: so that he, who wants the power, could not be false, as has been admitted already.

Hip. It is so.

Soc. Let us now consider further the third instance, that of an astronomer; in which science you conceive yourself still more skilled than in those (mentioned) before. Is it not so, Hippias?

⁷ Aristotle, in Metaphys. v. 29, observes that there is here a paralogism; for by ψευδής, "a man of falsehood," is meant a man δυνάμενος ψεύδισθαι, "capable of telling a falsehood;" whereas the word properly signifies a man apt to speak falsities through choice, and with the intention to deceive, and to beget in others false notions of things. Aristotle however does not condemn Plato, whose name is not mentioned, as guilty of arguing unfairly; but appeals to this passage as a singular instance of the improper use of the term ψευδής, "false." S.

⁸ Bekker, with whom Stalbaum agrees, would expunge ἄλλως, omitted by Ficinus; whose version is, "ut lubet;" but Graser, in Adversar. p. 99, would retain it. We might perhaps read ἄλλοθι, to answer to the preceding ἄλλοθι.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Do not the very same things hold good in astronomy?

Hip. It is probable, Socrates.

Soc. In astronomy likewise, if there be any one else who is false, the good astronomer will be the man of falsehood, as having the power to be false; for it cannot be the man, who wants the power; for he is unskilled.

Hip. It appears so.

Soc. The same person therefore in astronomy likewise will be the man of truth and falsehood.

Hip. It seems so.

[10.] Soc. Come then, Hippias, and consider freely in this manner through all sciences, whether the case be otherwise than this. Now you are of all men the most skilled in every way in the greatest number of arts,⁹ as I once heard you boasting, when you were detailing your abundant and enviable wisdom in the market-place by the tables of the usurers.¹⁰ For you said you once went to Olympia, having as the work of your own hands all that you wore about your body:¹¹ first, the ring which you had on your finger—for you began with that—was your own work, proving your skill in cutting rings; and you had another¹² seal of your own workmanship, and a strigil,¹³

* The origin of this universal knowledge in arts and sciences, Sydenham conceives is to be traced to the fact mentioned by Iamblichus in his life of Pythagoras, that Hippias was for a short time a disciple of Agesidamus, a Pythagorean philosopher of Metapontum in Lucania; who taught that the perfect man was αὐτάρκης, "self-sufficient." But instead of the mental self-sufficiency, which his master had in mind, Hippias conceived that the doctrine had reference to all the conveniences, and even the ornaments of life, and that the philosopher should know and practise the arts and sciences by which he might become self-sufficient, and attain a resemblance to the deity; for, according to Socrates in Xenophon, Mem. i., "to want nothing is peculiar to the divine nature; and to have the fewest wants is to approach the nearest to it." S.

¹⁰ Such is Stalbaum's interpretation of ἐπὶ ταῖς τραπέζαις. But I would refer it rather to the tables, which mountebanks made use of to exhibit the tricks of their trade.

¹¹ From this passage Cicero drew the facts mentioned in his De Orator. iii. 32.

¹² Instead of καὶ ἄλλην I should prefer καὶ καλὴν—

and an unguent-box, which you had made yourself; moreover the shoes you then had on, you said you had cut out yourself and made; and that you had woven the upper and the under cloak which you then wore. But what seemed the strangest thing to all, and a proof of the greatest cleverness, was—when you stated that the belt which you wore round your vest—and it was of the costly kind made in Persia—you had plaited yourself; and in addition to all this, you came there bringing your own poems, epic, tragic, and dithyrambic, and many and various compositions in prose; and that in the arts, which I have just now mentioned, you had reached a pre-eminence in skill above all the rest, and in accuracy on points of rhythm and harmony, and grammar; and in addition to these (you spoke of) many other things, as I appear to myself to remember. But I had like to have forgotten, it seems, your art of memory, in which you deem yourself to shine the most; and, I presume, I have forgotten very many others. [11.] But what I mean is this—Do you, turning your eye upon your own (arts)—and they are quite enough—and upon those of others, tell me—if perchance you can discover from what has been acknowledged by myself and you—where is the man of falsehood and the man of truth apart and not the same? Consider the matter in any kind you please, of wisdom, or knavery, or whatever else you delight to call it; and you will never find it, my friend; for it does not exist; but (if it does), do you mention it.

Hip. I am not able, Socrates, thus on the instant, at least.

Soc. Nor will you, as I think, ever be able. If then I am speaking what is true, do you remember, Hippias, what results from the reasoning?

Hip. I do not very well understand, Socrates, what you mean.

Soc. For you do not perhaps at present make use of your art of memory. For it is evident that you think there is no need of it. But I will remind you. You know that you said the strigil, they took a bath, and afterwards anointed themselves, especially about their joints, with some perfumed oil. Thus the skin was cleansed, the blood put into circulation, and the joints made supple and pliant. S. The practice has been introduced from the East into England, under the name of "shampooing." Stalbaum refers to Persius v. 136, "I, puer, et strigiles Crispini ad balnea defer;" and says that Boeckh, in his Domest. Œconom. Athen. ii. p. 330, explains στλεγγίς by "a comb."

Achilles was a man of truth, but Ulysses a man of falsehood, and versatile.

Hip. I did so.

Soc. But you now perceive, that the man of truth and the man of falsehood have been proved to be the same person; so that, if Ulysses is a man of falsehood, he becomes no less a man of truth: and if Achilles is a man of truth, he (becomes) likewise a man of falsehood; and the men do not differ from, nor are they opposite to, each other, but are similar.

Hip. You are always, Socrates, weaving some discourses of this kind, and, cutting off that portion of the argument which is the most difficult, you lay hold of it in the way of something minute;¹³ but you do not grapple with the question as a whole, respecting which the debate happens to be. For even now, if you wished it, I could show from many proofs in a satisfactory speech, that Homer has represented Achilles as a man of greater bravery than Ulysses, and free from falsehood, but the latter as crafty, and frequently false, and worse than Achilles. And do you, if you will, place (your) reasonings opposite (to mine), (to prove) the other is the better man; and (thus) the persons here will the better know, which of us is the better speaker.

[12.] Soc. I have no doubt, Hippias, of your being cleverer than myself. But I am ever accustomed, when any one says any thing, to give my attention—especially when the speaker seems to be a clever person—as being desirous of learning what he is speaking about, and ask him questions, and I think over the question again, and I put together what has been said, in order that I may understand it. But if the speaker appears to me to be a person of no mark, I neither ask him any questions, nor give myself any thought about what he has been talking. Now by this you may know what persons I consider to be clever. For you will find me solicitous about what has been said by such¹⁴ a person, and making inquiries of him, in order that I may be benefited by learning. Since even now I have been thinking, while you were speaking, that, in the verses, which you just now recited to show that Achilles was speaking, as if he were a cheat, to Ulysses, something appeared to me to be strange; if, what you assert, is the truth, that the versatile Ulysses no where appears to be a man of falsehood, while Achilles appears to be versatile according to your expression; at least he tells a falsehood. For Achilles having spoken those very words, which you have just now recited,

¹⁴ Instead of ροῦρον Ficinus has "illorum," as if he had found in his MS. ροῦρων. Sydenham prefers ροῖούρον—

Hateful to me, as are the gates of hell,
Is he, who one thing in his bosom hiding,
Another says—

he states shortly afterwards, that he would not be dissuaded (from his purpose) by either Ulysses or Agamemnon; nor would he stay at all in the Trojan land; but he says,

To-morrow, after paying holy rites
To Zeus and all the gods, I will my ships
Load well, and drag them to the deep; and then
Thou'lt see, if such thy wish, and such thy care,
At dawn of day my vessels sailing o'er
The Hellespont fish-feeding, and my sailors
Eager to ply the oar; and should the voyage
Prosperous the god, for shaking earth renowned,
Grant, fertile Phthia reach I the third day:

and still before this he says, while abusing Agamemnon, (in Il. i. 169.)

But now I'll go to Phthia; since 'tis far
Better to homeward wend with ships, ¹⁵ whose sterns
Are rounded; ¹⁶ nor, myself dishonour'd thus,
Think I, that here thou'lt yearly riches gain.

Now though he had said this at one time in the face of the whole army, and at another to his friends, he no where appears to have made any preparations, or even an attempt, towards dragging down his vessels to the sea, as being about to sail homeward, but very ¹⁶ nobly deemed it a little thing to tell the truth.¹⁶ I therefore, Hippias, proposed at the beginning the question, as I was in doubt which of these two had been represented by the poet as the better man ; and deeming both to be very good, it was difficult to decide which was the better, as regards falsehood and truth, and every other virtue ; for in that point likewise both seemed to be nearly on a par.

^{15—16} Such is the conventional version of νηυσὶ κορωνίσιν. But as κορωνή is a kind of an aquatic bird, it seems more natural to understand by νηυσὶ κορωνίσιν, "ships" shaped like a sea-fowl.

^{16—16} Perhaps Horace had in mind this passage of Plato, when he wrote his "Splendide mendax."

[13.] Hip. You do not consider the matter, Socrates, correctly. For, though Achilles tells a falsehood, he appears to do so not with any fixed design, but against his inclination ; as he was compelled, by the distresses of the army, to remain and give his assistance. But what Ulysses says falsely, is willingly and with a design.

Soc. My dearest Hippias, you are deceiving me, and are yourself imitating Ulysses.

Hip. By no means, Socrates. But what are you saying, and for what purpose ?

Soc. Because you assert that Achilles told a falsehood not designedly—he, who was such a juggler, and in addition to his vain-boasting, a plotter, as Homer has represented, that he appears to have a higher notion of himself than of Ulysses to such an extent, with regard to lying hid from him while vain-boasting, as to dare in his presence to contradict himself. And lie hid he did from Ulysses. At least Ulysses does not appear to have said any thing to him, as (not)¹⁷ perceiving that Achilles had said what was false.

Hip. What is this that you are speaking of, Socrates ?

Soc. Know you not that, on saying afterwards¹⁸ to Ulysses, that he would set sail in the morning, he says to Ajax, on the other hand, no such thing, but tells him a quite different story.

Hip. Where ?

Soc. Where he says, (Il. ix. 646,)

For of the blood-stain'd war I'll take no thought,
Till god-like Hector, thoughtful Priam's son,
Shall reach of Myrmidons the tents and ships,
And, Argives slaying, set the fleet on fire.
But round my tent and dark ship Hector coming,
And eager for the fight, I guess, will stop.

[14.] Now do you imagine, Hippias, that the son of Thetis and the pupil of the most clever Chiron was so forgetful, as that, after previously abusing with the extreme of abuse those, who speak what they do not mean, he would immediately say to Ulysses that he would sail away, and then to Ajax, that he would remain, and this too without a fixed design, or holding Ulysses to be a simpleton,¹⁹ and that he should get the better of him by this very trickery and speaking falsely?

Hip. It does not, Socrates, seem so at least to me. But being dissuaded on these points by his own easy temper, he spoke to Ajax in a different manner to what he had done to Ulysses. But Ulysses, whenever he speaks truth, speaks always with a fixed design, and so too, when he speaks a falsehood.

Soc. Ulysses then is a better man, it seems, than Achilles.

Hip. Surely, Socrates, the least of all.

Soc. Why, were not they, who speak false willingly, proved to be better²⁰ than those (who do so) unwillingly?

Hip. But how, Socrates, can they, who do an injury willingly, and plot against a person willingly, and do mischief, be better men than those, who do so unwillingly; to the latter of whom it seems that pardon is greatly due, should any one unconsciously do an injury, or tell a falsehood, or do any other wrong. And even the laws are surely more severe against those, who do evil and tell falsehoods wilfully, than against those, who act so unwillingly.

[15.] Soc. You see, Hippias, that I spoke the truth in saying how pressing I am in regard to putting questions to the clever. And yet I run the risk of possessing this solitary good, the rest that I possess being trifling. For in what manner things are, I am at fault; nor do I know where they are. And of this there is evidence sufficient for myself. For whenever I am in the company of any of you in high repute for your cleverness, and for whom all the Greeks are witnesses of your wisdom, I appear as one knowing nothing; for scarcely on a single point, so to speak, am I of the same opinion with you. And what greater proof can there be of a man's want of instruction, than when he differs from men of wisdom? Yet I have this one wonderful good, which is my preservation; for I am not ashamed to learn; but I make inquiries, and ask questions, and am very thankful to the person, who gives me an answer; nor do I ever deprive any one of the thanks (I owe). For I never deny that I have learnt a thing, by pretending that what I have learnt was a discovery of my own; but I pass encomium upon the person, who has taught me, as being a clever man, by showing forth what I learnt from him. And now I do not agree with what you assert, but differ very greatly. And this, I know well, takes place through myself; because I am such as I am, that I may not speak too highly of myself. To me, Hippias, every thing appears the contrary to what you say. They then who hurt (other) persons, and do an injury, and speak falsehoods, and deceive, and commit a fault willingly, (appear to me)²¹ to be better men than those, (who act so) unwillingly. Sometimes, however, I am of a contrary opinion; and my mind wanders on these points, evidently through my knowing nothing. But at present there has come around me, as it were, the periodical return of my disorder; and they, who commit an error willingly, seem to me to be better than those, who commit it unwillingly. And for this my present state of mind I blame the previous discussion as the cause; so that for the present it appears that they, who do each of these things unwillingly, are more wicked than those who do them willingly. Do then indulge me, nor grudge to heal the disorder of my mind. For you will do me a much greater good by causing my mind to cease from its ignorance, than my body from disease.²² If however you wish to speak a lengthened speech, I tell you beforehand, that you will effect no cure; for I cannot follow you.

¹⁹ The Greek ἀρχαῖος is used similarly in Euthyd. p. 295, C., and Aristoph. Plut. 323.

²⁰ This is another instance, similar to the one noticed by Aristotle, of an argument founded on the ambiguity of an expression. For the truth of the position contended for, has indeed been proved; but Plato applies it in this place to morals, of which it has not been proved, but the direct contrary insinuated. S. We may quote in illustration of the ambiguity of the word "good," the passage in Shakspeare's Merchant of Venice, where on Shylock saying that "Antonio is a good man," Bassanio asks, "Have you heard any imputation to the contrary?" to which the Jew replies, "No, no; my meaning, in saying that he is a good man, is to have you understand me that he is sufficient."

²¹ Stalbaum says that δοκούει is to be supplied here from the preceding δοκῶ, referring very appositely to Apolog. p. 25, B.

²² So Macbeth, in Shakspeare, after inquiring of the Doctor, whether he cannot minister to a mind diseased, and hearing that therein the patient must minister to himself, rejoins, "Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it."

But if you are willing, as lately, to answer my questions, you will benefit greatly myself; nor do I think you will receive any harm. Justly then do I call upon you, son of Apēmantus; for you have urged me to converse with Hippias; and now if Hippias is unwilling to give an answer, do you intercede with him in my behalf.

Now to this inquiry I think we shall arrive by the most direct road thus—and do you give an answer. Do you speak of a runner as being good?²²

Hip. I do.

Soc. And (of one as being) bad?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Is not he, who runs well, good? and bad he, who runs badly?

Hip. Yes.

To perform these exercises properly, there are requisite agility, strength, gracefulness, and a musical voice; all of which arise respectively from the elasticity of the fibres, the firmness in the fabric of the bones, the pliancy in the joints, and the expansion and contraction of the lungs and larynx. S.

Soc. Does not he, who runs slow, run badly? but well he, who (runs) quick?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. In a race then, and in running, swiftness is a good thing; slowness a bad thing.

Hip. What else should it be?

Soc. Which then is the better runner? he who willingly runs slow, or unwillingly?

Hip. He (who runs so) willingly.

Soc. Is not to run to do something?

Hip. It is to do (something).

Soc. And, if to do, is it not to perform some act?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. He then, who runs ill, performs in a race an act bad [and unseemly].²³

Hip. Yes, bad; for how not?

Soc. Now he who runs badly, runs, you say, slowly.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. The good runner then performs willingly this bad act, [and the unseemly]:²⁴ but the bad runner (does so) unwillingly.

Hip. It seems so.

Soc. In a race then, he who performs bad actions unwillingly, is worse than he (who does so) willingly.

Hip. Yes, in a race.

Soc. And how is it in wrestling? Which is the better wrestler? he who falls willingly, or unwillingly?

Hip. Probably he who falls willingly.

Soc. Now in wrestling, is it worse and more unseemly to fall, or to throw down?

Hip. To fall.

Soc. In wrestling then likewise, he who performs willingly bad and unseemly acts, is a better wrestler than he who (does so) unwillingly?

Hip. It is probable.

Soc. What then is the case in all the other uses of the body? Is not he, who is (stronger and)²⁵ better in his body; able to ^{23, 24} The words within brackets are shown by the answer of Hippias to be an interpolation; and the same observation applies, for the same reason, to kai tò alexpōn, just afterwards. They owe their origin to alexion, a little below.

²⁵ From the words of Ficinus, "Nonne qui corpore robustior atque perform acts both strong or weak, and unseemly and beautiful? So that when one performs acts, which as regards the body are bad, he, who is better in body, performs them willingly, but he, who is worse, unwillingly?

Hip. It is probably so as regards at least the strength of the body.

Soc. And what as regards a good conformation of the body, Hippias? Does it not belong to the better body, to perform willingly gestures unseemly, and bad; but to the worse, (to do so) unwillingly? or how does it seem to you?

Hip. In this way.

Soc. A bad conformation then, when voluntary, is on the side of virtue; when involuntary, on that of vice.

Hip. So it seems.

Soc. And what say you as to the voice? Which do you say is the better? that which sings out of tune willingly, or unwillingly?

Hip. That which does so unwillingly.

Soc. And (you say) the more wretched voice is that, which (sings out of tune) unwillingly.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Would you choose to possess things²⁶ that are good or bad?

Hip. Those that are good.

Soc. Would you then choose to have your feet lame willingly, or unwillingly?

Hip. Willingly.

Soc. Is not lameness in the feet a depravity and a bad conformation?

aptior est," Heusde saw acutely that his MS. read, what the train of thought requires,—οὐχ ὁ ἰσχυρότερος καὶ βελτίων τὸ σῶμα—

²⁶ Plato's five next instances are taken from those parts of the body which are the immediate servants of the mind: 1. The outward instruments of motion, such as the feet, by which the will of the mind is executed; 2. The outward organs of sensation, through which the mind perceives outward things; 3. That immediate source of motion and sensation, the brain; to which Plato applies the metaphor of a rudder, that steers the body as the mind pleases; 4. Those inward instruments of motion and sensations, the nerves; which he compares to the strings of musical instruments, braced up or let down by the passions of the soul, and vibrating as they are touched by sensations from without or from within; and lastly, the organs of speech, signified by musical wind-instruments, through which the mind expresses what is passing within itself. S.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. And is not indistinct vision a depravity in the eyes?

Hip. It is.

Soc. Which sort of eyes now would you choose to possess? and with which to live? Those, with which a person willingly sees indistinctly or squints, or unwillingly?

Hip. Those with which (he does so) willingly.

Soc. Of the things, then, which are your own, you deem those, that perform depraved actions willingly, better than those, that (do so) unwillingly.

Hip. In things of such kind I do.

Soc. One reasoning then embraces all such things, as the ears, and nose, and mouth, and all the senses, namely, that those, which perform what is bad unwillingly, ought not to be possessed, as being bad, but that those, which (do so) willingly, ought to be possessed, as being good.

Hip. So it seems to me.

Soc. What then as regards instruments, with which is it better to be familiar? those, with which a man performs badly willingly, or those, with which he (performs so) unwillingly. Is a rudder, for example, the better, with which a person shall unwillingly steer badly, or that, with which (he shall do so) willingly?

Hip. That, with which (he shall do so) willingly.

Soc. Is it not so with the bow and lyre, and hautboy, and the rest of instruments?

Hip. You say the truth.

[17.] Soc. What then,²⁷ is it better to have a horse of such a spirit as that one may unwillingly ride him badly, or (such as one may ride him so) willingly?

Hip. Such (as one may ride him so) willingly.

Soc. Such a spirit then is the better.

Hip. Yes.

Soc. With the better spirit of the horse a man would perform the mischievous acts belonging to such a spirit willingly, but unwillingly (the similar acts belonging to the worse).

²⁷ From the just frame of the body, Plato proceeds to describe the other parts of ἐφύστα, "a good natural disposition," which he holds to be the necessary foundation of virtue. He begins accordingly with the passions, which, in the Platonic system, were ἐπιθυμία, "desire," and θυμὸς, "anger." The first of these kinds is under the emblem of a horse, and the latter under that of a dog: for although both these animals are irrational, they are still manageable by and serviceable to man, when their powers and feelings are regulated by his reason. S.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. And is it not so with respect to a dog? and all other animals?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. What then, as regards the talent of an archer? Is it better to possess that, which misses the mark willingly, or that, which (does so) unwillingly?

Hip. That, which (does so) willingly.

Soc. Such a talent then is the better for the archer's art?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. And the talent then, which errs unwillingly, is worse than that, which (does so) willingly.

Hip. Yes, in the case of the archer's art.

Soc. And how is it in the medical art? Is not the talent, which causes willingly mischiefs to bodies more like the medical art?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. Such a talent then, in such an art, is better than that, which is not ²⁸ [like the medical art].²⁸

Hip. It is better.

Soc. And how in the case of the talent devoted to playing on the harp and hautboy, and all the other things relating to arts and sciences? Is not that the better talent, which willingly performs what is bad and disgraceful and commits errors, while the worse (does so) unwillingly?

Hip. It appears so.

Soc. And moreover we should certainly choose to have the possession of slaves with such talents, as would commit faults willingly, rather than such (as would do so) unwillingly, as (the former) is better for these things.²⁹

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. What then, would we not desire to have our own soul the best possible?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. Will it then not be better, if it did evil willingly, than if it did so unwillingly?

²⁸⁻²⁹ The words within brackets Schleiermacher was the first to reject as an interpolation. For he saw they were omitted in the version of Ficinus—"peritior est quam illa, quæ per ignorantiam peccat."

²⁹ Ficinus has—"ad hæc opera meliores," which would lead to εἰς τὰ ἔργα, i. e. "for their works."

Hip. It would be a terrible thing, Socrates, if they, who do an injury willingly, were better than those, who (do so) unwillingly.

Soc. And yet from what has been said it appears so.

Hip. But not so to myself at least.

[18.] Soc. To you, I thought, it had appeared so. Answer me then again—Is not honesty either a kind of power, or knowledge, or both? Is it not necessary that honesty should be one of these?

Hip. It is.

Soc. If honesty then be a kind of power in the mind, the more powerful the mind the more honest it is. For, my very good man, the mind of such a kind, has surely been shown to be the better.

Hip. It did so appear.

Soc. What then if it is knowledge? Is not the wiser mind the more honest, but the less instructed the more dishonest?

Hip. Yes.³⁰

Soc. What if it is both? Is not the mind, which possesses both knowledge and power, the more honest; but the more uninstructed (and powerless)³¹ the more dishonest? Is it not necessary for such to be the case?

Hip. So it appears.

Soc. Was not the mind of greater power and wisdom shown to be the better, and more able to perform both beautiful and disgraceful doings, relating to every kind of action?

Hip. Yes.

Soc. When therefore it performs the disgraceful, it does so willingly, through its power, and its knowledge. Now these, either both or either, appear to belong to honesty.

Hip. Probably.

Soc. Now, to do injustice is to do ill; but not to do injustice (is to do) well.

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. The mind then which is the more powerful and better, ³⁰ This answer of Hippias, first restored by Heusde from the version of Ficinus, has been subsequently found in two MSS. from a correction.

³¹ To preserve the balance of the sentences, Sydenham proposed to insert kai adunatēria after ἡ δὲ ἀμαθία, but Heusde, kai dothenēria—and while Stalbaum would read ἡ δὲ μὴ instead of ἡ δὲ ἀμαθία, Beck considered the words ἡ δὲ ἀμαθία as interpolated from what had gone before.

when it does injustice does it willingly; but the worse (does so) unwillingly.

Hip. So it seems.

Soc. Is not he, who possesses a good mind, a good man; and he (who possesses) a bad one, a bad man?

Hip. Certainly.

Soc. It belongs then to the good man, to do injustice willingly, but to the bad man, unwillingly; since the good man possesses a good mind.

Hip. This moreover is so.

Soc. The man therefore who errs, and does things disgraceful and dishonest, willingly, if there be such a man, Hippias, can be no other than the good man.

Hip. I know not, Socrates, how to agree with you in this.

Soc. Nor I with myself, Hippias. It must however of necessity appear so to us at present, from the course of the reasoning. But, as I said before, upon these points, I wander up and down, nor do things ever appear to me in the same light. Now that myself or any other unskilled individual should be wandering thus, is not at all to be wondered at. But if you, the wise, wander also, this will be to us a dreadful thing indeed; since we shall never cease from our wanderings, not even by coming to you.

INTRODUCTION TO THE ION.

IN placing the Ion next to the Hippias Minor I have followed the example of Stalbaum, who doubtless perceived a marked similarity in the two dialogues. For while in the one the pretensions of Hippias are exposed, after he had made a display of his talents as a lecturer upon Homer, in the other the scarcely less clever Ion of Ephesus is similarly treated, previous to the exhibition he was about to make as a Rhapsodist at the approaching Panathenaic festival at Athens, after he had recently gained at Epidaurus the first prize of victory in a similar professional contest.

As regards the object of the dialogue, it may be briefly stated that it is intended to prove, that as a poet is born and not made, so is a poet's interpreter—for partly such was the Rhapsodist of old—and that all which art can do is to slightly improve the talents, given by what Plato calls "a divine allotment."

With respect to the conflicting opinions, promulgated by different scholars of Germany touching the matter, manner, and genuineness of the dialogue, Stalbaum refers to Schleiermacher, Ast, Socher, Nitzsch, and Wiegand. Of these it seems that Schleiermacher considers it a kind of supplement to the Phædrus, and that only a portion of it was really written by Plato; while Ast rejects the whole as a spurious production—an opinion which not one of the other critics appears disposed to adopt. For as Xenophon testifies that Socrates considered the Rhapsodists to be the silliest of men, it was surely very natural for Plato to feel a desire to embody the ideas of his master in a dialogue; where, while every honour is paid to Homer, none is given to those, who presumed in the case of the "tale divine of Troy," and its sequel the wanderings of Ulysses,

"To scent the lily, and to paint the rose."

As Stalbaum laments that it has not been his good fortune to obtain a sight of Sydenham's translation reprinted by Taylor, which Müller has praised so highly, and of the notes, which the same editor has frequently put into Latin, I have introduced in an abridged form some of the latter; and should have occasionally adopted a portion of the former, had it been as literal as is required by the nature of this work; and a similar observation is applicable to the translation by Shelley, published in his Posthumous Essays, Letters, Translations, &c. Lond. 1840. There is likewise a French translation of the Ion by L' Abbé Arnaud in Mémoires de L' Académie des Inscriptions, t. xxxix. p. 249—278, which Stalbaum says he never saw; and he therefore did not know that the French translator has proposed to supply what he considers to be a lacuna in § 4, by reading, Οὐκοῦν ἐπιῶδαν λάβη τις καὶ ἄλλην τέχνην ὑπεννοῦν ἔλθην, ὁ αὐτὸς τρόπος τῆς σκίψεως περὶ ἱκίνης τέχνης ἐστὶ καὶ περὶ ἀπασῶν τῶν τεχνῶν, in lieu of τῆς σκίψεως ἐστὶ περὶ ἀπασῶν—

ION.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND ION.

SOCRATES.

[1.] HAIL¹ to thee, Ion; from whence have you come to sojourn with us² for the present? Is it from your home at Ephesus?

Ion. By no means, Socrates, but from Epidaurus, from the feast of Æsculapius.³

Soc. Do the Epidaurians too⁴ ordain a contest of rhapsodists,⁵ in honour of the god?

Ion. They do; and other kinds of the muse's art likewise.

¹ In Greek χαίρειν was used both by persons meeting or leaving each other. The latter more commonly; but the former is found in Theocrit. Id. xiv. 1, quoted by Nitzsch.

² Stalbaum says that ἡμῖν is here, as elsewhere in Plato, a form of familiar address.

³ Æsculapius, the god of physic, was the tutelary deity of Epidaurus, now called "Epidavra."

⁴ This is said because the most celebrated contests of the Rhapsodists took place at Athens during the Panathenaic festival.

⁵ The rhapsodists were a kind of itinerant minstrels, similar to the Troubadours of the middle ages; who strung together and sung portions chiefly of the Homeric poems. They wore a particular dress of scarlet or purple—the latter to represent the colour of the sea, the former of blood—while they were chanting portions of the Odyssey and Iliad respectively; and when they had a contest, the victor gained a lamb as the prize; as we learn from Eustathius, l. A. According to Xenophon in M. S. iv. 2, Socrates said they knew Homer indeed accurately enough, but were in other respects great simpletons; and so after him does Maximus Tyr. in Dissertat. xxiii.

Soc. 'What then? did you contend?

Ion. I do not deny it.

Soc. And how did you contend?⁶

Ion. We carried off, Socrates, the first of the prizes.

Soc. You say well, come then, in order that we two may win at the Panathenæa.⁷

Ion. And this will be if a god is willing.

Soc. Often have I indeed, Ion, been envious of the art of you rhapsodists. For that both your body⁸ is decorated (so as) to be always becoming to your art, and to appear the most beautiful,⁹ and at the same time that it is necessary for you to be conversant with many other excellent poets, and especially Homer, the best and most divine of all, and to learn thoroughly his meaning, not his words merely, is indeed a thing to be envied. For a man would never be a (good)¹⁰ rhapsodist, unless he understood what was said by the poet; for a rhapsodist ought to be an interpreter to the audience of the meaning of the poet; but this it is impossible to do well, without knowing what the poet means. Now worthy is all this to be envied.

⁷ This was an annual festival kept at Athens in honour of Athéné. In every fifth year it was celebrated with more than ordinary pomp; and was then called the Great Panathenæa, to distinguish it from those held in the intermediate periods, termed the Less. It was just previous to the greater festival, probably, that Ion came to Athens. For says Lycurgus in his speech against Leocrates, c. xxvi. p. 223, ed. Taylor, (= 209, R.) "Your ancestors conceived Homer to be so useful a poet as to make a law, that in every fifth year of the Panathenæa his poems alone should be recited by the rhapsodists:" and a similar account is given in the dialogue called Hipparchus, transcribed almost verbatim by Ælian in V. H. viii. 2. S.

⁸ After κεκοσμησθαι it is evident that ὥστε has dropt out.

⁹ In lieu of καλλίστοις, which is without regimen, one MS. has καλλιστοῦ, which leads directly to κάλλιστον—

¹⁰ Sydenham had inserted "good," confirmed subsequently by a MS. at Venice.

Ion. You say, Socrates, what is true. At least this very portion of my art has given me the greatest trouble. I fancy however I can speak most beautifully about Homer, so that neither Metrodorus¹¹ of Lampsacus, nor Stesimbrotus¹² of Thasus, nor Glaucō,¹³ nor any one else, of those who have ever existed, had it in their power to express so many and such beautiful sentiments as I can do, relating to Homer.

Soc. You speak beautifully, Ion. For it is evident that you will not grudge me an exhibition (of your talent).

Ion. Indeed, Socrates, it is well worth your hearing how well I have set off Homer; so that, I conceive, I am worthy to be crowned by the Homeridæ¹⁴ with a golden crown.

[2.] Soc. I will make for myself still a leisure time to hear you. But for the present, answer me thus much. Are you skilled on the subject of Homer alone, or of Hesiod and Archilochus likewise?

Ion. By no means; on the subject of Homer alone. This seems to be enough for me.

Soc. But there is that, about which Homer and Hesiod say the same things.

Ion. There are, I think, many such.

Soc. Respecting these, can you better explain what Homer says than what Hesiod does?

¹¹ We are told by Diogenes Laert. ii. 3, that Metrodorus wrote a treatise on the physiology of Homer, where, as it would seem from Tatian in Δόγ. πρὸς Ἑλλήν. he explained Homer's theology from the various operations and phenomena of nature: and thus gave a rational account of the poet's mythology, in lieu of the literal sense, in which it was received by the vulgar. S.

¹⁴ By the Homeridæ are meant here, as in Phædr. p. 252, B., and Rep. x. p. 599, F., quoted by Müller, the admirers of Homer, as Sydenham had translated.

Ion. Equally, Socrates, respecting those, where they say the same.

Soc. But how, where they do not say the same? For instance, Homer and Hesiod say something about the prophetic art.

Ion. Certainly.

Soc. Well then, whatever those two poets say about the prophetic art, either agreeing or disagreeing, could you explain better, or one of the clever prophets?

Ion. One of the prophets.

Soc. But if you were a prophet, would you not know, if you were able to give an explanation where they agree, to explain likewise where they disagree?

Ion. - It is evident I should.

Soc. How then are you skilled as regards Homer, but not as regards Hesiod, or any other of the poets? Does Homer speak of other things than what other poets have, taken all together? Has he not gone through the greater part of subjects relating to war, and to the intercourse with each other of men, good and bad, and unskilful and practised in arts, and relating to the gods, as having an intercourse, such as they have, with one another and with human beings; and to such as relate to celestial events and those in Hades, and the birth of gods and heroes. Are not these the subjects, relating to which Homer has composed his poetry?

Ion. You say, Socrates, what is true.

Soc. Well then, and do not the rest of the poets (write) about these very things?

Ion. They do, Socrates; but they have not composed their poetry as Homer has his.

Soc. What then, in a worse way?

Ion. Very much so.

Soc. But Homer in a better?

Ion. Better indeed, by Zeus.

[3.] Soc. Now, thou dear head,¹⁵ Ion, when many persons are speaking about numbers, and one of them speaks the best, assuredly some person will know who speaks correctly.

Ion. I admit it.

¹⁵ On this Platonic formula, imitated from the Homeric Τεῦκρε, φῶλη κεφάλη, Stalbaum refers to Phædr. p. 264, B., Gorg. p. 513, C., and Euthyd. p. 293, E.

Soc. Will it be the same as he, who (knows) likewise those speaking incorrectly, or some one else?

Ion. The same person, certainly.

Soc. And is it not he, who knows the science of arithmetic?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. What then, when many persons are speaking about wholesome food, of what kinds they are, and one speaks the best, will one person know that he, who speaks the best, does speak the best, and another (know) that he, (who speaks) worse, (does speak) worse, or will the same person (know both)?

Ion. The same person, clearly.

Soc. Who is he? What is his name?

Ion. Physician.

Soc. Let us say then universally, that, when many are speaking upon the same subject, the same person will always know who speaks correctly and who incorrectly. For¹⁶ if a person shall not know the party speaking incorrectly, it is evident that he will not (know) the party speaking correctly, at least upon the same subject.

Ion. Just so.

Soc. The same person then will be skilled respecting both.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Did not you say that Homer, and the rest of the poets, amongst whom there are both Hesiod and Archilochus, write about the same things, though not in the same manner? but that the one does so well, the others worse?

Ion. And I said what is true.

Soc. If then you know the party who speaks well, you will know those likewise, who speak worse, that they do speak worse?

Ion. It is probable.

Soc. In saying then, thou best of men, that Ion is clever on the subject of Homer and all the other poets, we shall not err; since he acknowledges himself that the same person is a competent judge of all such as speak upon the same subjects, and that nearly all poets take the same subjects for their poetry.

¹⁶ So Sydenham, as if he wished to read kai γὰρ in lieu of ἤ—Ficinus has "et—"

Ion. What can be then the reason, Socrates, that whenever any one is discoursing upon any other poet, I pay no attention, and am unable to contribute any thing whatever (to the discussion) worth mentioning, and really begin to nod; but when any one brings Homer to my recollection, I am immediately awake, and give my mind to the subject, and am at no loss what to say.

Soc. It is not difficult, my friend, to guess the reason of this. For it is clear to every one that you are unable to speak¹⁷ about Homer by art or science. For if you were able by art, you would be able to speak about all the other poets; for the whole is surely poetry. Or is it not?

Ion. It is.

[4.] Soc. When a man shall have laid hold of any other art whatever as a whole,¹⁷ is there not the same method of viewing it (as) all the arts? Why I say this, do you, Ion, request to hear from me?

Ion. Yes, by Zeus, Socrates, I do; for I delight to hear you wise men.

Soc. I would wish, Ion, that you were saying what is true; but you surely are the wise men, you the rhapsodists and performers,¹⁸ and those whose poems you recite; whereas I speak nothing but the simple truth,¹⁹ as becomes a mere unskilled person. Since the question, which I just now asked you, see how trifling it is, and suited to an unskilled person, and for every man to know, namely, that, which I spoke of as presenting the same view, when a person lays hold of the whole of any art. ²⁰ Let us then lay hold in our discourse of painting; for ²⁰ it is an art (whole in itself), is it not?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Are there not, and have been, many painters good and bad?

Ion. Very many.

Soc. Now then, did you ever see any person who, as regards Polygnotus, ²¹ the son of Aglaophon, is skilled in showing what he paints well and what ill, but is unable to do so as regards other painters? and whenever any exhibits the works of those other painters, grows drowsy, and is at a loss, and has not what to contribute to (the conversation); but when it is necessary to declare his judgment about Polygnotus, or any other painter you please, immediately wakes up and gives all attention, and is at no loss what to say?

Ion. Not at all, by Zeus.

Soc. Well then, in the statuary's art, did you ever see any one who, as regards Dædalus, ²² the son of Metion, or Epeius, the son to Panopeus, or Theodorus the Samian, or any other single statuary, was skilled in explaining what each had executed well, but as regards the other statuaries, was at a loss, grew drowsy, as having nothing to say?

Ion. No, by Zeus, I never knew such a person as this.

Soc. Nor, as I think, in the case of playing on the hautboy

^{20—20} I have adopted Stalbaum's version of λάβωμον γὰρ τῷ λόγῳ, words that had given no little trouble to previous translators and editors, and which Shelley entirely omits. To complete, however, the sense, it was requisite to suppose that the author wrote δὲ—γραφικὴν ἢ γὰρ, not γὰρ—γραφικὴ γὰρ—

²¹ This artist was, in the days of Socrates, called the Homer of painters. He was the first to express the manners and passions by attitudes, and a change of countenance, and to give a flattering likeness; and, amongst other improvements, invented the method of showing the skin through transparent drapery. See Aristotle, Polit. viii. 5, and Poet. ii. and vi., Pliny's Nat. Hist. xxxv. 9, and Ælian's Var. Hist. iv. 3. S.

or harp, and in singing to the harp, and in the recitations of the rhapsodists, you never saw a man who, as regards Olympus,²³ or Thamyris, or Orpheus, or Phemius the rhapsodist of Ithaca,²³ is a skilful interpreter, but as regards Ion the Ephesian, is at a loss and unable to give an opinion whether Ion does well or not as a rhapsodist.

Ion. I have nothing to say against you upon that point, Socrates, but of this I am conscious to myself, that as regards Homer I speak the best of all men, and am least at a loss, and every body else says that I do speak well, but not, as regards the rest. Consider then why is this.

[5.] Soc. I do consider, Ion, and I commence showing you how this seems to me. This faculty of speaking well about Homer is not an art, as I said just now, but a divine power, which moves you, like that in the stone, which Euripides²⁴ calls the Magnesian, but the common people Heracleian. For this stone not only attracts iron rings, but imparts a power to the rings, so that they are able to do the very same things as the stone does, and to attract other rings, and sometimes a very long series of iron rings,²⁵ hung (as in a chain),²⁶ one ²³⁻²³ These four persons severally excelled in the four arts just before mentioned. According to Plutarch and Maximus Tyr. Diss. xxiv., Olympus played on the αὐλός, Thamyris on the κιθάρα, as stated by Hom. Il. ii. 600, but without the accompaniment of his voice, as we learn from Pliny; Orpheus was κιθαρωδός, playing and singing together; while Phemius recited poems of the epic kind, touching his lyre at the same time, as appears from Hom. Od. i. 153. S.

²⁵ Sydenham has thus adopted "ferreorum annulorum" in Serranus' version. For neither of them could understand σιδηρίων καὶ δακτυλίων. Nor could Shelley, who has, "a long chain of rings and other iron substances." But the whole question is about iron rings alone.

²⁶ Sydenham seems to have added this, with the view of showing that the iron rings were not united in the inside, as rings generally are, but merely touched each other on the outside, as appears partly from Lucretius—"Unus (annulus) ubi ex uno dependet subter adhærens;" but from another; but from that stone depends the power in all of them. Thus too does the Muse herself move men divinely inspired, and through them thus inspired, a chain hangs together of others inspired divinely likewise. For all the good epic poets compose all their beautiful poems, not by art,²⁷ but by being divinely inspired and possessed (by the Muse); and so too the good lyric poets, just as the Corybantes²⁸ dance, not being in their sound senses,²⁹ compose their beautiful lyrical poems, when they are not in their sound senses; but when they go on according to the harmony and rhythm, they become mad, possessed (by a god), as are the priestesses of Bacchus, (who,) possessed by a god, draw from rivers honey and milk;³⁰ but are unable to do so, when in their senses; and the soul of the lyric poets does that, which they say they do. For assuredly they say to us,³¹ that (drawing) from fountains flowing with honey, and gather-more fully from S. Augustine De Civit. Dei xx. 4, quoted by Kirchmann De Annulis, C. 15, p. 97, as remarked by Müller. The words of the Latin father are too remarkable to be omitted here. "Magnetem lapidem novimus mirabilem ferri esse raptorem. Quod cum primum vidi, vehementer inhorruui. Quippe cernebam a lapide ferreum anulum raptum atque suspensum; deinde cum tamquam ferro, quod rapuerat, vim dedisset suam communemque fecisset, idem annulus admotus est alteri, eumque suspendit atque, ut ille prior lapidi, sic alter annulus priori annulo cohærebat. Accessit eodem modo tertius; accessit et quartus. Jamque sibi per mutua connexis circulis non implicatorum intrinsecus sed extrinsecus adhærentium quasi catena pependerat annulorum."

²⁷ Plato however, in the Phædrus, does not exclude art entirely, but considers it only as the handmaid of inspiration. S.

²⁸ On the followers of Demeter, called Corybantes, and their doings, see the authors quoted by Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 163, and the commentators on Crito, § 17.

²⁹ After ὀρχοῦνται follow αὐτῶ καὶ οἱ μελοποιοί, words evidently interpolated.

³⁰ According to Euripides the honey and milk were obtained from the ground and trees, not from streams. But Sydenham aptly refers to Aristides, T. ii. p. 20, Jebb, who quotes a passage from Æschines, a disciple of Socrates, so as to lead to the belief that this dialogue was written by that philosopher. The words are, "The Bacchantes, when they become inspired, draw honey and milk from wells, out of which the rest of persons are not even able to draw water."

³¹—³¹ The Greek is ἀπὸ κρηνῶν μελιρρῦτων ἐκ Μουσῶν κήπων τινῶν καὶ ναπῶν δρεπόμενοι τὰ μέλη ἡμῖν φέρουσιν, ὥσπερ αἱ μέλιτται. Ficinus has more fully, "a fontibus, quibus mel scaturit, haurientes, et a Musarum viridariis collibusque decerpentes carmina, ad nos transferunt, quemadmodum mel ex floribus apes," as if he had found in his MS., ἀπὸ κρηνῶν μελιρρῦτων ἀρυτόμενοι καὶ ἐκ—δρεπόμενοι ἀνθη, τὰ μελη—

ing (flowers) from the gardens and glades of the Muses, they bring us their songs, as bees do (their honey),³¹ and are ever³² too on the wing. And they tell us too what is true. For a poet is a thing light,³³ and with wings, and sacred,³⁴ and unable to compose poetry until he becomes inspired,³⁵ and is out of his sober senses, and his imagination is no longer under his control. For so long as a person is in complete possession of it, he is unable to compose verses or to speak oracularly. Hence as they compose not by art,³⁶ they say many beautiful things relating to their subjects, as you do about Homer; but each is able to compose that alone through a divine allotment, to which the Muse has impelled them, one to dithyrambs,³⁷ another to panegyrics,³⁸ another to hyporchemata,³⁹ another to epic verse, and another to iambic; but in the other kinds each makes no figure; for they do not compose by art, but through a divine power; since if they knew how to speak by art upon one subject correctly, they would (be able to do so) upon all others. And on this account a deity has deprived them of their senses, and employs them as his ministers, and oracle-singers, and divine prophets, in order that when we ὥσπερ μέλι αἱ μέλιτται, and so I have translated. Sydenham was the first to see that μέλι had dropt out here, quoting very opportunely from Horace—"Ego, apud Matinæ More modoque, Grata carpentis thyma per laborem Plurimum, circa nemus uvidique Tiburis ripas operosa parvus Carmina fingo." With regard to the comparison between flowers and songs, it is sufficient to refer to Valckenaer on Eurip. Hippol. 73.

³¹ Instead of οὕτω the author wrote, I suspect, αἰ ποτε—

³² On the use of χρῆμα the commentators refer to Aristoph. Lys. 678, Theocrit. Id. xv. 83, and Valckenaer on Phæn. 206.

³⁴ Why bees were considered sacred is shown by Virgil in G. iv. 150; while poets were held so, as being under the protection of Apollo.

³⁵ Cicero de Oratore ii. 46, Sæpe audiui poetam bonum neminem, id quod a Democrito et Platone in scriptis relictum esse dicunt, sine inflammatione animorum existere posse."

³⁶ A similar doctrine is promulgated, in Apolog. p. 22, C. where poets are mentioned as here with oracle-singers. For it seems that at different oracular shrines poets were kept to put the answers of the prophetic deity into verse, as we learn from Strabo, p. 642, A.

³⁷ The author probably alludes to the lost dithyrambs of Pindar.

³⁸ Of the nature of the panegyrics a faint idea may be formed from the lifeless hymns of Callimachus, whom Ovid has so happily described by his "Quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet."

hear them, we may know it is not they to whom sense is not present, who speak what is valuable, but the god himself who speaks, and through them addresses us.⁴⁰ And of this assertion Tynnichus⁴¹ the Chalcidian affords the greatest proof; who never composed any other poem, which any one would think worth remembering, but the Pæan, which every body sings, of almost all hymns the most excellent, and as he himself states,

"An invention of artless Muses."⁴²

For in him most especially does the god seem to me to point out to us, that we are not to doubt about those beautiful poems being not human but divine, and the work not of men but of gods; and that poets are nothing else but interpreters of the gods,⁴³ possessed by whatever deity they may happen to be. And in pointing out this, the deity has through a poet the most indifferent sung a melody the most beautiful. Or do I not seem to you, Ion, to say what is true?

Ion. To me at least you do. For you somehow, Socrates, touch my very soul by your arguments; and the good poets seem to me, by a divine allotment, to be in this way to us the interpreters of the gods.

[6.] Soc. Now do not you rhapsodists interpret, on the other hand, the writings of the poets?

Ion. And this too you truly assert.

Soc. Do you not then become the interpreters of interpreters?

Ion. By all means.

Soc. Mind now, Ion, and tell me this; and do not conceal ⁴⁰ So Cicero de Divinat. i., "Deus inclusus corpore humano jam, non Cassandra, loquitur." S.

⁴¹ Of this Tynnichus no mention has been found except in a fragment of Ptolomæus Hephæstion, preserved by Photius in Biblioth. p. 485, and in an anecdote related by Porphyry. Περὶ Ἀποχῆς i. 18, where Æschylus is reported as bearing testimony to his excellence as an old writer of Pæans, a kind of hymn in honour of Apollo. MUELLER.

⁴² The Greek is ἀρίχως εὐρημά τι μουσῶν. But it is evident, that Plato, in citing this verse, means by ἀρίχως, "artlessly," or, as Cornarius renders it in Latin, "sine arte:" so Sydenham; who should have suggested ἀρίχων, as I have translated. The verse is an Anapæstic Paræmiac. Stalbaum refers to Fritzche in Quæst. Lucian. p. 128, where passages are quoted not in point.

⁴³ So Orpheus is called "sacer, interpresque deorum," by Horace, Art. Poet. 391. S.

whatever I shall ask about. Whenever you are spouting well any verses, and astonishing your audience the most, or when you are reciting how Ulysses,⁴⁴ leaping on the threshold (of his house), appeared manifest to the suitors, and poured out his arrows before their feet; or how Achilles rushed against Hector; or tell any of the tales of pity relating to Andromache, or Hecuba, or Priam; at such times are you quite in your senses, or beside yourself?⁴⁵ and does not your soul fancy itself carried away in a state of ecstasy by the deeds you are telling, whether they occur at Ithaca or Troy, ⁴⁶or how-ever else the verses may be.⁴⁶

Ion. How clear a proof have you, Socrates, produced! For so I will say, concealing nothing. For when I am reciting any tale of pity, my eyes are filled with tears; ⁴⁷but when any thing of horror, my hairs stand erect through fear, and my heart leaps.⁴⁷

Soc. What shall we say then, Ion? that the man is in his sound senses, when, decked in a many-tissued garb, and with a crown of gold, he bursts into tears at festivals and feasts, without having lost any of those (ornaments)? or feels a fear when he is standing in the midst of twenty thousand men, all friendly to him, and no one is stripping him or doing him an injury?

Ion. He is not, by Zeus, to confess the truth, Socrates.

[7.] Soc. Know you that you (rhapsodists) produce this very same effect upon the majority of your spectators.

Ion. I know it very well. For I am constantly looking down from my standing-place above upon those, who are weeping, or looking fiercely,⁴⁸ or astonished, in unison with ⁴⁴ The passages alluded to are Od. xxii. 2; Il. xxii. 311, and 405, and 437..

⁴⁵ So Cicero says of Æsop the actor, in Divinat. i. 37, "Vidi—in Æsopo tantum ardorem vultuum atque motuum, ut eum vis quædam abstraxisse a sensu mentis videretur." S.

^{46—48} The Greek is ἡ ὁρὴς ἀν καὶ τὰ ἔπη ἔχῃ. But Ficinus has "seu quocunque alio carmina rapiant te," translated by Shelley, "or wherever else the poem transports you." Ficinus, no doubt, found in his MS. ἡ ὁρὴς ὅ' ἀν τὰ ἔπη ἄχῃ.

^{47—48} Stalbaum quotes Sympos. p. 215, E. § 39, ἡ καρδία πηδᾷ καὶ δάκρυα ἰσχυραί, and refers to Abresch on Aristænet. ii. 5, Boissonad. on Eunap. p. 257, and Jacobs on Achill. Tat. p. 833.

⁴⁸ This is the literal meaning of δεινόν. But why the audience 'ld look so, I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus, Sydenham, or what is narrated. For indeed I must pay a great attention to them, in order that, if I set them weeping, I may laugh on receiving their money; but if laughing, that I may weep myself on losing their cash.

Soc. Know you not, then, that this spectator (of yours)⁴⁹ is the last of the rings, which, I said, receive their power from one another by means of the Heracleian stone? The middle ring are you the rhapsodist and the actor; but the first ring is the poet himself. By means of all these does the god draw, wherever it pleases him, the souls of men,⁵⁰ having suspended from each other the power.⁵⁰ And, as if from that stone, there is suspended a very numerous series of chorus-singers and dancers, and under-masters,⁵¹ hang the rings depending from the Muse, hanging sideways.⁵² But from one Muse one of the poets hangs; another from another.⁵³ And this we call by the expression "he is possessed;" for the (meaning) is very similar; since he is held fast.⁵³ From these first rings some

Shelley, who have translated respectively—"graviter," and, "as if horror seized them," and, "with eyes fixed earnestly on me."

⁴⁹ So Sydenham, as if he wished to read ὁ σὸς instead of οὗτος.

⁵⁰⁻⁵¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek, ἀνακρεμαννὸς ἐξ ἀλλήλων τὴν δύναμιν. The sense requires, "having imparted the power of hanging from each other."

of the poets hang, some from one, and others from others, and become inspired by them; some, for instance, Orpheus, others by Musæus; but the majority⁵⁴ are inspired by Homer, and held fast by him.⁵⁴ Of this number, Ion, you are one, and are possessed by Homer. Hence when any one sings the verses of any other poet, you fall asleep, and are at a loss what to say: but when any one recites a strain of that poet, you wake up immediately, and your soul dances (with joy),⁵⁵ and you are at no loss what to say; for you say, what you say, about Homer, not from art or science, but from a divine allotment, and through being possessed. (For)⁵⁶ the Corybantes have an acute perception of such music only, as belongs to the god by whom they are possessed, and are not wanting either in gestures or words, adapted to that melody; but care not for any other music. So you, Ion, when any one makes mention of Homer, are not at a loss, but are at a loss (when mention is made) of other poets. And this is the reason of that, about which you were asking, why as regards Homer you are not at a loss, but are so as regards other poets; because you are not by art, but by a divine allotment, a skilful panegyrist of Homer.

Ion. You say well, Socrates. I should, however, wonder if you can speak so well as to convince me that I panegyryze Homer through being possessed and mad. Nor, as I fancy, should I appear so to you, if you were to hear me speaking about Homer.

[8.] Soc. And willing I am indeed to hear you; but not before you shall have answered me this. On which of the subjects about which Homer speaks, do you speak well? For surely it is not about all.

Ion. Be assured, Socrates, there is nothing but what (I speak well about).

Soc. Surely you do not (speak) about those, of which you happen to know nothing, but which Homer mentions.

Ion. And what are those, which Homer mentions, but which I do not know?

that he was suspended from a god, for he is held by him, if he καίχεται—and wonders that Sydenham and Müller should have laboured so hard in explaining the passage.

⁵⁴—⁵⁴ From this passage it is evident why καίχεται and ἔχεται are said just before to be very similar in meaning.

⁵⁵ In Æsch. Cho. 156, the expression is ὀρχεῖται φόβῳ.

⁵⁶ Ficinus has “et—” but γὰρ has probably dropt out after ὥστερ—

Soc. Does not Homer speak much and often of 'arts; for instance, the art of chariot-driving? If I can remember the verses, I will repeat them to you.

Ion. I will recite them; for I remember them.

Soc. Recite me then what Nestor says to his son Antilochus, when advising him to be careful respecting the turning in the chariot-race, run in honour of Patroclus.

Ion. His words are these (in Il. xxiii. 335—340):

Thyself upon the polish'd chariot bend
To the left gently; but the right-hand horse
With goad and voice urge on, and somewhat yield,
Holding the reins; but let the left-hand steed
Come near the turn-post grazing, which almost
Of wheel well-made, let the nut seem to doubt
If it reach not; but stone to touch avoid.

Soc. It is enough. Now whether Homer does or does not, Ion, correctly express himself in these words, who would know the better, a physician or a charioteer?

Ion. A charioteer, undoubtedly.

Soc. Whether because he possesses that art, or for some other reason?

Ion. For no other than that (he possesses) the art.

Soc. Has not to each of the arts this been granted by the deity, to be able to know a work? for what we know by the pilot's art, we shall not know by the physician's.

Ion. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor what (we know) by the physician's art, (shall we know) by the builder's art.

Ion. Certainly not.

Soc. Is it not thus then as regards all the arts, that what we know by one art, we shall not know by another? But answer me this previous to that. Do not you admit that there is one art of one kind, and another art of another kind?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Do not you make use of the same proof as I do, that when there is a science, one of some things, and another of other things, I call one by one name, and the other by another; and do not you (call them) so?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. For surely ⁵⁷if of the same things there were some science, ⁵⁷why should we call one by one name, and another by another, when it would be possible to know the same things from both? as, for instance, I know that these fingers are five in number; and you know it, respecting them, the same as I do. Now were I to ask you, whether it was by the same art of arithmetic that both you and I know the same things, or by another art, you would surely say, by the same art.

^{57—57} This I cannot understand.

Ion. Yes.

[9.] Soc. The question then, which I was lately about to ask you, answer me now. Whether does it seem so to you, as regards all the arts, in this way, that it is necessary for the same art to know the things; and for a different art (to know) not the same things? but whether, if (the art) be different, it is necessary for it to know different things?

Ion. It seems to me, Socrates, in this way.

Soc. He therefore, who has not any art, will not be able to know what is said or done well, relating to that art.

Ion. You speak the truth.

Soc. As regards the verses, then, which you repeated, will you, or a charioteer, better know whether Homer says well or not?

Ion. A charioteer.

Soc. For you are a rhapsodist, but not a charioteer.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Now the art of a rhapsodist is different from that of a charioteer.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. If the science be different, it is conversant likewise about different things.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Well then, when Homer relates how Hecamede, the concubine of Nestor, gave to Machaon, when he was wounded, a potion to drink,⁵⁸ he says, composed

⁵⁸ Of Pramnian wine; and into it she grates,
With brazen grater, cheese from goat's milk made,
And for the potion onion as a relish;⁵⁹

to know thoroughly and well whether Homer says this cor-

⁵⁸ After πίνειν δίδωσι the words καὶ λέγει πρὸς οὗτως, which could not be inserted between δραν λέγει and φησιν, Ficinus has properly omitted.

⁵⁹—⁶⁰ In this quotation from Homer the author has brought together some verses separated from each other by an interval of nine lines. See Il. xi. 630 and 639. To the same passage Plato refers in Rep. iii. p. 406, A.

rectly or not, does it belong to the physician's, or the rhapsodist's art?

Ion. To the physician's.

Soc. Well then, where Homer (in Il. xxiv. 80) says,

She to the bottom went, just like the lead,
Which near the horn of bull, in meadows living,
(Is placed upon the line,) and rushes eager,
To fish, on raw flesh feeding, bringing fate—⁶⁰

shall we say that it belongs to the fisher's rather than to the rhapsodist's art, to decide on what he says, and whether correctly or not?

Ion. It is evident, Socrates, to the fisher's art.

[10.] Soc. Consider now, ⁶¹ you asking, if you asked me, ⁶¹ Since then, Socrates, you discover what it is fitting for each of these arts to decide upon in Homer, come, find me out, what as relating to the business of a prophet and the prophet's art, are the things which it is fitting for him to be able to know thoroughly, whether the poet has done well or ill—consider how easily and truly I could reply. For Homer, in the Odyssey, speaks frequently on the subject. For instance, where Theoclymenus the prophet, one of the race of Melampus, ⁶² says to the suitors—

⁶⁰ Why by doom fated suffer ye this ill?
Involved in the gloom of night are faces, heads,
And nether limbs; and ⁶³ burns the loud lament ⁶³
Fiercely, and cheeks with many tears are wet.
Of ghosts the porch is full, and full the hall,
To Erebus in darkness rushing; and the sun
From heaven is lost, and luckless mists come on. ⁶⁴

⁶⁰ I have adopted κῆρα, found in Homer, in lieu of its interpretation πῆμα, read here in all the MSS. but one. On the other hand, ἐμμεσανία here is far more elegant than ἐμβεβανία, read in the common text; which has arisen merely from the perpetual confusion of α (β) and μ.

^{61—61} Such is the literal version of the Greek—σοῦ ἱπομῖνον, εἰ ἔποιό με, where εἰ ἔποιό is evidently the interpretation of σοῦ ἱπομῖνον. Ficinus has—"Si præterea me interrogares," as if his MS. omitted σοῦ ἱπομῖνον.

⁶² See Od. xv. 225.

^{63—63} On the mixed metaphor in οἰμωγῇ δίδῃ see my note on Æsch. Prom. And to the passages there quoted I could now add a dozen more. The most apposite is "clamore incendunt cælum" in Virgil.

^{64—64} See Od. xx. 351—357, where however between the 4th and 5th verse is another, omitted here—"And walls and handsome rooms be-smear'd with blood."

And often too in the Iliad, for example in the fight near the mound-wall (of the Greeks). For there too he says (Il. xii. 200—207):

To them, while eager to pass on, an eagle,
High-flying bird, appear'd upon the left,
And the army check'd. For in its claws it bore
A snake, of size enormous, with blood stain'd,
Alive, and gasping, but of fight not yet
Regardless. For on twisting round, it bit
The breast of the bird, that held it, near the neck;
Who, smarting with the pain, let go its hold,
And sent it to the ground; and midst the throng
It fell; and the bird with the wind screaming flew.⁶⁵

These passages, and others of the same kind, shall I say, it belongs to the prophet to consider, and to judge of?

Ion. Yes, if you say what is true, Socrates.

Soc. And you too, Ion, speak the truth, in this. Come then, and, as I have selected for you from the Odyssey, and the Iliad, such passages as belong to the prophet, and the physician, and the fisherman, so do you select for me, since you are better versed in Homer than I am, such passages, Ion, as belong to the rhapsodist, and to the rhapsodist's art; which it is fitting for the rhapsodist to consider and judge of, (better than) other men.

Ion. ⁶⁶ I say, Socrates, all things.⁶⁶

Soc. You did not, Ion, say all. Or are you so forgetful? And yet it ill becomes a man, who is a rhapsodist, to be forgetful.

Ion. Of what then am I forgetful?

Soc. Do you not remember, you said that the rhapsodist's art is different from that of the charioteer?

Ion. I do remember it.

Soc. And did not you confess too, that, being different, it would know things different?

Ion. Yes, I did.

⁶⁵ I have adopted πίρρο, found in one MS., in lieu of ῥίρρο.—For a bird does not follow the wind, but flies with it; and especially when wounded; for it is then unable to make use of any muscular exertion, nor is it necessary when it is flying with the wind.

⁶⁶—⁶⁶ This I cannot understand, nor could Müller; unless Ion meant to generalize the assertion, which Socrates had confined to the art of the rhapsodist alone.

[11.] Soc. According to your own account then, the rhapsodist's art will not know all things, nor even the rhapsodist himself.

Ion. Except, perhaps, Socrates, things of such a kind.

Soc. By things of such a kind you mean such as belong nearly to all the other arts. Now what will (the rhapsodist) know, if (he knows) not all things.

Ion. He knows, I presume, what is proper for a man to speak, and what for a woman; and what for a slave, and what for a freeman; and what for him, who is commanded, and for him, who commands.

Soc. Do you mean that the rhapsodist will know better than the steersman, what it is proper for the commander of a ship, tost in a storm at sea, to say?

Ion. No. This at least the steersman (will know) better.⁶⁷

Soc. But what it is proper for a person governing a sick person to say, will the rhapsodist know better than the physician?

Ion. Not in this case.

Soc. But what is it proper for a slave, you say.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. For example, do you assert that, what it is fitting for a slave, who tends cattle, to say, when pacifying⁶⁸ cows that are in a savage state, the rhapsodist will know, but not the herdsman?

Ion. Not I indeed.

Soc. But what it is proper for a woman engaged in wool-work to say about working in wool?

Ion. No.

Soc. But he will know what it is proper for an army-leader to say, when exhorting the soldiers?

Ion. Yes. For such things the rhapsodist will know.

Soc. What then, is the rhapsodist's art that of an army-leader?

Ion. I should know⁶⁹ what it is fitting for an army-leader to say.

⁶⁷ The Greek is Οὐκ ἄλλὰ δὲ—But one MS. has Οὐκ ἄλλιον δὲ—Ficinus, "Non; sed gubernator melius hoc percipiet," whom I have followed.

⁶⁸ Nitzsch aptly refers to Politic. p. 268, A. § 11.

⁶⁹ Instead of γνοίην γοῦν ἄρ'—Sydenham suggested, γνοίην γοῦν ἄν, and so Bekker from MSS. Ficinus has "Intelligerem equidem, si opus esset."

Soc. Because you have, perhaps, the art of a general, Ion. For if you happened to be skilled in horsemanship and in harp-playing at the same time, you would have known those, who manage⁷⁰ horses well and ill. Now if I had asked you—By which of those arts, Ion, do you know those who manage horses well? Is it by that through which you are a horseman, or by that through which you are a harpist? what answer would you make me?

Ion. I should (answer), By that through which I am a horseman.

Soc. If then you knew thoroughly those who play well the harp, would you not confess that you knew them by that art, through which you are a harpist, but not through that, by which you are a horseman?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Since then you know the things relating to armies,⁷¹ do you know them by the art, through which you are a general, or by that, through which you are an excellent rhapsodist?

Ion. There seems to me no difference.

Soc. How say you that there is no difference? Say you that the art of the rhapsodist and of the general is one? Or are they two?

Ion. They seem to me at least to be one.

Soc. ⁷²Whoever then is a good rhapsodist, he happens to be likewise a good general.⁷²

Ion. By all means, Socrates.

Soc. And whoever happens to be a good general, is a good rhapsodist too.

Ion. This, I think, on the other hand does not seem to be true.

⁷¹ Instead of στρατηγικά, Ficinus evidently found in his MS. στρατηγικά, as shown by his version, "quæ ad imperatorem spectant," adopted by Sydenham.

⁷²⁻⁷³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. But Sydenham has what is preferable—"Whoever then happens to be a good rhapsodist, the same must be also a good general"—where "must be" has been obtained from "erit," in Ficinus. Sydenham's tacit alteration is supported by the next remark of Socrates.

Soc. But the other does seem so, ⁷³[that whoever is a good rhapsodist is also a good general.] ⁷³

Ion. Certainly.

Soc. Now are not you a rhapsodist, the best of the Greeks?

Ion. Very much, Socrates.

Soc. And are you also, Ion, a general, the best of all Greeks?

Ion. Be well assured, Socrates (of this); for I have learnt⁷⁴ that too from Homer.

[12.] Soc. Why then by the gods, Ion, do you, since you are amongst the Greeks the best, both as a general and a rhapsodist, go about acting the part of a rhapsodist before the Greeks, and not of a general. Does there seem to you a great need of a rhapsodist, crowned with a golden crown, but none of a general?

Ion. Yes. For our city, Socrates, is governed, and our forces commanded by your people, and there is no need of a general. But your city, or that of the Lacedæmonians, would not choose me for a general; for ye (both) conceive yourselves to be competent for that.

Soc. Know you not, Ion, O best of men, Apollodorus of Cyzicum?

Ion. Who is he?

Soc. He whom the Athenians have often selected as their general, although a foreigner, and Phanosthenes too⁷⁵ of Andros, and Heraclides⁷⁶ of Clazomenæ, whom this state, although they are foreigners, appoints to the command of armies and other offices in the government, through their having shown themselves men worthy of notice.⁷⁷ And will she not choose ⁷³⁻⁷⁵ The words within brackets are evidently an interpretation of ἴστω.

⁷⁴ So Sydenham from Ficinus, "hæc enim in Homeri scriptis didici? who doubtless found in his MS. ἴμαθον in lieu of μαθών: which may, however, be united to εἰ in the question of Socrates.

⁷⁵ As this Phanosthenes was sent against his countrymen to Andros by the Athenians, according to Xenophon in H. Gr. i. 5, 18, about Ol. 93. 2, Ast conceives that this dialogue was written shortly after that event.

Ion of Ephesus as her general, honour him should he seem worthy of notice? What, are not you Ephesians Athenians of old?⁷⁸ and is not Ephesus a city inferior to none? But as to yourself, Ion, if indeed you say truly, that you are able by art and science to praise Homer, you are doing wrong in that, after professing that you know many fine things, relating to Homer, and saying that you would make a display, you are cheating me, and want much from making it; so that, although I have been for a long time earnestly making the request, you are unwilling to mention those things, in which you are so skilled; but you really become, like Proteus, of many forms,⁷⁹ turning yourself topsy turvy, until at last you escape me, and start up a general, in order that you may not show how great you are in the wisdom relating to Homer. If then you really are an artist, such as I just now spoke of, and after promising to make a display relating to Homer, you deceive me, you are an unjust man; but if you are not an artist, but are, by a divine allotment, inspired by Homer, and although you know nothing, are saying many fine things about the poet, as I have stated respecting you, you are doing no wrong. Choose then, whether you wish to be deemed by us a man unjust, or divine.

Ion. Great is the difference, Socrates; for it is much better to be deemed divine.

Soc. Now this better thing, Ion, is in your power (to obtain) at our hands, to be divine, and a praiser of Homer, but not from art.

but of the Athenian people for the conduct they adopted to the persons here mentioned.

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST ALCIBIADES.

SINGULAR, says Stalbaum, has been the fate of the dialogue that passes under the name of the First Alcibiades. For after it had been held in the highest honour by a long line of admirers, amongst the Neo-Platonists of the olden time, attempts have been made during the last half-century by Schleiermacher and Ast to displace it from its former pedestal. So many and such gross faults, relating to the matter and manner, say those two scholars, are to be found in the dialogue, as to lead to the conclusion of its being quite unworthy of its reputed author. On the other hand, Socher and Stalbaum are of opinion that not a single substantial reason can be assigned for doubting its genuineness; and with the latter I confess I am disposed to agree; and shall continue to do so, until some definite rules are laid down to enable us to assert that the men, who passed their whole lives in the study of the philosophers of antiquity, were cheated by a shadow, and unable, like the people of Cuma, in the Æsopo-Socratic fable, to discover the long ears of an asinine imitator, peeping out of the lion's hide of the original genius.

Be however the author who he may, the dialogue itself is well worth the perusal of those, who, like Alcibiades, pride themselves on the union of natural and artificial advantages; and of others too, under less favourable circumstances, who fancy themselves fit to appear in public life, and competent to direct the affairs of a state, without having previously undergone that mental training, which alone enables a person to govern first himself, and then his fellow-men. And happy would it have been for his native Athens, and indeed for the whole of Greece, and other countries, had Alcibiades of the poets hang, some from one, and others from others, and become inspired by them; some, for instance, Orpheus, others by Musæus; but the majority⁵⁴ are inspired by Homer, and held fast by him.⁵⁴ Of this number, Ion, you are one, and are possessed by Homer. Hence when any one sings the verses of any other poet, you fall asleep, and are at a loss what to say: but when any one recites a strain of that poet, you wake up immediately, and your soul dances (with joy),⁵⁵ and you are at no loss what to say; for you say, what you say, about Homer, not from art or science, but from a divine allotment, and through being possessed. (For)⁵⁶ the Corybantes have an acute perception of such music only, as belongs to the god by whom they are possessed, and are not wanting either in gestures or words, adapted to that melody; but care not for any other music. So you, Ion, when any one makes mention of Homer, are not at a loss, but are at a loss (when mention is made) of other poets. And this is the reason of that, about which you were asking, why as regards Homer you are not at a loss, but are so as regards other poets; because you are not by art, but by a divine allotment, a skilful panegyrist of Homer.

Ion. You say well, Socrates. I should, however, wonder if you can speak so well as to convince me that I panegyryze Homer through being possessed and mad. Nor, as I fancy, should I appear so to you, if you were to hear me speaking about Homer.

[8.] Soc. And willing I am indeed to hear you; but not before you shall have answered me this. On which of the subjects about which Homer speaks, do you speak well? For surely it is not about all.

Ion. Be assured, Socrates, there is nothing but what (I speak well about).

Soc. Surely you do not (speak) about those, of which you happen to know nothing, but which Homer mentions.

Ion. And what are those, which Homer mentions, but which I do not know?

that he was suspended from a god, for he is held by him, if he καρίχεται "—and wonders that Sydenham and Müller should have laboured so hard in explaining the passage.

⁵⁴—⁵⁴ From this passage it is evident why καρίχεται and ἔχεται are said just before to be very similar in meaning.

⁵⁵ In Æsch. Cho. 156, the expression is ὀρχεῖται πόβῳ.

⁵⁶ Ficinus has "et—" but γὰρ has probably dropt out after ὥστε—

Soc. Does not Homer speak much and often of 'arts; for instance, the art of chariot-driving? If I can remember the verses, I will repeat them to you.

Ion. I will recite them; for I remember them.

Soc. Recite me then what Nestor says to his son Antilochus, when advising him to be careful respecting the turning in the chariot-race, run in honour of Patroclus.

Ion. His words are these (in Il. xxiii. 335—340):

Thyself upon the polish'd chariot bend
To the left gently; but the right-hand horse
With goad and voice urge on, and somewhat yield,
Holding the reins; but let the left-hand steed
Come near the turn-post grazing, which almost
Of wheel well-made, let the nut seem to doubt
If it reach not; but stone to touch avoid.

Soc. It is enough. Now whether Homer does or does not, Ion, correctly express 'himself in these words, who would know the better, a physician or a charioteer?

Ion. A charioteer, undoubtedly.

Soc. Whether because he possesses that art, or for some other reason?

Ion. For no other than that (he possesses) the art.

Soc. Has not to each of the arts this been granted by the deity, to be able to know a work? for what we know by the pilot's art, we shall not know by the physician's.

Ion. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor what (we know) by the physician's art, (shall we know) by the builder's art.

Ion. Certainly not.

Soc. Is it not thus then as regards all the arts, that what we know by one art, we shall not know by another? But answer me this previous to that. Do not you admit that there is one art of one kind, and another art of another kind?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Do not you make use of the same proof as I do, that when there is a science, one of some things, and another of other 'things, I call one by one name, and the other by another; and do not you (call them) so?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. For surely ⁵⁷if of the same things there were some science, ⁵⁷why should we call one by one name, and another by another, when it would be possible to know the same things from both? as, for instance, I know that these fingers are five in number; and you know it, respecting them, the same as I do. Now were I to ask you, whether it was by the same art of arithmetic that both you and I know the same things, or by another art, you would surely say, by the same art.

^{57—57} This I cannot understand.

Ion. Yes.

[9.] Soc. The question then, which I was lately about to ask you, answer me now. Whether does it seem so to you, as regards all the arts, in this way, that it is necessary for the same art to know the things; and for a different art (to know) not the same things? but whether, if (the art) be different, it is necessary for it to know different things?

Ion. It seems to me, Socrates, in this way.

Soc. He therefore, who has not any art, will not be able to know what is said or done well, relating to that art.

Ion. You speak the truth.

Soc. As regards the verses, then, which you repeated, will you, or a charioteer, better know whether Homer says well or not?

Ion. A charioteer.

Soc. For you are a rhapsodist, but not a charioteer.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Now the art of a rhapsodist is different from that of a charioteer.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. If the science be different, it is conversant likewise about different things.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Well then, when Homer relates how Hecamede, the concubine of Nestor, gave to Machaon, when he was wounded, a potion to drink,⁵⁸ he says, composed

⁵⁸ Of Pramnian wine; and into it she grates,
With brazen grater, cheese from goat's milk made,
And for the potion onion as a relish;⁵⁹

to know thoroughly and well whether Homer says this cor-

⁵⁸ After πίνειν δίδωσι the words καὶ λίγει πῶς οὕτως, which could not be inserted between δραν λίγη and ψησιν, Ficinus has properly omitted.

⁵⁹—⁶⁰ In this quotation from Homer the author has brought together some verses separated from each other by an interval of nine lines. See II. xi. 630 and 639. To the same passage Plato refers in Rep. iii. p. 406, A.

rectly or not, does it belong to the physician's, or the rhapsodist's art?

Ion. To the physician's.

Soc. Well then, where Homer (in Il. xxiv. 80) says,

She to the bottom went, just like the lead,
Which near the horn of bull, in meadows living,
(Is placed upon the line,) and rushes eager,
To fish, on raw flesh feeding, bringing fate—⁶⁰

shall we say that it belongs to the fisher's rather than to the rhapsodist's art, to decide on what he says, and whether correctly or not?

Ion. It is evident, Socrates, to the fisher's art.

[10.] Soc. Consider now, ⁶¹ you asking, if you asked me, ⁶¹ Since then, Socrates, you discover what it is fitting for each of these arts to decide upon in Homer, come, find me out, what as relating to the business of a prophet and the prophet's art, are the things which it is fitting for him to be able to know thoroughly, whether the poet has done well or ill—consider how easily and truly I could reply. For Homer, in the Odyssey, speaks frequently on the subject. For instance, where Theoclymenus the prophet, one of the race of Melampus, ⁶² says to the suitors—

⁶⁰ Why by doom fated suffer ye this ill?
Involved in the gloom of night are faces, heads,
And nether limbs; and ⁶³ burns the loud lament ⁶³
Fiercely, and cheeks with many tears are wet.
Of ghosts the porch is full, and full the hall,
To Erebus in darkness rushing; and the sun
From heaven is lost, and luckless mists come on.⁶⁴

⁶¹—⁶¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek—σοῦ ἐρομένον, εἰ ἔποιό μ, where εἰ ἔποιό is evidently the interpretation of σοῦ ἐρομένον. Ficinus has—"Si præterea me interrogares," as if his MS. omitted σοῦ ἐρομένον.

⁶² See Od. xv. 225.

⁶⁴—⁶⁴ See Od. xx. 351—357, where however between the 4th and 5th verse is another, omitted here—"And walls and handsome rooms besmeared with blood."

And often too in the Iliad, for example in the fight near the mound-wall (of the Greeks). For there too he says (Il. xii. 200—207):

To them, while eager to pass on, an eagle,
High-flying bird, appear'd upon the left,
And the army check'd. For in its claws it bore
A snake, of size enormous, with blood stain'd,
Alive, and gasping, but of fight not yet
Regardless. For on twisting round, it bit
The breast of the bird, that held it, near the neck;
Who, smarting with the pain, let go its hold,
And sent it to the ground; and midst the throng
It fell; and the bird with the wind screaming flew.⁶⁵

These passages, and others of the same kind, shall I say, it belongs to the prophet to consider, and to judge of?

Ion. Yes, if you say what is true, Socrates.

Soc. And you too, Ion, speak the truth, in this. Come then, and, as I have selected for you from the Odyssey, and the Iliad, such passages as belong to the prophet, and the physician, and the fisherman, so do you select for me, since you are better versed in Homer than I am, such passages, Ion, as belong to the rhapsodist, and to the rhapsodist's art; which it is fitting for the rhapsodist to consider and judge of, (better than) other men.

Ion. ⁶⁶ I say, Socrates, all things.⁶⁶

Soc. You did not, Ion, say all. Or are you so forgetful? And yet it ill becomes a man, who is a rhapsodist, to be forgetful.

Ion. Of what then am I forgetful?

Soc. Do you not remember, you said that the rhapsodist's art is different from that of the charioteer?

Ion. I do remember it.

Soc. And did not you confess too, that, being different, it would know things different?

Ion. Yes, I did.

⁶⁵ I have adopted πέρεο, found in one MS., in lieu of ῥεο.—For a bird does not follow the wind, but flies with it; and especially when wounded; for it is then unable to make use of any muscular exertion, nor is it necessary when it is flying with the wind.

⁶⁶—⁶⁶ This I cannot understand, nor could Müller; unless Ion meant to generalize the assertion, which Socrates had confined to the art of the rhapsodist alone.

[11.] Soc. According to your own account then, the rhapsodist's art will not know all things, nor even the rhapsodist himself.

Ion. Except, perhaps, Socrates, things of such a kind.

Soc. By things of such a kind you mean such as belong nearly to all the other arts. Now what will (the rhapsodist), know, if (he knows) not all things.

Ion. He knows, I presume, what is proper for a man to speak, and what for a woman; and what for a slave, and what for a freeman; and what for him, who is commanded, and for him, who commands.

Soc. Do you mean that the rhapsodist will know better than the steersman, what it is proper for the commander of a ship, tost in a storm at sea, to say?

Ion. No. This at least the steersman (will know) better.⁶⁷

Soc. But what it is proper for a person governing a sick person to say, will the rhapsodist know better than the physician?

Ion. Not in this case.

Soc. But what is it proper for a slave, you say.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. For example, do you assert that, what it is fitting for a slave, who tends cattle, to say, when pacifying⁶⁸ cows that are in a savage state, the rhapsodist will know, but not the herdsman?

Ion. Not I indeed.

Soc. But what it is proper for a woman engaged in wool-work to say about working in wool?

Ion. No.

Soc. But he will know what it is proper for an army-leader to say, when exhorting the soldiers?

Ion. Yes. For such things the rhapsodist will know.

Soc. What then, is the rhapsodist's art that of an army-leader?

Ion. I should know⁶⁹ what it is fitting for an army-leader to say.

⁶⁷ The Greek is Οὐκ ἀλλὰ δ—But one MS. has Οὐ· κάλλιον δ—Ficinus, "Non; sed gubernator melius hoc percipiet," whom I have followed.

⁶⁸ Nitzsch aptly refers to Politic. p. 268, A. § 11.

⁶⁹ Instead of γνοίην γούν ἄρ'—Sydenham suggested, γνοίην γούν ἄν, and so Bekker from MSS. Ficinus has "Intelligerem equidem, si opus esset."

Soc. Because you have, perhaps, the art of a general, Ion. For if you happened to be skilled in horsemanship and in harp-playing at the same time, you would have known those, who manage⁷⁰ horses well and ill. Now if I had asked you—By which of those arts, Ion, do you know those who manage horses well? Is it by that through which you are a horseman, or by that through which you are a harpist? what answer would you make me?

Ion. I should (answer), By that through which I am a horseman.

Soc. If then you knew thoroughly those who play well the harp, would you not confess that you knew them by that art, through which you are a harpist, but not through that, by which you are a horseman?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Since then you know the things relating to armies,⁷¹ do you know them by the art, through which you are a general, or by that, through which you are an excellent rhapsodist?

Ion. There seems to me no difference.

Soc. How say you that there is no difference? Say you that the art of the rhapsodist and of the general is one? Or are they two?

Ion. They seem to me at least to be one.

Soc. ⁷²Whoever then is a good rhapsodist, he happens to be likewise a good general.⁷²

Ion. By all means, Socrates.

Soc. And whoever happens to be a good general, is a good rhapsodist too.

Ion. This, I think, on the other hand does not seem to be true.

⁷⁰ As ἰππάζεσθαι is a verb deponent, it is evident that ροῦς has dropt out after ἵππους, similar to ροῦς εὖ ἰππάζομενους ἵππους, in the very next sentence.

⁷¹ Instead of στρατιωρικῇ, Ficinus evidently found in his MS. στρατηγικῇ, as shown by his version, "quæ ad imperatorem spectant," adopted by Sydenham.

⁷²⁻⁷³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. But Sydenham has what is preferable—"Whoever then happens to be a good rhapsodist, the same must be also a good general"—where "must be" has been obtained from "erit," in Ficinus. Sydenham's tacit alteration is supported by the next remark of Socrates.

Soc. But the other does seem so, ⁷³[that whoever is a good rhapsodist is also a good general.] ⁷³

Ion. Certainly.

Soc. Now are not you a rhapsodist, the best of the Greeks?

Ion. Very much, Socrates.

Soc. And are you also, Ion, a general, the best of all Greeks?

Ion. Be well assured, Socrates (of this); for I have learnt ⁷⁴that too from Homer.

[12.] Soc. Why then by the gods, Ion, do you, since you are amongst the Greeks the best, both as a general and a rhapsodist, go about acting the part of a rhapsodist before the Greeks, and not of a general. Does there seem to you a great need of a rhapsodist, crowned with a golden crown, but none of a general?

Ion. Yes. For our city, Socrates, is governed, and our forces commanded by your people, and there is no need of a general. But your city, or that of the Lacedæmonians, would not choose me for a general; for ye (both) conceive yourselves to be competent for that.

Soc. Know you not, Ion, O best of men, Apollodorus of Cyzicum?

Ion. Who is he?

Soc. He whom the Athenians have often selected as their general, although a foreigner, and Phanosthenes too ⁷⁵ of Andros, and Heraclides ⁷⁶ of Clazomenæ, whom this state, although they are foreigners, appoints to the command of armies and other offices in the government, through their having shown themselves men worthy of notice. ⁷⁷ And will she not choose ⁷³⁻⁷⁵ The words within brackets are evidently an interpretation of ἰσχυρο.

⁷⁴ So Sydenham from Ficinus, "hæc enim in Homeri scriptis didici? who doubtless found in his MS. ἔμαθον in lieu of μαθών: which may, however, be united to εἰ in the question of Socrates.

⁷⁵ As this Phanosthenes was sent against his countrymen to Andros by the Athenians, according to Xenophon in H. Gr. i. 5, 18, about Ol. 93. 2, Ast conceives that this dialogue was written shortly after that event.

⁷⁶ Both Heraclides and Apollodorus are mentioned by Ælian in Var. Hist. xiv. 5, who however drew all his information from this passage, as remarked by Perizonius.

Ion of Ephesus as her general, honour him should he seem worthy of notice? What, are not you Ephesians Athenians of old?⁷⁸ and is not Ephesus a city inferior to none? But as to yourself, Ion, if indeed you say truly, that you are able by art and science to praise Homer, you are doing wrong in that, after professing that you know many fine things, relating to Homer, and saying that you would make a display, you are cheating me, and want much from making it; so that, although I have been for a long time earnestly making the request, you are unwilling to mention those things, in which you are so skilled; but you really become, like Proteus, of many forms,⁷⁹ turning yourself topsy turvy, until at last you escape me, and start up a general, in order that you may not show how great you are in the wisdom relating to Homer. If then you really are an artist, such as I just now spoke of, and after promising to make a display relating to Homer, you deceive me, you are an unjust man; but if you are not an artist, but are, by a divine allotment, inspired by Homer, and although you know nothing, are saying many fine things about the poet, as I have stated respecting you, you are doing no wrong. Choose then, whether you wish to be deemed by us a man unjust, or divine.

Ion. Great is the difference, Socrates; for it is much better to be deemed divine.

Soc. Now this better thing, Ion, is in your power (to obtain) at our hands, to be divine, and a praiser of Homer, but not from art.

but of the Athenian people for the conduct they adopted to the persons here mentioned.

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST ALCIBIADES.

SINGULAR, says Stalbaum, has been the fate of the dialogue that passes under the name of the First Alcibiades. For after it had been held in the highest honour by a long line of admirers, amongst the Neo-Platonists of the olden time, attempts have been made during the last half-century by Schleiermacher and Ast to displace it from its former pedestal. So many and such gross faults, relating to the matter and manner, say those two scholars, are to be found in the dialogue, as to lead to the conclusion of its being quite unworthy of its reputed author. On the other hand, Socher and Stalbaum are of opinion that not a single substantial reason can be assigned for doubting its genuineness; and with the latter I confess I am disposed to agree; and shall continue to do so, until some definite rules are laid down to enable us to assert that the men, who passed their whole lives in the study of the philosophers of antiquity, were cheated by a shadow, and unable, like the people of Cuma, in the Æsopo-Socratic fable, to discover the long ears of an asinine imitator, peeping out of the lion's hide of the original genius.

Be however the author who he may, the dialogue itself is well worth the perusal of those, who, like Alcibiades, pride themselves on the union of natural and artificial advantages; and of others too, under less favourable circumstances, who fancy themselves fit to appear in public life, and competent to direct the affairs of a state, without having previously undergone that mental training, which alone enables a person to govern first himself, and then his fellow-men. And happy would it have been for his native Athens, and indeed for the whole of Greece, and other countries, had Alcibiades been as ready to practise the precepts of philosophy, as he was to listen to them. For we learn from Xenophon, that, so long as he was a follower of Socrates, his conduct was as praiseworthy, as it was the reverse when, after leaving the pacific ocean of philosophy, he embarked on the stormy sea of politics, in which he eventually lost his character, his fortune, and his life.

THE FIRST ALCIBIADES.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.
SOCRATES, ALCIBIADES.

SOCRATES.

[1.] You feel some wonder, I think, son of Clinias, that I, who was the first of your admirers, am now, when all the rest have ceased to be so, the only one who has not withdrawn himself; and that, while the others were plaguing you with their conversation, I did for so many years never speak a word to you. For this behaviour of mine the reason is to be found not in any obstacle arising from man, but from a dæmon, of whose power you shall hear hereafter. But as it no longer offers any opposition, I have come to you now; and I am in good hopes that for the future likewise it will be no impediment. By reflecting, however, during the interval, I nearly thoroughly understand what is your position with respect to your admirers. For though they were many, and men who thought highly of themselves, yet there is not one, who has not gone away from you, through their being surpassed by you in self-conceit.¹ Now the reason for your thinking so highly of yourself I am desirous of detailing. You assert then, that you are in nothing inferior to any man. For what is your own, beginning from the body and ending in the mind, is so great, as to stand in need of nothing. [2.] In the first place, you fancy yourself to be very handsome,² and of a great size. And in this it is evident to every one, who can see, that you are not mistaken. In the next place, you are of a family the most youth-like³ in your own city, which is the greatest of any in Greece; and that you have friends here, and relations on your father's side, very numerous and very powerful, ready, if need be, to assist you; and those too on your mother's side are neither inferior nor fewer. But greater than all I have mentioned taken together, is the influence you possess through Pericles, the son of Xanthippus, whom your father left as guardian to yourself and brother; (that Pericles) who is able to do what he pleases, not only in this city, but through all Greece, and with many and mighty clans of Barbarians. And I will add too, that you are one of the wealthy; although, on this point, you seem to me to value yourself the least. Boasting yourself then highly on all these advantages, you have acted the lord over your admirers; and they, feeling their inferiority, have become your slaves. And of this you are very sensible; and hence I know full well, that you feel a wonder at what I have in my thoughts, in that I do not withdraw myself, and what is the hope I entertain in remaining, when all the rest have gone away.

[3.] Alc. Perhaps, Socrates, you are not aware that you have anticipated me a little. For I really had it in my mind to come to you previously, and to ask you these very questions—What can you possibly mean, and looking to what hope are you plaguing me, and, wherever I am, are perpetually present yourself? For I do in truth wonder what your business can be with me; and I should very gladly hear.

Soc. You will hear me then, as is likely, very readily, if, as you say, you are really desirous of knowing what I have in my thoughts. I speak then as to one 'who will hear, and stay.'⁴

² That Alcibiades, says Proclus, was of large size and of great beauty is evident from his being called the general object of love in the whole of Greece; and from the saying of Antisthenes, that, if Achilles were not such as Alcibiades is, he was not in reality beautiful; and from the fact of Hermæ being modelled after him. T.

³ By νεανικωτάτου Stalbaum understands "the most brave," or "most manly." Ficinus has "nobilissimo"—what the sense requires. Plato wrote, I suspect, μεγακλειστάτου—in allusion to Megaclees, whose daughter, Deinomache, was the mother of Alcibiades.

⁴ Ficinus has avoided the ὑστερον πρότερον by translating, as Plato probably wrote, "expectanti et auscultaturo."

Alc. Entirely so. Speak then.

Soc. But mark, for it will be a thing not of wonder, if, as I begin with difficulty, I should with difficulty likewise make an end.

Alc. Speak, my good man, for I will listen.

Soc. Speak then I must; and though it is a hard task for an admirer to address himself to him, who is not inferior to his admirers, yet I must dare to speak my mind. [4.] If, Alcibiades, I had seen you satisfied with the advantages which I have just now detailed, and that you conceived you ought to pass your life amongst them, I should long since have withdrawn myself from all the love I bear; at least so I persuade myself. But I will now convict you of having other thoughts relating to yourself; and by so doing you will know, how I have continued keeping my attention directed towards you. For you appear to me such that, if any god were to say to you, "Are you willing, Alcibiades, to live possessing what you now do, or to die instantly, unless you are permitted to possess things still greater?" you would prefer to die. But in what kind of hope are you now living? I will unfold. (For⁵) you conceive that, if you were to come rather quickly before a meeting of the Athenian people—and this will take place within a few days—you will be able to show that you are worthy of being honoured in a way that neither Pericles nor any one else of those, who have ever existed, (was worthy); and after you have shown this, that you will possess the greatest power in the state; and that if you are the man of the greatest influence here, you will be so amongst the rest of the Greeks; and not only amongst the Greeks, but amongst the Barbarians likewise, as many as inhabit the same continent with us.⁶ And further, if the very same god were to say to you that—It is necessary⁷ for you to be the master here in Europe, but that it will not be allowed you to pass over into Asia, nor to concern yourself with affairs there—it appears to me that you would not even on these terms be willing to live, unless you could fill the mouths, so to say, of all men with your name and power; and you would deem, I fancy, that no man ever lived, except Cyrus and Xerxes, worth mentioning. Now, that you do entertain such hopes I know full well, and speak not from conjecture merely. [5.] Perhaps, you will say, as being convinced that I am speaking the truth—What has all this to do with the reason, which you said you would tell, why you have not withdrawn yourself from me? I will tell you then, my dear son of Clinias and Dinomache. That to all these thoughts of yours a finish should be put, is impossible without my help; so great power do, I think, I possess with regard to your affairs and to yourself to boot. Hence I have long ago thought that the god⁸ did not permit me to converse with you; for whom I have waited, until he should permit. For as you have a hope of ⁹being able to show before the state that you are worth every thing to it, and after having shown it, that there is nothing that you will not be able to do forthwith,⁹ so do I have a hope that I shall possess the greatest power over you, after having shown that I am worth every thing to you;¹⁰ and that neither guardian, nor relation, nor any one else, is able to procure you the power you desire, except myself, with the assistance, however, of the god. While therefore you were rather young, and before you were filled with these hopes, the god, it seems to me, would not permit me to discourse with you, lest I should converse in vain; but, now he has permitted; for now you will hearken to me.

⁶ By these are meant the Macedonians, Thracians, and others. For otherwise οἱ βάρβαροι would mean the Asiatics.

[6.] Alc. Much more unreasonable, Socrates, do you appear to me now, since you have begun to speak, than when you followed me in silence: and yet you were at that time very much a person of such kind to ¹¹look upon. Whether I have such thoughts, or not, you, it seems, know with certainty; so that were I to deny it, the denial would not avail me to persuade you an atom the more. Let it then be so. But if I have such thoughts ever so much, can you tell me

⁸ That is, the demon of Socrates. T.

⁹ Since all the words between the numerals are wanting in the three oldest MSS., Buttman was the first to reject them as an interpolation from § 4, and his idea is adopted by Schleiermacher and Stalbaum.

¹⁰ Sydenham was the first to remark that εἰ, requisite to preserve the balance of the sentences, had dropt out; which the three oldest MSS. have subsequently supplied.

¹¹ By "such a kind," is meant "unreasonable."

how they will be accomplished through you ; but without your help they never can be ?

Soc. Do you ask me, whether I am able to make a long harangue, such as you are accustomed to hear ? For if so, such is not my ability. But yet I should be able, I think, to show you, that such is the case, if you are willing to do me only one small piece of service.

Alc. If you mean some service not difficult, I am willing.

Soc. Does it seem to you difficult to give answers to questions ?

Alc. Not difficult at all.

Soc. Answer then.

Alc. Ask.

Soc. Shall I ask you then as having the thoughts, which I say you are thinking of ?

Alc. Be it so, if you will ; in order that I may know what you will say.

[7.] Soc. Well then. You have it in your mind, as I said, to go and consult with the Athenians within not a long time. If then, when you were just about to mount the platform, I were to lay hold of you, and to say—"Since the Athenians are thinking, Alcibiades, about deliberating upon some matter, are you rising up to give them advice ? Is it, since¹² about what you know better than they do ?" What answer would you make ?

Alc. I would assuredly answer—About what I know better than they do.

Soc. On those subjects, then, which you happen to know, you are a good counsellor ?

Alc. How not ?

Soc. Do you know those things only, which you have learnt from others, or found out yourself ?

Alc. What other things are there ?

Soc. Is it then possible that you should ever have learnt, or found out, any thing, which you were not willing to learn, or to search out by yourself ?

Alc. It is not.

Soc. What then, have you ever been willing to search out or learn what you thought you knew ?

¹² Ficinus, unable, it would seem, to understand ἀρ' ἐπειδὴ, has omitted ἐπειδὴ entirely. Stephens, too, was equally in the dark. Plato wrote, I suspect, ἀρὰ σπεύδεις—i. e. Do you hasten (to advise) ?—

Soc. Because you have, perhaps, the art of a general, Ion. For if you happened to be skilled in horsemanship and in harp-playing at the same time, you would have known those, who manage⁷⁰ horses well and ill. Now if I had asked you—By which of those arts, Ion, do you know those who manage horses well? Is it by that through which you are a horseman, or by that through which you are a harpist? what answer would you make me?

Ion. I should (answer), By that through which I am a horseman.

Soc. If then you knew thoroughly those who play well the harp, would you not confess that you knew them by that art, through which you are a harpist, but not through that, by which you are a horseman?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Since then you know the things relating to armies,⁷¹ do you know them by the art, through which you are a general, or by that, through which you are an excellent rhapsodist?

Ion. There seems to me no difference.

Soc. How say you that there is no difference? Say you that the art of the rhapsodist and of the general is one? Or are they two?

Ion. They seem to me at least to be one.

Soc. ⁷²Whoever then is a good rhapsodist, he happens to be likewise a good general.⁷²

Ion. By all means, Socrates.

Soc. And whoever happens to be a good general, is a good rhapsodist too.

Ion. This, I think, on the other hand does not seem to be true.

⁷¹ Instead of στρατιωτικῇ, Ficinus evidently found in his MS. στρατηγικῇ, as shown by his version, "quæ ad imperatorem spectant," adopted by Sydenham.

⁷² Such is the literal version of the Greek. But Sydenham has what is preferable—"Whoever then happens to be a good rhapsodist, the same must be also a good general"—where "must be" has been obtained from "erit," in Ficinus. Sydenham's tacit alteration is supported by the next remark of Socrates.

Soc. But the other does seem so, ⁷³[that whoever is a good rhapsodist is also a good general.] ⁷³

Ion. Certainly.

Soc. Now are not you a rhapsodist, the best of the Greeks?

Ion. Very much, Socrates.

Soc. And are you also, Ion, a general, the best of all Greeks?

Ion. Be well assured, Socrates (of this); for I have learnt ⁷⁴that too from Homer.

[12.] Soc. Why then by the gods, Ion, do you, since you are amongst the Greeks the best, both as a general and a rhapsodist, go about acting the part of a rhapsodist before the Greeks, and not of a general. Does there seem to you a great need of a rhapsodist, crowned with a golden crown, but none of a general?

Ion. Yes. For our city, Socrates, is governed, and our forces commanded by your people, and there is no need of a general. But your city, or that of the Lacedæmonians, would not choose me for a general; for ye (both) conceive yourselves to be competent for that.

Soc. Know you not, Ion, O best of men, Apollodorus of Cyzicum?

Ion. Who is he?

Soc. He whom the Athenians have often selected as their general, although a foreigner, and Phanosthenes too ⁷⁵of Andros, and Heraclides ⁷⁶of Clazomenæ, whom this state, although they are foreigners, appoints to the command of armies and other offices in the government, through their having shown themselves men worthy of notice. ⁷⁷And will she not choose ⁷³⁻⁷⁵ The words within brackets are evidently an interpretation of ἰσχυρο.

⁷⁴ So Sydenham from Ficinus, "hæc enim in Homeri scriptis didici? who doubtless found in his MS. ἔμαθον in lieu of μαθών: which may, however, be united to εἰ in the question of Socrates.

⁷⁵ As this Phanosthenes was sent against his countrymen to Andros by the Athenians, according to Xenophon in H. Gr. i. 5, 18, about Ol. 93. 2, Ast conceives that this dialogue was written shortly after that event.

⁷⁶ Both Heraclides and Apollodorus are mentioned by Ælian in Var. Hist. xiv. 5, who however drew all his information from this passage, as remarked by Perizonius.

⁷⁷ This praise Athenæus, in xi. p. 506, A., considers to be ironical, and hence he infers that Plato was not content to speak ill of poets alone,

Ion of Ephesus as her general, honour him should he seem worthy of notice? What, are not you Ephesians Athenians of old?⁷⁸ and is not Ephesus a city inferior to none? But as to yourself, Ion, if indeed you say truly, that you are able by art and science to praise Homer, you are doing wrong in that, after professing that you know many fine things, relating to Homer, and saying that you would make a display, you are cheating me, and want much from making it; so that, although I have been for a long time earnestly making the request, you are unwilling to mention those things, in which you are so skilled; but you really become, like Proteus, of many forms,⁷⁹ turning yourself topsy turvy, until at last you escape me, and start up a general, in order that you may not show how great you are in the wisdom relating to Homer. If then you really are an artist, such as I just now spoke of, and after promising to make a display relating to Homer, you deceive me, you are an unjust man; but if you are not an artist, but are, by a divine allotment, inspired by Homer, and although you know nothing, are saying many fine things about the poet, as I have stated respecting you, you are doing no wrong. Choose then, whether you wish to be deemed by us a man unjust, or divine.

Ion. Great is the difference, Socrates; for it is much better to be deemed divine.

Soc. Now this better thing, Ion, is in your power (to obtain) at our hands, to be divine, and a praiser of Homer, but not from art.

but of the Athenian people for the conduct they adopted to the persons here mentioned.

⁷⁸ Ephesus was colonized by some Athenian emigrants under the command of a son of Codrus. See Ruhnken on Velleius Patere. i. 4.

⁷⁹ On the changes of form, which Proteus could assume, it will be sufficient to refer to Hom. Od. iv. 455, Virgil, G. iv., and the commentators on Plato, Euthyph. p. 15, D., ὡς περ ὁ Πρωτεύς—στρεφόμενος ἄνω καὶ κάτω

INTRODUCTION TO THE FIRST ALCIBIADES.

SINGULAR, says Stalbaum, has been the fate of the dialogue that passes under the name of the First Alcibiades. For after it had been held in the highest honour by a long line of admirers, amongst the Neo-Platonists of the olden time, attempts have been made during the last half-century by Schleiermacher and Ast to displace it from its former pedestal. So many and such gross faults, relating to the matter and manner, say those two scholars, are to be found in the dialogue, as to lead to the conclusion of its being quite unworthy of its reputed author. On the other hand, Socher and Stalbaum are of opinion that not a single substantial reason can be assigned for doubting its genuineness; and with the latter I confess I am disposed to agree; and shall continue to do so, until some definite rules are laid down to enable us to assert that the men, who passed their whole lives in the study of the philosophers of antiquity, were cheated by a shadow, and unable, like the people of Cuma, in the Æsopo-Socratic fable, to discover the long ears of an asinine imitator, peeping out of the lion's hide of the original genius.

Be however the author who he may, the dialogue itself is well worth the perusal of those, who, like Alcibiades, pride themselves on the union of natural and artificial advantages; and of others too, under less favourable circumstances, who fancy themselves fit to appear in public life, and competent to direct the affairs of a state, without having previously undergone that mental training, which alone enables a person to govern first himself, and then his fellow-men. And happy would it have been for his native Athens, and indeed for the whole of Greece, and other countries, had Alcibiades been as ready to practise the precepts of philosophy, as he was to listen to them. For we learn from Xenophon, that, so long as he was a follower of Socrates, his conduct was as praiseworthy, as it was the reverse when, after leaving the pacific ocean of philosophy, he embarked on the stormy sea of politics, in which he eventually lost his character, his fortune, and his life.

THE FIRST ALCIBIADES.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES, ALCIBIADES.

SOCRATES.

[1.] You feel some wonder, I think, son of Clinias, that I, who was the first of your admirers, am now, when all the rest have ceased to be so, the only one who has not withdrawn himself; and that, while the others were plaguing you with their conversation, I did for so many years never speak a word to you. For this behaviour of mine the reason is to be found not in any obstacle arising from man, but from a dæmon, of whose power you shall hear hereafter. But as it no longer offers any opposition, I have come to you now; and I am in good hopes that for the future likewise it will be no impediment. By reflecting, however, during the interval, I nearly thoroughly understand what is your position with respect to your admirers. For though they were many, and men who thought highly of themselves, yet there is not one, who has not gone away from you, through their being surpassed by you in self-conceit.¹ Now the reason for your thinking so highly of yourself I am desirous of detailing. You assert then, that you are in nothing inferior to any man. For what is your own, beginning from the body and ending in the mind, is so great, as to stand in need of nothing. [2.] In the first place, you fancy yourself to be very handsome,² and of a great size. And in this it is evident to every one, who can see, that you are not mistaken. In the next place, you are of a family the most youth-like³ in your own city, which is the greatest of any in Greece; and that you have friends here, and relations on your father's side, very numerous and very powerful, ready, if need be, to assist you; and those too on your mother's side are neither inferior nor fewer. But greater than all I have mentioned taken together, is the influence you possess through Pericles, the son of Xanthippus, whom your father left as guardian to yourself and brother; (that Pericles) who is able to do what he pleases, not only in this city, but through all Greece, and with many and mighty clans of Barbarians. And I will add too, that you are one of the wealthy; although, on this point, you seem to me to value yourself the least. Boasting yourself then highly on all these advantages, you have acted the lord over your admirers; and they, feeling their inferiority, have become your slaves. And of this you are very sensible; and hence I know full well, that you feel a wonder at what I have in my thoughts, in that I do not withdraw myself, and what is the hope I entertain in remaining, when all the rest have gone away.

[3.] Alc. Perhaps, Socrates, you are not aware that you have anticipated me a little. For I really had it in my mind to come to you previously, and to ask you these very questions—What can you possibly mean, and looking to what hope are you plaguing me, and, wherever I am, are perpetually present yourself? For I do in truth wonder what your business can be with me; and I should very gladly hear.

Soc. You will hear me then, as is likely, very readily, if, as you say, you are really desirous of knowing what I have in my thoughts. I speak then as to one 'who will hear, and stay.'⁴

² That Alcibiades, says Proclus, was of large size and of great beauty is evident from his being called the general object of love in the whole of Greece; and from the saying of Antisthenes, that, if Achilles were not such as Alcibiades is, he was not in reality beautiful; and from the fact of Hermæ being modelled after him. T.

³ By νεανιωτάτου Stalbaum understands "the most brave," or "most manly." Ficinus has "nobilissimo"—what the sense requires. Plato wrote, I suspect, μεγαλειστάτου—in allusion to Megaclees, whose daughter, Deinomache, was the mother of Alcibiades.

⁴ Ficinus has avoided the ὑστερον πρότερον by translating, as Plato probably wrote, "expectanti et auscultaturo."

Alc. Entirely so. Speak then.

Soc. But mark, for it will be a thing not of wonder, if, as I begin with difficulty, I should with difficulty likewise make an end.

Alc. Speak, my good man, for I will listen.

Soc. Speak then I must; and though it is a hard task for an admirer to address himself to him, who is not inferior to his admirers, yet I must dare to speak my mind. [4.] If, Alcibiades, I had seen you satisfied with the advantages which I have just now detailed, and that you conceived you ought to pass your life amongst them, I should long since have withdrawn myself from all the love I bear; at least so I persuade myself. But I will now convict you of having other thoughts relating to yourself; and by so doing you will know, how I have continued keeping my attention directed towards you. For you appear to me such that, if any god were to say to you, "Are you willing, Alcibiades, to live possessing what you now do, or to die instantly, unless you are permitted to possess things still greater?" you would prefer to die. But in what kind of hope are you now living? I will unfold. (For⁵) you conceive that, if you were to come rather quickly before a meeting of the Athenian people—and this will take place within a few days—you will be able to show that you are worthy of being honoured in a way that neither Pericles nor any one else of those, who have ever existed, (was worthy); and after you have shown this, that you will possess the greatest power in the state; and that if you are the man of the greatest influence here, you will be so amongst the rest of the Greeks; and not only amongst the Greeks, but amongst the Barbarians likewise, as many as inhabit the same continent with us.⁶ And further, if the very same god were to say to you that—It is necessary⁷ for you to be the master here in Europe, but that it will not be allowed you to pass over into Asia, nor to concern yourself with affairs there—it appears to me that you would not even on these terms be willing to live, unless you could fill the mouths, so to say, of all men with your name and power; and you would deem, I fancy, that no man ever lived, except Cyrus and Xerxes, worth mentioning. Now, that you do entertain such hopes I know full well, and speak not from conjecture merely. [5.] Perhaps, you will say, as being convinced that I am speaking the truth—What has all this to do with the reason, which you said you would tell, why you have not withdrawn yourself from me? I will tell you then, my dear son of Clinias and Dinomache. That to all these thoughts of yours a finish should be put, is impossible without my help; so great power do, I think, I possess with regard to your affairs and to yourself to boot. Hence I have long ago thought that the god⁸ did not permit me to converse with you; for whom I have waited, until he should permit. For as you have a hope of ⁹being able to show before the state that you are worth every thing to it, and after having shown it, that there is nothing that you will not be able to do forthwith,⁹ so do I have a hope that I shall possess the greatest power over you, after having shown that I am worth every thing to you;¹⁰ and that neither guardian, nor relation, nor any one else, is able to procure you the power you desire, except myself, with the assistance, however, of the god. While therefore you were rather young, and before you were filled with these hopes, the god, it seems to me, would not permit me to discourse with you, lest I should converse in vain; but, now he has permitted; for now you will hearken to me.

⁵ Ficinus—"Putas enim," which leads to ἡγῆ γὰρ—

⁶ By these are meant the Macedonians, Thracians, and others. For otherwise οἱ βαρβάρου would mean the Asiatics.

[6.] Alc. Much more unreasonable, Socrates, do you appear to me now, since you have begun to speak, than when you followed me in silence: and yet you were at that time very much a person of such kind to ¹¹look upon. Whether I have such thoughts, or not, you, it seems, know with certainty; so that were I, to deny it, the denial would not avail me to persuade you an atom the more. Let it then be so. But if I have such thoughts ever so much, can you tell me

⁸ That is, the dæmon of Socrates. T.

⁹ Since all the words between the numerals are wanting in the three oldest MSS., Buttmann was the first to reject them as an interpolation from § 4, and his idea is adopted by Schleiermacher and Stalbaum.

¹⁰ Sydenham was the first to remark that σοι, requisite to preserve the balance of the sentences, had dropt out; which the three oldest MSS. have subsequently supplied.

¹¹ By "such a kind," is meant "unreasonable."

how they will be accomplished through you ; but without your help they never can be ?

Soc. Do you ask me, whether I am able to make a long harangue, such as you are accustomed to hear ? For if so, such is not my ability. But yet I should be able, I think, to show you, that such is the case, if you are willing to do me only one small piece of service.

Alc. If you mean some service not difficult, I am willing.

Soc. Does it seem to you difficult to give answers to questions ?

Alc. Not difficult at all.

Soc. Answer then.

Alc. Ask.

Soc. Shall I ask you then as having the thoughts, which I say you are thinking of ?

Alc. Be it so, if you will ; in order that I may know what you will say.

[7.] Soc. Well then. You have it in your mind, as I said, to go and consult with the Athenians within not a long time. If then, when you were just about to mount the platform, I were to lay hold of you, and to say—"Since the Athenians are thinking, Alcibiades, about deliberating upon some matter, are you rising up to give them advice ? Is it, since¹² about what you know better than they do ?" What answer would you make ?

Alc. I would assuredly answer—About what I know better than they do.

Soc. On those subjects, then, which you happen to know, you are a good counsellor ?

Alc. How not ?

Soc. Do you know those things only, which you have learnt from others, or found out yourself ?

Alc. What other things are there ?

Soc. Is it then possible that you should ever have learnt, or found out, any thing, which you were not willing to learn, or to search out by yourself ?

Alc. It is not.

Soc. What then, have you ever been willing to search out or learn what you thought you knew ?

¹² Ficinus, unable, it would seem, to understand ἀπ' ἑκείνης, has omitted ἑκείνη entirely. Stephens, too, was equally in the dark. Plato wrote, I suspect, ἀπα σπεύδεις—i. e. Do you hasten (to advise) ?—

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. What you now happen to know, was there a time, when you did not think you knew?

Alc. Of course.

Soc. Now, what you have learnt, I know pretty nearly. But if any thing has escaped me, do you mention it. To the best of my memory, you have learnt assuredly grammar, and to play on the harp, and to wrestle: for to play on the hautboy, you were not willing to learn.¹³ These things are what you know; unless peradventure you have learnt something else secretly. And yet I think that you neither by day or night¹⁴ went out from within.¹⁴

Alc. I have never gone to the school of other masters than of these.

[8.] Soc. When therefore the Athenians are deliberating about grammar, and how they are to write correctly, at that time will you rise up to give them advice?

Alc. By Zeus, not I.

Soc. But when (they are debating) about striking (the strings of) the lyre?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. But on the subject of wrestling they are not wont to deliberate in a public assembly.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. When then they are deliberating about what? For assuredly it cannot be, when the subject is about house-building:

Alc. No, certainly.

Soc. For a house-builder would advise them better than you could.

Alc. True.

Soc. Nor yet is it, when they are deliberating about divination.

¹³ According to Plutarch, Alcibiades considered the playing on the hautboy to be very ungraceful, as it distorted the muscles of the face; and could not, like playing on the lyre, be accompanied by the voice. See, too, A. Gellius, xv. 17. So Sydenham; who did not see that Plutarch has probably preserved the words ὡς δῆθεν ἀνελευθέρου ἔργον εἶναι, which he found in his MS. of Plato.

¹⁴—¹⁴ Ficinus has, what the sense requires and is adopted by Sydenham, "exisse te domo nos latentem," as if he had found in his MS. ἐξῶν μ' ἀλαθεῖς εἶναι, instead of ἐξῶν ἐνδοθεῖν.

Alc. No.

Soc. For a diviner would do so better than you.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And that too, whether he be a short man or a tall one; whether handsome or ugly; and whether of a noble or ignoble family.

Alc. How not?

Soc. For advice upon each subject belongs, I conceive, to a person who knows it, and not to a man of wealth.

Alc. How not?

Soc. And whether the man, who gives advice, be rich or poor, it will make no difference to the Athenians, when they are deliberating about the health of those in the city; but they will seek for a physician to be their counsellor.

Alc. And reasonably so.

[9.] Soc. When they are inquiring into what subject, will you rise up, and after rising up, give them advice?

Alc. When they are inquiring, Socrates, into the state of their affairs.

Soc. Do you mean about building a fleet? and what kind of vessels it is requisite should be built?

Alc. No such thing, Socrates.

Soc. Because you are ignorant, I think, in the art of ship-building. Is this or any thing else the reason?

Alc. There is no other than this.¹⁵

Soc. But when they are consulting about what affairs of their own do you mean?

Alc. When they are deliberating, Socrates, about war or peace; or any other affairs of state.

Soc. Do you mean when they are deliberating with whom it is requisite to make peace, and against whom to engage in war, and in what way?

Alc. Just so.

Soc. Now is it not requisite (to do so) with whom it is better (to do so)?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. And at that time, when it is better?

Alc. By all means.

Soc. And for so long a time, as it is better?

¹⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were οὐκ ἀλλ' ἢ τοῦτο, instead of οὐκ, ἀλλὰ τοῦτο. See at § 29.

Alc. Just so.

Soc. If then the Athenians were deliberating with whom it was requisite to wrestle and with whom to come to close quarters, and in what way, would you give better advice than the exercise-master?

Alc. The exercise-master assuredly.

Soc. Can you tell me now, by looking to what would the exercise-master give advice, with whom it is meet to wrestle closely, and with whom it is not? and at what time, and in what manner? I mean something of this kind. Is it meet to wrestle closely with those persons, with whom it is better (to do so)? or is it not?

Alc. It is.

Soc. Whether to such an extent as it is better?

Alc. To such an extent.

Soc. And at the time too when it is better?

Alc. By all means.

[10.] Soc. Moreover, a singer ought sometimes to play the harp, and to move (his feet) according to the tune.

Alc. Just so.

Soc. Ought he not (to do so) at the time when it is better (to do so)?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. And to such an extent as it is better?

Alc. So I say.

Soc. Well then, since you make use of the term better in both cases, namely in playing the harp according to the tune, and in close wrestling, what do you call "the better" in playing the harp, as I call the better in wrestling by the term gymnastical? what do you call that?

Alc. I do not understand.

Soc. Try then to imitate me. For I have assuredly answered¹⁶ you, (it is that) which, under all circumstances, is correct. Now that is correct, which is done according to art. Is it not?

Alc. It is.

Soc. Now is not the art gymnastic?

Alc. How not?

¹⁶ Instead of ἀπεκρίναμην, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἀποκρίναμην ἂν, as shown by his version, "responderem." Ast, however, Buttmann, and Stalbaum, all are content with ἀπεκρίναμην: which I confess I do not understand.

Soc. And I said, that the better in wrestling is gymnastical.

Alc. You said so.

Soc. And was it not well (said)?

Alc. It seems so to me at least.

Soc. Come then, and say—for it would surely become you too to discourse correctly—in the first place, What is the art, to which belong the playing on the harp, the singing, and the moving (the feet) correctly. By what name is the whole of this art called? Are you not able to tell?

Alc. Indeed I am not.

[11.] Soc. Try in this way then. Who are the goddesses to whom the art belongs?

Alc. Mean you, Socrates, the Muses?

Soc. I do. Consider now, what appellation has the art derived from their name?

Alc. You appear to me to mean musical.

Soc. Yes, I meant so. What then is that, which is performed rightly according to this art? Just as I told you, that what was performed rightly according to art, was gymnastical. So what do you say is similarly in this case? How is it to be performed?

Alc. Musically, I think.

Soc. You say well. Come then—What do you term the better in the expressions, “the warring better,” and “in enjoying peace (better)?” just as there¹⁷ you made use in each case of the term better,¹⁸ (in one)¹⁹ as being more musical, in the other as more gymnastical. Try now in these cases likewise to state what is “the better.”

Alc. I cannot tell at all.

Soc. But surely it is a disgraceful thing, should any one,²⁰ while you were giving advice respecting the kinds of food, and saying,²⁰ that this is better than that, both as regards the

¹⁷ Instead of ἑκεί, which seems to have been interpolated from the preceding ἑκεί, one MS. has καί, which leads to ὥσπερ γε καί—Ficinus avoids the difficulty by his version, “in superioribus—”

¹⁸ In lieu of τῷ ἀμείνονι, three MSS. and Proclus offer τὸ ἀμεινον, and thus confirm the conjecture of Cornarius.

¹⁹ Ficinus has “in uno quidem, quod magis musicum,” as if he had found in his MS., before ὅτι, ἐπὶ τῷ μὲν, to answer to ἐπὶ τῷ ἑτέρῳ. Ast, however, Buttmann, and Stalbaum, are content with the ellipse of ἐπὶ τῷ μὲν in the first clause of the two balanced sentences.

^{20—20} I have translated as if the Greek were συμβουλευόντα περὶ present time and quantity, inquire of you, "What do you mean, Alcibiades, by 'the better?'" that you should, on these subjects, be able to tell him that it was the more wholesome—and this, too, although you do not profess to be a physician—but that on a subject, of which you profess to have a knowledge, and, after rising up, you will give advice, as if you knew it, you are not, when questioned, ashamed, as you seem to be, if you are unable to say any thing? Or does this appear to be not disgraceful?

Alc. Very much so.

[12.] Soc. Consider now, and be ready to state—To what point tends "the better" in enjoying peace, and in warring with those with whom it is meet?

Alc. But though I do consider, I am unable to imagine (what it is).

Soc. Know you not, when we make war, that²¹ after accusing each other of some suffering, we proceed to hostilities, and ²²by what calling it we proceed?

Alc. I do. (It is) by our being deceived, or treated with violence, or deprived of something.

Soc. Hold. How are they suffering in each of these points? Endeavour to state what is the difference, this way or that.

Alc. By the expression "this way," do you mean, Socrates, "justly" or "unjustly?"

Soc. This very thing.

Alc. And yet this is a difference wholly and entirely.

Soc. Well then, with whom shall you advise the Athenians to war? with those, who do what is unjust, or with those, who do what is just?

Alc. You are asking a hard question. For even if any man conceives that it is needful to war with such, as do what is right, he would not confess it.

Soc. For this, it seems, is not lawful.

σιτίων καὶ λίγοντα ὅτι, instead of λίγοντα καὶ συμβουλευόντα περὶ σιτίων ὅτι—

²¹ I have translated as if the Greek were ὅτι τι—πάθημα, instead of ὅ, τι—πάθημα.

²² The words between the numerals I cannot understand; to say nothing of the repetition of ἐρχόμεθα. Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, "et quomodo nuncupamus illud, quo ad bellum incitatur."

Alc. By no means is it so; nor does it seem to be honourable.

[13.] Soc. ²³With a view then to these points, and to what is just,²³ you will make your speeches.

Alc. It is necessary (to do so).

Soc. Does then the term "better," ²⁴about which I asked you just now, relating to the going to war or not, and with whom it is meet (to do so), and with whom not, and at what time, and when not, happen to be any thing else than²⁵ the term "more just?" or does it not?

Alc. It appears (to be nothing else).

Soc. How then, my dear Alcibiades, does it lie hid from yourself, that you are ignorant of this? or have you lain hid from me, while learning, and frequenting the school of a master, who has taught you to distinguish between what is the more just, and what is the less just? Now who is he? Tell me, in order that you may introduce me too, as a frequenter (of his school).

Alc. You are bantering, Socrates.

Soc. Not so, by the guardian-god of friendship²⁶ to both myself and you, whom I would the least of all invoke²⁷ as witness to a falsehood? If then you have (any master), tell me who he is.

Alc. But what if I have not? Think you that I could by no other means have a knowledge of what is just, and what is unjust?

Soc. I think (you would), if you had discovered it yourself.

Alc. Do you conceive then I could not have discovered it?

Soc. You (would have done so) perfectly, had you sought for it.

Alc. Think you, then, that I have not sought for it?

²³⁻²⁵ The Greek is ἵπὸς ταῦτ' ἀπα καὶ σὺ τὸ δίκαιον—where Sydenham has suggested the simple correction, which I have adopted, σὺ καὶ—for by ταῦτα are meant, he says, the lawful and the honourable.

^{26, 27} I have translated as if the Greek were τὸ βίλιον and καὶ μὴ, ᾗ, not βίλιον—καὶ μὴ, although I am quite aware that ἄλλο τι is said by some to be merely the formula of an interrogation. In the present case ᾗ is properly found in two MSS.

²⁸ On the name of φίλιος applied to Ζεὺς, who presided over friendship, see the learned on Euthyphr. p. 6, B., and on Suid. Φίλιος.

²⁷ This is an allusion to Homer, Il. O. 39, whom Euripides has likewise imitated in Orest. 1531, as remarked by Porson.

Soc. I (think you would), if you had thought you did not know it.

Alc. Was there not a time, when I was²⁸ in that state?

[14.] Soc. You speak correctly. Can you then mention the time when you did not think you knew what is just, and what is unjust? Come, (tell me,) were you making the search last year, and did you think then, or did you not, that you knew them? Answer truly now, that our conversation may not be in vain.

Alc. Nay, I did at that time think I knew.

Soc. And did you not (think) so during the third, fourth, and fifth year (preceding)?

Alc. I did.

Soc. But previously you were a boy.

Alc. True.

Soc. And even then, I know full well, that you thought you knew.

Alc. How do you know it well?

Soc. Often have I heard you, when you were a boy at school, and in other places, when you were playing at marbles, or any other game, speaking, as if you had no doubt respecting what is just and unjust, but proclaiming loudly and boldly about any of the boys who happened to be there, that he was a knave, and not just. Say I not what is true?

Alc. But, Socrates, what else was I to do, when any one did me an act of injustice?

Soc. Right. But if you happened at that time to be ignorant whether you were injured or not, would you have said,²⁹ What were you to do?

Alc. But, by Zeus, I was not ignorant; but I clearly knew that I was injured.

[15.] Soc. You thought then, it seems, when you were a mere boy, that you knew what is just and unjust?

Alc. I (did think) so; and knew it too.

Soc. At what time did you discover it? for certainly it was not when you merely thought you knew.

²⁸ From the version of Ficinus, "cum sic me haberem," Sydenham was the first to reject οὕς between ὄρε and εἶλον. And so Ast and others, with nearly all the MSS.

²⁹ The Greek is τότε, λέγεις, τί σε χρὴ ποιεῖν. But one MS. offers λέγαν: which evidently leads to τότ', εἰλεγς ἀν—χρὴν ποιεῖν; and so I have translated.

Alc. Certainly not then.

Soc. At what time then did you think you did not know? Reflect; for ³⁰that time you will never find.³⁰

Alc. By Zeus, Socrates, I am not able to tell.

Soc. You did not then know by finding it yourself.

Alc. It seems I did not.

Soc. But you stated however just now, that you knew, even without learning. But if you neither discovered it nor learnt it, how or whence did you know it?

Alc. But perhaps I did not answer you correctly by saying that I knew by discovering it myself. ³¹ But the case is this. I learnt it, I presume, as others do.³¹

Soc. We are now come again to the same point. From whom (did you learn it)? Tell me.

Alc. From the people.

Soc. In referring it to the people, you fly to no good instructors.

Alc. Why so? Are not they capable of teaching?

Soc. Not even the game of back-gammon (correctly) or not. [16.] And yet I think that these subjects are of less importance than those relating to what is just. Do not you think so too?

Alc. I do.

Soc. Are they then unable to teach some things of less importance, and some things of more?

Alc. I think so; at least they are able to teach many things of more importance than playing at back-gammon.

Soc. What things are these?

Alc. I learnt, for instance, from them to speak the Greek language; nor could I name my teacher on that subject, but I refer to those very persons, who you say are not good teachers.

Soc. But, my noble sir, on this subject, indeed, the people are good teachers, and may be justly praised for their power of instructing.

³⁰⁻³² This seems a rather strange assertion. For if Alcibiades could never find the time, there was no need of Socrates telling him to reflect. Instead of ot Plato probably wrote πῶ—On the interchange of those two words, see Porson on Eurip. Hec. 300.

³³⁻³⁴ This arrangement of the speeches was first suggested by Buttmann, and has been adopted by Stalbaum.

Alc. Why so?

Soc. Because on these subjects they possess what it is necessary for good teachers to possess.

Alc. What mean you by this?

Soc. Know you not, that it is necessary for those who are to teach any thing, in the first place to know it themselves? Must they not?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And (must) not they, who know it, agree together, and not differ?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. But would you say that they know the subjects in which they differ?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Of such things, then, how can they be good teachers?

Alc. By no means.

[17.] Soc. Well then, do the people appear to you to differ as to what is stone and wood? And should you inquire of any one, do they not (all)²² agree in the same opinion? and when they wish to take up a stone, or a piece of wood, do they not all rush to the same kind of things? and similarly (understand) all things of such kind? For I very nearly learn that you mean by this the knowing how to use the Greek language? Is it not so?

Alc. It is.

Soc. On these subjects, then, as we have said, do not persons individually agree with each other and themselves? and publicly the states (of Greece) do not have a difference with each other, by some of them meaning one thing, and others a different thing (by the same words).

Alc. They do not.

Soc. On these subjects, then, they would reasonably be good teachers.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. If then we wished to cause a person to have a knowledge on these points, we should do right in sending him for such instruction to the people?

Alc. Perfectly so.

Soc. But what if we wished that person to know not only ²² Ficinus has alone preserved this word, so necessary for the sense.

of what kind are men and of what are horses, but what kind of horses are fit for the race, and what are not, are the people competent to teach this?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. And is this for you a sufficient proof that they do not know and are not correct²³ teachers on these points, because they do not agree with each other on these points?

Alc. To me at least it is.

Soc. And what, if we wished that person to know not only of what kind men are, but what are healthy and unhealthy, would the many be competent teachers for us?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. And it would be a proof to you that they are bad teachers on these points, if you saw them disagreeing.

Alc. It would.

[18.] Soc. What then, do the many seem to you to agree, themselves with themselves, or with each other, respecting persons and acts, just and unjust?

Alc. By Zeus, Socrates, the least of all.

Soc. What then, that they differ the most on these points?

Alc. Very much indeed.

Soc. You have never, I suppose, seen or heard of men, differing so violently, about things wholesome and not, as on that account to fight and kill one another?

Alc. Never.

Soc. But upon questions of justice and injustice, ²⁴(how bitterly they differ)²⁴ I know well; and if you have not seen it, you have at least heard from many others, and from Homer; for you have heard of both the Odyssey and the Iliad.

Alc. Entirely, Socrates.

Soc. Are not then those poems concerning a difference as to what is just and unjust?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And did not the battles and the deaths take place amongst the Greeks and the other²⁵ Trojans, and amongst the wooers of Penelope, and Ulysses, on account of this very difference?

²³ As the word ερίγγων is found only once even in Homer, and never elsewhere in Attic poetry, much less in prose, it is probably a corruption; which it would not be difficult to correct.

²⁴⁻²⁵ The words between the numerals are due to the version of Ficinus alone, "quam acriter dissentiant—"

²⁶ According to some scholars, ἄλλος is used pleonastically, without

Alc. You speak what is true.

Soc. And I conceive that to the Athenians, Lacedæmonians, and Boeotians who perished at Tanagra,³⁶ and to those, who afterwards³⁷ met in arms at Coronea, when³⁷ Clinias your father ended his career, a difference upon no other question than what relates to justice and injustice, caused³⁸ the deaths and battles.³⁹ Is it not so?

Alc. You are in the right.

Soc. Shall we say then that those persons had a knowledge on the question about which they differed with such vehemence, as by their contending with each other to inflict upon themselves the extreme (of mischief)?³⁹

Alc. It appears not.

[19.] Soc. Do you not then refer to teachers of such a kind, as you confess yourself to know nothing?

Alc. I seem (to do so).

Soc. How then is it likely that you should know what is just and unjust on questions, about which so vague are your ideas, and which you appear to have neither learnt from another, nor to have discovered yourself?

Alc. From what you say, it is not likely.

Soc. See you again this, that you have not spoken, Alcibiades, correctly?

Alc. What is it?

Soc. In that you stated that I said so.

Alc. What, did not you say that I know nothing of what is just and unjust?

Soc. Not I, indeed.

Alc. But did I (say it)?

Soc. Yes.

Alc. How so?

any definite meaning. But here, instead of ἄλλως, Plato wrote, I suspect, ἑτέρως, of which τῶς was the explanation. Respecting the loss or corruption of ἑτέρως, see my note on Crito, § 14, n. 18.

³⁶ On this battle see Thucyd. i. 108, Diodor. Sic. xi. 81.

³⁸ As the deaths would follow, not precede, the battles, Plato adopted perhaps this ὅσους πρότερον to avoid the repetition of the collocation αἱ μάχαι καὶ οἱ θάνατοι, found just above.

³⁹ Here again Proclus has alone preserved the words τῶν κατῶν, wanting in all the MSS. of Plato.

Soc. You will see it in this way, should I ask you about one and two, which is the greater number, you will say that two is.

Alc. I shall.

Soc. By how much.

Alc. By one.

Soc. Which of us then is the person who says that two is more than one by one?

Alc. It is I.

Soc. Did not I ask the question, and did not you answer it?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. On these points, then, who appears to assert? Is it I who ask, or thou who answerest?

Alc. I.

Soc. What then, were I to ask how many (and what)⁴⁰ are the letters in "Socrates," and you were to state, which of us (would be) the teller?

Alc. Myself.

Soc. Come then, tell me in one word, whenever a question and answer take place, who is it that asserts? he who asks, or he who answers?

Alc. He who answers, Socrates, as it seems to me.

Soc. Now through the whole of the conversation⁴¹ was not I the party asking?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And you the party answering?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Well then, which of us two said what was asserted?

Alc. From what has been admitted, Socrates, I appear to be the party.

[20.] Soc. Has it not been said that Alcibiades, the handsome son of Clinias, knew nothing about what is just and unjust, but thought (he knew); and that he was about to go to a public meeting to give the Athenians advice upon questions of which he knew nothing? Is it not so?

⁴⁰ I have adopted Schleiermacher's πόσα καὶ ποῖα, supported by the parallel passage in Xenoph. M. S. iv. 4, 7, ὅλον περὶ γραμμάτων, ἴαν τις ἰσηταί σε, πόσα καὶ ποῖα Σωκράτους ἴσθιν: and so Buttmann in ed. 2, although he had rejected it in ed. 1.

⁴¹ Although the three oldest MSS. offer τοῦ λόγου after διὰ παντός, yet Buttmann, with whom Stalbaum agrees, would supply χρόνου, similar to "semper" in Ficinus.

Soc. Yes.

Alc. How so?

any definite meaning. But here, instead of ἄλλοις, Plato wrote, I suspect, Ἰλιῦσι, of which Τρωσι was the explanation. Respecting the loss or corruption of Ἰλιῦσι, see my note on Crito, § 14, n. 18.

³⁶ On this battle see Thucyd. i. 108, Diodor. Sic. xi. 81.

³⁷⁻³⁷ I have adopted the reading preserved by Proclus alone, ἐν Κορωνείᾳ συμβᾶσιν ὄντι, in lieu of ἐν Κορωνείᾳ, ἐν οἷς— On the battle of Coronea, see Thucyd. i. 113.

³⁸⁻³⁸ As the deaths would follow, not precede, the battles, Plato adopted perhaps this ὕστερον πρότερον to avoid the repetition of the collocation αἱ μάχαι καὶ οἱ θάνατοι, found just above.

³⁹ Here again Proclus has alone preserved the words τῶν κατῶν, wanting in all the MSS. of Plato.

Soc. You will see it in this way, should I ask you about one and two, which is the greater number, you will say that two is.

Alc. I shall.

Soc. By how much.

Alc. By one.

Soc. Which of us then is the person who says that two is more than one by one?

Alc. It is I.

Soc. Did not I ask the question, and did not you answer it?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. On these points, then, who appears to assert? Is it I who ask, or thou who answerest?

Alc. I.

Soc. What then, were I to ask how many (and what)⁴⁰ are the letters in "Socrates," and you were to state, which of us (would be) the teller?

Alc. Myself.

Soc. Come then, tell me in one word, whenever a question and answer take place, who is it that asserts? he who asks, or he who answers?

Alc. He who answers, Socrates, as it seems to me.

Soc. Now through the whole of the conversation⁴¹ was not I the party asking?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And you the party answering?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Well then, which of us two said what was asserted?

Alc. From what has been admitted, Socrates, I appear to be the party.

[20.] Soc. Has it not been said that Alcibiades, the handsome son of Clinias, knew nothing about what is just and unjust, but thought (he knew); and that he was about to go to a public meeting to give the Athenians advice upon questions of which he knew nothing? Is it not so?

⁴⁰ I have adopted Schleiermacher's πόσα καὶ ποῖα, supported by the parallel passage in Xenoph. M. S. iv. 4, 7, ὅλον περὶ γραμμάτων, ἅν τις ἔρηται σε, πόσα καὶ ποῖα Σωκράτους ἴσθιν: and so Buttmann in ed. 2, although he had rejected it in ed. 1.

⁴¹ Although the three oldest MSS. offer τοῦ λόγου after διὰ παντός, yet Buttmann, with whom Stalbaum agrees, would supply χρόνου, similar to "semper" in Ficinus.

Alc. So it appears.

Soc. The saying then of Euripides has come to pass, Alcibiades. You seem very nearly to have heard this ⁴² from yourself, and not from me.⁴³ For it is not I, who say this, but yourself; and vainly do you lay the blame on me. ⁴³ And indeed you speak correctly. For mad is the endeavour, O best of men, which you have in your thoughts of attempting to teach what you do not know and have neglected to learn.⁴³

Alc. I conceive, Socrates, that the Athenians, and the other Greeks, seldom deliberate whether things are more just or unjust; for these things they think are plain enough. Dismissing then (the consideration) of such points, they look to what will be most conducive to those who act. For I imagine that justice and interest are not the same things; since to many it has conduced to their interest to have done things very unjust, while to others there has been no advantage in having acted with justice.

[21.] Soc. Then if justice happens to be a thing ever so much of one kind, and interest of another, do you not surely think you know what is a man's interest, and why it is so?

Alc. What prevents me, Socrates? unless you ask me again from whom I learnt it, or how I discovered it myself.

Soc. What is this you are doing? If you say any thing not correctly, and it happens to be possible to prove it so by the same arguments as before, you fancy forsooth that you ought to hear something fresh, and other arguments; as if the former had been worn out like dresses, and you could no longer put them on, unless one should bring you a proof⁴⁴.

⁴²⁻⁴³ Muretus, in Var. Lect. v. 20, was the first to remark that Plato alluded to σοῦ ράδ', οὐκ ἐμοῦ κλέεις, in Hippol. 352.

⁴⁴ In lieu of τεκμήριον, Cornarius suggested σκενάριον; while Ast, with whom Buttmann agrees, would expel the word as an interpolation, especially as it is not acknowledged by Ficinus. On the other hand, Nurnberger and Stalbaum conceive that there is a kind of mixed metaphor, partly correct, and partly incorrect. Unless I am greatly mistaken, in τεκμήριον lies hid τὸ τεκμηρίου μηχανόμενον, by which was meant what we call the staple of flax or wool drawn out, as shown by Hesych., Μη-ρυνόμενον ἱερυνόμενον: while, as regards the metaphor, it may be compared with the passage quoted by Porson in his Letters to Travis, "To draw out the thread of verbosity finer than the staple of the argument."

clear and without a stain. But bidding farewell to the quick sallies of your speech, I will nevertheless ask you from whence have you learnt, and how do you know, what is to a person's interest, and who was your teacher? and all the former points I now put in a single question. For it is evident that you will come to the same point; nor will you be able to show either that, by having discovered it, you know what is to a person's interest, or that you have learnt it. [22.] But since you give yourself airs, and would not pleasantly have a taste of the same argument again, I bid farewell to the question, whether you do or do not know what is for the interest of the Athenians. But whether justice and interest are the same, or different, why have you not shown, by putting, if you wish it, questions to me, as I did to you? or, if (you had rather) go through the subject in a speech at your discretion.

Alc. But I know not, Socrates, if I should be able to go through it before you.

Soc. But, my good friend, suppose me to be the assembly and people. For there it will be necessary for you to persuade every individual. Is it not so?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Does it not belong, then, to the same person to be able to persuade each individual, and many met together, about what he knows? just as a teacher of grammar is wont⁴⁵ to persuade one and many on the question of letters.

Alc. True.

Soc. And will not on the question of numbers the same person persuade both one and many?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And will not he, who knows, be an arithmetician?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. And are not you likewise able to persuade many on those points, on which you (persuade) one?

Alc. It is probable.

Soc. But these subjects it is plain are what you know.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Does then the person in a meeting like this differ from the orator before the people in any thing else, than that the ⁴⁵ I have adopted ἐπειθε from many MSS. in lieu of πειθε. For the imperfect is sometimes used to convey the idea of a custom.

one endeavours to persuade persons collected together, but the other persons taken singly.

Alc. It appears nearly so.

23.] Soc. Come then, since it appears that it belongs to the same person to persuade many and one, practise your skill on myself, and endeavour to prove that what is just is sometimes not to a person's interest.

Alc. You are very saucy, Socrates.

Soc. And I am now from my sauciness about to persuade you the very contrary to what you are unwilling (to persuade) me.

Alc. Say on.

Soc. Do you only answer the questions asked.

Alc. Not so; but do you say yourself.

Soc. Why so? Do you not wish to be persuaded as much as possible?

Alc. By all means.

Soc. Would you not, if you said that such was the case, be entirely persuaded of it?

Alc. So it seems to me.

Soc. Answer then; and if you do not hear from yourself that what is just is to a person's interest, do not believe any one else who says so.

Alc. Not at all. But I must answer. For I do not think I shall come to any hurt.

Soc. For you are like a diviner.⁴⁶ Tell me then. Say you that of things, that are just, some are to a person's interest, and some not?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. What then, that some of them are beautiful, and some not?

Alc. Why ask you this?

Soc. Whether⁴⁷ has any one seemed to you to act basely indeed, but justly?

Alc. Not to me at least.

Soc. But (you think) that all actions that are just are honourable?

⁴⁶ To indicate a sneer Dobree, in Adversar. i. p. 153, suggested μαρτυροῦς γ' ἂν—in lieu of μαρτυροῦς γὰρ— ⁴⁷ Since εἰ is never used in a direct interrogation, we must, says Stalbaum, supply ἴσως.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. But what, as to actions, that are honourable? Whether are all good, or some are so and some not?

Alc. I indeed, Socrates, conceive that some honourable actions are evil.

Soc. And that some base actions are good?

Alc. Yes.

[24.] Soc. Do you mean such actions as these? For instance, many men by aiding in battle a friend or relation have received wounds and died; whilst others, by not aiding when they ought, have come off safe and sound.

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. Such aid⁴⁸ then you call honourable with respect to their endeavour to save those whom they ought. Now this is fortitude, is it not?

Alc. It is.

Soc. But (you call it) evil with respect to the death and wounds.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is not fortitude one thing, and death another?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. To aid a friend then is not honourable and evil in the same respect?

Alc. It appears it is not.

Soc. Consider now, whether it be not good so far as it is honourable, as in the present case. For, with respect to fortitude, you acknowledged that such aid is an honourable act. Consider then this very thing, namely fortitude, whether it be a good or an evil; and consider it in this way. Which would you choose to have, good things or evil?

Alc. Good things.

Soc. And would not (you choose) the best things the most?

Alc. (Yes).⁴⁹

Soc. And would you not choose to be deprived of them the least?

Alc. How not?

⁴⁸ Stalbaum here refers the reader to Xenoph. M. S. iii. 8. 5—7, as exhibiting sentiments of Socrates very similar to those put into his mouth by Plato.

⁴⁹ Between μάλιστα and καὶ Dobree, in Adversar. i. p. 155, proposed to insert AA. καὶ: which Stalbaum has approved of, and I have adopted.

Soc. How say you then of fortitude? at what price would you choose to be deprived of it?

Alc. I would not accept even of life to be a coward.

Soc. To you, then, it seems that cowardice is the extreme of evil.

Alc. It does, at least to me.

Soc. On a par, as it seems, with death.

Alc. So I say.

[25.] Soc. Are not life and fortitude the most opposite to death and cowardice?

Alc. They are.

Soc. And would you choose to have those the most, and these the least?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is it because you deem those the best of things, and these the worst?

Alc. For this very reason.⁵⁰

Soc. To aid, then, our friends in war, in so far as it is honourable, with regard to the working out a good action, namely, that of fortitude, you call an honourable thing.

Alc. Yes, I appear (to do so).

Soc. But with regard to the working out an evil action, namely, that of death, (you call it) an evil thing.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is it not then just to denominate every action thus? If, in so far as it works out an evil, you call it evil, ought it not to be called good, in so far as it works out a good?

Alc. It seems so to me.

Soc. In so far, then, as it is good, is it not honourable? but in so far as it is evil, (is it not) base?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. In saying then that the aiding our friends in a war is honourable indeed, but yet evil, you speak in not a different way than if you called⁵¹ it good indeed, but yet evil.

⁵⁰ Stobæus, in ix. p. 123, reads πάντ' γε: and adds, ΣΟΚ. ἐν τοῖς ἀπείροισι ἀγαθὸν οὐδ' ἡγρὶ ἀνδρίαν εἶναι καὶ ἐν τοῖς κακίοις θάνατον. ΔΔ. ἐγχευε: which Buttmann considers to be genuine; but Stalbaum an interpolation.

⁵¹ Instead of προσίπτε, Etwall and Sydenham suggested προσείπτε, similar to "dixisses" in Ficinus; and so three MSS. collated subsequently. The restoration is attributed to Wolf by Buttmann and Stalbaum.

Alc. You seem to me, Socrates, to speak the truth.

Soc. Nothing then which is honourable, so far as it is honourable, is an evil; nor is any thing which is base, so far as it is base, a good.

Alc. Evidently it is not.

[26.] Soc. Consider now further in this way. Whoever acts honourably does he not act well too?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And are not they, who act well, fortunate?⁵²

Alc. How not?

Soc. And are they not happy through the possession of good things?

Alc. Most certainly.

Soc. And they possess these good things by acting well.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. To do well then is a good?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And is the doing well an honourable thing also?

Alc. It is.

Soc. Therefore the same thing has again been shown to us to be both honourable and good?

Alc. It seems so.

Soc. Whatever then we shall find to be an honourable thing, we shall find it to be a good thing likewise,⁵³ according to this reasoning at least.

Alc. It must be so.

Soc. What then, do good things conduce to one's interest, or not?

Alc. They do.

Soc. Do you remember now how we agreed about things that are just?

Alc. I suppose (you mean) that they, who do what is just, must of necessity do what is honourable.

⁵³ Instead of καλὸν τε καὶ—Sydenham was the first to propose καλὸν, καὶ—suggested by "idem quoque bonum" in Ficinus. The restoration, confirmed by MSS. and Olympiodorus, is attributed to Schneider by Stalbaum.

Soc. And that they, (who do) what is honourable, (do) what is good?

Alc. We did.

Soc. And that good things conduce to one's interest?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Things then that are just, Alcibiades, conduce to one's interest.

Alc. It seems so.

Soc. Well then, are not you the asserter of this, and I the questioner?

Alc. I appear so, as it seems.

Soc. If then a person rises up to give advice to the people either of Athens or Peparethus,⁵⁴ conceiving that he knows what is just and unjust, and should say that what is just is sometimes an evil, would you not laugh at him? since you too happen yourself to be the person asserting, that the same things are both just and conducive to one's interest.

[27.] Alc. Now, by the gods, Socrates, I know not what to say; but I am really like a man in an absurd position. For while you are asking questions, at one time I am of one opinion, and at another time of another.

Soc. Are you then ignorant, my friend, what condition you are in?

Alc. Entirely.

Soc. Think you, then, that if a person were to ask you, Have you two eyes or three? and two hands or four? or put any other question of such a kind, you would give one answer at one time, and another at another time? or always the same?

Alc. I have indeed some fear for myself; but I think I should give the same answer.

Soc. Is not the reason, because you know?

Alc. I think so.

Soc. Of matters then, where you give contrary answers unwillingly, it is evident that you know nothing.

⁵⁴ Of this island, now called Piperi, one of the Cyclades, and near to Scyrus, the earliest notice is found in Soph. Phil. 551, where it is described as εὐβορεῦς, and εὐβορεῖς by Heraclides of Pontus. Its wine was however of an inferior quality, as we learn from Athenæus, i. p. 29, F. The place is here mentioned as being of little note, and therefore properly opposed to the better-known Athens.

Alc. Probably so.

Soc. Do you not say that about things just and unjust, honourable and base, good and evil, to one's interest and not, you waver in your answer? Is it not then evident, that through your not knowing these subjects, you waver respecting them?

Alc. (It is plain) to myself at least.

[28.] Soc. Is not then this the case? When a man does not know a thing, must not his mind waver respecting it?

Alc. How not?

Soc. Well then, do you know by what means you can mount up to heaven?

Alc. By Zeus, not I.

Soc. Does your opinion waver on this subject?

Alc. Not at all.

Soc. Do you know the reason? Or shall I tell it?

Alc. Tell it.

Soc. It is, my friend, because, not knowing, you do not think you know.

Alc. How say you this?

Soc. Do you, in common (with me), look (at the matter). About the questions, which you do not know, and are convinced you do not know, do you waver? For instance, in preparing sauces, you surely know that you know nothing.

Alc. Perfectly.

Soc. Do you then form any opinion respecting them, how it is necessary to prepare them, and then waver (in your opinions)? or do you commit them to the person who does know?

Alc. In this way (I act).

Soc. And what, if you were sailing in a vessel, would you form any opinion, whether it was necessary to bring the rudder inwards or outwards, and waver as a person knowing nothing? Or would you commit it to the pilot, and keep yourself quiet?

Alc. (I should commit it) to the pilot.

Soc. In matters then of which you are ignorant, you do not waver, at least if you know that you know nothing.

Alc. I do not seem (to do so).

[29.] Soc. Do you perceive then, that errors in acting arise through this very ignorance, namely, in a person thinking he knows, when he does not know.

Alc. How say you this again?

Soc. Whenever we think we know what we are doing, then we surely endeavour to do it.

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. But when persons think they do not know, then they hand over the matters to others.

Alc. How not?

Soc. Such then of those, who do not know, live free from mistakes through their committing the management of such matters to others.

Alc. True.

Soc. Who then are they, who make mistakes? for certainly they are not the knowing.

Alc. By no means.

Soc. Since then they are neither the knowing, nor those of the ignorant, who know that they are ignorant, are any other persons left than those who are ignorant, but fancy that they are knowing?

Alc. None other than these.⁵⁴

Soc. This very ignorance, then, is the cause of their evils,⁵⁵ and an absence of learning worthy of reproach.⁵⁶

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. When therefore it relates to things of greatest moment, is it not then the most mischievous and disgraceful?

Alc. Yes, the most so.

Soc. Well then, can you mention things of greater moment than the just, and honourable, and good, and conducing to one's interest?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Do you not say that upon these subjects you waver?

Alc. I do.

Soc. But if you are wavering, is it not evident from the previous (reasoning), that not only you are ignorant of subjects of the greatest moment, but that you think that, although not knowing, you do know them?

Alc. I seem to be nearly so.

⁵⁴ So Sydenham; as if he wished to read Οὐκ ἄλλοι ἢ οὗτοι, instead of Οὐκ ἄλλ' οὗτοι. Ficinus has, "Non alii, sed isti," i. e. Οὐκ ἄλλοι, ἀλλ' οὗτοι.

⁵⁵⁻⁵⁶ The words between the numerals are scarcely suited to the train of argument.

[30.] Soc. Ho, ho! Alcibiades! In what a state are you suffering! such as I am loth to name; but however, since we are alone, it must be mentioned. You are dwelling, O best of men, in a state of ignorance, the most disgraceful; since the reasoning brings a charge ⁵⁶ against you, and you are bearing witness against yourself, ⁵⁶ in that you are rushing to affairs of state, before you have been taught (at all).⁵⁷ But this not you alone have suffered, but the majority likewise of those, who manage the affairs of the state, except a few, and perhaps your guardian Pericles.

Alc. He, however, is reported, Socrates, to have become wise, not from himself, but through his intercourse with many wise men, and Pythocleides ⁵⁸ and Anaxagoras; ⁵⁹ and even at his time of life he is, on this very account, intimate with Damon.

Soc. What then, have you ever seen a person wise in any thing, and yet unable to make another person wise in the same things as himself; for instance, he, who taught you grammar, was clever himself, and he has made you so, and whomsoever he wished of other persons likewise. Is it not so?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And will not you too, who have learnt from him, be able (to teach) another?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. And as a harp-master, and a teacher of gymnastic exercises, in like manner?

Alc. Perfectly.

[31.] Soc. This then is assuredly a fair proof that they, who know any thing whatever, do really know it, when they ⁵⁶—⁵⁶ I have adopted καταμαρτυρεῖ, preserved here by Olympiodorus, as a various reading for κατηγορεῖ. Plato wrote, I suspect, ὁ λόγος σου κατηγορεῖ, καὶ καταμαρτυρεῖ σὺ αὐτοῦ.

⁵⁷ I have translated, as if τι had dropt out before παιδευθῆναι.

⁵⁸ According to the Scholiast, Pythocleides was a Pythagorean, whose disciple was Agathocles, the teacher of Lamprocles, of whom Damon was the pupil. He is called a Cean in Protagor. p. 316, E. § 20. The object of the sect was to teach moral and political truths under the mask of musical science. Of the nature of their political tenets some idea may be formed by knowing, as related by Plutarch in Pericles, § 4, that Damon was expelled from Athens as a meddler in state affairs, and a friend to arbitrary power. S.

⁵⁹ On Anaxagoras, the preceptor of Pericles in astronomy and natural philosophy, see Valckenaer in Diatrib. p. 34.

are able to produce ⁶⁰ another person knowing it likewise.⁶⁰

Alc. So it seems to me.

Soc. Well then, can you mention any one whom Pericles has made clever, beginning with his own sons?

Alc. But what, if the sons⁶¹ of Pericles were silly fellows, Socrates?

Soc. Clinias, then, your brother?

Alc. Why should you mention Clinias,⁶² a man out of his senses?

Soc. Since then Clinias is a madman, and the sons of Pericles were silly fellows, what reason shall we assign in the case of yourself, for his overlooking you, when you are in such a state?

Alc. I am, I fancy, myself the cause, by not giving my mind (to him).

Soc. But of the other Athenians or foreigners, mention either a slave or a freeman, who can show a reason for his having become wiser through his intercourse with Pericles; as I can mention Pythodorus⁶³ the son of Isolochus, and Callias⁶⁴ the son of Calliades through Zeno; to whom each of them paid a hundred minæ,⁶⁵ and thus became clever and in high repute.

Alc. By Zeus, I cannot.

[32.] Soc. Be it so. What then do you intend respecting yourself? whether to leave yourself as you now are, or to pay some regard to yourself?

Alc. ⁶⁶Let the consultation, Socrates, be common to both.⁶⁶

⁶⁰⁻⁶¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek ἄλλον—ἐπιστάμενον. But Ficinus has more correctly "alium quoque doctum ab ipsis," i. e. "another person taught by them."

⁶¹ These were Paralus and Xanthippus; see Meno, § 33; both of whom were carried off by the plague, during the life-time of their father, as we learn from Xenophon, M. S. iii. 5.

⁶² On this Clinias see Protagor. p. 320, A. § 29.

⁶³ This is the party at whose house Plato lays the scene of the Parmenides.—S.

⁶⁴ This Callias commanded the army sent by the Athenians for the recovery of Potidæa; but was slain in the first battle before that city. See Thucydides, i. 61—63. S.

For ⁶⁷I have something⁶⁷ in my mind, while you are speaking, and agree to it. For they who manage the affairs of the state, seem, except a few, to be uneducated.

Soc. And what then?

Alc. If they had been educated, it would have been requisite for the person attempting to be their antagonist, to go against them, as if they were prize-fighters, after having learnt and practised (the science). But now, since they proceed to state affairs raw and undisciplined, what need is there for a person to exercise himself, and by learning to give himself any trouble? For I well know, that by my natural abilities, I shall be very much their superior.

Soc. Ho! ho! thou best of men, what a mighty speech is this thou hast spoken. How unworthy of your personal qualities, and of the other advantages belonging to you!

Alc. What especially (do you mean), Socrates, and why do you say this?

Soc. I feel greatly hurt in behalf of yourself, and of the love I bear you.

Alc. How so?

Soc. In that you think there is a fitting contest for yourself against the men here.

Alc. Against whom then?

Soc. This forsooth is a question for him to ask, who fancies himself to be a high-minded man!

Alc. How say you? Is not my contest with these very persons?

[33.] Soc. If you had any thought of steering a trireme about to engage in a sea-fight, would it be sufficient for you to be superior to your fellow-sailors in the art of steering? or would you think that this ought to be at hand, and you would look to those in reality your antagonists, but not as you now do to your fellow-combatants? to whom it is assuredly⁶⁸ meet regimen; I have translated as if the Greek were κοινή βουλή ἴστω, Σώκρατες, similar to ἴστω κοινή βουλή in Crito, p. 49, D. § 10, and κοινή γὰρ ἴσται ἢ πύστις in Lach. § 27.

⁶⁷—⁶⁷ The Greek is καίτοι ἐννοῶ, where Stephens proposed to read καί τι ἐννοῶ. He might have suggested καί γὰρ τι—similar to “etenim” in Ficinus. Stalbaum indeed says that ἐννοῶ is united to the genitive εἰπόντος σου, in Rep. ii. p. 370. But there, as here, it is the genitive absolute.

⁶⁸ Instead of δεῖ in Ald. and Steph. the two Basil edd. have δὲ, adopted for you to be so much the superior, that they ought never to deem themselves fit to contend against (you),⁶⁹ but, through their being held in little esteem, to contend merely with you against the enemy; if indeed you are thinking of exhibiting any exploit in reality honourable, and worthy of yourself and of your country.

Alc. Of such an act I am indeed thinking.

Soc. Is it then very worthy of you to rest contented, if you are a better man than your fellow-soldiers merely,⁷⁰ and not to look to the leaders of your opponents,⁷¹ considering if perchance you shall become somewhat better than they, and exercising yourself in reflecting upon the things relating to them.⁷¹

Alc. Who are the persons, of whom you are speaking, Socrates?

Soc. Know you not, that the state is constantly at war with the Lacedæmonians, and the great king?⁷²

Alc. True.

Soc. If then you have it in your mind to be the leader of this state, would you not think rightly in thinking that you will have to contend against the kings of Lacedæmon and Persia?

Alc. You are very near to speaking the truth?

[34.] Soc. Nay, but, my good man, must you not look to Midias, the quail-feeder,⁷³ and others of that kind, who attempt by Sydenham, suggested by Heusde, and subsequently found in nearly all the MSS.

⁶⁹ In συναγωνιζέσθαι, found in three MSS., lies hid οἱ ἀνταγωνιζέσθαι, required by the balance of the sentence, as Schleiermacher was the first to perceive.

⁷⁰ Instead of στρατιωτῶν, Sydenham suggested συστρατιωτῶν, to answer to συναγωνιστῶν just before.

⁷² Such was the title of the king of Persia. See at Meno, § 11.

⁷³ What cock-fighting was once in England, quail-fighting was at Athens; for small as the bird is, it is, like the male partridge and robin, very pugnacious. According to Pollux, the birds were placed in a circular pit, and the one that drove his opponent out of the circle was considered to manage the affairs of the state, and still wear, as the women would say, the slave-like cut of hair⁷⁴ in their souls, through their want of a liberal education; nor having as yet thrown it off, but acting still the part of barbarians,⁷⁵ they have come to the city, to fawn upon, and not to rule it. ⁷⁶Ought you then to look to these men, of whom I am speaking, and to disregard yourself,⁷⁶ and neither to learn what is closely connected with learning, when you are about to enter into a contest so great, nor to practise what requires practice, and, after being furnished with every kind of preparation, to proceed thus to the affairs of state?

Alc. Indeed, Socrates, you seem to me to say what is true. I fancy, however, that the Lacedæmonian generals and the king of Persia differ in nothing from other persons.

Soc. But consider, thou best of men, of what kind is this fancy of yours.

Alc. With respect to what?

Soc. In the first place, whether you fancy you would take the more care of yourself, when feeling a fear, and fancying them to be formidable, or not?

Alc. It is evident, if I fancied them formidable.

the conqueror; this was called ὄρνυγομαχία: but the ὄρνυγοκοπία consisted in striking with the finger the head of the bird, or plucking from it a feather; and the one that endured the torture without flinching, won the sum staked by their respective owners. To this kind of sport Midias was so addicted as to be called by the name of the bird, as we learn from Aristoph. Ὀρν. 1297.

⁷⁴ According to Olympiodorus, whose Scholium was first published by Casaubon on Persius, v. 116, Παροιμία ἴστι γυναικῶν ἐπὶ τῶν ἐλευθερουμένων δοῦλων καὶ ἐπιμενόντων ἐν τῇ δουλοπρεπείᾳ, (not δουλείᾳ, as it is absurdly printed,) ὅτι ἔχεις τὴν ἀνδραποδῶδη τρίχα ἐν τῇ κεφαλῇ, τοῦτ' ἴστιν, ἐπὶ τὴν δουλικὴν ἔξιν (printed τρίχα, which is explaining idem per idem) ἔχεις. "The women had a saying, which they used to slaves made free, but still retaining the manners which belonged to slaves—You wear your slavish hair on your head still—that is, You still retain your slavish habits." It was applied, it seems, by the Athenian ladies, to men whom they saw ill-bred and illiterate. So Sydenham; who might have quoted Aristoph. Ὀρν. 911, ἔπειτα τῇδὶ (vulg. δῆτα) δοῦλος ὦν κόμην ἔχεις, to prove that slaves were not permitted to wear their hair hanging down.

⁷⁵ It would seem from hence that the family of Midias was of foreign extraction.

^{76—76} By taking, with Sydenham, the sentence interrogatively, we get rid of the necessity of expelling δὲ, with Stephens and Bekker, or of changing it into δὴ, as suggested by Etwall and Buttmann.

Soc. Do you fancy then that you would sustain any injury by taking care of yourself?

Alc. Not at all; but be benefited even greatly.

Soc. This fancy then of yours has this one evil of so great a kind.

Alc. You say the truth.

[35.] Soc. Consider then if there be not probably a second, namely, that it is false.

Alc. How so?

Soc. Whether is it probable that the better natures⁷⁷ are produced from noble races, or not?⁷⁸

Alc. It is evident, from the noble.

Soc. And (is it not probable that) the well-born, if they are brought up well, will thus become perfect in virtue?

Alc. Necessarily so.

Soc. Let us consider then in comparing our condition with theirs, whether the kings of Lacedæmon and of Persia appear to be sprung from inferior races. Now know we not that the former are descendants of Hercules, and the latter of Achæmenes?⁷⁹ and that both the family of Hercules, and that of Achæmenes, are carried up to Perseus the son of Jupiter?⁸⁰

Alc. And my family, Socrates, (is carried up) to Eurysaces; and that of Eurysaces⁸¹ to Zeus.

Soc. And mine, my noble Alcibiades, is to Dædalus, and his to Vulcan, the son of Zeus.⁸² But in the families of the ⁷⁷ Instead of φῆσεις, found in only one MS., the rest have φύσεις: which Sydenham elicited before Heusde from "naturas" in Ficinus.

⁷⁸ So Aristotle in Polit. iii. 8, Βελτίους εἰκὸς τοὺς ἐκ βελτιόνων εὐγενεῖα γὰρ ἴσθιν ἀπρὸ γένους. "It is reasonable for the better persons to come from the better. For to be well-born is the virtue of a race." So Horace too says, "Fortes creantur fortibus." S. See Menexen. § 5, and Cratyl. § 24.

⁷⁹ On this Achæmenes, see Herodot. vii. 11, and 150, and the Commentators on Horace, Od. iii. 1, 44; Epod. xiii. 12.

⁸⁰ As Hercules, says Sydenham, was never supposed to be descended from Perseus, it is evident that the passage is corrupt. He would therefore insert εἰς τὸν Δία after τὸ δὲ Ἡρακλίου τὸ γένος—a suggestion which, strange to say, has been overlooked by every subsequent scholar.

⁸¹ This Eurysaces was the son of Ajax, by whom he was so called, from being the heir to the broad shield of the hero of Salamis.

other parties, beginning from themselves, are kings sprung from kings carried up to Zeus; some of Argos and Lacedæmon, and the others of Persia for ever, and often of all Asia, as they are at present: whereas we and our fathers are only private individuals. If then it were requisite to exhibit your ancestors in the person of Eurysaces, and Salamis as your country, or Ægina as that of the still more remote Æacus, of what ridicule do you fancy you would not have to pay the debt in the presence of Artaxerxes, the son of Xerxes? [36.] Consider besides, whether we are not inferior both in the pride of birth, and in the rest of our bringing up. Know you not how great are the advantages attendant upon the kings of Lacedæmon? whose wives are watched in public by the Ephori,⁸³ in order that as far as possible,⁸⁴ no king may be secretly begotten except by one of the family of the Heracleidæ; while the Persian king is so greatly our superior, that not a single person has the least suspicion that a king can be born from any other than a king.⁸⁵ The consort, therefore, of the king is under no guard but that imposed by her own fears. Further, when the eldest son is born to him, who is then the ruler, all those in the (palace) of the king over whom he rules, have a feast, and subsequently at another period the whole of Asia makes a sacrifice and feast, on the birth-day of the king. But when we were born, Alcibiades, "our very neighbours even little knew it," as the comic poet⁸⁶ says. After this the child is brought up, not by some nurse at a little price, but by the eunuchs,⁸⁷ who are considered the best about the ⁸³ These were five in number, and formed the privy council of the state at home; while the kings had little power, except at the head of an army on foreign service.

⁸⁵ Such is what the sense requires; but it can hardly be obtained from the Greek ἐξ αὐτοῦ.

⁸⁶ According to the Scholiast and Olympiodorus, the comic poet was the namesake of the philosopher; and the verse was, Ἐμοῦ γαμοῦντος δ', οὐδὲ γέινω ἦσθ' ἔοικε, as Dacier elicited from Plutarch in Phocion, § 30, with which has been compared the expression in Cicero, Cat. ii. 10, "corruant; sed ita, ut non modo civitas, sed ne vicini quidem proximi sentiant."

⁸⁷ We learn from Herodotus, that eunuchs were highly valued at the king's person; on whom the duty is imposed of taking care of the royal infant in other matters, and of contriving how he may become as handsome as possible in his person, by moulding his limbs,⁸⁰ and making them straight; and they who do this (well⁸⁰) are held in great honour. [37.] When the young princes are seven years old, they are placed upon horseback, and frequent the schools of the riding-masters, and commence going a hunting. At fourteen years of age they, who are called the royal preceptors, take the boy under their care. Now these are chosen out from such as are deemed the most excellent of the Persians, men in the prime of life, four in number, excelling (severally) in wisdom, justice, temperance, and fortitude. The first of these instructs the youth in the learning of the Magi⁸¹ according to Zoroaster,⁸¹ the son of Oromazes,⁸²—now by this learning is meant the worship of the gods,⁸³—and likewise in the art of kingly government. The person, excelling in justice, (teaches him) to be true in words and deeds through the whole of life. He who excels in temperance, to be governed by not a single pleasure of any kind, in order that he may acquire the habits of a freeman, and be really a king, by governing first his own appetites, instead of being their slave. But the person who excels in fortitude, makes him fearless and intrepid, since he, who fears, is a slave. But, over you, court of Persia, and purchased at a great price, on account of their reputation for fidelity in all things committed to their trust. S.

⁸⁰ According to Olympiodorus, the nose was made aquiline, as being the mark of a kingly mind.

⁸¹ So Sydenham; as if he wished to read ταὺτ' εὖ δρῶντες in lieu of ταῦτα δρῶντες.

⁸² On the learning of the Magi, see Hemsterhuis on Lucian. Necyom. § 6. It was perhaps from this passage of Plato that Cicero asserted in Divinat. i., that no person could be a king in Persia, "qui non ante Magorum disciplinam scientiamque perceperit."

⁸³ Who Zoroaster was, and when he lived, is unknown. According to Oriental scholars, the word means "star-gazer." Hence one might be led to conjecture that Z is "the," ὦπο, "see," and αστρ, "star." In Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, t. xxxix. p. 689 and foll., there is an elaborate account of the religion introduced into Persia by Zoroaster.

⁸⁴ According to Plutarch, in Isis and Osiris, p. 369, Ὀρομάζης was the name given by the Persians to the author of all good.

⁸⁵ See Porphyry Περὶ Ἀποχῆς, iv. p. 165, and Apuleius in Apolog. p. 290, ed. Elmenh., quoted by Stalbaum.

Alcibiades, Pericles appointed as a preceptor, Zopyrus of Thrace, who was, through old age, the most useless of his domestics. I could recount to you the rest of the bringing up and instruction of your antagonists, if it were not a work of time; and moreover, these are sufficient to show all the rest that follow after them. But of your birth, Alcibiades, and nurture, and instruction, or any thing else whatever, there is a care to not one, so to say, of the Athenians; unless there happens to be some admirer of you. But if on the other hand you would turn your eyes to the wealth of the Persian kings, and their luxurious living and apparel, and the trailing of the trains of their dresses,⁹⁴ and the anointing of themselves with perfumes, and the multitude of their retinue and servants, and the rest of their delicate living, you would be ashamed of yourself, on perceiving how greatly you fall short of them. [38.] And if, on the other hand, you would turn your eyes to the temperance and orderly conduct of the Lacedæmonians, their easy deportment and mildness of disposition, and high-mindedness, and regularity, and manly bearing, and endurance under suffering, and their love of labour, and of contending, and of honour, you would deem yourself a child in all these points. But if you turn your thoughts at all to your wealth, and fancy that on this point you are something, let not this be left unsaid by us, if perchance you are sensible in what rank you stand. If you are willing then to look to the wealth of the Lacedæmonians, you will know that the lands here fall far short of those there. For the land which they possess in their own country, and in Messenia, is such, that not one of those here would contend (to be inferior),⁹⁵ either in quantity or quality, or in the possession of slaves of other kinds,⁹⁶ and of those called Helotes,⁹⁷ and of ⁹⁴ This was considered a mark of pride or effeminacy, in which not only Alcibiades indulged himself, but his son likewise. See Wyttenbach on Plutarch, S. N. V. p. 28.

⁹⁵ Buttmann was the first to remark, that something had dropt out here; for he found in the version of Ficinus, "nemo utique dubitaret, quin—nostros exsuperet." But he did not see that ἐλαττωῦσθαι had probably dropt out between τῶδε and πλήθει.

⁹⁶ By these were meant such as were acquired by purchase. S.

horses, and such other cattle as pasture in Messenia. [39.] But to all this I bid a farewell. But as to gold and silver, there is not so much amongst all the Greeks, as there is at Lacedæmon in private hands. For already during many generations the metals have been coming thither from all the Greeks, and often too from the Barbarians;⁹⁸ but there is no going out to any place;⁹⁹ but really, according to the fable of Æsop, where¹⁰⁰ the fox speaks to the lion, the impressions of coined money at Lacedæmon, as it enters thither, one may see plainly marked,¹ but no where of its going out; so that it is easy sals; and, in lieu of the produce, to pay a fixed rent to their masters, not unlike the tenants in villinage under the feudal laws in after times. To the like hard conditions did the Lacedæmonians subsequently subject the conquered Messenians, who were often comprehended under the same name, as appears from Pausanias, iii. 21, and Thucydides, i. 101, where the Scholiast states, that the Lacedæmonians διὰ τὸ αἰ διαφόρους εἶναι Εἰλώταις, (for so we ought to read, in lieu of the absurd ἀλλήλοις,) were wont to call their other slaves by the same name. S.

⁹⁸ Instead of ἐκ τῶν, one would prefer ἐκ τινων, to balance ἀπάντων—

⁹⁹ As the Lacedæmonians were prohibited by law from using any coined money, of gold, silver, or copper, they adopted as the circulating medium pieces of iron of a conical shape, and so peculiarly tempered as to be of no other use. But as such money had no real value elsewhere, and only a nominal one in Laconia, it would not pass elsewhere in exchange for merchandise. On the other hand, all the corn produced and cattle bred in the fertile fields and fine pastures of Messenia, all the copper and iron dug out of the rich mountains of Laconia, and manufactured by the Helotes, and which was not wanted at home, was sent abroad and paid for in gold and silver; which money was either deposited in the temple at Delphi, or intrusted to the custody of their neighbours, the Arcadians, as shown by Athenæus, vi. p. 233; or much of it buried, (as silver is said to be at Pekin,) or concealed in secret places, an instance of which is recorded by Plutarch in his life of Lysander. So Sydenham. Ast refers to Xenoph. Rep. Laced. vii. 6, xiv. 3; and Stalbaum to Cragius de Rep. Laced. iii. 10, and Boeckh. Œconom. Athen. i. p. 32, ii. p. 138.

to know well that of (all)² the Grecians the richest in gold and silver are the people there, and of them (the richest³ is) their king. For from sources of that kind the largest and most frequent receipts go to the kings; and still further, the royal tribute, which the Lacedæmonians pay to their kings, is not a trifle. But though the wealth of the Lacedæmonians is great, as compared with that of the Greeks, yet as compared with that of the Persians, and their king, it is nothing. [40.] For I once heard a person⁴ worthy of credit, one of those who went up to the king, who stated that he passed along a large and fertile territory for nearly a day's journey, which the inhabitants called the Queen's Girdle;⁵ that there was another called the (Queen's) Veil; and that many other fair and fruitful countries were appropriated to provide the Queen's apparel; and that each of those countries had its name from the part of the apparel (it furnished). So that I think, if any person were to tell Amastris, the mother of the (reigning) king, and the consort formerly of Xerxes, that the son of Dinomache had in mind to array himself against her son, and that (Dinomache's) whole attire was worth perhaps fifty minæ,⁶ supposing it to be of the most costly kind,⁷ and that her son possessed in Ercheia⁸ not even three hundred plethra⁹

To the same fable there is an allusion in Horace, Epist. i. l. 73, "Olim quod vulpes ægroto cauta leoni Respondit, referam; quia me vestigia terrent Omnia te adversum spectantia, nulla retrorsum."

² Sydenham has thus adopted "omnium," found in Ficinus, and "the richest," from his "pecuniosissimus."

³ This is supposed by Olympiodorus and the Scholiast to be Xenophon; who says in Anab. i. Δ. 9, that the villages, in which they encamped, had been appropriated for the girdle of Parysatis (the queen). A similar account is given by Diodor. Sic. i. p. 62, where Wesseling refers to Cicero in Verr. iii. 33.

⁴ There was the same custom in ancient Egypt, as stated by Herodotus, ii. 98, where the city of Anthylla was assigned to supply the queen-consort with shoes and slippers. S.

⁵ Equal to £161 9s. 2d. English money. S.

⁸ Ercheia was a ward of the tribe of Ægeus. See Harpocration in Ἐρχεῖαν.

⁹ A Greek πλῆθρον contained 10,000 square feet; an English acre contains 4840 square feet. Hence the estate of Alcibiades contained about 619 English acres. S.

of land, she would wonder to what could Alcibiades be trusting, so as to have in mind to contend with Artaxerxes ; and she would, I think, say, it is impossible for this man to make the attempt through trusting to nothing else than his carefulness and wisdom ; for these are the only things worth mention amongst the Greeks. [41.] Since if she heard, that this same Alcibiades is making so great an attempt,¹⁰ being in the first place, not yet twenty years of age, and in the next place, that he is utterly un instructed ; and besides this, (that)¹¹ when his admirer told him he ought first to acquire knowledge, and to pay attention to himself, and after some practice to go in this way, when he was about to contend with the king, he would not do so, but said that he was all-sufficient as he was, then, she would, I think, be astonished, and ask, What is the thing in which the youth puts his trust ? If then we were to say that (he trusts) to his beauty and size and family and wealth, and to the natural faculties of his mind, she would think us, Alcibiades, out of our senses, when she reflected upon the advantages of such a kind on their side. And I think too that Lampido,¹² the daughter of Leotychidas, and the wife of Archidamus, and the mother of Agis, all of whom became kings, would wonder, when she reflected upon the advantages on their side, that you should have a mind to contend with her son, while you have been brought up so ill. And now do you not think it a shameful thing, that the wives of our enemies should consider more prudently for us, than we do for ourselves, what sort of persons we ought to be to attack them. But do you, O blessed one, be persuaded by me and the inscription at Delphi, "Know thyself ;" since such are your antagonists, and not those whom you fancy, and to whom you would never be superior by any thing else except application and skill ; in which, if you are deficient, you will fail in that renown amongst the Greeks and Barbarians, of which you appear to me to have such a desire as no other person has of any thing else.

[42.] Alc. To what then, Socrates, must I apply myself ?

¹⁰ Picinus has "certamen tantum inire," which leads to ροσούρον ἐπιχρησέν instead of νῦν ἐπιχρησέν.

¹¹ So Sydenham ; as if he wished to insert ὅτι between ρούρους and ροῦ—

¹² The word in Herodot. vi. 71 is Lampito.

Can you inform me? for you seem to me to say what is especially correct.

Soc. Yes, I can. But ¹³let there be a joint consultation ¹³ respecting the means of our becoming the best. For I do not say that, as regards you, there is a necessity for instruction, but not as regards myself; for there is no difference between you and me, except in one thing.

Alc. What is that?

Soc. My guardian is better and wiser than Pericles, who is yours.

Alc. And who is yours, O Socrates?

Soc. A deity, Alcibiades, who did not suffer me to converse with you before to-day; and trusting to whom I assert that your favourable appearance ¹⁴ (in life) will arise through no one else than myself.

Alc. You are in jest, Socrates.

Soc. Perhaps so. I am speaking, however, the truth, (in saying) that we are in need of application, ¹⁵ if not more than all men, ¹⁵ yet very much so.

Alc. (In saying) that I (am in need of it), you do not say what is false.

Soc. Nor that I myself am so.

Alc. What then must we do?

Soc. We must not hesitate, my friend, nor act a soft part.

Alc. It is by no means, Socrates, becoming to do so.

[43.] Soc. Indeed it does not; but we must consider in common. Now tell me. We say that we wish to become as excellent as possible. Do we not?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. In what quality?

Alc. Plainly in what men are good.

Soc. Good in what?

Alc. Evidently in performing acts.

¹³—¹⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were κοινή βουλή ἴστω, Σώκρατες, not κοινῇ βουλῇ, ὃ Σώκρατες, to avoid the juxta-position of two datives, βουλῇ, φ— See above, § 32, and at Laches, § 27.

(¹⁴ Schleiermacher remarks that the present is the only passage in Plato where ἐπιφάνεια is found in this sense.

¹⁵—¹⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were εἰ μὴ μᾶλλον ἢ πάντες ἄνθρωποι, and not μᾶλλον μὲν (one MS. δὲ) πάντες ἄνθρωποι: which Buttmann could not understand, nor can I.

Soc. What acts? Of horsemanship?¹⁶

Alc. Surely not.

Soc. For then we should go to jockies.

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Do you then mean naval affairs?

Alc. No.

Soc. For then we should go to nautical men.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. What affairs then? and who are the doers?

Alc. Such as the Athenians do, who are men of honour and goodness.

Soc. By men of honour and goodness, do you mean those with mind or without it?

Alc. With mind.

Soc. In whatever, then, each is a man of mind, in that is he good likewise?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. But in whatever he is without a mind, in that is he bad likewise?

Alc. How not?

Soc. Is not a shoemaker a man of mind, as regards the making of shoes?

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. In this respect then is he good?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. But as regards the making of garments, is not the shoemaker without mind?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. In this respect then he is bad.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. By this reasoning then the same man is both bad and good.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. Would you say then that the good men are also bad?

Alc. Surely not.

[44.] Soc. Whom then do you mean by the good?

Alc. I mean such as are able to rule in the state.

Soc. Not the horses, surely?

¹⁶ This allusion to horsemanship is made advisedly. For Alcibiades was fond of that amusement, as may be inferred from Aristophanes, who has drawn his character in the Clouds, under the name of Pheidippides.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. But men?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Men, who are sick?

Alc. No.

Soc. Those on a voyage?

Alc. No.

Soc. Those harvesting?

Alc. No.

Soc. Those who are doing nothing? or those who are doing something?

Alc. I mean, who are doing something?

Soc. What? Endeavour to show to me clearly.

Alc. Those (I mean) who ¹⁷ come in contact with, and make use of each other,¹⁷ as we do, who are living in cities.

Soc. You mean then of persons using each other, (so as)¹⁸ to rule.

Alc. I do.

Soc. Do you mean of boatswains,¹⁹ who make use of rowers?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. For this ability to do so belongs to the steersman.

Alc. True.

Soc. Do you then mean of men (able) to rule hautboy-players, and by leading the song [to men],²⁰ and making use of ballet-dancers?

¹⁸ As ἀρχειν has nothing to govern it, Stephens proposed to supply δυναμίνους from the preceding τοὺς δυναμίνους—ἀρχειν. But the reference would be too remote. Ast and Stalbaum however have adopted the idea; the latter of whom thus renders the whole speech: "Do you mean those, who are able to rule men, by using the labour of men." Ficinus has "Nunquid imperare eos dicis hominibus, qui hominibus utuntur," i. e. "Say you then that those rule men, who make use of them?" which is perfectly intelligible indeed, but not a translation of the Greek.

¹⁹ This is the correct nautical word in English for κελυστήης in Greek, and "hortator" in Latin.

²⁰ Sydenham, unable to understand ἀνθρώποις by itself, translated, "to other men." But the train of argument requires its rejection entirely.

ministered and preserved? I would have said—When health is present, and disease absent. Do not you think thus?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And if you had asked me again—By (the presence or absence) of what, (are administered the better and preserved) the eyes? I would have answered in like manner—By sight being present, and blindness absent. So likewise the ears, when deafness is absent, and hearing present, are the better, and better taken care of.

Alc. Certainly.

[46.] Soc. What then is the state? By the presence and absence of what does it become better, and is better ²⁵ [attended to and] ²⁵ administered.

Alc. It seems to me, Socrates, when friendship exists to them ²⁶ with each other, and hate and dissension are absent.

Soc. By friendship do you mean the thinking alike, or not alike?

Alc. The thinking alike.²⁷

Soc. Now by what science do states think alike respecting numbers?

Alc. Through the science of arithmetic.

Soc. Well then, and do not individuals too through the same (science)?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And does not each person (think alike) with himself too?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Now, through what science does each person think alike with himself about a span and a cubit, which of the two is the greater? Is it not through the science of mensuration?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And do not individuals with each other, and states likewise?

Alc. Yes.

²⁵⁻²⁶ The words within brackets are omitted by Ficinus.

²⁶ According to Stephens, whom Buttmann and Stalbaum follow, αὐτοῖς agrees with πολλοῖς, which is to be got out of πόλις. But Ficinus found, no doubt, in his MS. ἀλλοῖς, as shown by his version, "inter cives." On the confusion of ἀλλοῖς and αὐτοῖς, see Markland on Eurip. Suppl. 365.

²⁷ So Sallust, "Idem velle atque idem nolle ea demum firma amicitia est."

Soc. And about weights? Is it not in like manner?

Alc. I say so.

Soc. But the thinking alike, of which you are speaking, what is it, and about what? and what is the science that furnishes it? And is it the same in the case of a state, and an individual, as regards both himself and another person?

Alc. Probably it is.

Soc. What is it then? Do not be faint-hearted in giving an answer, but be ready to speak out.

Alc. ²⁹ I suppose I may say that friendship and thinking alike is ³⁰ that, by which a father and a mother think alike, in loving their son, and a brother with his brother, and a man with his wife.

[47.] Soc. Do you then, Alcibiades, suppose that a man can think alike with his wife on the subject of weaving, he, who does not know, with her, who does?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. Nor ought he either. For this knowledge belongs to women.³¹

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. What then, can a woman think alike with a man on the subject of shield-warfare, when she has never learnt it?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. For this you would perhaps say belongs to men.³²

Alc. I would.

Soc. Some kinds of knowledge then belong to women, and some to men, according to your account.

Alc. How not?

Soc. On these subjects then there is no thinking alike amongst women and men.

Alc. There is not.

²⁹⁻³⁰ The Greek is Ἐγὼ μὲν οἶμαι φίλιαν τε λίσγειν καὶ ὁμόνοιαν. But as Socrates had asked about ὁμόνοια, and not φιλία, it is evident that φίλιαν τε is out of place here. On the other hand, as he had told Alcibiades not to be faint-hearted, but to speak out, it is probable that Plato wrote—οἶμαι ἐν ἀσφαλεῖ γε—λίσγειν, i. e. "I think I may safely—assert." Moreover as οἶμαι—λίσγειν, cannot mean, as Buttman explains it, the same as λίσγω, we may adopt εἶναι λίσγειν, found in one MS., and similar to "reor—esse—" in Ficinus, or rather λίσγειν εἶναι, for thus καὶ would be a remnant of εἶναι.

³¹ Compare Hom. Il. Z. 490, where Hector tells Andromache to go into the house, and to attend to her business of the loom and distaff.

³² Compare Hom. Il. Z. 492, πόλεμος δ' ἀνδρῶσσι μέλει.

Soc. Neither then is there any friendship, if friendship be a thinking alike.

Alc. It appears not.

Soc. So far then as wives attend to their own business, they are not beloved by their husbands.

Alc. It is probable.

Soc. Neither are husbands (beloved) by their wives, so far as (they attend to) their own business.

Alc. It seems not.

Soc. Neither are states (well)³¹ administered in this way,³² when every one attends to his own business.

Alc. I think so, Socrates.

Soc. How say you, when friendship is not present, through the existence of which we said that states were well administered, but otherwise not?

Alc. But friendship seems to me to exist to them on this very account, because every one attends to his own business.

[48.] Soc. It did not (seem so to you) just now. How then do you now state the reverse? Does friendship exist, while a thinking alike does not exist? Or is it possible for a thinking alike to exist on subjects, which some do know and others do not?

Alc. It is not possible.

Soc. Do persons act justly or unjustly, when each attends to his own business?

Alc. Justly. How not?

Soc. When the citizens in a state act justly, is not friendship produced amongst each other?

Alc. It appears to me necessary, Socrates.

Soc. What kind of friendship then, or thinking alike, do you mean, respecting which it is meet for us to be wise and of good counsel, in order that we may be good men? For I am unable to learn what it is, or in what things it exists. For at one time it seems to exist in the same things, and at another time not, according to your account of it.

Alc. Now by the gods, Socrates, I do not know myself

³¹ From "optime" in Ficinus, Sydenham was the first to suggest av in lieu of av, confirmed by Olympiodorus. So too Heusde, Schleiermacher, and Ast.

³² Instead of raôry, omitted in one MS., Ficinus found in his rots, as shown by his version, "tunc."

what I mean: but I am in danger of having been unconsciously for a long time in a shameful state.

Soc. But now you ought to take courage. For if you had perceived you were so suffering at the age of fifty, it would have been difficult for you to take care of yourself. But you are now at the very time of life, in which it is meet for you to perceive it.

Alc. What then must I do, Socrates, now that I perceive it?

Soc. Answer to what I ask, Alcibiades. And if you do so, you and I god willing, will be in a better state, if one may trust to my prophetic powers.

Alc. Such will be the result, as far as it depends on my answering.

Soc. Come then (say).—What is it to take care of oneself?—in order that we may not be unconsciously, as we often²² are, not taking care of ourselves, although fancying we are—and when does a man do so? When he is taking care of what belongs to him, is he then taking care of himself?

Alc. To me, at least, it appears so.

Soc. What then, when does a man take care of his feet? Is it when he is taking care of the things belonging to his feet?

Alc. I do not understand.

Soc.²³ Do you call by a name something belonging to the hand? as, for instance, a ring? Would you say that it belongs to any other (part) of a man than his finger?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. And (does) not a shoe (belong) to the foot in like manner?

Alc. Yes.²⁴

Soc. When we are taking care of shoes, are we then taking care of feet?

Alc. I do not, Socrates, very well understand.

²² Here, as elsewhere, Buttmann would render παλλάκις "perchance," on the authority of the passages quoted by Heindorf on Phædo, § 11. And so too Stalbaum.

²³⁻²⁴ After Nai, Stobæus supplies, in p. 178, as remarked by Gottleber, ΣΟΚ. Kai ipátia kai στρώματα τοῦ ἄλλου σώματος; AAK. Nai: which Buttmann considers to be genuine; and so did T. Taylor in the Cl. Jl. No. 41, p. 141, but Stalbaum an interpolation.

Soc. Well then, Alcibiades, do you call by any name the taking a correct care of any thing whatever?

Alc. I do.

Soc. When then a person makes any thing better, call you that a correct care?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. What then is the art, that makes shoes better?

Alc. The shoemaker's.

Soc. By the shoemaker's art then we take care of shoes.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And (do we take care) of a foot by the shoemaker's art, or by that by which we make the feet better?

Alc. By this last art.

Soc. And (we make) better the feet not by the art, by which (we do) the rest of the body?

Alc. So it seems, at least to me.

Soc. And is not this the gymnastic art?

Alc. Especially so.

Soc. By the gymnastic art then we take care of the foot, but by the shoemaker's art that, which belongs to the foot.

Alc. Exactly so.

Soc. And by the gymnastic art (we take care) of the hands, but by the art of engraving rings, of what belongs to the hand.

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. And by the gymnastic art (we take care) of the body, but by the art of the weaver and other arts, what belongs to the body.

Alc. Entirely so.

[50.] Soc. By one art then we take care of each thing, but by another what belongs to it.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. You are not then taking care of yourself, when you are taking care of what belongs to yourself.

Alc. Not at all.

Soc. For the art, it seems, is not the same, by which one takes care of himself, and of what belongs to himself.

Alc. So it appears.

Soc. Now then, by what kind of art can we take care of ourselves?

Alc. I cannot tell.

Soc. So much, however, has been agreed upon, that it is not the art, by which we render better any thing whatever belonging to us, but that, by which (we render so) ourselves.

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. Could we have ever known what art would make a shoe better, if we knew not what a shoe was?

Alc. Impossible.

Soc. Neither what art makes better finger-rings, if ignorant, (could we have known) what a finger-ring was.

Alc. True.

Soc. Well then, can we ever know what art makes a man³⁵ better, if we are ignorant what we are ourselves?

Alc. Impossible.

Soc. Does it then happen to be an easy thing to know oneself? and was he a person of mean abilities, who put up that inscription in the temple at Pytho?³⁶ or is it a difficult thing, and not for every one (to discover)?

Alc. To me indeed, Socrates, it has often seemed to be (an easy thing³⁷), for every one (to discover), and often too, a thing very difficult.

Soc. But, Alcibiades, whether it be easy or not, with respect to us, the case is this. Had we known it, we should perhaps have known to take care of ourselves; but not knowing, we can never (do so).

Alc. Such is the case.

[51.] Soc. Come then, by what means can a thing be discovered what it is by itself? For so we might thus perhaps find what we are ourselves; but being in ignorance on that point, we are unable (to know ourselves).

Alc. You speak correctly.

Soc. Attend now, by Zeus. With whom are you conversing now? Is it not³⁸ with myself?

³⁵ Instead of αὐτὸν Ficinus found ἡμᾶς αὐτοὺς in his MS., as shown by his version, "nos ipsos."

³⁶ Pytho was another name for Delphi. The Scholiast here quotes a distich, which Meineke on Menander, p. 576, ed. 1, attributes to Ion the tragic writer: "To know thyself is in word nothing great; And a god only knows it well in deed."

³⁷ Ficinus alone has—"facile hoc," as the balance of the sentence requires.

³⁸ Instead of ἄλλῳ τινι ᾧ ἐμοί, Sydenham suggested ἄλλοι τι ἢ ἐμοί, on account of the affirmative answer Ναί: and so all the MSS. but one.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And am I not conversing with you?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. It is Socrates then who is conversing and arguing?

Alc. Quite true.

Soc. And Alcibiades who is listening?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is it not by a discourse that Socrates is conversing?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And is not the same thing to converse and to use a discourse?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. But is not the person, who uses a thing, different from the thing, which he uses?

Alc. How do you mean?

Soc. As a shoemaker, for instance, cuts leather with (a semicircular) knife, and (a straight) knife, and other tools.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is not then the shoemaker, who cuts and uses (tools), one, but the tools, which he uses, another?

Alc. How not?

Soc. Would not in like manner the instruments on which a harp-player plays, and the harp-player himself, be different?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. This, then, I was lately asking, whether the person, who uses a thing, seems to you always to be different from the thing, which he uses.

Alc. He seems so.

Soc. What then shall we say of the shoemaker? That he cuts with his tools only, or with his hands likewise?

Alc. With his hands likewise.

Soc. He uses them too.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And does he not use his eyes too, when he is cutting leather?

Alc. He does.

Soc. Now we are agreed, that the person, who uses, is different from what he uses.

Bekker omits η , because when $\delta\lambda\lambda\omicron\tau\epsilon$ is used interrogatively, the η is not expressed. Buttman and Stalbaum, prefer $\delta\lambda\lambda\omega\tau\omega\eta$, furnished by Stobæus, despite the objection of Sydenham.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. The shoemaker, then, and the harp-player, are different from the hands and eyes with which they work.

Alc. It is apparent.

Soc. And does not a man use also his whole body.

Alc. Certainly.

— Soc. Now the thing using is different from what it uses.

Alc. True.

— Soc. A man therefore is a being different from his body.

Alc. It seems so.

[52.] Soc. What sort of being then is a man?

Alc. I cannot tell.

Soc. But you can (tell) that it is some being making a use of its body.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Does any other being make use of its body but the soul?

Alc. None other.

— Soc. And does it not so do by ruling (the body)?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. I suppose moreover that no man would ever think otherwise than this.

Alc. Than what?

Soc. That the man was one of three things.

Alc. What things?

— Soc. Soul, or body, ³⁹ or a whole, itself formed of both. ⁴⁰

Alc. How not?

Soc. Now have we agreed that the being, which rules the body, is a man.

Alc. We have agreed.

Soc. ⁴¹[What being then is a man?] ⁴² Does the body itself govern itself?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. For we said that it was ruled.

Alc. True.

Soc. This then cannot be that, of which we are in search.

³⁹⁻⁴⁰ Instead of ἡ ἐναμφοτέρων τὸ ὅλον τοῦτο, Schleiermacher, whom I have followed, elicited ἡ καὶ ἐξ ἀμφοτέρων τὸ ὅλον οὐδὲ, by the aid of Ficinus—"aut totum ipsum ex utrisque compositum."

⁴¹⁻⁴² The words within brackets are wanting in the three oldest MSS. and omitted by Bekker and Stalbaum.

Alc. It seems not.

Soc. But does the compound being rule the body? and is this a man?

Alc. Perhaps it is.

Soc. Least of all so. For (of two parties), one not being a joint-ruler, there are no means for both to rule jointly.

Alc. Right.

Soc. Since then neither the body, nor the compound of both, is a man, it remains, I think, either that the being (man) is nothing at all, or, if it be any thing, it results that the man is nothing else than soul.

Alc. It is just so.

[53.] Soc. Needs it then be proved to you still more clearly, that the soul is man?

Alc. It needs not, by Zeus: for it seems to me (to be shown) sufficiently.

Soc. If it be proved not accurately, yet moderately so, it is sufficient for us. For we shall then perhaps know accurately, when we shall have discovered, what we just now passed by, through its being a matter of much consideration.

Alc. What is that?

Soc. That which was just now spoken of in some such way as this; that we must first consider the self by itself; but now ⁴¹ instead of "the self by itself," we have been considering the "each" ⁴¹ what it is; and this perhaps will suffice. For we could surely never say that any thing is more the master of ourselves, than the soul.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Is it not then well to think thus; that we are having an intercourse with each, by making use of discourses, ⁴² soul with soul? ⁴²

⁴¹—⁴¹ The Greek is ἀντὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ αὐτὸ ἕκαστον: of which Schleiermacher has offered one correction, and Stalbaum two others. I have translated as if the Greek were, ἀντὶ τοῦ—αὐτὸ τὸ αὐτό, "τὸ ἕκαστον"—to which I have been led by the version of Ficinus, "nunc vero pro eo, quod est ipsum quod ipsum, consideravimus ipsum unumquodque."

⁴²—⁴² The Greek is τῇ ψυχῇ πρὸς τὴν ψυχὴν. But as the dative has nothing to govern it, Dobree in Adversar. i. p. 156, suggested τὴν ψυχὴν πρὸς ψυχὴν: with which Stalbaum is dissatisfied; for he saw, no doubt, that the accusative is in a similar predicament. Perhaps Dobree intended τοῖς λόγοις χρωμένους τῆς ψυχῆς, remembering Pope's expression, "the intercourse of soul with soul," and the passages quoted on Hippias, § 37, where the soul is said to speak. Add Plato Epist. 2, p. 313, A.

Alc. Not at all.

Soc. For this (ability) belongs to the ballet-master.

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. ²¹ But of persons making use of what, do you say it is possible for men to rule men? ²¹

Alc. Of those, I mean, who partake in a polity, and come in contact with each other, (and are able) ²² to rule those in the city.

[45.] Soc. What then is this art? As if I were to ask you again, what I did just now—What is the art, which enables (a person) to know how to rule those partaking in a sailing?

Alc. The art of steering.

Soc. And what is the science, that enables (a person) to rule those, who, as was just now said, partake in a song?

Alc. The teaching, as you just now said, of ballet-dancing.

Soc. Well then, and what do you call the science (enabling one to rule) those, who partake in a polity?

Alc. I call it, Socrates, good counsel.

Soc. What, then, does the science of steersman seem to you to be a want of counsel?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. But good counsel.

Alc. So it seems to me, at least.

Soc. For the preservation of those who are sailing.

Alc. You speak correctly.

Soc. But ²³ what you call good counsel, for what is it (good)?

Alc. For the better administering ²³ the commonwealth, and its being saved. ²⁴

Soc. By the presence or absence of what, is it the better administered to and preserved? As, if you had asked me—By the presence or absence of what is the body the better ad-

²¹⁻²¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which Stephens, Ast, and Stalbaum all translate differently; but all are as wide of the Greek, as is that of Ficinus, "Quid denique vocas imperare posse hominibus, qui utuntur hominibus."

²² I have translated, as if the Greek were οἷον τ' ὄντων, not τούτων.

²³⁻²³ I have adopted the arrangement of the speeches found in Ficinus; of which Schleiermacher partially approved.

²⁴ To balance the subsequent διοικῆσαι καὶ σώζεσθαι, one would prefer here διοικισθαι καὶ σώζεσθαι.

ministered and preserved? I would have said—When health is present, and disease absent. Do not you think thus?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And if you had asked me again—By (the presence or absence) of what, (are administered the better and preserved) the eyes? I would have answered in like manner—By sight being present, and blindness absent. So likewise the ears, when deafness is absent, and hearing present, are the better, and better taken care of.

Alc. Certainly.

[46.] Soc. What then is the state? By the presence and absence of what does it become better, and is better ²⁵ [attended to and] ²⁵ administered.

Alc. It seems to me, Socrates, when friendship exists to them ²⁶ with each other, and hate and dissension are absent.

Soc. By friendship do you mean the thinking alike, or not alike?

Alc. The thinking alike.²⁷

Soc. Now by what science do states think alike respecting numbers?

Alc. Through the science of arithmetic.

Soc. Well then, and do not individuals too through the same (science)?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And does not each person (think alike) with himself too?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Now, through what science does each person think alike with himself about a span and a cubit, which of the two is the greater? Is it not through the science of mensuration?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And do not individuals with each other, and states likewise?

Alc. Yes.

²⁵⁻²⁶ The words within brackets are omitted by Ficinus.

²⁶ According to Stephens, whom Buttmann and Stalbaum follow, αὐτοῖς agrees with πολίταις, which is to be got out of πόλις. But Ficinus found, no doubt, in his MS. ἀστοῖς, as shown by his version, "intercives." On the confusion of ἀστοῖς and αὐτοῖς, see Markland on Eurip. Suppl. 365.

²⁷ So Sallust, "Idem velle atque idem nolle ea demum firma amicitia est."

Soc. And about weights? Is it not in like manner?

Alc. I say so.

Soc. But the thinking alike, of which you are speaking, what is it, and about what? and what is the science that furnishes it? And is it the same in the case of a state, and an individual, as regards both himself and another person?

Alc. Probably it is.

Soc. What is it then? Do not be faint-hearted in giving an answer, but be ready to speak out.

Alc. ²⁸ I suppose I may say that friendship and thinking alike is ²⁹ that, by which a father and a mother think alike, in loving their son, and a brother with his brother, and a man with his wife.

[47.] Soc. Do you then, Alcibiades, suppose that a man can think alike with his wife on the subject of weaving, he, who does not know, with her, who does?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. Nor ought he either. For this knowledge belongs to women.²⁹

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. What then, can a woman think alike with a man on the subject of shield-warfare, when she has never learnt it?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. For this you would perhaps say belongs to men.³⁰

Alc. I would.

Soc. Some kinds of knowledge then belong to women, and some to men, according to your account.

Alc. How not?

Soc. On these subjects then there is no thinking alike amongst women and men.

Alc. There is not.

²⁸⁻²⁹ The Greek is Ἐγὼ μὲν οἶμαι φιλίαν τε λέγειν καὶ ὁμόνοιαν. But as Socrates had asked about ὁμόνοια, and not φιλία, it is evident that φιλίαν τε is out of place here. ³⁶ Pytho was another name for Delphi. The Scholiast here quotes a distich, which Meineke on Menander, p. 576, ed. 1, attributes to Ion the tragic writer: "To know thyself is in word nothing great; And a god only knows it well in deed."

³⁷ Ficinus alone has—"facile hoc," as the balance of the sentence requires.

³⁸ Instead of ἄλλω τινι ἢ ἐμοί, Sydenham suggested ἄλλοι τινὲς ἐμοί, on account of the affirmative answer Ναί: and so all the MSS. but one.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And am I not conversing with you?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. It is Socrates then who is conversing and arguing?

Alc. Quite true.

Soc. And Alcibiades who is listening?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is it not by a discourse that Socrates is conversing?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And is not the same thing to converse and to use a discourse?

Alc. Certainly.

* Soc. But is not the person, who uses a thing, different from the thing, which he uses?

Alc. How do you mean?

Soc. As a shoemaker, for instance, cuts leather with (a semicircular) knife, and (a straight) knife, and other tools.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Is not then the shoemaker, who cuts and uses (tools), one, but the tools, which he uses, another?

Alc. How not?

Soc. Would not in like manner the instruments on which a harp-player plays, and the harp-player himself, be different?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. This, then, I was lately asking, whether the person, who uses a thing, seems to you always to be different from the thing, which he uses.

Alc. He seems so.

Soc. What then shall we say of the shoemaker? That he cuts with his tools only, or with his hands likewise?

Alc. With his hands likewise.

Soc. He uses them too.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And does he not use his eyes too, when he is cutting leather?

Alc. He does.

Soc. Now we are agreed, that the person, who uses, is different from what he uses.

Bekker omits η , because when $\alpha\lambda\lambda\omicron\tau\iota$ is used interrogatively, the η is not expressed. Buttman and Stalbaum, prefer $\alpha\lambda\lambda\omega\tau\omega\eta$, furnished by Stobæus, despite the objection of Sydenham.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. The shoemaker, then, and the harp-player, are different from the hands and eyes with which they work.

Alc. It is apparent.

Soc. And does not a man use also his whole body.

Alc. Certainly.

— Soc. Now the thing using is different from what it uses.

Alc. True.

— Soc. A man therefore is a being different from his body.

Alc. It seems so.

[52.] Soc. What sort of being then is a man?

Alc. I cannot tell.

Soc. But you can (tell) that it is some being making a use of its body.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Does any other being make use of its body but the soul?

Alc. None other.

— Soc. And does it not so do by ruling (the body)?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. I suppose moreover that no man would ever think otherwise than this.

Alc. Than what?

Soc. That the man was one of three things.

Alc. What things?

— Soc. Soul, or body, ³⁹ or a whole, itself formed of both.

Alc. How not?

Soc. Now have we agreed that the being, which rules the body, is a man.

Alc. We have agreed.

Soc. ⁴⁰ [What being then is a man?] ⁴⁰ Does the body itself govern itself?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. For we said that it was ruled.

Alc. True.

Soc. This then cannot be that, of which we are in search.

³⁹⁻⁴⁰ Instead of ἡ ξυναμώτερον τὸ ὅλον τοῦτο, Schleiermacher, whom I have followed, elicited ἡ καὶ ἐξ ἀμφοτέρων τὸ ὅλον οὐτὸ, by the aid of Ficinus—"aut totum ipsum ex utrisque compositum."

⁴⁰⁻⁴⁰ The words within brackets are wanting in the three oldest MSS. and omitted by Bekker and Stalbaum.

Alc. It seems not.

Soc. But does the compound being rule the body? and is this a man?

Alc. Perhaps it is.

Soc. Least of all so. For (of two parties), one not being a joint-ruler, there are no means for both to rule jointly.

Alc. Right.

Soc. Since then neither the body, nor the compound of both, is a man, it remains, I think, either that the being (man) is nothing at all, or, if it be any thing, it results that the man is nothing else than soul.

Alc. It is just so.

[53.] Soc. Needs it then be proved to you still more clearly, that the soul is man?

Alc. It needs not, by Zeus: for it seems to me (to be shown) sufficiently.

Soc. If it be proved not accurately, yet moderately so, it is sufficient for us. For we shall then perhaps know accurately, when we shall have discovered, what we just now passed by, through its being a matter of much consideration.

Alc. What is that?

Soc. That which was just now spoken of in some such way as this; that we must first consider the self by itself; but now ⁴¹ instead of "the self by itself," we have been considering the "each" ⁴¹ what it is; and this perhaps will suffice. For we could surely never say that any thing is more the master of ourselves, than the soul.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Is it not then well to think thus; that we are having an intercourse with each, by making use of discourses, ⁴² soul with soul? ⁴²

⁴¹—⁴¹ The Greek is ἀντὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ αὐτὸ ἕκαστον: of which Schleiermacher has offered one correction, and Stalbaum two others. I have translated as if the Greek were, ἀντὶ τοῦ—"αὐτὸ τὸ αὐτὸ," τὸ "ἕκαστον"—to which I have been led by the version of Ficinus, "nunc vero pro eo, quod est ipsum quod ipsum, consideravimus ipsum unumquodque."

⁴²—⁴² The Greek is τῇ ψυχῇ πρὸς τὴν ψυχὴν. But as the dative has nothing to govern it, Dobree in Adversar. i. p. 156, suggested τὴν ψυχὴν πρὸς ψυχὴν: with which Stalbaum is dissatisfied; for he saw, no doubt, that the accusative is in a similar predicament. Perhaps Dobree intended τοῖς λόγοις χρωμένους τῆς ψυχῆς, remembering Pope's expression, "the intercourse of soul with soul," and the passages quoted on Hippias, § 37, where the soul is said to speak. Add Plato Epist. 2, p. 313, A.

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. This then was what we were saying a little before; that Socrates is conversing with Alcibiades, by using speech, not, as it seems, to your person, but by putting reasons to Alcibiades; now this is his soul.

Alc. So it seems to me at least.

[54.] Soc. He then who enjoins a person to know himself, orders us to recognise a soul.

Alc. It is probable.

Soc. ⁴³Whoever then knows only the things belonging to his body, knows the things belonging to himself, but not himself.⁴³

Alc. Just so.

Soc. Not one therefore of the physicians, so far as he is a physician, knows himself; neither does any master of exercises, so far as he is such a master.

Alc. It is probable.

Soc. Husbandmen then, and other workmen, are far from knowing themselves. For these it seems do not (consider)⁴⁴ even what belongs to themselves, but what are still more remote from themselves, according to the arts which they possess. For they know the things belonging to the body, (and) by which it is taken care of.

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. If therefore it is temperance⁴⁵ to know oneself, none of these is temperate according to their (respective) arts.

⁴³—⁴⁴ The Greek is δοτις ἀρα τῶν τοῦ σώματος γινώσκει, τὰ αὐτοῦ, ἀλλ' οὐχ αὐτὸν, ἔγνωκεν. To restore the syntax, Stephens would insert τι before τῶν, or change τῶν into τὰ—But this is at variance with the reasoning; which requires the mention of the body itself, and not τὰ (or τι τῶν) τοῦ σώματος, i. e. the things belonging to the body. Le Fevre and Dacier seem to have been well aware of this, and have rightly translated "son corps," similar to "corpus" in Ficinus. Perhaps he found in his MS. δοτις ἀρα τὸ αὐτοῦ σῶμα γινώσκει, τὰ αὐτοῦ, ἀλλ' οὐχ αὐτὸν, ἔγνωκεν—similar to his version, "Quicumque igitur corpus agnoscit, sua quidem non se ipsum novit." So Sydenham; and so too Schleiermacher proposed to expel τῶν, or to read δοτις ἀρα τὸ σῶμα ἢ τῶν τοῦ σωματός τι, where σωματός τι is due to Stobæus.

⁴⁴ Ficinus has inserted "considerant," but whether from his MS. or not, is uncertain.

⁴⁵ According to a Scholiast, σωφροσύνη is here used in the sense of φρόνησις, and hence Ficinus rendered it "prudentia;" whom Sydenham followed; as do Nurnberger and Stalbaum; who refer respectively to Enophon M. S. iii. 9. 4, and Plato Charmid. p. 164, D.

Alc. I think they are not.

Soc. On this account then these arts seem to be those of handicrafts, and not the learning fit for a good man.

Alc. Entirely so.

Soc. Again, whoever takes care of his body, takes care of what belongs to him, but not of himself.

Alc. It is nearly so.

Soc. And whoever takes care of his property, (takes care) neither of himself nor of what belongs to him, but of what are still more remote from what belongs to himself.

Alc. So it seems to me at least.

Soc. The money-making man ⁴⁶ does then not do his own business.⁴⁶

Alc. Rightly (said).

[55.] Soc. If then a person has become an admirer of the body of Alcibiades, he is not in love with Alcibiades, but with something which belongs to Alcibiades.

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. But whoever is in love with you, is (in love with your) soul.

Alc. This appears necessary from the reasoning.

Soc. And hence he, who admires your body, when it ceases to bloom, goes away.

Alc. It seems so.

Soc. But the admirer of the soul does not go away, so long as it goes on to what is better.

Alc. Probably so.

Soc. Am I not then the person not going away, but remaining, when, the body ceasing (to bloom),⁴⁷ the rest have departed?

Alc. And well have you done so, Socrates; and never may you depart.

Soc. Be ready then to be the best possible.

Alc. I will be ready.

Soc. For the case is this. There never has been, it seems, an admirer of Alcibiades, the son of Clinias, nor is there ⁴⁶—⁴⁶ Ficinus, apparently unable to understand τὰ αὐτοῦ πράττει, has "suis indulget." Perhaps Plato wrote ἀπ' ἀριστά πράττει, not ἀπ' ἐτι πράττει.

⁴⁷ Sydenham wished to insert ἀνθῶν, as just before λέγει ἀνθοῦν—Ficinus has "senescente corpore—" now, but ⁴⁸one alone, and he worthy to be loved,⁴⁸ Socrates, the son of Sophroniscus and Phænarete.

Alc. It is true.

Soc. Did you not say that I had been a little beforehand with you when I accosted you; for that you were about to address me first, being desirous to ask me, why I alone do not go away?

Alc. It was so.

Soc. This then is the reason; for I alone am the admirer of you; but the others of what belong to you. Now what belong to you are ceasing to bloom; but you are beginning to be in flower. [56.] If then you are not now spoilt by the Athenian mob, and become ugly, I shall never forsake you. For of this I am most afraid, that you may become a mob-lover, and be spoilt by them. Since many, even virtuous Athenians, have already suffered this fate. For ⁴⁹the mob of the magnanimous Eretheus⁴⁹ has a fair exterior. ⁵⁰But you ought to see it undressed.⁵⁰ Make use therefore of the caution, which I give you.

Alc. What caution?

Soc. In the first place, my friend, exercise yourself,⁵¹ and learn what a person ought to learn, who is proceeding to state affairs; but previously not; in order that you may go to them possessing an antidote, and suffer no grievous harm.

Alc. You seem to me, Socrates, to speak correctly. But endeavour to explain in what way we may take care of ourselves.

Soc. Has not so much been gone through by us already? For what we are, has been tolerably well agreed upon. Indeed we feared lest, if mistaken on that point, we should be unconsciously taking care of something else, and not of ourselves.

Alc. It is so.

⁴⁸⁻⁴⁹ Buttmann acutely saw here an allusion to Μοῦνος ἰὼν ἀγαπητός in Hom. Il. B. 305.

⁴⁹⁻⁵⁰ Here, as Gottleber remarked, is an allusion to Δῆμος Ἐρεχθίδος μεγαλήτορος in Hom. Il. B. 547.

⁵⁰⁻⁵¹ For it would then appear, to use the words of Horace, "Introrsus turpis, speciosa pelle decorus."

⁵¹ Ficinus has "exue illum—" as if he had found in his MS. γύμνασον—and referred the verb to the people.

Soc. And after this we ought to take care of the soul, and look to it.

Alc. Plainly so.

Soc. And that to others should be handed over the care of our bodies and our property.

Alc. How not?

[57.] Soc. In what way then can we know these things the most clearly? For, after we know this, it seems, we shall know ourselves. Now, by the gods, do we not understand the Delphic inscription we just now mentioned, as saying correctly?

Alc. What? What are you thinking of, and what do you mean, Socrates?

Soc. I will tell you what I suspect this inscription means, and what it advises us (to do). For it nearly seems that its resemblance does not exist every where, but only with reference to the sight.

Alc. How say you thus?

Soc. Do you likewise consider it. If it had said to our eye, as to a man, by way of advice—"Behold yourself—" how and what should we suppose it was advising? Would it not be to look to that, by looking to which the eye might see itself?

Alc. It is evident.

Soc. Let us then consider, by looking to what of things existing we can see both it and ourselves?

Alc. It is evident, Socrates, (by looking at) mirrors, and other things of the like kind.

Soc. You say rightly. And in the eye itself, with which we see, ⁵²is there not something⁵³ of such a kind?

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. You have observed then, that the face of him, who looks at the eye of another, appears visible to himself in the eye-sight of the person opposite to him, as in a mirror, which we call the pupil,⁵⁴ being the image⁵⁴ of the person, who looks in it.

⁵² Instead of ἐν ἑαυτῇ τῶν τοιούτων, Ficinus found in his MS. ἐν τῇ τῶν τοιούτων, as is evident from his version, "inest hujusmodi quiddam," which Sydenham adopted, and F. A. Wolf subsequently suggested in Miscell. Analect. p. 104.

⁵³ In lieu of κορυφήν, Dacier was the first to adopt κόρην, from "pupillam" in Ficinus; and so the three oldest MSS. and Stobæus. So too Bernard Martin, in Varr. Lect. iv. 3, and Viger on Euseb. p. 54.

⁵⁴ As the pupil is not the image itself, but only gives the image, it

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. An eye therefore beholding an eye, and looking at that, which is the best part of itself, with which it sees, may thus see itself?

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. But if it look at any other part of the man, or at any of things existing, except at that, to which it happens to be like, it will not see itself.

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. If then an eye would see itself, it must look at an eye, and to that place of the eye where the virtue of the eye is naturally seated; now this is surely the sight.

Alc. Just so.

[58.] Soc. Is't not true then, my dear Alcibiades, that the soul likewise, if it would know itself, must look at soul, and especially at that place of the soul where wisdom,⁵⁵ the virtue of the soul, is inherent, and to that other thing, to which it happens to be like?

Alc. To me at least, Socrates, it seems so.

Soc. Can we mention any property of the soul more divine⁵⁶ than that, about which knowledge and intelligence are conversant?

Alc. We cannot.

Soc. This therefore in the soul resembles the divine nature. And a person looking at this, and recognising all that is divine, both god⁵⁷ and intelligence, would thus know himself the most.⁵⁸

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. And to know oneself, we acknowledge to be wisdom.⁵⁹

Alc. By all means.

is probable that Plato wrote εἰδωλον διδοῦν τι, in lieu of εἰδωλον εἶναι τι—

⁵⁵ Heusde first proposed to expel σοφία, as an interpolation; with whom Ast and Stalbaum feel disposed to agree.

⁵⁶ In lieu of θειώτερον, the three oldest MSS. offer νοειώτερον, which Buttmann would receive, but Stalbaum reject.

⁵⁷ Instead of θεόν τε καὶ φρόνησιν, Heusde suggested σοφίαν τε καὶ φρόνησιν, similar to the preceding τὸ εἰδέναι τε καὶ φρονεῖν. But Ast, νοῦν τε καὶ φρόνησιν, referring to Julian, Or. ii. p. 68, D., νῦ καὶ φρονήσει, φησι (ὁ Πλάτων) καὶ, τὸ ὅλον, τῷ ἐν ἡμῖν θεῷ.

⁵⁸ I should prefer κάλλιστα to μάλιστα.

⁵⁹ Here again σωφροσύνη is used in the sense of φρόνησις, and so is σώφρονες a little below for φρόνιμοι.

⁶⁰[Soc. As mirrors then are more clear, and more pure, and more brilliant, than the mirror in the eye, so the deity is more pure and more brilliant than that, which is the best in our soul.

Alc. It is likely, Socrates.

Soc. Looking therefore at the deity, we should make use of him, as the most beautiful mirror; but (of) things belonging to man, to the virtue of the soul; and shall we not thus especially see and know our very selves?

Alc. Yes.]⁶⁰

Soc. By not knowing ourselves, and not being wise, can we know what of things belonging to us are good and evil?

Alc. How could it be, Socrates?

Soc. For perhaps it appears impossible for him who knows not Alcibiades himself, to know that what belongs to Alcibiades does so belong to Alcibiades.

Alc. It is, by Zeus, impossible.

Soc. Nor that what are our own, are really our own, ⁶¹ unless (he knows) us.⁶¹

Alc. For how should he?

Soc. And if not what are ours, then not what belongs to ours.

Alc. It appears he cannot.

Soc. We did not then rightly admit, as we did just now, that there were some, who know not themselves, and yet (know) what belonged to them, but that others⁶² (do not know) even ^{60—60} "The words within the brackets are quoted by Stobæus, xxi. p. 181, although the omission has not been noticed by any editor of Plato." The original is, Ἀρ', ὥσπερ κάτοπτρα σαφέστερά ἐστι τοῦ ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ ἐνόπτρου καὶ καθαρώτερά τε καὶ λαμπρότερα, οὕτω καὶ ὁ θεὸς τοῦ ἐν τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ ψυχῇ βελτίστου καθαρώτερόν τε καὶ λαμπρότερον τυγχάνει δν; "Εοικέ γι, ὦ Σώκρατες. Εἰς τὸν θεὸν ἄρα βλέποντες ἐκείνῳ καλλίστῳ ἐνόπτρῳ χρῶμεθ' ἂν, καὶ τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων εἰς τὴν ψυχῆς ἀρετὴν: καὶ οὕτως ἂν μάλιστα οὐχ ὀρῶμεν καὶ γινώσκοιμεν ἡμᾶς αὐτοὺς; Ναί. The intelligent reader need not, I trust, be told, that, without this beautiful passage, the dialogue is defective in its most essential part." So Taylor. Gesner had, however, already noticed the Supplement, which is likewise found in Eusebius, Præpar. Evang. xi. 27, p. 551. It is rejected by Nurnberger, Schleiermacher, Ast, and Stalbaum; but considered genuine by Gottleber, Wernsdorf, and Buttmann.

^{61—61} In lieu of εἰ μὴ δι' ἡμᾶς, Faber suggested εἰ μὴδ' ἡμᾶς, which he got from Ficinus: "nisi prius nos ipsos." The conjecture is confirmed by nearly all the MSS.

⁶² I have adopted with Buttmann the reading ἄλλους δέ, found in Stowhat belongs to them. For it seems, that it is the province of one person, and of one art, to know himself, (and) the things which are his, and what belongs to the things that are his.

Alc. The fact is nearly so.

[59.] Soc. And whoever is ignorant of what belongs to himself, would surely be ignorant likewise of what belongs to other men.

Alc. How not?

Soc. And if (he is ignorant) of what belongs to other men, will he not be ignorant also of what belongs to states?

Alc. Necessarily.

Soc. Such a man therefore cannot be a statesman.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor fit even to manage a family.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor will he know what he is doing.

Alc. He will not.

Soc. And will not he, who knows not (what he is doing), act amiss?

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. And acting amiss, will he not do ill, both in private and public capacity?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And is not he, who does ill, miserable?

Alc. Yes, very.

Soc. And what are those, for whom he is acting?

Alc. And they too are (miserable).

Soc. It is not possible then for a person to be happy, unless he be prudent and good.

Alc. It is not possible.

Soc. Bad men then are in a miserable state.

Alc. Very.

Soc. Not even the rich man then is free from a miserable state, but only the prudent one.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. States then are not in want of walls, or ships, or docks, if they would be happy, nor even of a multitude (of people), or of extent (of country), without the possession of virtue. bæus, in lieu of ἀλλ' οὐδέ—for thus τινας and ἀλλους are properly opposed to each other.

Alc. Not at all.

Soc. If then you would manage the affairs of a state rightly and well, you must impart to the citizens virtue.

Alc. How not?

Soc. But how can a person impart what he has not himself?

Alc. How indeed?

Soc. You must therefore, in the first place, acquire virtue yourself, and so must another, who would rule, take care not only of himself and his own private affairs, but of the state, and the affairs of the state.

Alc. You say true.

[60.] Soc. You must not therefore procure for yourself or the state the power and dominion to do what you please, but justice and prudence.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. For by acting justly and prudently both you and the state will act in a manner pleasing to the deity.

Alc. It is likely.

Soc. And by looking, as we said before, at what is divine and bright, ye will do so.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. And, moreover, by looking there,⁶³ ye will behold and know what is your own good.

Alc. True.

Soc. And will ye not then act both rightly and well?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And acting thus I will guarantee that you will be happy.

Alc. For you are a sure guarantee.

Soc. But by acting unjustly and looking to that which is godless and dark, ye will, it is likely, commit acts similar to those things, through your being ignorant of yourselves.

Alc. It is likely.

Soc. For to the party, my dear Alcibiades, who has the power of doing what he pleases, and does not possess a mind, what is there likely to happen, either as a private person, or in the case of a state?⁶⁴ as in the case of a sick person, ⁶³ The expression ἐνταῦθα βλέποντες is hardly correct Greek, for it ought to be ἐκείσε; and if it were otherwise, yet here it could be scarcely admitted, where the train of thought requires, εἰς τὰ θεῖα, as opposed to the subsequent εἰς τὸ ἄθιον—βλέποντες.

⁶⁴ Sydenham, perceiving that πόλλαι could hardly be thus opposed to having the power to do what he pleased, but not possessing a medical mind, and acting the tyrant, so that nobody would chide him, what would be the consequence? Would it not be in all probability that his body would be destroyed?

Alc. You say the truth.

Soc. And do you see, in the case of a ship, if a person devoid of mind and the talent of a steersman had the power of doing as he thought proper, what would happen both to himself and to his shipmates?

Alc. I do; that they would all be lost.

Soc. Does not, in like manner, in the case of a state, the doing ill follow upon all offices and power deficient in virtue?

Alc. Necessarily.

[61.] Soc. It is not meet then, O best (of men) Alcibiades, to procure a tyrant's power either for yourself, or for the state, if ye would be happy, but virtue.

Alc. You say true.

Soc. And before possessing virtue, it is better for a man, and not a child alone, to be ruled by his better, than to rule.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. Is not the better more beautiful likewise?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And is not the more beautiful more becoming?⁶⁵

Alc. How not?

Soc. It is becoming then for a bad man to be a slave; for it is better.

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Now vice is a thing becoming only to a slave.

Alc. It seems so.

Soc. But virtue is a thing becoming to a freeman.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Ought we not, friend, to fly from what is becoming to a slave?

Alc. Most especially, Socrates!

Soc. Perceive you then in what state you are? Is it such as becomes a freeman, or not?

Alc. I think I perceive it very strongly.

Soc. Know you then, how you may escape from that, which ιδίωτε, translated "to the state, if he governs it:" which has led me to suggest that in πόλει οἷον lie hid πόλειως προστατεύοντι, οἷον— For thus προστατεύοντι would answer to τυραννεύοντι in the very next sentence.

⁶⁵ This doctrine is more fully developed in the Hippias Major.

is now around you? (I say this) that we may not apply that name⁶⁶ to a man of honour?

Alc. I do.

Soc. How?

Alc. If you, Socrates, are willing.

Soc. You say not well, Alcibiades!

Alc. But what ought I to say?

Soc. This, "if a god is willing."

Alc. So I say then. And I will add to those words this too; that we shall be in danger, Socrates, of changing characters, I (assuming) yours, and you mine. For it is not possible for me from this day forward not to follow you, as if I were your tutor, and you were my pupil.

Soc. My love then for you, my noble Alcibiades, differs in nothing from that of the stork;⁶⁷ if after having hatched for you a winged love, it shall be administered to in return by this love of yours.

Alc. And such is the case; and I will begin henceforth to pay all attention to what is just.

Soc. I wish you may persevere. But I have a great fear, not indeed through distrusting your natural disposition, but through perceiving the strength⁶⁸ of the city, lest it overcome both me and you.

⁶⁶ i. e. δουλοπρεπής. To this passage Cicero is supposed to allude in Tuscul. iii. 32, where he states that—"quum Socrates Alcibiadi persuasisset, ut accepimus, eum nihil hominis esse, nec quidquam inter Alcibiadem summo loco natum et quemvis bajulum interesse, quum se Alcibiades affligeret lacrymansque Socrati supplex esset, ut sibi virtutem traderet turpitudinemque depelleret—" But as Plato says nothing about Alcibiades shedding tears, Cicero must have got the anecdote from some other source; unless it be said that he found here Δακρύων δοκῶ μοι—not simply Δοκῶ μοι—

⁶⁸ Sydenham translates ρώμην, "torrent," as if he wished to read ρύμην, literally, "dragging along," which would be a more vivid expression.

I will state here, what I forgot to do in the Introduction, that Winckelmann agrees with Schleiermacher and Ast, in considering the First Alcibiades not to be a genuine production of Plato; for in p. 126, C. § 46, the word σκιθαμῆ is found, which according to Mœris was an Hellenic word, but δόχη the Attic one.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SECOND ALCIBIADES, ON PRAYING.

ALTHOUGH different scholars have arrived at different conclusions respecting the author of the First Alcibiades, yet nearly all appear to admit that the Second was not written by Plato. Clinton indeed, in Fast. Hellenic. p. 225, seems to consider it genuine. For he probably did not so much forget, as designedly disregard, the statement made by Athenæus in xi. p. 506, C., that the dialogue had been attributed to Xenophon. It is however quoted as Plato's by Ælian V. H. viii. 9, Priscian, p. 1148, Olympiodorus on Phileb. p. 265, and Thom. Mag. Εὔχομαι. But in the last passage some MSS. rightly read ὡς ὁ Πλατωνικὸς λόγος Ἀλκιβιάδης ἐπιγραφόμενος ἢ περὶ Προσενχής. It seems moreover to be alluded to by Juvenal in x. 346, and Persius ii. 61. But Stalbaum denies the existence of any such allusion, and conceives that the author was some philosopher of Alexandria, who lived in the second or third century before the Christian æra, and who was not only ignorant of Plato's manner of carrying on a dialogue, but of the purity and peculiarities of the language spoken at Athens, which neither the philosopher himself, nor any of his contemporaries, would have failed to adopt. But as the dialogue has come down to us in rather a corrupt state, as remarked by Dobree, and that there is, according to Stalbaum himself, scarcely a sentence where something does not occur to offend, it seems hardly fair to lay upon the author all the faults to be found in the dialogue, instead of attributing some to the carelessness of now, but ⁴⁸one alone, and he worthy to be loved,⁴⁸ Socrates, the son of Sophroniscus and Phænarete.

Alc. It is true.

Soc. Did you not say that I had been a little beforehand with you when I accosted you; for that you were about to address me first, being desirous to ask me, why I alone do not go away?

Alc. It was so.

Soc. This then is the reason; for I alone am the admirer of you; but the others of what belong to you. Now what belong to you are ceasing to bloom; but you are beginning to be in flower. [56.] If then you are not now spoilt by the Athenian mob, and become ugly, I shall never forsake you. For of this I am most afraid, that you may become a mob-lover, and be spoilt by them. Since many, even virtuous Athenians, have already suffered this fate. For ⁴⁹the mob of the magnanimous Erechtheus⁴⁹ has a fair exterior. ⁵⁰But you ought to see it undressed.⁵⁰ Make use therefore of the caution, which I give you.

Alc. What caution?

Soc. In the first place, my friend, exercise yourself,⁵¹ and learn what a person ought to learn, who is proceeding to state affairs; but previously not; in order that you may go to them possessing an antidote, and suffer no grievous harm.

Alc. You seem to me, Socrates, to speak correctly. But endeavour to explain in what way we may take care of ourselves.

Soc. Has not so much been gone through by us already? For what we are, has been tolerably well agreed upon. Indeed we feared lest, if mistaken on that point, we should be unconsciously taking care of something else, and not of ourselves.

Alc. It is so.

^{48—48} Buttmann acutely saw here an allusion to Μοῦνος τὸν ἀγαπητὸς in Hom. Il. B. 305.

^{49—49} Here, as Gottleber remarked, is an allusion to Δῆμος Ἐρεχθίδος μεγαλήτορος in Hom. Il. B. 547.

^{50—50} For it would then appear, to use the words of Horace, "Intrusus turpis, speciosa pelle decorus."

⁵¹ Ficinus has "exue illum—" as if he had found in his MS. γύμνασον—and referred the verb to the people.

Soc. And after this we ought to take care of the soul, and look to it.

Alc. Plainly so.

Soc. And that to others should be handed over the care of our bodies and our property.

Alc. How not?

[57.] Soc. In what way then can we know these things the most clearly? For, after we know this, it seems, we shall know ourselves. Now, by the gods, do we not understand the Delphic inscription we just now mentioned, as saying correctly?

Alc. What? What are you thinking of, and what do you mean, Socrates?

Soc. I will tell you what I suspect this inscription means, and what it advises us (to do). For it nearly seems that its resemblance does not exist every where, but only with reference to the sight.

Alc. How say you thus?

Soc. Do you likewise consider it. If it had said to our eye, as to a man, by way of advice—"Behold yourself—" how and what should we suppose it was advising? Would it not be to look to that, by looking to which the eye might see itself?

Alc. It is evident.

Soc. Let us then consider, by looking to what of things existing we can see both it and ourselves?

Alc. It is evident, Socrates, (by looking at) mirrors, and other things of the like kind.

Soc. You say rightly. And in the eye itself, with which we see, ⁵²is there not something ⁵²of such a kind?

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. You have observed then, that the face of him, who looks at the eye of another, appears visible to himself in the eye-sight of the person opposite to him, as in a mirror, which we call the pupil, ⁵³being the image ⁵⁴of the person, who looks in it.

⁵²⁻⁵³ Instead of ἐν ἑαυτῇ τῷ τοιούτῳ, Ficinus found in his MS. ἐν ἑαυτῇ τῇ τοιούτῳ, as is evident from his version, "inest hujusmodi quiddam," which Sydenham adopted, and F. A. Wolf subsequently suggested in Miscell. Analect. p. 104.

⁵³ In lieu of κορυφήν, Dacier was the first to adopt κόρην, from "pupillam" in Ficinus; and so the three oldest MSS. and Stobæus. So too Bernard Martin, in Varr. Lect. iv. 3, and Viger on Euseb. p. 54.

⁵⁴ As the pupil is not the image itself, but only gives the image, it

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. An eye therefore beholding an eye, and looking at that, which is the best part of itself, with which it sees, may thus see itself?

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. But if it look at any other part of the man, or at any of things existing, except at that, to which it happens to be like, it will not see itself.

Alc. You say what is true.

Soc. If then an eye would see itself, it must look at an eye, and to that place of the eye where the virtue of the eye is naturally seated; now this is surely the sight.

Alc. Just so.

[58.] Soc. Is it not true then, my dear Alcibiades, that the soul likewise, if it would know itself, must look at soul, and especially at that place of the soul where wisdom,⁵⁵ the virtue of the soul, is inherent, and to that other thing, to which it happens to be like?

Alc. To me at least, Socrates, it seems so.

Soc. Can we mention any property of the soul more divine⁵⁶ than that, about which knowledge and intelligence are conversant?

Alc. We cannot.

Soc. This therefore in the soul resembles the divine nature. And a person looking at this, and recognising all that is divine, both god⁵⁷ and intelligence, would thus know himself the most.⁵⁸

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. And to know oneself, we acknowledge to be wisdom.⁵⁹

Alc. By all means.

is probable that Plato wrote εἰδωλον διδοῦν τι, in lieu of εἰδωλον ὄν τι—

⁵⁵ Heusde first proposed to expel σοφία, as an interpolation; with whom Ast and Stalbaum feel disposed to agree.

⁵⁶ In lieu of θειώτερον, the three oldest MSS. offer νοερώτερον, which Buttmann would receive, but Stalbaum reject.

⁵⁷ Instead of θεόν τε καὶ φρόνησιν, Heusde suggested σοφίαν τε καὶ φρόνησιν, similar to the preceding τὸ εἶδέναι τε καὶ φρονεῖν. But Ast, νοῦν τε καὶ φρόνησιν, referring to Julian, Or. ii. p. 68, D., νῦ καὶ φρονήσει, φησὶ (ὁ Πλάτων) καὶ, τὸ ὅλον, τῷ ἐν ἡμῖν θεῷ.

⁵⁸ I should prefer κάλλιστα to μάλιστα.

⁵⁹ Here again σωφροσύνη is used in the sense of φρόνησις, and so is σώφρονες a little below for φρόνιμοι.

⁶⁰[Soc. As mirrors then are more clear, and more pure, and more brilliant, than the mirror in the eye, so the deity is more pure and more brilliant than that, which is the best in our soul.

Alc. It is likely, Socrates.

Soc. Looking therefore at the deity, we should make use of him, as the most beautiful mirror; but (of) things belonging to man, to the virtue of the soul; and shall we not thus especially see and know our very selves?

Alc. Yes.]⁶⁰

Soc. By not knowing ourselves, and not being wise, can we know what of things belonging to us are good and evil?

Alc. How could it be, Socrates?

Soc. For perhaps it appears impossible for him who knows not Alcibiades himself, to know that what belongs to Alcibiades does so belong to Alcibiades.

Alc. It is, by Zeus, impossible.

Soc. Nor that what are our own, are really our own, ⁶¹ unless (he knows) us.⁶¹

Alc. For how should he?

Soc. And if not what are ours, then not what belongs to ours.

Alc. It appears he cannot.

Soc. We did not then rightly admit, as we did just now, that there were some, who know not themselves, and yet (know) what belonged to them, but that others⁶² (do not know) even ⁶⁰⁻⁶¹ "The words within the brackets are quoted by Stobæus, xxi. p. 181, although the omission has not been noticed by any editor of Plato. The original is, 'Ἀρ', ὥσπερ κάτοπτρα σαφέστερά ἐστι τοῦ ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ ἐνόπτρου καὶ καθαρώτερά τε καὶ λαμπρότερα, οὕτω καὶ ὁ θεὸς τοῦ ἐν τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ ψυχῇ βελτίστου καθαρώτερόν τε καὶ λαμπρότερον τυγχάνει δν; "Εοικέ γε, ὦ Σώκρατες. Εἰς τὸν θεὸν ἄρα βλέποντες ἐκείνῳ καλλίστῳ ἐνόπτρῳ χρῶμεθ' ἂν, καὶ τῶν ἀνθρωπίνων εἰς τὴν ψυχῆς ἀρετὴν: καὶ οὕτως ἂν μάλιστα οὐχ ὀρώμεν καὶ γινώσκοιμεν ἡμᾶς αὐτοὺς; Ναι. The intelligent reader need not, I trust, be told, that, without this beautiful passage, the dialogue is defective in its most essential part." So Taylor. Gesner had, however, already noticed the Supplement, which is likewise found in Eusebius, Præpar. Evang. xi. 27, p. 551. It is rejected by Nurnberger, Schleiermacher, Ast, and Stalbaum; but considered genuine by Gottleber, Wernsdorf, and Buttmann.

⁶¹⁻⁶² In lieu of εἰ μὴ δι' ἡμᾶς, Faber suggested εἰ μὴδ' ἡμᾶς, which he got from Ficinus: "nisi prius nos ipsos." The conjecture is confirmed by nearly all the MSS.

⁶² I have adopted with Buttmann the reading ἄλλους δέ, found in Stowhat belongs to them. For it seems, that it is the province of one person, and of one art, to know himself, (and) the things which are his, and what belongs to the things that are his.

Alc. The fact is nearly so.

[59.] Soc. And whoever is ignorant of what belongs to himself, would surely be ignorant likewise of what belongs to other men.

Alc. How not?

Soc. And if (he is ignorant) of what belongs to other men, will he not be ignorant also of what belongs to states?

Alc. Necessarily.

Soc. Such a man therefore cannot be a statesman.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor fit even to manage a family.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor will he know what he is doing.

Alc. He will not.

Soc. And will not he, who knows not (what he is doing), act amiss?

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. And acting amiss, will he not do ill, both in private and public capacity?

Alc. How not?

Soc. And is not he, who does ill, miserable?

Alc. Yes, very.

Soc. And what are those, for whom he is acting?

Alc. And they too are (miserable).

Soc. It is not possible then for a person to be happy, unless he be prudent and good.

Alc. It is not possible.

Soc. Bad men then are in a miserable state.

Alc. Very.

Soc. Not even the rich man then is free from a miserable state, but only the prudent one.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. States then are not in want of walls, or ships, or docks, if they would be happy, nor even of a multitude (of people), or of extent (of country), without the possession of virtue. bæus, in lieu of ἀλλ' οὐδέ—for thus τινας and ἀλλους are properly opposed to each other.

Alc. Not at all.

Soc. If then you would manage the affairs of a state rightly and well, you must impart to the citizens virtue.

Alc. How not?

Soc. But how can a person impart what he has not himself?

Alc. How indeed?

Soc. You must therefore, in the first place, acquire virtue yourself, and so must another, who would rule, take care not only of himself and his own private affairs, but of the state, and the affairs of the state.

Alc. You say true.

[60.] Soc. You must not therefore procure for yourself or the state the power and dominion to do what you please, but justice and prudence.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. For by acting justly and prudently both you and the state will act in a manner pleasing to the deity.

Alc. It is likely.

Soc. And by looking, as we said before, at what is divine and bright, ye will do so.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. And, moreover, by looking there,⁶³ ye will behold and know what is your own good.

Alc. True.

Soc. And will ye not then act both rightly and well?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And acting thus I will guarantee that you will be happy.

Alc. For you are a sure guarantee.

Soc. But by acting unjustly and looking to that which is godless and dark, ye will, it is likely, commit acts similar to those things, through your being ignorant of yourselves.

Alc. It is likely.

Soc. For to the party, my dear Alcibiades, who has the power of doing what he pleases, and does not possess a mind, what is there likely to happen, either as a private person, or in the case of a state?⁶⁴ as in the case of a sick person, ⁶³ The expression ἐν ταῦθα βλέποντες is hardly correct Greek, for it ought to be ἐκείσε; and if it were otherwise, yet here it could be scarcely admitted, where the train of thought requires, εἰς τὰ θεῖα, as opposed to the subsequent εἰς τὸ ἀθρον—βλέποντες.

⁶⁴ Sydenham, perceiving that πόλει could hardly be thus opposed to having the power to do what he pleased, but not possessing a medical mind, and acting the tyrant, so that nobody would chide him, what would be the consequence? Would it not be in all probability that his body would be destroyed?

Alc. You say the truth.

Soc. And do you see, in the case of a ship, if a person devoid of mind and the talent of a steersman had the power of doing as he thought proper, what would happen both to himself and to his shipmates?

Alc. I do; that they would all be lost.

Soc. Does not, in like manner, in the case of a state, the doing ill follow upon all offices and power deficient in virtue?

Alc. Necessarily.

[61.] Soc. It is not meet then, O best (of men) Alcibiades, to procure a tyrant's power either for yourself, or for the state, if ye would be happy, but virtue.

Alc. You say true.

Soc. And before possessing virtue, it is better for a man, and not a child alone, to be ruled by his better, than to rule.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. Is not the better more beautiful likewise?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And is not the more beautiful more becoming?⁶⁵

Alc. How not?

Soc. It is becoming then for a bad man to be a slave; for it is better.

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Now vice is a thing becoming only to a slave.

Alc. It seems so.

Soc. But virtue is a thing becoming to a freeman.

Alc. Yes.

Soc. Ought we not, friend, to fly from what is becoming to a slave?

Alc. Most especially, Socrates!

Soc. Perceive you then in what state you are? Is it such as becomes a freeman, or not?

Alc. I think I perceive it very strongly.

Soc. Know you then, how you may escape from that, which ιδιῶς, translated "to the state, if he governs it:" which has led me to suggest that in πόλει οὖν lie hid πόλεως προστατεύοντι, οὖν— For thus προστατεύοντι would answer to τυραννεύοντι in the very next sentence.

⁶⁵ This doctrine is more fully developed in the Hippias Major.

is now around you? (I say this) that we may not apply that name⁶⁶ to a man of honour?

Alc. I do.

Soc. How?

Alc. If you, Socrates, are willing.

Soc. You say not well, Alcibiades!

Alc. But what ought I to say?

Soc. This, "if a god is willing."

Alc. So I say then. And I will add to those words this too; that we shall be in danger, Socrates, of changing characters, I (assuming) yours, and you mine. For it is not possible for me from this day forward not to follow you, as if I were your tutor, and you were my pupil.

Soc. My love then for you, my noble Alcibiades, differs in nothing from that of the stork;⁶⁷ if after having hatched for you a winged love, it shall be administered to in return by this love of yours.

Alc. And such is the case; and I will begin henceforth to pay all attention to what is just.

Soc. I wish you may persevere. But I have a great fear, not indeed through distrusting your natural disposition, but through perceiving the strength⁶⁸ of the city, lest it overcome both me and you.

⁶⁶ i. e. δουλοπρεπής. To this passage Cicero is supposed to allude in Tuscul. iii. 32, where he states that—"quum Socrates Alcibiadi persuasisset, ut accepimus, eum nihil hominis esse, nec quidquam inter Alcibiadem summo loco natum et quemvis bajulum interesse, quum se Alcibiades afflicta ret lacrymansque Socrati supplex esset, ut sibi virtutem traderet turpitudinemque depelleret—" But as Plato says nothing about Alcibiades shedding tears, Cicero must have got the anecdote from some other source; unless it be said that he found here Δακρύων δοκῶ μοι—not simply Δοκῶ μοι—

⁶⁸ Sydenham translates ῥώμην, "torrent," as if he wished to read ῥύμην, literally, "dragging along," which would be a more vivid expression.

I will state here, what I forgot to do in the Introduction, that Winckelmann agrees with Schleiermacher and Ast, in considering the First Alcibiades not to be a genuine production of Plato; for in p. 126, C. § 46, the word σπιθαμή is found, which according to Mæris was an Hellenic word, but δόχμη the Attic one.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SECOND ALCIBIADES, ON PRAYING.

ALTHOUGH different scholars have arrived at different conclusions respecting the author of the First Alcibiades, yet nearly all appear to admit that the Second was not written by Plato. Clinton indeed, in Fast. Hellenic. p. 225, seems to consider it genuine. For he probably did not so much forget, as designedly disregard, the statement made by Athenæus in xi. p. 506, C., that the dialogue had been attributed to Xenophon. It is however quoted as Plato's by Ælian V. H. viii. 9, Priscian, p. 1148, Olympiodorus on Phileb. p. 265, and Thom. Mag. Εὔχομαι. But in the last passage some MSS. rightly read ὡς ὁ Πλατωνικὸς λόγος Ἀλκιβιάδης ἐπιγραφόμενος ἢ περὶ Προσευχῆς. It seems moreover to be alluded to by Juvenal in x. 346, and Persius ii. 61. But Stalbaum denies the existence of any such allusion, and conceives that the author was some philosopher of Alexandria, who lived in the second or third century before the Christian æra, and who was not only ignorant of Plato's manner of carrying on a dialogue, but of the purity and peculiarities of the language spoken at Athens, which neither the philosopher himself, nor any of his contemporaries, would have failed to adopt. But as the dialogue has come down to us in rather a corrupt state, as remarked by Dobree, and that there is, according to Stalbaum himself, scarcely a sentence where something does not occur to offend, it seems hardly fair to lay upon the author all the faults to be found in the dialogue, instead of attributing some to the carelessness of transcribers, and others to the accidents of time. My own opinion is, that as Antisthenes wrote, or rather dressed up, a dialogue under the title of Alcibiades, as we learn by Diogenes Laertius ii. 61, and that the same person spoke ill of the son of Clinias, as stated by Athenæus v. 20; and as we find in this dialogue more frequent allusions to the Æsopo-Socratic fables, than are furnished by any dialogue of Plato, or separate work of Xenophon; and that Julian, in Orat. vii. p. 390, testifies to the fact that Antisthenes was accustomed, like Xenophon, to have recourse to fables in his philosophical discourses, one may fairly assign to him the authorship of the Second Alcibiades; where he has not only represented his master as acting the part of a sensible philosopher, but Alcibiades in that of a mere ordinary man, instead of being, what he fancied he was, the then living sun of Athens and the cynosure of Greece.

With regard to the matter of the dialogue, the folly or inutility of prayer, as practised by the generality of mankind, Gottleber refers to Xenophon's M. S. i. 3, where Socrates is said to have prayed the gods simply to give what was good, leaving them to decide, as knowing better than himself, what was or was not for his good. The doctrine was adopted by Marcus Antoninus in v. 7, who says that we must either pray in general terms, or not at all; while the latter alternative was chosen by the philosophers of Cyrene, who, as we learn from Clemens Alexandrinus in Stromat. vii. p. 722, asserted the inutility of prayer.

THE SECOND ALCIBIADES.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES, ALCIBIADES.

SOCRATES.

[1.] ARE you going, Alcibiades, to pray to the god?¹

Alc. Just so, Socrates.

Soc. You appear to have a serious look, and to be directing your eyes to the ground, as if thinking upon something.

Alc. Of what should a person be thinking, Socrates?

Soc. Of things, Alcibiades, of the greatest moment, as it seems to myself at least. For come, by Zeus, do you not think, when we happen to pray, either in private or in public, that the gods themselves² sometimes grant some of those prayers, and some not, and to some persons they (nod assent),³ but to some not?

Alc. Very much so.

Soc. Does it not seem then to you that there is need of much forethought, in order that a person may not unconsciously pray for great evils for himself, while thinking (he is praying) for good; and that the gods may not happen to be in such a disposition, as to grant whatever he happens to be praying for? just as they say Œdipus did, in praying that his sons might divide their patrimony by the sword;³ (and)⁴ when he might have prayed for his then present evils to be averted, he uttered a curse that others might be superadded; and thereupon both these were brought to pass, and after these others too, many and terrible,⁵ of which what need is there to speak singly?

¹ As the deity is not mentioned, Sydenham and Koeppen suppose it was Zeus, but Gottleber Apollo.

² Buttmann would reject αἱ τοὶ, as being perfectly unnecessary. It is however defended by Reinhold Klotz in Quæst. Crit. p. 24. I long ago suggested ἀνθρώποις, to answer to "malignis" in Juvenal x. 3, "Magnaque numinibus vota exaudita malignis."

³ In lieu of ἀνθρώποις Ficinus seems to have found καταθέουσιν, as shown by his version, "annuere."

Alc. But, Socrates, you have spoken of a man who was mad; for who, think you, of sound mind would venture to make such a prayer?

[2.] Soc. Does it seem to you, that to be mad is at all the contrary to being in one's senses?

Alc. Perfectly so.

Soc. Do not men seem to you to be senseless and sensible?

Alc. Yes, to be so.

Soc. Come then, let us consider who these are. For that there are men senseless and sensible you have admitted, and others who are mad.

Alc. It has been admitted.

Soc. Moreover, there are some men in a sound state of health?

Alc. There are.

Soc. And are there not others in a bad state of health?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. These are not the same with those?

Alc. They are not.

Soc. Are there not others, who are in neither of those states?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. For every man must of necessity be either in a diseased state or not.

Alc. It seems so to myself at least.

Soc. What then with respect to intellect and non-intellect, have you the same opinion?

Alc. How say you?

³ The curse is described by Euripides in Phœn. 70, Ἀρὰς ἀρᾶται καὶ οἷν ἀνέστηντάς τε καὶ οὐδὲν δῶμα διαλαχέειν τόδε: where see Valckenauer.

⁴ Stephens suggested the insertion of καὶ from "cumque," in Ficinus. Buttmann, however, and Hommel on Sympos. p. 186, B., and Stalbaum consider it unnecessary.

⁵ For the whole family was destroyed. And hence Juvenal says in x. 7, "Evertere domos totas, optantibus ipsis, Di faciles."

Soc. Does it seem to you to be necessary⁶ for a man to be sensible or senseless? Or is there some third and middle state, which causes a man to be neither sensible nor senseless?

Alc. There certainly is not.

Soc. It is necessary then for him to be in the one or in the other⁷ of those states.

Alc. So it seems to me at least.

[3.] Soc. Do you not remember that you admitted this, that insanity is contrary to being in one's senses?

Alc. I do.

Soc. And that there is no middle or third state, which causes a man to be neither sensible nor senseless?

Alc. I admitted this too.

Soc. But how can two different things be contrary to one thing?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. ⁸To be senseless then, and to be mad, seem to be nearly the same thing.⁸

Alc. They seem so.

Soc. If then we should pronounce that all fools were madmen, we should pronounce rightly, Alcibiades. For example, if some of your equals in age, happen to be senseless, as indeed they are, and some of your elders likewise, ⁹come, by ⁶ The Greek is Δοκεῖ σοὶ οὐδὲν τι εἶναι, "Do you think it possible," &c. But Ficinus has "Opinaris hominem—esse oportere"—as if he had read in his MS. Δοκεῖ σοὶ δεῖν εἶναι, "Do you think that a man ought to be." Both readings interfere equally with the argument, which requires us to read, Δοκεῖ σοὶ ἀναγκαῖον εἶναι, as we have translated in English, and Dacier has done similarly in French. S. From whence Buttmann was led to Δοκεῖ σοὶ ἀνάγκη εἶναι. But Wex, in Commentat. de Menon, p. 43, has suggested—δοκεῖς ἄνδρ' (i. e. ἀνθρώπων) ὄντα εἶναι ἢ φρόνιμον ἢ ἄφρονα: Stalbaum, Εἰ δοκεῖ σοὶ μόνον τιν' εἶναι: and Sauppe, Εἰ δοκεῖς οὐχ οὐδὲν τι μὴ εἶναι. The reader is therefore left to take his choice.

⁸ That the Stoics derived from Socrates their celebrated paradox πάντας τοὺς ἄφρονας μαίνεισθαι, "all fools are mad," is justly observed by Cicero in Tuscul. iii. 5; where Davis refers to this passage in Plato. S. But on the other hand Boeckh was led to believe that this dialogue was written subsequent to the time of Socrates, when the doctrines of the Stoics were more in vogue.

⁹ Ficinus omits the words φέρε πρὸς Διός—

Jove,⁹ do you not think that in this city there are few sensible men, but the majority senseless, whom you call madmen?

Alc. Yes, I do.

Soc. Think you then, that, living under the same state with so many madmen, we should be delighted,¹⁰ or that we should not be buffeted, and pelted, and have long since suffered punishment for, such acts as madmen are wont to commit? But consider, thou blessed man, whether this be the case.

Alc. What then could it be, Socrates? For it appears nearly to be not what I just now fancied.

Soc. Neither does it appear so to myself. But let us look at the matter in some such way as this.

Alc. In what way do you mean?

Soc. I will tell you. [4.] We understand that some men are in bad health; do we not?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Does it seem to you necessary for every man in bad health to have the gout, or a fever, or ophthalmia?¹¹ Or does it not seem to you that a man, without suffering at all in this way, may be ill in some other disorder? For diseases, we suppose, are of many various kinds, and not these alone.

Alc. I suppose there are.

Soc. Does not every ophthalmia seem to be a disease?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. But is every disease ophthalmia?

Alc. Certainly not, it seems to me. Yet still I am at a loss about your meaning.

Soc. If, however, you will give me your attention,¹² by considering the matter, both of us together¹² will peradventure discover it.

Alc. I am giving you, Socrates, all attention, to the best of my power.

Soc. Was it not agreed upon by us, that every ophthalmia was a disease; but every disease was not an ophthalmia?

¹⁰ Stalbaum translates χαίροντας "impune"—But that use of the verb χαίρειν is found only in a threat.

¹¹ Although "ophthalmia" is a Greek word written merely in English letters, it has now become naturalized to express a peculiar disorder in the eyes.

¹² ¹³ Here is an allusion to Hom. Il. K. 224, Σύν τε δὲ ἱππομήνεω—from whence τε has crept in, where the author wrote γε—The same allusion is found likewise in the Banquet, p. 174, D. § 2.

Alc. It was agreed so.

Soc. And it seems to me to have been correctly agreed. For all persons in a fever have a disease; but not all, however, who have a disease, are in a fever; neither have they all I think the gout, nor ophthalmia. Every thing indeed of this kind is a disease; and they, whom we call physicians, say that diseases produce different effects. For all diseases are not alike, nor do they all act similarly, but each according to its own peculiar power; and yet they are all diseases, just as we understand there are in the case of workmen; do we not?

Alc. Certainly.

[5.] Soc. Such as shoemakers, carpenters, statuaries, and very many others, whom why need one mention in detail? All these have divided amongst them portions of handicraftship, and yet all are handicraftsmen. They are not, however, carpenters, nor shoemakers, nor statuaries, taken altogether.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Just so have men divided folly amongst them. And those, who have the largest share, we call madmen; but those, who have a less, silly, and thunder-struck.¹³ But if we choose to speak of such in good-omened language, some call them high-spirited, but others simpletons; and others again, harmless and inexperienced, and speechless.¹⁴ You will also find, upon inquiry, many other names. But they all mean non-intellect; although they differ, just as one art has been shown by us (to differ) from another; and one disease from another. Or how does it seem to you?

Alc. To me in this way.

Soc. ¹⁵To the point then (from whence we digressed)¹⁵ let us return back again. For it was proposed, I think, in the beginning of our conversation to consider who are the senseless, and sensible. For it was agreed that some such existed. Was it not?

¹³ In Greek, μυθοννήτους: for the effect of lightning when attended by thunder, and indeed of all electrical fire, is to stupify, at least for a time, whatever animal it strikes. S.

¹⁴ The Greek is ἑνεός, a word properly applied to infants. Of these three epithets, the first alludes to the wholly useless in any affair; the next to the easy to be imposed on; and the last to those who, from the want of ideas, have nothing to say. S. But ἑνεός is rather said of a person struck dumb, as shown by Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 102.

¹⁵—¹⁶ I have followed Ficinus, "Sed ut redeamus unde digressi sumus," rather than the Greek Ὁκοῦν ἀπ' ἐκείνου πάλιν ἐπανέλθωμεν, where ἐκείνου has nothing to which it can be referred.

Alc. Yes, it was so agreed.

Soc. Whether then do you understand by the sensible, those who know how to do and say what they ought?

Alc. I do.

Soc. And whom (do you understand) by the senseless? Are they not such as know neither of those things?

Alc. Those very persons.

Soc. Will not those persons then, who know neither of those things, unconsciously say and do what they ought?

Alc. It appears so.

[6.] Soc. Now of these very persons, Alcibiades, Œdipus, I said, was one. And you will find many of those living even now, who, though not influenced by anger, as he was, pray for things hurtful to themselves; not fancying them to be so, but good (rather).¹⁶ He indeed, as he did not pray for (good), so neither did he fancy (he was doing so). But some others there are, who have suffered the very contrary to this. For I think that you, if the god to whom you happen to be going should appear to you, and, before you had uttered a prayer, first ask you—"Will it suffice for you to become a despotic king¹⁷ of Athens;" and, if you thought this a trifle,¹⁸ [and no great thing,]¹⁸ should add "and over all the Greeks;" and, if he should see that you fancied you would still have¹⁹ too little, unless he were²⁰ to appoint you king²⁰ of the whole of Europe; and should undertake not this alone, (but) that on this very day, according to your wish, all should perceive that Alcibiades, the son of Clinias, is their autocrat—I think you would walk away exceedingly delighted, as if you had met with the greatest good.

¹⁶ Ficinus has "sed bona potius," as if he had found in his MS. ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον ἀγαθά.

¹⁷ The word τύραννος every where in Plato signifies a despotic monarch. S.

¹⁸—¹⁸ The words μή μέγα τι are evidently an explanation of φαῦλον.

¹⁹ Instead of ἔχειν, the sense requires either ἔχειν ἄν or ἔξειν, as I have translated.

²⁰—²⁰ Since in lieu of ὑποσταίη σοι, one MS. has καταστήσῃ σοι; from the two united I elicited, many years ago, ἀνακτα καταστήσεις σὲ, similar to δεσπότῃ κατιστήσαν in Isocrates, p. 478, Bekk., and ἀρχοντας καθιστάναι in Thucyd. iv. 132.

Alc. I fancy, Socrates, that any one else whatever would do so likewise, if such things were to happen to him.

Soc. You would not, however, be willing that the country of, and absolute dominion over, all the Greeks and Barbarians should be yours in exchange for your life.²¹

Alc. I suppose not; (for why should I?) when I was about to make no use of them.

Soc. What then, if you were about to make a bad and detrimental use of them, you would not (be willing) even in such a case?

Alc. Certainly not.

[7.] Soc. You see then that it is not safe to accept at random gifts when offered; nor for a person to pray that things may take place, if he is about to be injured through them, or be totally released from life. Many, too, we could mention, who after having longed for absolute power, and laboured to obtain it, as if about to enjoy some mighty good, have, on account of their tyranny, been plotted against and lost their lives.²² I think, too, that some events, which happened as it were but yesterday,²³ have come to your ears, how that a favourite²⁴ of Archelaus, tyrant of Macedonia, murdered his admirer, through his being as fond of absolute power, as the tyrant was of him, and with the view of becoming the tyrant himself, and a happy man; but that, possessing the power for three or four days, he was in turn plotted against by some of his friends and destroyed. You see, too, of our own fellow-citizens—for this we have not heard from others, but know by being present ourselves—that such as have longed for, and obtained, the command of an army, some are even now exiles from the city, and others have ended their lives; and such, as seemed to have fared the best, have passed

²¹ In Alcibiad. i. p. 105, A. § 4, there is a very similar train of argument. But there the son of Clinias is represented as preferring power to life. From the change in his feelings it is fair to infer that this dialogue relates to a period, when he had become somewhat cooled down by age.

²² The author had probably in view the fate of Peisistratus and Hipparchus.

²³ The phrase Χθιζά τε καὶ πρωῒζα is taken from Homer in Il. B. 303. In Attic prose Greek it is χθὲς καὶ πρωῒν, found in Gorg. p. 470. BUTTM.

²⁴ The name of the favourite is Κραεύας, in Ælian V. H. viii. 9, Κράρεπος in Diodorus, lxi. p. 761, but Κραταῖος in Aristot. Polit. v. 8, 11.

through many trying dangers and terrors²⁵ during the campaign itself;²⁶ and when they have returned to their own country, have suffered from informers a siege not at all inferior to that, which they have endured from foreign foes; so that some of them prayed they had never been at the head of an army, rather than to have borne a command. [8.] Now, if the dangers and toils had tended to their benefit,²⁷ it would have had some reason;²⁸ but now it is quite the reverse. And with respect to children, you will find in the very same manner, how that some persons, after having prayed for them to be born, have, when they are born,²⁹ come into the greatest calamities and sorrows. For some, whose children have been thoroughly wicked, have passed the whole of their lives in sorrow; and some, whose children were well-behaved, have met with the misfortune to be deprived of them, and have come into calamities in no respect less than the others, and, like them, have wished rather that their children had been never born.³⁰ And yet, although these, and many other instances of the like kind, are so very evident to persons, it is rare to find a man who would refuse what is offered, or who, if he is about to obtain it by prayer, would cease to pray for it. Nor would the majority refrain from absolute power, if offered them, or the command of an army, or many other things, which, when present, do more harm than good; but they would, on the contrary,³¹ pray for their possession, should such things happen not to be present to any one. And yet, after waiting a little time, they sometimes recant,³¹ and pray the reverse of what they prayed before. I have therefore my ²⁵ Instead of φόβον, Sydenham would prefer πόνον, as better suited to κινδυνεύει τε καὶ πόνει, just afterwards.

²⁶ I have adopted ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ σπαρτῇ, which Ficinus found in his MS. as shown by his version—"in ipso exercitu."

²⁷⁻²⁸ The Greek is εἶχεν δὲ— But as there is nothing to which the verb can be referred, Ficinus introduced "hoc studium." The author wrote, I suspect, εἶχεν εἶχεν δὲ—"a prayer would have had—"

²⁹ The word ἤδη, which now precedes γενέσθαι, should be united to γενομένων. S.

³⁰ I have omitted here ἢ γενέσθαι with Ficinus; whose version is, "ac prorsus eligerent nunquam se filios genuisse."

³¹ Instead of ἀλλὰ, the sense requires ἀλλ' αὖ—

³¹ Gottleber quotes opportunely Maxim. Tyr. xxx. p. 313, Μίδας—ποιεῖται παλινφθίαν τῆς εὐχῆς.

doubts, that men do in reality accuse the gods unjustly, in saying that their evils come from them; for either by their own crimes or follies, we should say,

They griefs endure beyond their fated share.²²

[9.] And that poet, Alcibiades, was near to being a sensible person, who, when connected with some friends void of understanding, and observing them to do and pray for things which it were better for them (not to have), but which appeared to them (to be good), thought proper to use in common a prayer, which he expresses somehow to this effect—

“Oh, Zeus, our king, whate’er is good vouchsafe
To us, if prayers we offer or do not;
But evil, when we pray thee to avert,²³
Do thou ordain.”²⁴

To me indeed the poet appears to speak correctly and safely. But if you have aught in your mind against this sentiment, do not hold your tongue.

Alc. It is a difficult matter, Socrates, to speak against any thing which is said correctly. But I am thinking on that point, of how many evils to man is ignorance the cause; since, as it seems, through it we are unconsciously doing to ourselves the greatest mischiefs, and, what is the worst, even praying for them; a fact which no one would fancy; but every one would conceive this rather, that he is competent to pray for things the best for himself, and not the worst; for this would in reality be like a curse, and not a prayer.

Soc. But perhaps, O best of men, some one who happens to be wiser than you or I, would say, that we do not speak correctly in blaming thus at random ignorance, unless we add that of some things and to some persons and under certain circumstances, ignorance is a good, as it is to them an evil.

Alc. How say you? Is there any thing whatever, of ²² Here, as Sydenham remarks, is an allusion to Od. I. 32.

²³⁻²⁴ The Greek couplet is found with some slight variations in Antholog. Epigr. Ἀδίσκωρ. 466, ed. Br. The same verses have been lately found likewise in Orion Antholog. Gnomie. and published by Schneidewinn in Conject. Crit. p. 48, as remarked by Sauppe, who refers to Proclus in Platon. Rep. 402, 26, ed. Bas.

²⁴ Instead of κέλεις, which is unintelligible, Ficinus found in his MS. κίλεις, as shown by his version, “abesse jube—” which it is better for any person whatever, under any circumstances whatever, to be ignorant than to know?

Soc. So it seems to me at least; and does it not to you?

Alc. No, by Zeus.

[10.] Soc. I will not bring a verdict against you on the point of your being willing to do³⁵ to your own mother, what they say Orestes and Alcmaeon did, or whoever else may have happened to act in the same manner as they did.

Alc. Speak, by Zeus, words of good omen, Socrates.

Soc. There is no need, Alcibiades, of your bidding that person to speak words of good omen, who says that you would not be willing to do such a deed, but much rather him, who says the contrary. (But)³⁶ since the deed appears to you to be so dreadful, that it ought not to be mentioned so easily, do you think that Orestes, if he had been a sensible person, and known what it was best for him to do, would have dared to commit any such act?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. Nor would, I think, any other man.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc.³⁷ The ignorance therefore of what is best is an evil; and to be ignorant of the best.³⁷

Alc. So it appears, at least to me.

Soc. And to him, and to all other men.

Alc. So I say.

Soc. Let us consider further this too. If it occurred to you on this very instant to think it were a better thing for you to take a dagger, and, going to the house of Pericles, your guardian and your friend, to ask—Is he within—with the intention of killing only him, and no other person, and that the servants should say—He is within.—[11.] I do not assert that you have an inclination to do any of these things; ²⁸ but if, as I think, it shall seem good to you, what surely nothing prevents, that to him, who is ignorant of what is the best, an opinion has at some time occurred, so that what is even the worst, has been thought at some time to be the best.²⁸ Or does it not seem to you it would be?

³⁵ Respecting the murder of his mother Clytemnestra by Orestes, it will be sufficient to refer to the Choephoroi of Æschylus, and the Electra of Sophocles, and Euripides; and for that of Alcmaeon, to the Scholia on Hom. Od. xi. 326; Servius on Virgil's Æn. vi. 445; and Apollodorus iii. 6. S. Who might have added the fragments of the Alcmaeon of Euripides, some of which are to be found translated into Latin in Cicero's Academics.

³⁶ I have adopted Buttmann's conjecture, that $\delta\epsilon$ has dropt out after $\delta\eta$. Hommel however, on Sympos. p. 189, D., defends the want of connexion; while Stalbaum would read $\epsilon\pi\alpha\iota\tau\alpha$ —

Alc. Certainly so.

Soc. If then, upon going within, you should see himself there, but not knowing him, should think he was some other person, would you still venture to kill him?

Alc. No, by Zeus; I do not think I should.

Soc. For you would not (kill) any person, who happened to meet you, but only that very person, whom you wished (to kill). Is it not so?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And if you made frequent attempts, but were always ignorant of his being Pericles, ²⁹ [whenever you were about to do the deed,] ²⁹ you never would make an attack upon him.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. What then, do you think that Orestes would ever have made an attack upon his mother, if in like manner he had not known her?

Alc. I think he would not.

Soc. For he too had it not in his mind to kill any woman, who might meet him, nor the mother of any person whatever, but his own mother.

Alc. Such is the fact.

Soc. To persons then so situated, and having such fancies, it is better not to know such things.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. Do you then perceive, that of some things, and to some persons, and under some circumstances, ignorance is a good, and not, as it seemed to you just now, an evil?

Alc. It is probable.

^{28—29} Such is the literal translation of the Greek, out of which neither Sydenham nor any one else have been able to make the least sense, except by alterations more or less violent. Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, "Sed an videatur tibi, quod quidem nihil prohibet, ignorantibus tibi, quid sit optimum, adesse posse interdum opinionem, ut iudices, quod est pessimum, nonnunquam optimum esse."

^{29—29} The words within brackets are properly omitted by Ficinus.

[12.] Soc. Further still, if you are willing to consider what is after this, it would perhaps appear to you to be absurd.—⁴⁰

Alc. What especially, Socrates?

Soc. That the possession of (all)⁴¹ other sciences, so to speak, is, unless a person possesses the science⁴² of what is best, very near to being seldom a benefit, but generally hurtful to the person possessing it.⁴³ And consider in this way. Does it not seem to you necessary that, when we are about to do or say any thing, we ought to know, or previously fancy we know, or know in reality, what we are about to say or do rather readily?

Alc. To me at least it seems so.

Soc. Do not then our public speakers, either knowing how to counsel, or fancying they know, give us their counsel on the instant on every occasion, some about war and peace, others, about the building of walls, or furnishing harbours; and, in one word, whatever one state does to another state, or itself by itself, all takes place from the advice of the orators.

Alc. You speak the truth.

Soc. See then what is after this.

⁴⁵ Alc. If I am able.

*Soc.*⁴⁵ You surely call persons sensible and senseless.

Alc. I do.

Soc. Do you not (call) the many senseless, but the few sensible?

⁴⁰ Ficinus has "Præterea si volueris—mirabile dictu discutere forte probabile videbitur," which Sydenham adopted; and from whence Buttmann elicited ἀποπον δὲ, ἵσως δὲ σοὶ εἰκὸς δόξειεν εἶναι. Stalbaum once proposed ἵσως δὲ σοὶ τι δόξειεν εἶναι: and so Sydenham before him.

⁴¹ I have adopted the "omnium" of Ficinus. For without that word the limitation of the universality in ὥς ἔπος εἰπεῖν would be unintelligible. Otherwise we must omit ὥς ἔπος εἰπεῖν, as Ficinus has done.

⁴² Sydenham was the first to perceive that τῆς was required here between ἀνεν and τοῦ, as is evident from § 15, where the assertion is repeated. The correction is attributed to Schleiermacher by Buttmann.

⁴³ Instead of αὐτὸ in all the MSS. but two, which read αὐτὸν, Schneider suggested αὐτὸ, whom Bekker and Stalbaum have followed. The credit of the correction is due to Sydenham, who was led to it by comparing § 15. He likewise anticipated αὐτὰς, formerly proposed by Stalbaum.

⁴⁴ Instead of πρῶτον, Ficinus seems to have read in his MS. πρότερον, answering to his "prius." But πρῶτον is found again in § 14.

⁴⁵—⁴⁶ I have adopted the arrangement of the speeches suggested by Heusde.

Alc. Just so.

Soc. And (you call) both so, with an eye to something.

Alc. Yes.

[13.] Soc. Would you call that man sensible, who knows how to give advice, but without (knowing) whether a thing is better, and in what it is better?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor him, I think, who knows war abstractedly, but without (knowing) when it is better, or for how long a time it is better. Is it not so?

Alc. It is.

Soc. Nor if a person knows how to murder another, or to take away his property, or to cause him to be an exile from his country, without (knowing) when it is better, or to whom it is better (to do so).

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. The man, therefore, who possesses any knowledge of such a kind, unless the knowledge also of what is best follows at his side—now this is surely the same as the knowledge of what is beneficial—⁴⁶ Is it not so?

Alc. Certainly it is.

Soc. Shall we say that he is a sensible ⁴⁶ and a competent counsellor both for the state and himself; but that the man ⁴⁷ who does not do so, is the contrary of these? ⁴⁷ Or how seems it to you?

Alc. To me in this way.

Soc. What then, should a person who knows how to ride, or shoot with a bow, or wrestle, or box, or engage in any other kind of combat, or in any thing else which we know by art, by what name will you call him, who knows what takes place the better according to each art?⁴⁸ (Will you not call him, who knows) according to the equestrian art, an equestrian?

⁴⁶⁻⁴⁸ The whole passage between the numerals Ficinus thus translates—“hunc forte prudentem vocabis. Alc. Hunc ipsum. Soc. Prudentemque ipsum dicemus”—

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And him (who knows) according to the boxing art, a boxer? but him, according to the hautboy-playing art, a hautboy-player; and in the rest of cases surely analogously to these? Or how otherwise?

Alc. Not otherwise than in this way.

Soc. Does it then seem to you necessary that the person knowing any of these, is a sensible man? Or shall we say that he wants much of being so?

Alc. Much indeed, by Zeus.

[14.] Soc. What kind of a commonwealth do you think there would be, composed of good bow-men and hautboy-players, and still more of athletes⁴⁹ and other artists, and of those mixed with such as we have just now mentioned, who know how to war⁵⁰ in the abstract, and to murder in the abstract;⁵⁰ and, moreover, of orators puffed up with the statesman's swell,⁵¹ but all devoid of the knowledge of what is best, and of that, which knows when it is better to make use of each one of those things, and against whom?

Alc. A bad one, Socrates, I think.

Soc. And you would say, I think, when you saw each one of these men full of ambition, and giving the greatest share he has in the commonwealth to that point,

Where he may happen to be best himself,⁵²

⁴⁸ In lieu of κατὰ ταύτην τὴν τέχνην, Ficinus found in his MS. κατὰ τέχνην, as shown by his version—"in arte." Buttmann suggested καθ' ἑκάστην τὴν τέχνην, which I have adopted.

⁴⁹ We have no word in English to answer to ἀθλητής, by which was meant a person contending in all kinds of bodily exercises.

⁵⁰ Ficinus twice omits ἀνὰ—

⁵¹ The cant English word "swell" answers exactly to the Greek φύσημα. Stalbaum has given here a facetious anecdote, preserved by Eustathius on Il. Σ. p. 1151 = 1205, who states that when Demeas, the son of Diomedes by a female hautboy-player, was acting the swell as an orator, Hyperides stopped him by saying, Will you not be silent, nor swell your cheeks more than your mother did?

⁵² The author alludes to a passage quoted by Plato in Gorg. p. 481, E., from the Antiope of Euripides; where instead of τῆς πολιτείας, is found ἡμίρας: and hence in lieu of πολιτείας I should prefer πραγματείας, especially as Cicero has in Rep. i. 22, "Cum in suo quemque opere artificem, qui quidem excellat, nihil aliud cogitare, meditari, curare videam, nisi quo sit in illo genere melior."

I mean that which becomes best according to his own art,⁵³ but of that which is the best for the state, and himself for himself having missed for the most part, as having I think trusted without intellect to opinion.⁵⁴ Since then such is the case, should we not speak correctly in saying that such a commonwealth was full of great disorder and of lawlessness?

Alc. Right indeed, by Zeus.

Soc. Did it not seem to us to be necessary that we ought previously to fancy we know, or to know in reality, what we are about to say or do readily?⁵⁵

Alc. It seems so.

[15.] Soc. ⁵⁶ Should then a person do what he knows, or thinks he knows, and there follow that we have ourselves beneficially and profitably both to the state and himself to himself, is not—⁵⁶

Alc. How not?

⁵³ So Sydenham, as if he wished to read κατὰ τὴν αὐτοῦ τέχνην, instead of κατ' αὐτὴν τὴν τέχνην, "according to art in the abstract," which I cannot understand.

^{54—55} Such is the literal translation of the Greek, where I am now, as I was many years ago, quite in the dark. For I cannot see, nor could Stephens, how αὐτὸν can be united to πόλει by a copulative conjunction; nor how αὐτὸν can be said of the thing meant by βελτίστου, nor on what the accusative δημαρτηκότα depends; nor, lastly, why there should be any mention made of a person trusting to opinion without intellect; although it is true that there is a reference to this passage in § 15, but there all is as clear as it is here the reverse.

⁵⁶ In § 12, the word is προχειροτέρως, where Sauppe prefers προχείρως, as read here.

^{56—56} Here again a literal version will best show that it was not without reason that Sydenham wrote a very long note, and closed it with proposing to read Οὐκοῦν, εἰ μὲν πράττει τις, ἃ οἶδεν, παρέπηται δὲ ἡ τοῦ βελτίστου ἐπιστήμη, ἰδὸκει ἡμῖν λυσιτελοῦντως ἕξειν τῇ πόλει καὶ αὐτὸν αὐτῷ, i. e. Should then a person do what he knows, and should the knowledge of what is the best accompany (the act), did it not seem to us that he would be in a condition advantageous to the state and to himself? To these emendations Sydenham was led by finding in Ficinus, "Nonne, si quis agit quidem, quod novit, aut nosse existimat, addit autem scientiam optimi, sequitur ut utiliter agat, et ad se ipsum et ad rem publicam." From whence Buttmann too wished to elicit παρέπηται δὲ ἡ τοῦ ὠφελίμου ἐπιστήμη, referring to § 13, ὅστις ἄρα τι τῶν τοιούτων οἶδεν, εἰ μὲν παρέπηται ἡ τοῦ βελτίστου ἐπιστήμη—αὕτη δὲ ἦν ἡ αὐτῇ δῆπου ἥπερ καὶ ἡ τοῦ ὠφελίμου. With regard to my own refiction of the passage, to which I still adhere, I will refer the reader to my edition of this dialogue.

Jove,⁹ do you not think that in this city there are few sensible men, but the majority senseless, whom you call madmen?

Alc. Yes, I do.

Soc. Think you then, that, living under the same state with so many madmen, we should be delighted,¹⁰ or that we should not be buffeted, and pelted, and have long since suffered punishment for, such acts as madmen are wont to commit? But consider, thou blessed man, whether this be the case.

Alc. What then could it be, Socrates? For it appears nearly to be not what I just now fancied.

Soc. Neither does it appear so to myself. But let us look at the matter in some such way as this.

Alc. In what way do you mean?

Soc. I will tell you. [4.] We understand that some men are in bad health; do we not?

Alc. Certainly.

Soc. Does it seem to you necessary for every man in bad health to have the gout, or a fever, or ophthalmia?¹¹ Or does it not seem to you that a man, without suffering at all in this way, may be ill in some other disorder? For diseases, we suppose, are of many various kinds, and not these alone.

Alc. I suppose there are.

Soc. Does not every ophthalmia seem to be a disease?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. But is every disease ophthalmia?

Alc. Certainly not, it seems to me. Yet still I am at a loss about your meaning.

Soc. If, however, you will give me your attention,¹² by considering the matter, both of us together¹³ will peradventure discover it.

Alc. I am giving you, Socrates, all attention, to the best of my power.

Soc. Was it not agreed upon by us, that every ophthalmia was a disease; but every disease was not an ophthalmia?

¹⁰ Stalbaum translates χαίροντας "impune"—But that use of the verb χαίρειν is found only in a threat.

¹¹ Although "ophthalmia" is a Greek word written merely in English letters, it has now become naturalized to express a peculiar disorder in the eyes.

¹²⁻¹³ Here is an allusion to Hom. Il. κ. 224, Σύν τε δὲ' ἱρχομένο—from whence τε has crept in, where the author wrote γέ—The same allusion is found likewise in the Banquet, p. 174, D. § 2.

Alc. It was agreed so.

Soc. And it seems to me to have been correctly agreed. For all persons in a fever have a disease; but not all, however, who have a disease, are in a fever; neither have they all I think the gout, nor ophthalmia. Every thing indeed of this kind is a disease; and they, whom we call physicians, say that diseases produce different effects. For all diseases are not alike, nor do they all act similarly, but each according to its own peculiar power; and yet they are all diseases, just as we understand there are in the case of workmen; do we not?

Alc. Certainly.

[5.] Soc. Such as shoemakers, carpenters, statuaries, and very many others, whom why need one mention in detail? All these have divided amongst them portions of handicraftship, and yet all are handicraftsmen. They are not, however, carpenters, nor shoemakers, nor statuaries, taken altogether.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Just so have men divided folly amongst them. And those, who have the largest share, we call madmen; but those, who have a less, silly, and thunder-struck.¹³ But if we choose to speak of such in good-omened language, some call them high-spirited, but others simpletons; and others again, harmless and inexperienced, and speechless.¹⁴ You will also find, upon inquiry, many other names. But they all mean non-intellect; although they differ, just as one art has been shown by us (to differ) from another; and one disease from another. Or how does it seem to you?

Alc. To me in this way.

Soc. ¹⁵To the point then (from whence we digressed)¹⁵ let us return back again. For it was proposed, I think, in the beginning of our conversation to consider who are the senseless, and sensible. For it was agreed that some such existed. Was it not?

¹³ In Greek, μυβροντήρους: for the effect of lightning when attended by thunder, and indeed of all electrical fire, is to stupify, at least for a time, whatever animal it strikes. S.

¹⁴ The Greek is ἄνευρος, a word properly applied to infants. Of these three epithets, the first alludes to the wholly useless in any affair; the next to the easy to be imposed on; and the last to those who, from the want of ideas, have nothing to say. S. But ἄνευρος is rather said of a person struck dumb, as shown by Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 102.

¹⁵—¹⁵ I have followed Ficinus, "Sed ut redeamus unde digressi sumus," rather than the Greek Ὀύκοῦν ἀπ' ἐκείνου πάλιν ἐπανέλθωμεν, where ἐκείνου has nothing to which it can be referred.

Alc. Yes, it was so agreed.

Sec. Whether then do you understand by the sensible, those who know how to do and say what they ought?

Alc. I do.

Sec. And whom (do you understand) by the senseless? Are they not such as know neither of those things?

Alc. Those very persons.

Sec. Will not those persons then, who know neither of those things, unconsciously say and do what they ought?

Alc. It appears so.

[6.] Sec. Now of these very persons, Alcibiades, Œdipus, I said, was one. And you will find many of those living even now, who, though not influenced by anger, as he was, pray for things hurtful to themselves; not fancying them to be so, but good (rather).¹⁶ He indeed, as he did not pray for (good), so neither did he fancy (he was doing so). But some others there are, who have suffered the very contrary to this. For I think that you, if the god to whom you happen to be going should appear to you, and, before you had uttered a prayer, first ask you—"Will it suffice for you to become a despotic king¹⁷ of Athens;" and, if you thought this a trifle,¹⁸ [and no great thing,]¹⁸ should add "and over all the Greeks;" and, if he should see that you fancied you would still have¹⁹ too little, unless he were²⁰ to appoint you king²⁰ of the whole of Europe; and should undertake not this alone, (but) that on this very day, according to your wish, all should perceive that Alcibiades, the son of Clinias, is their autocrat—I think you would walk away exceedingly delighted, as if you had met with the greatest good.

¹⁶ Ficinus has "sed bona potius," as if he had found in his MS. ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον ἀγαθὰ.

¹⁷ The word τύραννος every where in Plato signifies a despotic monarch. S.

^{18—18} The words μη μίγα τι are evidently an explanation of φαῦλον.

¹⁹ Instead of ἔχειν, the sense requires either ἔχειν ἄν or ἔξειν, as I have translated.

^{20—20} Since in lieu of ὑποσταίη σοι, one MS. has καταστήσει; from the two united I elicited, many years ago, ἀνακτα καταστήσεις σέ, similar to δισκόται καρίστησαν in Isocrates, p. 478, Bekk., and ἀρχοντας καθιστάναι in Thucyd. iv. 132.

Alc. I fancy, Socrates, that any one else whatever would do so likewise, if such things were to happen to him.

Soc. You would not, however, be willing that the country of, and absolute dominion over, all the Greeks and Barbarians should be yours in exchange for your life.²¹

Alc. I suppose not; (for why should I?) when I was about to make no use of them.

Soc. What then, if you were about to make a bad and detrimental use of them, you would not (be willing) even in such a case?

Alc. Certainly not.

[7.] Soc. You see then that it is not safe to accept at random gifts when offered; nor for a person to pray that things may take place, if he is about to be injured through them, or be totally released from life. Many, too, we could mention, who after having longed for absolute power, and laboured to obtain it, as if about to enjoy some mighty good, have, on account of their tyranny, been plotted against and lost their lives.²² I think, too, that some events, which happened as it were but yesterday,²³ have come to your ears, how that a favourite²⁴ of Archelaus, tyrant of Macedonia, murdered his admirer, through his being as fond of absolute power, as the tyrant was of him, and with the view of becoming the tyrant himself, and a happy man; but that, possessing the power for three or four days, he was in turn plotted against by some of his friends and destroyed. You see, too, of our own fellow-citizens—for this we have not heard from others, but know by being present ourselves—that such as have longed for, and obtained, the command of an army, some are even now exiles from the city, and others have ended their lives; and such, as seemed to have fared the best, have passed

²¹ In Alcibiad. i. p. 105, A. § 4, there is a very similar train of argument. But there the son of Clinias is represented as preferring power to life. From the change in his feelings it is fair to infer that this dialogue relates to a period, when he had become somewhat cooled down by age.

²² The author had probably in view the fate of Peisistratus and Hipparchus.

²³ The phrase Χθιζά τε καὶ πρωῒζά is taken from Homer in Il. B. 303. In Attic prose Greek it is χθες καὶ πρῶην, found in Gorg. p. 470. BUTTM.

²⁴ The name of the favourite is Κρατεύας, in Ælian V. H. viii. 9, Κράτερος in Diodorus, lxi. p. 761, but Κραταῖος in Aristot. Polit. v. 8, 11.

through many trying dangers and terrors²⁵ during the campaign itself;²⁶ and when they have returned to their own country, have suffered from informers a siege not at all inferior to that, which they have endured from foreign foes; so that some of them prayed they had never been at the head of an army, rather than to have borne a command. [8.] Now, if the dangers and toils had tended to their benefit,²⁷ it would have had some reason;²⁸ but now it is quite the reverse. And with respect to children, you will find in the very same manner, how that some persons, after having prayed for them to be born, have, when they are born,²⁹ come into the greatest calamities and sorrows. For some, whose children have been thoroughly wicked, have passed the whole of their lives in sorrow; and some, whose children were well-behaved, have met with the misfortune to be deprived of them, and have come into calamities in no respect less than the others, and, like them, have wished rather that their children had been never born.³⁰ And yet, although these, and many other instances of the like kind, are so very evident to persons, it is rare to find a man who would refuse what is offered, or who, if he is about to obtain it by prayer, would cease to pray for it. Nor would the majority refrain from absolute power, if offered them, or the command of an army, or many other things, which, when present, do more harm than good; but they would, on the contrary,³¹ pray for their possession, should such things happen not to be present to any one. And yet, after waiting a little time, they sometimes recant,³¹ and pray the reverse of what they prayed before. I have therefore my ²⁵ Instead of φόβον, Sydenham would prefer πόνον, as better suited to κίνδυνοί τε καὶ πόνοι, just afterwards.

²⁶ I have adopted ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ στρατίᾳ, which Ficinus found in his MS. as shown by his version—"in ipso exercitu."

²⁷⁻²⁸ The Greek is εἶχεν δὲν— But as there is nothing to which the verb can be referred, Ficinus introduced "hoc studium." The author wrote, I suspect, εὐχὴ εἶχεν δὲν—"a prayer would have had—"

²⁹ The word ἤδη, which now precedes γενίσθαι, should be united to γινομένων. S.

³⁰ I have omitted here ἢ γενίσθαι with Ficinus; whose version is, "ac prorsus eligerent nunquam se filios genuisse."

³¹ Instead of ἀλλά, the sense requires ἀλλ' αὖ—

³¹ Gottleber quotes opportunely Maxim. Tyr. xxx. p. 313, Μίδας—ποιεῖται παλινφώδιαν τῆς εὐχῆς.

doubts, that men do in reality accuse the gods unjustly, in saying that their evils come from them; for either by their own crimes or follies, we should say,

They griefs endure beyond their fated share.²²

[9.] And that poet, Alcibiades, was near to being a sensible person, who, when connected with some friends void of understanding, and observing them to do and pray for things which it were better for them (not to have), but which appeared to them (to be good), thought proper to use in common a prayer, which he expresses somehow to this effect—

“ Oh, Zeus, our king, whate’er is good vouchsafe
To us, if prayers we offer or do not;
But evil, when we pray thee to avert,²³
Do thou ordain.²⁴

To me indeed the poet appears to speak correctly and safely. But if you have aught in your mind against this sentiment, do not hold your tongue.

Alc. It is a difficult matter, Socrates, to speak against any thing which is said correctly. But I am thinking on that point, of how many evils to man is ignorance the cause; since, as it seems, through it we are unconsciously doing to ourselves the greatest mischiefs, and, what is the worst, even praying for them; a fact which no one would fancy; but every one would conceive this rather, that he is competent to pray for things the best for himself, and not the worst; for this would in reality be like a curse, and not a prayer.

Soc. But perhaps, O best of men, some one who happens to be wiser than you or I, would say, that we do not speak correctly in blaming thus at random ignorance, unless we add that of some things and to some persons and under certain circumstances, ignorance is a good, as it is to them an evil.

Alc. How say you? Is there any thing whatever, of ²² Here, as Sydenham remarks, is an allusion to Od. I. 32.

²³⁻²⁴ The Greek couplet is found with some slight variations in Antholog. Epigr. Ἀδίστορος. 466, ed. Br. The same verses have been lately found likewise in Orion Antholog. Gnom. and published by Schneidewinn in Conject. Crit. p. 48, as remarked by Sauppe, who refers to Proclus in Platon. Rep. 402, 26, ed. Bas.

²⁴ Instead of κελύς, which is unintelligible, Ficinus found in his MS. κίλυσ, as shown by his version, “ abesse jube—” which it is better for any person whatever, under any circumstances whatever, to be ignorant than to know?

Soc. So it seems to me at least; and does it not to you?

Alc. No, by Zeus.

[10.] Soc. I will not bring a verdict against you on the point of your being willing to do³⁵ to your own mother, what they say Orestes and Alcmaeon did, or whoever else may have happened to act in the same manner as they did.

Alc. Speak, by Zeus, words of good omen, Socrates.

Soc. There is no need, Alcibiades, of your bidding that person to speak words of good omen, who says that you would not be willing to do such a deed, but much rather him, who says the contrary. (But)³⁶ since the deed appears to you to be so dreadful, that it ought not to be mentioned so easily, do you think that Orestes, if he had been a sensible person, and known what it was best for him to do, would have dared to commit any such act?

Alc. By no means.

Soc. Nor would, I think, any other man.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. ³⁷ The ignorance therefore of what is best is an evil; and to be ignorant of the best.³⁷

Alc. So it appears, at least to me.

Soc. And to him, and to all other men.

Alc. So I say.

Soc. Let us consider further this too. If it occurred to you on this very instant to think it were a better thing for you to take a dagger, and, going to the house of Pericles, your guardian and your friend, to ask—Is he within—with the intention of killing only him, and no other person, and that the servants should say—He is within.—[11.] I do not assert that you have an inclination to do any of these things; ²⁸ but if, as I think, it shall seem good to you, what surely nothing prevents, that to him, who is ignorant of what is the best, an opinion has at some time occurred, so that what is even the worst, has been thought at some time to be the best.²⁸ Or does it not seem to you it would be?

³⁵ Respecting the murder of his mother Clytemnestra by Orestes, it will be sufficient to refer to the Choephoroi of Æschylus, and the Electra of Sophocles, and Euripides; and for that of Alcmaeon, to the Scholia on Hom. Od. xi. 326; Servius on Virgil's Æn. vi. 445; and Apollodorus iii. 6. S. Who might have added the fragments of the Alcmaeon of Euripides, some of which are to be found translated into Latin in Cicero's Academics.

³⁶ I have adopted Buttmann's conjecture, that δὲ has dropt out after δῆ. Hommel however, on Sympos. p. 189, D., defends the want of connexion; while Stalbaum would read ἐνταῦθα—

Alc. Certainly so.

Soc. If then, upon going within, you should see himself there, but not knowing him, should think he was some other person, would you still venture to kill him?

Alc. No, by Zeus; I do not think I should.

Soc. For you would not (kill) any person, who happened to meet you, but only that very person, whom you wished (to kill). Is it not so?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And if you made frequent attempts, but were always ignorant of his being Pericles, ²⁹ [whenever you were about to do the deed,] ²⁹ you never would make an attack upon him.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. What then, do you think that Orestes would ever have made an attack upon his mother, if in like manner he had not known her?

Alc. I think he would not.

Soc. For he too had it not in his mind to kill any woman, who might meet him, nor the mother of any person whatever, but his own mother.

Alc. Such is the fact.

Soc. To persons then so situated, and having such fancies, it is better not to know such things.

Alc. It appears so.

Soc. Do you then perceive, that of some things, and to some persons, and under some circumstances, ignorance is a good, and not, as it seemed to you just now, an evil?

Alc. It is probable.

²⁸⁻²⁹ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, out of which neither Sydenham nor any one else have been able to make the least sense, except by alterations more or less violent. Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, "Sed an videatur tibi, quod quidem nihil prohibet, ignorantibus tibi, quid sit optimum, adesse posse interdum opinionem, ut iudices, quod est pessimum, nonnunquam optimum esse."

²⁹⁻²⁹ The words within brackets are properly omitted by Ficinus.

[12.] Soc. Further still, if you are willing to consider what is after this, it would perhaps appear to you to be absurd—⁴⁰

Alc. What especially, Socrates?

Soc. That the possession of (all)⁴¹ other sciences, so to speak, is, unless a person possesses the science⁴² of what is best, very near to being seldom a benefit, but generally hurtful to the person possessing it.⁴³ And consider in this way. Does it not seem to you necessary that, when we are about to do or say any thing, we ought to know, or previously fancy we know, or know in reality, what we are about to say or do rather readily?

Alc. To me at least it seems so.

Soc. Do not then our public speakers, either knowing how to counsel, or fancying they know, give us their counsel on the instant on every occasion, some about war and peace, others, about the building of walls, or furnishing harbours; and, in one word, whatever one state does to another state, or itself by itself, all takes place from the advice of the orators.

Alc. You speak the truth.

Soc. See then what is after this.

⁴³ Alc. If I am able.

Soc. ⁴³ You surely call persons sensible and senseless.

Alc. I do.

Soc. Do you not (call) the many senseless, but the few sensible?

⁴⁰ Ficinus has "Præterea si volueris—mirabile dictu discutere forte probabile videbitur," which Sydenham adopted; and from whence Buttmann elicited ἄραρον ὅν, ἵνα δὲ σοὶ σικὸς δόξαιεν εἶναι. Stalbaum once proposed ἵνα δὲ σοὶ τὶ δόξαιεν εἶναι: and so Sydenham before him.

⁴¹ I have adopted the "omnium" of Ficinus. For without that word the limitation of the universality in ὅς ἕκαστος εἰστί would be unintelligible. Otherwise we must omit ὅς ἕκαστος εἰστί, as Ficinus has done.

⁴² Sydenham was the first to perceive that τῆς was required here between εἶναι and ροῦ, as is evident from § 15, where the assertion is repeated. The correction is attributed to Schleiermacher by Buttmann.

⁴³ Instead of αὐτὸ in all the MSS. but two, which read αὐτὸν, Schneider suggested αὐτὸ, whom Bekker and Stalbaum have followed. The credit of the correction is due to Sydenham, who was led to it by comparing § 15. He likewise anticipated αὐτὰς, formerly proposed by Stalbaum.

⁴⁴ Instead of πρῶτον, Ficinus seems to have read in his MS. πρότερον, answering to his "prius." But πρῶτον is found again in § 14.

⁴⁵—⁴⁵ I have adopted the arrangement of the speeches suggested by Heusde.

Alc. Just so.

Soc. And (you call) both so, with an eye to something.

Alc. Yes.

[13.] Soc. Would you call that man sensible, who knows how to give advice, but without (knowing) whether a thing is better, and in what it is better?

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. Nor him, I think, who knows war abstractedly, but without (knowing) when it is better, or for how long a time it is better. Is it not so?

Alc. It is.

Soc. Nor if a person knows how to murder another, or to take away his property, or to cause him to be an exile from his country, without (knowing) when it is better, or to whom it is better (to do so).

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. The man, therefore, who possesses any knowledge of such a kind, unless the knowledge also of what is best follows at his side—now this is surely the same as the knowledge of what is beneficial—⁴⁶ Is it not so?

Alc. Certainly it is.

Soc. Shall we say that he is a sensible ⁴⁶ and a competent counsellor both for the state and himself; but that the man ⁴⁷ who does not do so, is the contrary of these? ⁴⁷ Or how seems it to you?

Alc. To me in this way.

Soc. What then, should a person who knows how to ride, or shoot with a bow, or wrestle, or box, or engage in any other kind of combat, or in any thing else which we know by art, by what name will you call him, who knows what takes place the better

⁴⁶—⁴⁶ The whole passage between the numerals Ficinus thus translates—“hunc forte prudentem vocabis. Alc. Hunc ipsum. Soc. Prudentemque ipsum dicemus”—

⁴⁷—⁴⁷ The Greek is τὸν δὲ μὴ ποιοῦντα τὰναντία τούτων. In lieu of ποιοῦντα, Sydenham suggested ὀφελούντα, that is, ὀφελῆν ἐπιστάμενον, or else τοιοῦτον: which last conjecture Stalbaum attributes to Schneider, and once called it “an egregious” one; but he afterwards proposed to omit ποιοῦντα entirely. I suggested many years ago—τὸν δὲ μὴ ἐπαύοντα τούτων, τὰναντία—but I should have corrected rather τὸν δὲ μὴ ἐπαύοντά τι τούτων, similar to τι τούτων ἐπαύειν, in Theætet. p. 145, D., i. e. “but the person knowing none of these things, the reverse.” Sauppe would read τὸν δὲ μὴ νοοῦντα—

according to each art?⁴⁸ (Will you not call him, who knows) according to the equestrian art, an equestrian?

Alc. Yes.

Soc. And him (who knows) according to the boxing art, a boxer? but him, according to the hautboy-playing art, a hautboy-player; and in the rest of cases surely analogously to these? Or how otherwise?

Alc. Not otherwise than in this way.

Soc. Does it then seem to you necessary that the person knowing any of these, is a sensible man? Or shall we say that he wants much of being so?

Alc. Much indeed, by Zeus.

[14.] Soc. What kind of a commonwealth do you think there would be, composed of good bow-men and hautboy-players, and still more of athletes⁴⁹ and other artists, and of those mixed with such as we have just now mentioned, who know how to war⁵⁰ in the abstract, and to murder in the abstract;⁵⁰ and, moreover, of orators puffed up with the statesman's swell,⁵¹ but all devoid of the knowledge of what is best, and of that, which knows when it is better to make use of each one of those things, and against whom?

Alc. A bad one, Socrates, I think.

Soc. And you would say, I think, when you saw each one of these men full of ambition, and giving the greatest share he has in the commonwealth to that point,

Where he may happen to be best himself,⁵²

⁴⁸ In lieu of κατὰ ταύτην τὴν τέχνην, Ficinus found in his MS. κατὰ τέχνην, as shown by his version—"in arte." Buttmann suggested καθ' ἑκάστην τὴν τέχνην, which I have adopted.

⁴⁹ We have no word in English to answer to ἀθλητής, by which was meant a person contending in all kinds of bodily exercises.

⁵⁰ Ficinus twice omits αὐτὸν—

⁵¹ The cant English word "swell" answers exactly to the Greek φύσημα. Stalbaum has given here a facetious anecdote, preserved by Eustathius on D. S. p. 1151 = 1205, who states that when Demas, the son of Diomedes by a female hautboy-player, was acting the swell as an orator, Hyperides stopped him by saying, Will you not be silent, nor swell your cheeks more than your mother did?

⁵² The author alludes to a passage quoted by Plato in Gorg. p. 481, E., from the Antiope of Euripides; where instead of τῆς πολιτείας, is found ἡμέρας: and hence in lieu of πολιτείας I should prefer πραγματείας, especially as Cicero has in Rep. i. 22, "Cum in suo quemque opere artificem, qui quidem excellat, nihil aliud cogitare, meditari, curare videam, nisi quo sit in illo genere melior."

I mean that which becomes best according to his own art,⁵³ but of that which is the best for the state, and himself for himself having missed for the most part, as having I think trusted without intellect to opinion.⁵⁴ Since then such is the case, should we not speak correctly in saying that such a commonwealth was full of great disorder and of lawlessness?

Alc. Right indeed, by Zeus.

Soc. Did it not seem to us to be necessary that we ought previously to fancy we know, or to know in reality, what we are about to say or do readily?⁵⁵

Alc. It seems so.

[15.] Soc. ⁵⁶ Should then a person do what he knows, or thinks he knows, and there follow that we have ourselves beneficially and profitably both to the state and himself to himself, is not—⁵⁶

Alc. How not?

⁵³ So Sydenham, as if he wished to read κατὰ τὴν αὐτοῦ τέχνην, instead of κατ' αὐτὴν τὴν τέχνην, "according to art in the abstract," which I cannot understand.

^{54—54} Such is the literal translation of the Greek, where I am now, as I was many years ago, quite in the dark. For I cannot see, nor could Stephens, how αὐτὸν can be united to πόλει by a copulative conjunction; nor how αὐτὸν can be said of the thing meant by βελτίστου, nor on what the accusative διημαρτηκότα depends; nor, lastly, why there should be any mention made of a person trusting to opinion without intellect; although it is true that there is a reference to this passage in § 15, but there all is as clear as it is here the reverse.

⁵⁵ In § 12, the word is προχειροτέρως, where Sauppe prefers προχείρως, as read here.

^{56—56} Here again a literal version will best show that it was not without reason that Sydenham wrote a very long note, and closed it with proposing to read Οὐκοῦν, κὰν μὲν πράττει τις, ἃ οἶδεν, παρέπηται δὲ ἡ τοῦ βελτίστου ἐπιστήμη, ἰδοὺ μὲν λυσιτελοῦντως ἔξιν τῇ πόλει καὶ αὐτὸν αὐτῷ, i. e. Should then a person do what he knows, and should the knowledge of what is the best accompany (the act), did it not seem to us that he would be in a condition advantageous to the state and to himself? To these emendations Sydenham was led by finding in Ficinus, "Nonne, si quis agit quidem, quod novit, aut nosse existimat, addit autem scientiam optimi, sequitur ut utiliter agat, et ad se ipsum et ad rem publicam." From whence Buttman too wished to elicit παρέπηται δὲ ἡ τοῦ ὠφελίμου ἐπιστήμη, referring to § 13, ὅστις ἀρα τι τῶν τοιούτων οἶδεν, ἴαν μὲν παρέπηται ἡ τοῦ βελτίστου ἐπιστήμη—αὕτη δὲ ἦν ἡ αὐτῇ δέπου ἦπερ καὶ ἡ τοῦ ὠφελίμου. With regard to my own reflection of the passage, to which I still adhere, I will refer the reader to my edition of this dialogue.

Soc. ⁵⁷ But if (he does) I think the contrary of these, ⁵⁷ there (will be a benefit) neither to the public nor himself.

Alc. Certainly not.

Soc. What then does it seem to you now? In the like manner, ⁵⁸ or somehow otherwise?

Alc. Not otherwise than this.

Soc. Did you not say that you called the many senseless, but the few sensible?

Alc. I did.

Soc. And do we not say again that the many have missed of what is the best, by having generally, I think, trusted to opinion without intellect?

Alc. We say it.

Soc. It is for the interest then of the many neither to know anything, nor to fancy they know, if they shall be more ready to do what they know, or fancy they know, and by doing so are about ⁵⁹ to be still more injured than benefited.

Alc. You say what is most true.

Soc. ⁶⁰ Do you see then ⁶⁰ that when I said, that the possession of the other sciences is, unless a person possesses the science of what is best, very near to being seldom beneficial, and generally hurtful to the person possessing it, did I not appear to be speaking in reality correctly?

Alc. If not then, yet now it seems so, Socrates.

[16.] Soc. It is requisite then for ⁶¹ a state, and a soul that ⁵⁷⁻⁵⁷ The Greek is 'Εάν δι' γ', οἶμαι, τάναντία τούτων— But as the sentence has reference to the preceding remark of Socrates, to express the required sense, we ought to read 'Εάν δ' ἀγνοία (sc. τοῦ ὠφελίμου παρίηται), τάναντία τούτων—i. e. "But if the ignorance of what is useful follows, the contrary of this will happen." So Sydenham; who did not perceive that the ellipse was to be thus supplied—'Εάν δι' γ' (πράττη) τάναντία τούτων, οὔτε τῇ πόλει οὔτ' αὐτὸν αὐτῷ (λυσιτελούτως ἔξειν)—and hence we can see the necessity of either omitting οἶμαι with Ficinus, or altering it into ἐνὶν, and placing it after αὐτῷ.

⁵⁸ Instead of ὡσαύτως, the οὕτως in the reply requires here likewise οὕτως, answering to "ita" in Ficinus.

⁶⁰ The Greek is βλάπτεσθαι τὰ πλείω μᾶλλον ἢ—But as there is nothing to govern βλάπτεσθαι, Schneider suggested μίλλουσι for μᾶλλον. But, says Stalbaum, ἢ cannot follow τὰ πλείω. We may, therefore, read ἔτι πλείω—and so I have translated, answering to Ficinus, "nocebunt crebrius quam conferent."

⁶⁰⁻⁶⁰ The words ὅπως οὖν ὅτι are properly omitted by Ficinus; for they cannot precede the interrogation at the end of the speech—ἀρ' οὐχί—

is about to live correctly,⁶¹ to cling to this science ; just as a person in sickness does to a physician, or a person about to sail in safety does to a steersman,⁶² by so much as the soul may not previously have a favourable wind, either respecting the possession of property or the strength of body, or any thing else of such a kind,⁶³ by so much the greater errors is it necessary, it seems, to arise from them ; and he who possesses what is called much learning and much art, but is destitute of this very science, and is carried along by each of the others, will he not in reality justly⁶³ encounter a violent storm, inas-much as he is, I think, continuing at sea without a steersman, a time not long life of gods ;⁶³ so that it seems to me that here too suits the sentiment of the poet, which he expresses, while he is bringing a charge against some one that Trades many knew he; but knew badly all.⁶⁴ .

tion of ideas ; and no less so is the syntax, where the singular τὴν μίλ-λουσαν follows πόλιν and ψυχὴν : while neither the state nor soul can be fairly said "to live correctly." What the author probably wrote may be seen in my edition, together with the reasons for the alterations proposed.

⁶²⁻⁶³ Such is the literal version of a passage, which Dacier said was one of the most difficult in Plato. The first person who appears to have had a glimpse of the right reading, was Sydenham ; who saw that two sentences had been transposed ; and, so after him did Schneider, to whom the credit of the discovery is given by Buttmann, whose conjecture of λαβρότερον for μὴ πρότερον Sydenham had already anticipated ; while Stalbaum would prefer either Wex's μὴ πρῶτερον, or his own μὴ λειότερον. In my own edition I stated that the sense was perhaps something to this effect—"For without this knowledge, by how much the more does fortune with a favouring wind urge on a headlong disposition ;" and that the whole passage concealed a fragment of tragedy. Sauppe suggests ὅσα γὰρ ἂν λαβρότερον ἐπουρίσῃ τὰ τῆς τύχης ἀνευ ταύτης ἢ περι-—where τύχης for ψυχῆς is due to Dacier.

⁶³⁻⁶⁴ Here too is another corrupt passage, which has hitherto defied the sagacity of scholars to restore it satisfactorily. And perhaps the same remark will be applied to my own attempt in the edition already referred to. Ficinus has in the concluding clause, "quippe cum absque gubernatore oberret in pelago brevi tempore periturus," to which he was led, I suspect, rather by the sense, than what he found in the MS. before him.

⁶⁴ This verse is taken from a mock-heroic poem, called the "Margites," to which Aristotle refers in Poet. c. 4, and Nichomach. Eth. vi. 7. Other references are to be found in Fabricius Biblioth. Græc. l. ii. c. 2, § 24. S. The poem seems to have been a parody of the Odyssey, where Ulysses is represented as the model of wisdom ; while the matter of it was, like the Batrachomyomachia, an imitation of, and cento from, Homer. Thus the line, Πόλλ' ἠπίστατο ἔργα, κακῶς δ' ἠπίστατο πάντα, is not unlike πολλά τε ᾗδ' ἢ Μάψ in Il. B. 213, and it would be still more like, if the Alc. But how, Socrates, does the verse of this poet suit here? For to me it seems to say nothing to the purpose.

Soc. Nay, it is very much to the purpose. But this poet writes enigmatically, and so do nearly all the others. [17.] For the whole of poetry is naturally enigmatical; and it is not for a person who is to be met with any where, to understand it; and in addition to its being such naturally, when it seizes upon a man of a grudging disposition and unwilling to make himself known, but desirous to conceal, as much as possible, his wisdom, it seems to be difficult beyond measure to understand what each of those poets mean. For you cannot, surely, think that Homer, a poet most divine and clever, was ignorant how impossible it is for a person to know a thing badly; for he it is, who says that Margites knew many things, but knew all badly; but he speaks enigmatically, I suppose, by introducing the word "badly" instead of the word "bad,"⁶⁵ and "he knew" instead of "to know." There is then a sentence composed, unshackled by the metre, and it expresses what he meant, that "He knew many trades; but that to know all was to him an evil."⁶⁶ It is evident then, that if to know many things was to him an evil, he himself was some worthless fellow; at least if we must give any credit to the reasonings previously produced.

Alc. And so it seems, Socrates, to me; for I should hardly give credit to other reasonings, if not to these.

Soc. And correctly does it seem so.

⁶⁷ Alc. Again it seems to me.⁶⁷

Soc. But come, by Zeus, for you surely see, how great reading were, as quoted by a Scholiast, Πολλὰ μὲν ᾗδεα ἔργαν, κακῶς δὲ μάλ' ᾗδεα πάντα.

⁶⁷—⁶⁷ The words between the numerals, found in Ficinus, and all the MSS. but one, Stalbaum says are excessively silly, whether they are assigned to Alcibiades, or, as in Ficinus, to Socrates. What the author wrote, may be seen in my edition, together with the reasons requisite to support my views.

and of what kind is the difficulty and doubt, in which you too appear to me to have a share; as you never rest at all in changing your place up and down; ⁶⁸ but what may have seemed especially to you, this to have gone secretly away again, and so seems no longer in a similar manner. ⁶⁹ [18.] Should the god then, to whom you happen to be going, appear to you even now, and ask you, before you had prayed for any thing whatever, whether it would be sufficient for you, if any of those things, mentioned at the beginning, were to take place; or should he leave it to yourself to make a request, how, think you, could you avail yourself of the opportunity? either by accepting any of the things offered, or by praying yourself for something to happen?

Alc. Now, by the gods, Socrates, I should not know what to say in such a case. But it seems to me to be a violent ⁶⁹ thing, and in good truth one of caution, in order that a person may not unconsciously pray for things evil, while fancying them to be good; and then after waiting, as you said, a little time, recant, and pray the reverse to what he did at first.

Soc. Did not then the poet, whom I mentioned at the beginning of the argument, know somewhat more than we do, when he begged ⁷⁰ (of Zeus) to avert terrible things from (us) when praying?

Alc. So it seems to me.

Soc. The Lacedæmonians, therefore, Alcibiades, having admired this very poet, or having so considered themselves the matter, put up on every occasion in private and in public ⁶⁸⁻⁶⁹ The Greek is ἀλλ ὅπερ ἂν μάλιστα σοὶ δόξῃ, τοῦτο καὶ ἐκδεύκιναι αὐ καὶ οὐκίτι ὡσαύτως δοκεῖν. But as there is nothing to govern ἐκδεύκιναι and δοκεῖν, Buttmann suggested ἐκδίδυκεν αὐ, and δοκεῖ, found in a single MS. And as there is some uncertainty about the meaning of ἐκδύνειν, Stalbaum says the author fancied it meant the same as ἀναδύεσθαι, "to retract," in Theætet. p. 135, C., and ἀνάδυσσις, in Euthyd. p. 302, E. There is some error here corrected in my edition.

⁶⁹ The Greek is μάργον, which Buttmann renders "insanum," i. e. "a mad wish." Ficinus has more fully—"insanum quiddam mihi videtur, temere deum precari ac diligenter considerandum—" Dobree, in Adversar. T. ii. p. 393, suggests μέγα ἔργον or μοῦργόν (i. e. μοι ἔργον) τε δοκεῖ—I have proposed οὐ Μαργείτου μοι δοκεῖ εἶναι, in allusion to § 17. Ast—μὴν ἔργον—Heindorf μίμμερον, a word found in Hipp. Maj. § 24.

⁷⁰ The verb κεύειν is used here and elsewhere in this dialogue in the sense of requesting. See too Thucyd. ii. 81, 85; iii. 7; iv. 108.

⁷¹ a similar prayer, by requesting the gods to grant them ever⁷² things honourable in addition to what are good;⁷¹ and no one has ever heard them pray for any thing more. Accordingly, up to the passing time, they have been fortunate less than none. And even if it has happened to them to be not fortunate in every thing, it was not on account of this prayer of theirs; but it is for the gods, I presume, to grant what a person happens to pray for, and the reverse. [19.] And I am desirous of telling you something else, which I once heard from certain elderly persons, how that, when differences arose between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, it so happened to our city, that whenever there was a battle, by land or sea, it was unsuccessful, and never able to gain a victory. Thereupon the Athenians, brooking ill their doings, and at a loss for some contrivance to find an escape from their present evils, held a council; and it seemed to them that it would be best to send to Ammon,⁷³ and inquire of him,⁷⁴ and in addition, this too likewise,⁷⁴ on what account do the gods always give the victory to the Lacedæmonians, rather than to us; who, of (all) the Greeks,⁷⁵ bring them sacrifices the most numerous and the most beautiful; and have decorated their temples with offerings such as none else have done; and are wont to make to the gods processions the most costly and the most solemn, each year; and to expend money, such as all the rest of the Greeks never did together; whereas the Lacedæmonians have never paid the least regard to any of these things; but conduct themselves in so slighting a manner towards the gods, as to sacrifice on each occasion animals, maimed even; and in all other matters fall far short of us not a little in honouring the gods, although possessing property not less than our state.

⁷¹⁻⁷² On the prayer τὰ καλὰ ἐκ τῶν ἀγαθῶν, Lobeck, in Aglaophamus, p. 12, refers to Plutarch in Laconic. T. 8, p. 253.

⁷³ I have adopted Buttmann's ἀεὶ in lieu of ἀθ, although I still adhere to the emendation proposed in my edition for the reasons assigned there.

⁷⁴ This allusion to the oracle of Ammon, situated in Africa, is peculiarly appropriate; for we learn from Plutarch i. p. 531, E., that when Alcibiades was exciting the Athenians to engage in the Sicilian expedition, some persons, who had been sent on a holy embassy to Ammon, returned with an oracle, stating that the Athenians would get all the people of Syracuse into their power.

⁷⁵ The words within the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

⁷⁶ So Sydenham; as if he wished to read πάντων τῶν Ἑλλήνων.—

[20.] When the messenger had thus spoken, and had inquired of the oracle what they ought to do to find a deliverance from their present evils, the prophet made no other answer ;⁷⁶—for it is evident the god did not permit him—but calling (the messengers),⁷⁷ said,—To the Athenians thus saith Ammon.⁷⁸ He saith, that he prefers the good-omened address of the Lacedæmonians before all the sacrifices of (the rest of)⁷⁹ the Greeks.—These words he said, and nothing more. Now it seems to me, that by a good-omened address the god means only that prayer of theirs ; for it is in reality much superior to the prayers of others. For the rest of the Greeks are wont, some of them, after placing (by the altar) oxen with gilded horns,⁸⁰ and others presenting the gods with offerings to be hung up (in temples), to pray for whatever they happen (to desire), whether it be good or evil. The gods therefore, on hearing their impious addresses, accept not their costly processions and sacrifices ; so that there is need of much caution and consideration as to what is to be spoken and not. And you will find in Homer likewise other expressions similar to these. [21.] For he says, that the Trojans, on taken up their night quarters,

The perfect hecatombs to th' Immortals gave,⁸¹

and that the winds carried the savour of the fat to heaven

Sweet-smelling ; but the blessed gods refused

To taste it ; for by them was hated much

The holy Ilion, and Priam too,

And of the careful Priam subjects all :

so that it was of no use for them to sacrifice, or to expend presents in vain,⁸² when they were thus hated by the gods.

⁷⁶ Ficinus, perceiving that ἄλλο οὐδὲν would be scarcely intelligible by itself, has given "non multa."

⁷⁷ Instead of αὐτὸν I have translated as if the Greek were τὸν ἄγγελον.

⁷⁸ On the formula, τάδε λέγει Ἀμμων, Gottleber refers to Diodor. xvii. 51, and Buttmann to Arrian vii. p. 305.

⁷⁹ Ficinus has "reliquorum—Græcorum," as if he had found in his MS. τῶν ἄλλων Ἑλλήνων, not simply τῶν Ἑλλήνων.

⁸⁰ Gottleber refers to Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 3, "Deorum honori—auratis cornibus hostiæ—immolabantur." Add from Virgil, "aurata fronte juvencum ;" and Callimachus, ἰλάφους—κεράων δ' ἀπελάμπετο χρυσός.

⁸¹ The passage, as here quoted, has been found in none of the MSS. of Homer. Barnes was the first to insert the supplement in its proper place, l. θ. 458.

⁸² Compare Eurip. Tro. 1241, Οὐκ ἤρεσαν θεοῖς τι, πλὴν οὐμοὶ πόνοι, Τροία τε πόλεων ἱεκρίτον μισουμένη· Μάρτην δ' ἰβουθυτοῦμεν.

For the divine nature, I conceive, is not such, as to be seduced by presents,⁸³ like a knavish judge.⁸⁴ But we are giving a silly reason, if we think to get the better of the Lacedæmonians in this way. For it would be a dreadful thin indeed, if the gods looked to gifts and sacrifices, and not the soul, should a person happen to be holy and just. Nay, (they look) much more, I think, (to this), than to expensive processions and sacrifices; for which there is nothing to prevent those from having the power to pay each year, either individuals or states, who have sinned greatly against the gods, and greatly too against men. But they, as not receiving bribes, disdain all such things as these, as says the god, and the prophet of the gods. [22.] It seems, then, that justice and prudence are near to being honoured above all things by the gods, and by men too, that have any sense. Now the sensible and the just are none other than such as know what it is meet to do and say both towards gods and men. But I should be glad to hear from you, what are your thoughts upon this subject.

Alc. To myself, Socrates, the matter seems to be in no other way, than it does to you and the god. For it would not be reasonable for me to vote contrary to the god.

Soc. Do you not remember, then, saying that you were much at a loss, lest you should unconsciously be praying for evil things, fancying them to be good?

Alc. I do.

Soc. You see then, that it is not safe for you to go to the god with the view of praying, in order that, should it so happen, he may not hear you speaking impiously, and receive no part of your sacrifice, and you perchance meet with something different. It seems to me, therefore, that it is best to keep quiet. For through your high spirit—for that is the fairest of names for folly—I think you would not be willing to make use of the Lacedæmonian prayer. It is necessary, therefore, for a man to wait, until he has learnt how he ought to conduct himself towards gods and men.

⁸³ Stalbaum refers to Persius ii. 48, to which he might have added Plato, Legg. iv. p. 601, x. p. 885, D., and Cicero de Legg. ii. 16, "Donis impii ne placare audeant deos."

⁸⁴ I have adopted Gedike's reading, δικαστήν, "judge," for τοκοστήν, "usurer." The allusion is to an Æsopo-Socratic fable in Latin, which I have given at length in my edition from a MS. in the British Museum. That it was found likewise in Greek is shown by an allusion to it in Plutarch de Solert. Animal. ii. p. 973. B., where lies hid the commencement of a Choliambic fable—Κουρεύς ποτ' ἔτρεφε θαῦμ' ὅσον τι πολυφώνου Κίττης, τὰ τ' ἀνδρῶν ἦτις εἶχε καὶ θηρῶν Φωνήματ' ἀνταποδιδόναι.

[23.] Alc. But when, Socrates, will that time be? and who is he that will instruct me? for I should be very glad, I think, to see who the man is.

Soc. It is he, of whose care you are the object.⁸⁵ But it seems to me, as Homer (Il. v. 127) says of Minerva, that she removed the mist from before the eyes of Diomede,

That he might clearly see both gods and men;

so must he in the first place remove from your soul the mist, that now happens to be present there, and then apply those things, through which you will be about to know both good and evil. For now you seem to be unable (to do so).

Alc. Let him then remove the mist, or any thing else that he pleases; as I am prepared not to fly from any thing ordered by him, whoever he may be, if I am about to become a better man.

Soc. And yet he has a very wonderful eagerness in your behalf.

Alc. Till that time then it seems to me to be best to put off my sacrifice.

Soc. And rightly it seems so to you. For it is safer than to run so great a risk.

[24.] Alc. But how,⁸⁶ Socrates? However, since you seem to me to have given good advice, I will put this garland⁸⁷

⁸⁶ Buttmann justly considers this a strange way of passing from one subject to another. What I suspect the author wrote may be found in my edition.

⁸⁷ Amongst the Greeks, they who went to a temple to pray to a god, carried a garland, which they wore while praying; and hence Socrates knew, on meeting Alcibiades, whither he was going. S.; who might have referred to Eurip. Hippol. 72.

round your (brows);⁸⁸ and to the gods we will then present crowns,⁸⁹ and all the other customary offerings, when I behold that day arrive; and it will in no long time arrive, if they are willing.

Soc. Well, I accept both this, and ⁹⁰I would see myself readily accepting⁹⁰ any thing else given by you. And as Creon, when he sees Tiresias wearing garlands, and hears that he had obtained them as the first-fruits of spoils taken from the enemy, is made by Euripides (in Phœn. 865) to say,

This crown, as a happy omen, have I worn;
For well you know how tempest-tost we lie—

so do I place on myself this opinion⁹¹ on your part as an omen of good. For I seem to myself to be in no less a storm than Creon; and I would gladly be a victor over your admirers.

⁸⁸ So in the Banquet, p. 213, § 37, Alcibiades is represented as putting a chaplet on the head of Socrates. The rite is ridiculed by Aristophanes in 'Ιππ. 1262, where Demus decks the Sausage-maker, after his victory over Cleon, with a crown of sausages, saying, as I corrected on Æsch. Suppl. i. Ἀλλάντις Ζεῦ, σὸν τὸ νικητηριον; i. e. "Thine is the victor's chaplet, Sausage-Zeus."

⁸⁹ Potter, in Archæolog. Græc. ii. 4, infers from this passage that the garlands worn by suppliants during their prayers were, on their leaving the temple, put on the head of the deity who had been addressed; and hence Alcibiades is represented as giving to Socrates the honour he had designed for the image of Jupiter. S.

⁹⁰⁻⁹⁰ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, to whom Stalbaum might have referred; for he says that nothing can be more absurd than the whole clause, καὶ ἄλλο δὲ—ἱμαντὸν—Perhaps the author wrote ἰδοὺς ἄν, "you would see."

⁹¹ In lieu of δόξαν, Büttmann suggested δόσιν, and myself λείξιν, comparing Iph. A. 607, Ὀρνίθα μὲν τόνδ' αἰσιον ποιούμεθα τὸ σὸν τι χρηστὸν καὶ λόγων εὐφημίαν. But perhaps δόξαν means here "glory" or, "reputation."

INTRODUCTION TO THE THEAGES.

IN placing in a consecutive order the Theages, Rivals, and Hipparchus, I have followed the arrangement adopted by Stalbaum. For he conceives that they were written, if not by the same hand, at least by a kindred mind, and are all equally unworthy of Plato, despite the attempt made by Socher and Knebel to reverse the judgment of Boeckh, Heindorf, Schleiermacher, and Ast. For though some of the arguments brought forward by the impugnors of the dialogue have been refuted, says Stalbaum, by its defenders, yet there still remains evidence enough to prove its spuriousness. For not only is it in matter and manner at variance with the subject and style adopted by Plato, but it contains likewise such remarkable instances of plagiarisms rather than imitation, as to leave little doubt of the writer being only a Plato in disguise; to say nothing of some peculiarities in language, not to be found in the writings of the philosopher and his contemporaries. The dialogue is, however, reckoned amongst the genuine works of Plato by Diogenes Laertius, iii. 57, on the authority of Thrasyllus, a Platonist of the time of Tiberius, as we learn from Suetonius in Tiberius, § 14, and the Scholiast on Juvenal, vi. 576; and it is quoted as such by Ælian, V. H. viii. 1. While Lamprias, in the list of the works of Plutarch, n. 68, mentions one, "On the Theages of Plato."

According to Stalbaum, Wympensee, in Diatrib. de Xenocrate, p. 96, conceived that the author of the dialogue was perhaps the philosopher of Chalcedon. But Stalbaum himself feels disposed to refer it to Antipater, who flourished about A. C. 150, and who was the teacher of Panætius, and the disciple of Diogenes of Babylon, and who wrote, as appears from Cicero de Divinat. i. 3, a work on the wonderful divinations made by Socrates, of which there are some curious instances given in this dialogue; and as both Cicero, and Plutarch in his treatise, On the Dæmon of Socrates, seem to have made use of the work of Antipater, so probably did the author of this dialogue.

THE THEAGES.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

DEMODOCUS, SOCRATES, THEAGES.

DEMODOCUS.

[1.] I WANT, Socrates, to speak with you in private¹ about some matters, if you are at leisure; and if your want of leisure be not very great, for my sake however make leisure.

Soc. Nay, I am at leisure in other respects, and on your account very much so. If then you wish to say any thing, it is in your power (to do so).

Dem. Are you willing then for us to retire out of the way, to the portico of Zeus Eleutherius² hard by?

Soc. If it seems good to you.

Dem. Let us go then, Socrates. All natural productions, growing out of the earth, and other animals as well as man, appear to subsist in nearly the same manner. For to such of us as cultivate the ground it is a thing the most easy in the case of plants, to prepare every thing prior to planting, and even the planting itself. But when what has been planted is in a living state, the care of it becomes great and painful, and difficult. The same thing appears to take place with respect to human beings likewise. I form this conjecture as regards other things from my own affairs. For of this my son, whether one must call it the planting, or the procreating, it is the easiest of all things; but his education is difficult, and I am continually in fear about him. On other points much might be said ; but the desire which now possesses him alarms me very much. It is not indeed an ignoble one, but it is dangerous. For he desires, Socrates, as he says, to become a wise man. I suspect that certain youths of his own age, and of the same ward, have been going down to the city, and repeating certain discourses, and disturbed his mind very much. Of these he is emulous ; and for a long time is giving me great trouble, thinking it fit that I should pay attention to him, and pay money to some of the sophists, who might make him a wise man. For the money indeed I care ¹ less than nothing, but think that, in going whither he is hastening, he is running into no small danger. Hitherto I have by soothing restrained him ; but as I am no longer able (to do so), I think it best to yield to him, lest by frequently associating (with others)² without me, he should be corrupted. Hence I am come for this very purpose, that I may place him with some one of those, who are considered to be sophists. Opportunely then for us have you appeared, with whom, as I am about to engage in affairs of this kind, I wished very much to consult. If then you have any advice to give respecting what you have heard from me, it is both lawful and needful (to do so).

¹ The word ἰδιωλογεῖσθαι, says Stalbaum, is not found elsewhere in pure Greek; and he refers to Suicer in Thesaur. Eccles. i. p. 1434.

² This portico was in the Ceramicus, as shown by Meursius de Ceramic. § 4, quoted by Stalb.

[2.] Soc. Counsel, Demodocus, is said to be a sacred thing.³ If then any other consultation is sacred, this is so, about which you are now considering. For there is not a thing, about which a person may consult, more divine, than about the instruction of himself and of those related to him. In the first place then, let you and I agree together as to what we think that thing is, about which we are consulting ; lest I may not perchance⁴ take it to be one thing, and you another ; and we afterwards perceive,

² Taylor has adopted "with others," from "cum aliis," found in Ficin. But συγγενόμενός τῳ, "associating with some one," found in all the MSS., is more correct.

³ The Scholiast, who vainly attempts to give a satisfactory account of this proverb, says it was found in the Amphiaraus of Aristophanes ; while Zenobius, Proverb. Cent. iv. 40, attributes it to Epicharmus. It is found likewise in Plato Epist. 5. It was probably a saying, addressed to those who came to consult an oracle.

⁴ On this sense of πολλάκις, see at Alcib. i. p. 127, E. § 49.

¹ when the conference has proceeded far,¹ that we are an object of ridicule, both I who give, and you who request, advice, in not thinking the same upon any thing.

Dem. You appear to me, Socrates, to speak correctly; and it is meet so to do.

Soc. And speak I do correctly, but not entirely so; since I make a trifling alteration. For I am thinking, that perhaps this youth may not desire that, which we think he desires, but something else; and in that case we shall be still more absurd in consulting about something different. It appears, therefore, to me to be the most correct to begin by inquiring of him what the thing is, which he desires.

Dem. It appears very nearly to be the best to do as you say.

[3.] Soc. Tell me then what is the name of this handsome² youth? what must we call him?

Dem. His name, Socrates, is Theages.

Soc. You have given your son, Demodocus, a beautiful and sacred-like name. Tell us, Theages, do you say that you desire to become a wise man? and do you think it fit for this your father to find out the acquaintance of such a person as may make you wise?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. Do you call those men wise, who are skilled in that, respecting which they have a knowledge, or those, who have not?

Thea. Those, who have a knowledge.

Soc. What then, has not your father caused you to be instructed, or taught you (himself),³ what others are taught, who are the sons of fathers good and honourable;⁴ for instance, letters, to play on the harp, to wrestle, and other exercises?

Thea. Yes, myself.

Soc. Do you think then there is still a want of some knowledge, to which it is proper for your father to pay attention for your sake?

² So Taylor, as if he wished to read, what the sense requires, καλῶ in lieu of καλόν—

³ To preserve the difference between διδάσκεισθαι and παιδεύειν, I have inserted "himself." Ficinus has simply "edocuit," omitting καὶ ἐπαιδεύειν, which he probably considered superfluous.

⁴ By καλοὶ καὶ ἀγαθοὶ are meant what we should call persons both handsome and of polished manners.

Thea. I do.

Soc. What is it? Tell us it, that we may gratify you.

Thea. My father knows it, Socrates; for I have often mentioned it to him. But he designedly says this to you, as if truly he did not know what I desire; for in this and other matters likewise he opposes me, and is unwilling to place me with any one.

[4.] Soc. But all that you have hitherto said to him, has been said, as it were, without witnesses. Now therefore make me a witness and state before me what is the wisdom you desire. For come now, if you should desire that wisdom, by which men steer ships, and I should happen to ask you—What is the wisdom, Theages, of which being in want you blame your father, because he is unwilling to place you with a man, through whom you might become wise? what answer would you give me? What would you say this wisdom is? Is it not the pilot's art?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. And if you desired to be wise in that wisdom, by which persons direct¹ chariots, and afterwards blamed your father, on my asking you what this wisdom is, what answer would you give me? Would you not say it is the charioteer's art?²

Thea. Yes.

Soc. But is the wisdom, of which you have now a desire, nameless, or has it a name?

Thea. I think it has (a name).

Soc. Whether then do you know it, but not its name? Or its name likewise?

Thea. Its name likewise.

Soc. Say then what it is.

Thea. What other name, Socrates, can one say it has, than that of wisdom?

Soc. Is not then the charioteer's art wisdom likewise? Or does it appear to you to be ignorance?

Thea. It does not.

¹ Schleiermacher objects to the expression κυβερνᾶν τὰ ἄρματα. But though the phrase is not elsewhere found in Plato, the metaphor might fairly be adopted here, just as Æschylus has ἐν πρύμνῃ πόλεως Οἶακα νεμῶν in S. Th. 2.

² With the whole of this passage compare Alcibiad. i. p. 125, § 44.

Soc. But wisdom?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. For what do we use it? Is it not for that, by which we know how to manage horses when yoked?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. Is not then the pilot's art wisdom likewise?

Thea. To me at least it appears so.

Soc. Is it not that, by which we know how to manage ships?

Thea. It is.

Soc. But what is the wisdom of which you are desirous? What by it do we know how to govern?

Thea. By it we know, it seems to me, how to govern men.

Soc. What, sick men?

Thea. No.

Soc. For that wisdom is the physician's art. Is it not?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. Is it that then, by which we know how to regulate singers in choirs?

Thea. It is not.

Soc. For this is the musician's art.

Thea. Certainly.

Soc. But is it that, by which we know how to regulate those, who are engaged in gymnastic exercises?

Thea. No.

Soc. For this is the gymnast's art.

Thea. It is.

Soc. Is it that of those, who do what? Be ready to state it to myself, as I have the preceding to you.

Thea. It is that, by which persons (do something) in the city.

Soc. Are there not then in a city persons who are sick?

Thea. Yes. But I am not speaking of these only, but also of the others in the city.

Soc. Do I then understand the art of which you are speaking? For you appear to me to say it is not that, by which we know how to govern mowers, and grape-gatherers, and planters, and sowers, and threshers; for it is the husbandman's art, by which we govern these. Is it not?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. Nor are you speaking of that, by which (we govern) sawyers, and planers, and turners; for does not this belong to the carpenter's art?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. But perhaps you are speaking of that wisdom, by which we govern all these, and husbandmen, and carpenters, and all artificers skilled and unskilled, and men and women.

Thea. Of this wisdom, Socrates, I have for a long while ago been wishing to speak.

[5.] Soc. Can you say, that Ægisthus, who slew Agamemnon at Argos, had dominion over what you have mentioned, artificers skilled and unskilled, and men and women, all taken together, or over some other things?

Thea. No; but over these.

Soc. What then, did not Peleus, the son of Æacus, have dominion over those very kind of persons in Phthia?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. And you have heard that Periander, the son of Cypselus, was a ruler in Corinth.

Thea. Yes.

Soc. And did he not rule over the very kind of persons in his city?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. What then, do you not think that Archelaus,¹ the son of Perdiccas, who was lately² the ruler in Macedonia, had dominion over the same kind of persons?

Thea. I do.

Soc. And over whom do you think that Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, ruled in this city? was it not over these kind of persons?

Thea. How not?

Soc. Can you tell me then, what appellation Bacis,³ and the Sibyl,⁴ and our countryman Amphilytus,⁵ bore?

¹ Of this Archelaus mention is made in Gorg. p. 471, D.

² This "lately" refers to about five years previously.

³ Bacis was a prophet, who, long before the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, predicted what would happen. Some of his prophecies are given by Herodotus in viii. 20. He is likewise frequently mentioned by Aristophanes, and in company with Σίβυλλα in Eup. 1119, and 1116. ΔΑΚΙΣΣΑ.

⁴ From the fact of finding the same three oracle-chaunters similarly united by Themistius Or. iii. p. 46, A., where the Sibyl is called "the Erythrean," it has been inferred that the writer had read this dialogue amongst those ascribed to Plato.

⁵ Respecting Amphilytus see Wesseling and Valckenaer on Herod. i. 62

Thea. What else, Socrates, than oracle-chaunters?

Soc. You speak correctly. But endeavour to give me an answer as to what appellation Hippias and Periander bore through the same kind of dominion?

Thea. Tyrants, I think; for what else (could it be)?

Soc. Whoever then desires to have dominion over all the men together in the city, desires this very same dominion, the tyrannic, and to be a tyrant.

Thea. So it appears.

Soc. Do you then say that you desire this dominion?

Thea. It seems so from what I have said.

Soc. O you wicked (youth)! Do you desire to tyrannize over us? And have you for a long time blamed your father, because he did not send you to the school of some tyrant-teacher?¹ And are not you, Demodocus, ashamed of yourself? who, having known a long time ago what this youth desired, and having likewise the power of sending him, where you might have made him that skilful artist in wisdom, of which he is desirous, have, notwithstanding, begrudged him this, and are unwilling to send him? But now, you see—since he has spoken against you before me—let us consult in common, you and I, to whose school we may send him; and through associating with whom he may become a wise tyrant.

Dem. Let us, by Zeus, then, Socrates, consult; for it appears to me that there is need of no despicable counsel in this affair.

Soc. Permit us first, thou good man, to interrogate him sufficiently.

Dem. Interrogate him.

[6.] Soc. What then, Theages, if we should make use of Euripides?² For he some where says,

Tyrants are wise, by converse with the wise.

If then some one should ask Euripides—In what say you, Euripides, do tyrants become wise by the conversation of the wise? just as if he had said, ¹ In defence of διδασκάλου, which Schleiermacher, with whom Beck agreed, wished to expunge, Stalbaum refers to Lobeck's "Disputat. iii. de Nominibus Adjectivis et Substantivis Ambiguis," p. 12.

² This verse is elsewhere attributed to Sophocles in Ajac. Loc. Fr. but given to Euripides by Plato in Rep. viii. p. 568, A.

Farmers are wise, by converse with the wise—and we had asked him—In what are they wise? What would he have answered? Would he (reply that they are wise) in any thing else than in things pertaining to agriculture?

Thea. In nothing else but those.

Soc. But what, if he had said,

Cooks become wise, by converse with the wise—and we had asked him—In what are they wise? What would he have answered? Would it not have been—In things pertaining to cooking?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. Again, if he had said,

Wrestlers are wise, by converse with the wise—and we had asked him—In what are they wise? Would he not have said—In things pertaining to wrestling?

Thea. Yes.

Soc. But since he says,

Tyrants are wise, by converse with the wise—

upon our asking him—In what say you, Euripides, are they wise? What would be his answer?

Thea. By Zeus, I do not know.

Soc. Are you willing then for me to tell you?

Thea. If you are willing.

Soc. It is that, which Anacreon says Callicrété¹ knew. Or do you not know the song?

Thea. I do.

Soc. What then, do you also desire the conversation of a man, who happens to be a fellow-artist with Callicrété the daughter of Cyané, and who knows the art of a tyrant, as the poet says she did, in order that you may become a tyrant over us and the city?

¹ This was a virgin who employed herself in teaching politics, as Aspasia, Diotima, and some others, did after her. The verses of Anacreon alluded to are lost. DACIER. Ficinus has, "Callicratem." But that was the name of a man. Bergk in Anacreont. Relliq. p. 264, would read Καλλικρίτην and Καλλικρίτη, found in one MS. I should prefer Χαλικρήτην. For the word χαλικρήτη would mean "wine-mixed," an epithet better suited to the lady by whom Anacreon, the wine-drinker, was instructed. The epithet is applied to σπονδαί, "libations," in Æsch. Fragm. 158. On the other hand, Egeria, the Nymph by whom Numa was instructed, was a water-drinker, as may be inferred from Juvenal, who speaks of a fountain dedicated to her.

Thea. You have for some time, Socrates, been laughing at and playing with me.

Soc. What then, do you say that you do not desire this wisdom, by which you may rule over all the citizens? And doing this, would you be any thing else but a tyrant?

Thea. I would pray, indeed, I fancy, to be a tyrant over all men, or, if not of all, of the greatest part; and I think that you, and all other men, would do the same, and perhaps still more, to be a god.¹ But I did not say that I desired this.

[7.] Soc. But what then, after all, is this which you desire? Do you not say that you desire to rule over the citizens?

Thea. Not by violence, nor as tyrants do; but I desire to rule over the willing, in the same manner as other men of note in the city.

Soc. Do you mean, as Themistocles, and Pericles, and Cimon, and such as were skilled in state affairs?

Thea. By Zeus, I mean those.

Soc. What then, if you happened to be desirous of becoming wise in horsemanship, by going to whom do you think you would become a skilful horseman? would it be (by going) to others than those skilled in horses?

Thea. By Zeus, not I.

Soc. But (you would go) to those very men, who are skilled in these matters, and who possess horses, and who continually use both their own and many that are the property of others.

Thea. It is evident I should.

Soc. What then, if you wished to become wise in the throwing of darts, think you not that you would become skilled by going to those engaged in the art of dart-throwing, and who possess darts, and continually use many darts, both their own and those belonging to others?

Thea. It appears so to me.

Soc. Tell me then, since you wish to become wise in state affairs, think you that you will become wise by going to any others than those statesmen, who are skilled in state affairs themselves, and who continually make use of their own state and many others, and have an intercourse both with the Greek and Barbarian states? Or do you think, that by associating with certain other persons, but not with these, you will become wise in those things, in which they are wise?

¹ Theages here alludes to what Socrates was wont to say, that men should endeavour to become similar to the deity.

Thea. I have heard the discourses, Socrates, which persons say you have spoken,¹ how that the sons of those very statesmen were in no respect better than the sons of shoemakers: and you appear to me to have spoken most truly, from what I am able to perceive. I should be senseless then, if I thought that any one of these could impart to me his wisdom, when he could not in any respect benefit his own son; if indeed he were able on these points to benefit any person whatever.

Soc. What then, O best of men, would you do, if you had a son, who should give you trouble of this kind, and say that he desired to become a good painter, and blame you, his father, because you were not willing to expend money for the sake of these things, while he was despising painters, the artists in this very matter, and unwilling to learn from them; or if, being desirous to become a piper or harper, he should act in this manner towards pipers or harpers? In what way would you treat him, and whither would you send him, when thus unwilling to learn from those persons?

Thea. By Zeus, I (do not know).²

Soc. Now then, as you are doing these very things to your father, do you wonder at and blame him, if he is in doubt how he shall treat you, and whither send you? For we will place you with whomever of the Athenians you wish, the most skilled³ in state affairs, and who will be with you gratuitously;⁴ and at the same time you will not lose your money, and

² So Taylor, for the sake of the sense, in lieu of "By Zeus, not I."

³ Instead of καλῶν καὶ ἀγαθῶν, which are never, I suspect, thus united to an accusative, as δεινός and σοφός are, Ficinus has simply "præstantissimorum," adopted by Taylor; and though the expression in the text is repeated just below, yet there Ficinus has correctly merely "ex bonis." For Socrates could not be numbered amongst the καλοὶ, although he might be amongst the ἀγαθοὶ.

⁴ Stalbaum refers to Apolog. p. 19, E., § 4.

likewise be in greater repute with the many than by associating with any one else.

[8.] Thea. What then, Socrates, are not you one of the excellent men? For if you are willing to associate with me, it is sufficient, and I seek no other.¹

Soc. Why say you this, Theages?

Dem. He does not, Socrates, speak badly; and at the same time by doing this you will gratify me. Since there is nothing I should consider a greater piece of good luck than for my son to be pleased with your society, and for you to be willing to associate with him. And indeed I am ashamed to say how very much I wish it. I entreat both of you, therefore, you, Socrates, to be willing to associate with him, and you, my son, not to seek to associate with any other than Socrates; and you will thus release me from many and dreadful cares. For I now very much fear for him, lest he should meet with some other person able to corrupt him.

Thea. Do not, father, feel any longer any fear for me, if you can but persuade Socrates to permit me to associate with him.

Dem. You speak very well. And after this, the conversation, Socrates, will be directed to you. For I am ready, so to say in few words, to give up to you both me and mine, and the nearest related, whatever, in short, you may require, if you will take this youth to your bosom, and benefit him as far as you can.

[9.] Soc. O Demodocus, I do not wonder that you are so importunate, if you think that your son can be especially benefited by me. For I do not know any thing about which he, who is endued with intellect, ought to be more anxious, than how his son may become the best of men. But from whence it has appeared to you that I am more able to benefit your son towards his becoming a good citizen, than you are yourself, and from whence he has thought that I can benefit him more than you, I very much wonder. For, in the first place, you are older than I am; and in the next place, you have held many offices, and those the greatest among the Athenians; and you are honoured by the people of the Anagyrusian ward,² by much the most, and no less so by the rest of the city. ¹ But neither of you can see any one of these things in me; and next, if Theages here despises the society of statesmen, and seeks after certain others who profess themselves able to instruct young men, there is Prodicus of Ceos, and Gorgias the Leontine, and Polus the Agrigentine, and many others, who are so wise, that they go to cities and persuade the noblest and wealthiest of the young men, who are permitted to associate gratuitously with any one of the citizens they please,—they persuade, I say, these to give up those of their own city, and to associate with them, and to put down moreover a considerable sum² of money, and, as a remuneration, to give them thanks besides.¹ Of these, then, it is reasonable for your son and yourself to select some one; but (to select) me it is not reasonable; for I know none of that blessed and beautiful learning, although I wish I did; but I am always somehow asserting that I happen to know, I may say, nothing but a mere trifle relating to matters of love.³ But in that kind of learning I lay claim⁴ to being more skilled than any one man of the past or present time.

[10.] Thea. See you, father, how Socrates does not appear to me to be very willing to pass the time with me. For, as to myself, I am ready, if he is willing. But he says this, playing with us. For I know some of the same age with myself, and (others) a little older, who, before they associated with him, were worth nothing; but when they had been with him, in a very little time they appeared to be better than all, to whom they were previously inferior.

Soc. Do you know then, son of Demodocus, how this is?

Thea. Yes, by Zeus, I do; and that, if you are willing, I too shall be able to become such as they are.

Soc. Not so, thou excellent youth; but you are not con-

Stalbaum refers to Boeckh Inscript. Græc. No. 210, and Grotefend De Demis Attic. p. 18.

² Instead of πολλόν, Beck suggested πολὺ, obtained from "multum," in Ficinus.

³ Stalbaum refers to Sympos. p. 177, D. § 5, and Lys. p. 204, B. § 2.

⁴ Here ποιῶμαι is improperly used for προσποιῶμαι, as remarked by Stalbaum.

scious how this occurs; and I will tell you.¹ There is, by a divine allotment, a certain dæmon that has followed me, beginning from childhood. This is a voice, which, when it exists, always signifies to me the abandonment of what I am about to do; but it never at any time incites me. And, if any one of my friends communicates any thing to me, and there is the voice, it dissuades me from that very thing, and it does not suffer me to do it. Of this I will produce you witnesses. You know the beautiful Charmides, the son of Glauco. He once happened to communicate to me that he was about to contend for the stadium² at Nemea; and immediately, on his beginning to say, that he meant to contend, there was the voice. And I forbade him, and said, While you were speaking to me, there was the voice of the dæmon; do not, therefore, contend. Perhaps, said he, the voice signified to you, that I should not conquer; but, though I should not be victorious, yet, by exercising myself at this time, I shall be benefited. Having thus spoken, he engaged in the contest. It is worth while, therefore, to inquire of him, what happened to him after this very act of contending. And if you are willing to inquire of Clitomachus, the brother of Timarchus,³ what Timarchus said to him, when, being about to die, ⁴he went right against the dæmon,⁴ both he and Euathlus, the runner in the stadium, who received Timarchus when he was an exile, will tell you what he then said.

Thea. What did he say?

Soc. O Clitomachus, said he, I indeed am now going to die, because I was unwilling to be persuaded by Socrates.

² The stadium was the course appointed for those who contended in the foot-race, as shown by an Æsopo-Socratic fable, quoted by Galen in Protrept. § 13.

³ I suppose this is Timarchus of Chæronæa, who desired to be interred near one of the sons of Socrates, who had died a little before. I could never find any vestige of this history elsewhere. DACIER. Nor has any one since his day been more fortunate.

⁴ The Greek is ἐὐθὺ τοῦ δαίμονιον: which Ficinus has omitted, either from his not understanding those words, or not finding them in his MS. Serranus—"adversus dæmonii mandatum"—of which Ruhnken approves on Timæus, p. 127. But ἐὐθὺ is never said of a single person; only of a place, or many persons. Stalbaum, in ed. 1, correctly observes, that there is some error here.

But why Timarches said this, I will tell you. When Timarches rose from the banquet, together with Philemon the son of Philemonides, with the view of murdering Nicias the son of Hierocomander, they two alone were cognizant of the plot; and Timarches, as he rose, said to me, What do you say,¹ Socrates? Do you continue drinking; but I must rise up (and go) some where. I will, however, return shortly, if I am successful. And there was the voice. And I said to him, By no means, said I, rise up; for there has been to me the usual daemon signal. Upon this he stayed. And after a slight interval, he was again going away, and said—Socrates, I am going. And there was again the voice. Again, therefore, I compelled him to stay. The third time, wishing to escape me unnoticed, he rose up without saying any thing to me, and escaped unnoticed, having watched me, while I had my attention otherwise engaged; and thus departing he perpetrated the acts, through which he went away about to die. Hence he told his brother, what I have now told you, that he was going to die, through his not believing in me. Further still, you will hear from many respecting the events in Sicily, what I said concerning the destruction of the army.² And the things that are past, you may hear from those that know them; but you may now make trial of the daemon signal, if it says any thing to the purpose. For on the departure of Sannio the beautiful³ for the army, there came to me the signal; and he is now gone with Thrasyllus,⁴ to carry on the campaign right through Ephesus and Ionia. And I think

² By comparing this account with that in Thucyd. viii. 1, it would seem that Socrates proved his daemon to be a truer prophet than were the oracle-chaunters, who predicted that the Athenians would gain possession of the whole of Sicily.

that he will either die, or that he will meet with an end¹ something near to it. And I very much fear for the rest of the enterprise. [12.] All these things have I said to you, because this power of this dæmon is able to effect every thing with respect to the intercourse of those, who pass their time with me. For it is opposed to many; and it is not possible for those to be benefited by passing their time with me, so that it is not possible for me to live with them. With many, however, it does not prevent me from conversing; and yet they are not at all benefited by being with me. But they, whom the power of the dæmon assists to the intercourse, are those whom you have noticed; for in a short time they make a proficiency. And of those, who make a proficiency, some have the benefit firm and lasting; but many, as long as they are with me, advance in a wonderful manner; but when they separate themselves from me, they again differ in no respect from any person whatever. This did Aristides, the son of Lysimachus and grandson of Aristides, suffer; for, while passing his time with me, he made a very great proficiency in a short period; but afterwards an expedition took place, and he went away, sailing with it. On his return he found Thucydides,² the son of Melesias and grandson of Thucydides, passing his time with me. Now this Thucydides, the day before, had felt some ill against me during a conversation. Aristides, therefore, after he had seen and saluted me, and other matters had been talked of, observed—I hear, Socrates, that Thucydides thinks highly of himself, on some points, and is angry with you, as if he were really something. It is so, said I. What then, said he, does he not know what a slave³ he was before he associated with you? By the gods, said I, it does not seem that he does. But I too, said he, am in a ridiculous situation, Socrates. What is it? said I. It is, said he, that, before I sailed away, I was able to converse with any man whatever, and not to appear inferior to any one in argument, so that I sought the society of men the most elegant; but now, on the contrary, I shun any one, whom I perceive to be instructed, so ashamed am I of my own littleness. But, said I, whether did this power leave you suddenly or by degrees? By degrees, he replied. When was it present with you, said I? Was it present while you were learning something from me, or was it in some other way? I will tell you, said he, Socrates, a thing incredible indeed, by the gods, but true. I never, at any time, learnt any thing from you, as you know. I made, however, a proficiency when I associated with you, even if I was only in the same house, though not in the same room; but more so when I was in the same room with you; and I seemed to myself (to improve) much more when, being in the same room, I looked at you, when you were speaking, than when I looked another way. But I made by far the greatest proficiency, when I sat near you and touched you.¹ Now, however, said he, all that habit has entirely oozed away. [13.] Of such kind then is, Theages, the intercourse with myself; for, if it is pleasing to the god, you will make a very great and rapid proficiency; but if not, not. See, then, whether it is not safer for you to be instructed by some one of those, who have a power over the benefit, with which they benefit men, than by me, who (have the power) to do only whatever may happen.

¹ In lieu of ἔλqν, which is never found in prose Greek, the two oldest MSS. offer γελαν, from which it is easy to elicit τελεῖν, the Attic future for τελέσειν.

² Both Aristides and Thucydides are alluded to in Lach. p. 179, A. § 2, as being the unworthy/scions of a virtuous stock.

Thea. It appears to me, Socrates, that we should act in this manner, namely, to make a trial of this dæmon by associating together. And, if he is favourable to us, this will be the best; but if not, then let us immediately consult what we shall do, whether we shall associate with some other person, or endeavour to appease the divine power, that is present with you, by prayers and sacrifices, or any other method that the diviners may explain.²

Dem. Do not, Socrates, oppose the lad any longer on these points; for Theages speaks well.

Soc. If it appears proper so to act, let us act so.

² On the technical word ἐξηγεῖσθαι, "to explain a religious rite," see Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 111.

INTRODUCTION TO THE RIVALS.

THIS is another of the dialogues considered to be spurious by the generality of modern scholars; and even with Thrasyllus, who lived in the time of Augustus, its genuineness was a matter of doubt, as we learn from Diogenes Laertius ix. 37. Sydenham, however, was so impressed with the conviction of its being really the production of its reputed author, as to remark, that although the dialogue is short, it is nevertheless of considerable value, and exhibits "a fair sample of the rich and plentiful repast provided by Plato in his longer productions; and it has this singular beauty, that the figures of the persons brought forwards are sketched in so exact and lively a manner, that painting itself could scarcely surpass it." On the other hand Stalbaum asserts, while confessing that it exhibits a style of writing at once so pure, chaste, and elegant, as to put it on a par with the writings of Plato and Xenophon, that its matter is such as fully to justify its repudiation by Boeckh, Schleiermacher, Ast, and others; while as regards the notion that Democritus was perhaps one of the anonymous persons alluded to in the dialogue, Stalbaum says it is too absurd to be entertained for a single moment. For he doubtless remembered, although he says nothing to that effect, that, according to Diogenes Laertius, Demetrius Phalereus had denied that Democritus ever visited Athens.

The title of the dialogue is generally 'Ἐρασταί, "the Lovers;" and so it is quoted by Olympiodorus. But Proclus calls it 'Ἀντερασταί, "the Rival Lovers;" and this is the name it ought to bear, as shown by the testimony of competent witnesses, produced by Menage on Diog. L. iii. 5, and his decision has been adopted by all subsequent scholars.

The object of the dialogue is to show, that they, who profess to know just so much of difficult arts and sciences as is suited to a person of liberal education, possess that very kind of knowledge, which to all practical purposes is perfectly useless.

The most recent English translation of this dialogue, as far as I know, is to be found in an anonymous work, published at London in 1827, under the title of "A Narrative of an Excursion from Corfu to Smyrna." Like Shelley, in the case of the Banquet and the Ion, the author has been more anxious to give an elegant than a close translation.

THE RIVALS.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES, AND TWO ANONYMOUS RIVALS.

SOCRATES.

[1.] I ENTERED the school of Dionysius,¹ the teacher of grammar,² and I saw there those of the young men, who were deemed to be the most remarkable for their personal appearance and the good repute of their fathers, and their admirers likewise. Two of the youths happened to be disputing, but about what I did not very well hear. They appeared however to be disputing about Anaxagoras,³ or Cænopides;⁴ as ¹ This person, according to Diog. L. iii. 5, had been Plato's grammar-master.

² The reading γραμματιστοῦ in lieu of γραμματικοῦ, first adopted by Forster from a single MS., has been subsequently found in all. By γραμματικός was meant "a critical grammarian," not merely "a teacher of the elements of grammar," in Greek γραμματιστής, respecting whose office Knebel refers to Protag. p. 325, E.

³ Respecting Anaxagoras, the reader may consult Diogenes Laertius, Stanley's History of Philosophy, and similar classical works.

⁴ Of this Cænopides, Proclus, on Euclid. ii. p. 19. 78 and 87, has made mention, when giving a brief sketch of the rise and progress of geometry. He says that Anaxagoras touched on many questions relating to geometry, and so did Cænopides of Chios; both of whom Plato has mentioned in the Rivals, as having obtained a reputation for learning. After them Hippocrates of Chios, who discovered the squaring of the meniscus, and Theodorus of Cyréné, who was somewhat junior to Anaxagoras, became they were describing⁵ circles, and imitating by their hands certain inclinations,⁶ with great earnestness. And I, for I was sitting near an admirer of one of the young persons, nudged him with my elbow, and asked—On what were the two youths so earnestly engaged? and I said, Surely it is a subject important and beautiful, on which they have bestowed so serious an attention.—What call you⁷ important and beautiful? said he. They are prating⁸ about things above in the sky, and trifling away their time in philosophizing.—And I, in wonder at such an answer, said—Do you think it, young man, to be a disgraceful thing to philosophize? or why do you speak so harshly?—But another person,⁹ who was a rival admirer (of the youths), and happened to be sitting near, on hearing me asking the question, and the answer, said—It is not for you,¹⁰ Socrates, to ask this man, whether he thinks it disgraceful to philosophize. Know you not that he has spent all his time in being throstled,¹¹ and cramming conspicuous for their knowledge of the same science; for the squaring of the meniscus is attributed to Hippocrates of Chios, by Simplicius, (on Aristot. Phys. fol. 12,) who has shown how it is to be done geometrically. But as no mention is made of Theodorus by name in this dialogue, Proclus (according to Sydenham) imagined that Theodorus was one of the nameless Rivals.

⁵ To avoid the repetition of ἐφαινέσθην, Heusde proposed to read κύκλους γοῦν γράφοντες σφαίρας, similar to “circulos describentes et inflexiones” in Ficinus, who omits ἐφαινέσθην.

⁷ To avoid the pleonasm in εἶπε and εἶφη, Sydenham suggested ὄψς; but where ποῖον is thus used to express surprise, a verb is rarely found, as shown by the mass of passages quoted by Reisig in Conjectan. p. 74; and though εἶφη is thus inserted after ποῖον in Euthyd. p. 304, E., yet there εἶπε is not added likewise.

⁸ On ἀδολεσχῆν and μετεώρων, see the commentators on Aristoph. Νεφ. 188, Plato Phædon. p. 70, C., Phædr. p. 270, A., Cratyl. p. 401, B., Rep. vi. p. 488, C., and Xenoph. M. S. i. 2, 31.

⁹ According to Diogenes Laert. ix. 37, Thrasyllus fancied this person to be Democritus, the philosopher of Abdera. See in § 2, n. 21 and 29.

¹⁰ In the formula πρὸς σοῦ, the verb ποιεῖς is not elsewhere found. I have therefore omitted it. Ficinus has correctly “Non expedit tibi.”

himself, and sleeping?¹² so that what other answer think you he would give, but that it is disgraceful to philosophize?—Now this person had employed his whole time in mental cultivation,¹³ but the other, whom he abused, in bodily exercises. It seemed then to me that I ought to dismiss the one, who had been interrogated,¹⁴ for he did not pretend even to be skilled in words, but in deeds; and to interrogate thoroughly the other, who pretended to be rather clever, in order that I might, if I could, be benefited by him¹⁵ in knowledge. I said therefore to him, that I had proposed my question in common for all; but if you think¹⁶ you will give a better answer, I put the same question to you as I did to him, Whether you think it honourable to philosophize or not?—Just as we were conversing thus, the two youths, overhearing us, became silent; and ceasing from the dispute, became listeners. Now, what their admirers suffered, I know not; but I was struck with astonishment. For I am always struck so in the case of the young and handsome. One of them, however, seemed to me in no less an agony than myself; and he answered with the air of a person eager for honour.—Should I ever,¹⁷ Socrates, said he, consider it disgraceful to philosophize, I should no longer deem myself a human being; nor, indeed, any one else, so disposed, pointing to his Rival, and speaking with a loud¹⁸ voice, so that the objects of their admiration might hear.—To you, then, said I, it seems honourable to philosophize.—Most highly, replied he.—[2.] What then, said

¹² Plutarch, in Philopœmenes, i. p. 375, C. § 3, and Galen to Thrasybul. c. 37, quoted respectively by Sydenham and Forster, give a similar account of the life of prize-fighters.

¹³ According to Plato, in Rep. ii. p. 246, and Legg. x. p. 795, education was divided into two parts, bodily, γυμναστική, and mental, μουσική. FORSTER.

¹⁴ In lieu of ἐρωόμενον or ἐρώμενον, found subsequently in many MSS., Mudge suggested ἐρωμίονον, but Schleiermacher ἐρωτώμενον, from "quem prius interrogaveram," in Ficinus.

¹⁵ Compare Hipp. Minor, § 12.

¹⁶ Here is a transition from the narrative to the dramatic style. S. There is a remarkable instance of a similar transition in Xenophon in Anab. i. 9. 25.

¹⁷ Instead of ὁ πόρε, Ficinus found in his MS. εἶπορε, answering to his version, "si quando."

¹⁸ Stutzmann was the first to suggest μεγάλη, subsequently found in the four best MSS. Stalbaum, however, is content with μέγα, supported by τῇ φωνῇ μέγα λέγων, in Protag. p. 310, B.

I; does it seem to you possible for a man to know any thing whatever, whether it is disgraceful or honourable, who does not know at all what that thing is?—No, said he.—Know you then, said I, what it is to philosophize?—Perfectly, said he.—What is it then? said I.—What else, (said he,) than according to the sentiment of Solon? For Solon says somewhere,¹⁹

Even as I grow old, still much I learn.

And it appears to me that the man, who would philosophize, ought to be always learning some one thing at least, when he is either young or old, in order that he may during life learn the greatest number of things.—At first it seemed to me that he had said something to the purpose; but afterwards, on thinking thrice,²⁰ I asked him, whether he considered philosophy to be much learning?—Completely so,²¹ said he.—And do you consider, said I, that philosophy is only honourable? or good likewise?—It is likewise very good, said he.—Do you perceive this to be something peculiar to philosophy? or does it seem to you to be the case in other things likewise? For instance, do you consider a love of gymnastic exercises to be not only honourable but good likewise, or not?—To this²² he said very ironically two things.²³ To this man let it be said, that it is neither; but to you, Socrates, I acknowledge it to be both honourable and good.—(I then asked him), Do you think that in these exercises the undergoing much toil is a love of exercise?—By all means, said he; just as in philosophizing, I consider that much learning is philosophy.—Do you think then, said I, that the lovers of those exercises desire any thing else than that, which will cause the body to be in a good state?—That very thing, he replied.—Do then, said I, many la-

¹⁹ The same verse is quoted in Lach. p. 188, B., and Rep. vii. p. 536, B.

²⁰ Instead of πρὸς, one MS. has περ. The two seem to lead to τρίς: for thus "tris" is used by Virgil in Æn. i. 109, "Tris Notus—torquet—tris Eurus—urget:" and τρίς in Æsch. S. Th. 727.

bours, cause the body to be in a good state?—Certainly, said he; for how should a person have, from little labour, his body in a good state?—Here I thought it best to call²³ upon the lover of gymnastics, in order that he might assist me through his knowledge of the gymnastic art. And I asked him, Why are you silent, O best of men, while this person is talking thus? Or to you likewise do persons seem to have their bodies in a good state from much labour or little?—²⁴ For my part, Socrates, said he, I thought he had known²⁵ the saying,²⁴ that moderate labour is best for the body.²⁶—²⁷ How so? (said I).—(I speak) not of a man²⁷ sleepless, and foodless, and having his neck not worn down²⁸ and attenuated by care.²⁹ On his saying this the youths were delighted, and burst into a laugh; but the other party blushed.—I then said, What then,

²³ So Sydenham. Ficinus has—"provocandus"—as if he found in his MS. κληρίος, in lieu of κνηρίος: on which see Heind. at Lys. p. 225, A.

²⁴—²⁴ Ficinus has merely "Equidem, O Socrates, asserere ausim—" For his MS. was either deficient; or else he saw that there was nothing in the shape of a proverb, to which the phrase τὸ λεγόμενον δὴ could be referred. Accordingly Knebel would supply τὸ μηδὲν ἄγαν, to which Plato alludes in Menex. p. 247, E. § 20, and Protag. p. 343, B. 82.

²⁵ After τοῦτο Schleiermacher would insert τοῦτον—But the disease is seated somewhat deeper.

²⁶ Cornarius quotes opportunely Hippocrates on Epidem. vi. 6, πόνος, σιτία, ποτά, ὕπνος, ἀποδίσια, πάντα μέτρια.

²⁷—²⁷ The Greek is, πόθεν δὴ; οὐχὶ ἄνδρα γε—Ficinus has, "Unde? inquam; non virum vigilantem dico—" as if he had found in his MS. πόθεν, ἣν δ' ἐγὼ; οὐχὶ ἄνδρα λέγω ἀγρυπνον—Forster, whom Sydenham follows, would insert ὁρᾶς after οὐχὶ—Heusde however, who says that the whole passage is wretchedly corrupt, would read—πόθεν δὲ οὐχὶ; ἄνδρα—εὐστραβῇ. But εὐστραβῆς is found no where else in Greek; nor in the formula πόθεν, used either by itself or with οὐ in a negative sense, do we meet with οὐχὶ. Schleiermacher prefers, ΣΩΚ. πόθεν δ' οὐχὶ οἱ πολλοί; Ἄνδρα γε—whom Beck follows in part. But the whole passage still requires correction.

²⁸ All the MSS. but one offer ἀτριβῇ in lieu of ἀστραβῇ. Ficinus has—"insuetam spinam habentem"—from which it is difficult to discover what he found in his MS. Stalbaum translates ἀτριβῇ τὸν τράχηλον ἔχοντα by "collum nullis pugnīs committentem."

by much the most, and no less so by the rest of the city. ¹ But neither of you can see any one of these things in me; and next, if Theages here despises the society of statesmen, and seeks after certain others who profess themselves able to instruct young men, there is Prodicus of Ceos, and Gorgias the Leontine, and Polus the Agrigentine, and many others, who are so wise, that they go to cities and persuade the noblest and wealthiest of the young men, who are permitted to associate gratuitously with any one of the citizens they please,—they persuade, I say, these to give up those of their own city, and to associate with them, and to put down moreover a considerable sum² of money, and, as a remuneration, to give them thanks besides.¹ Of these, then, it is reasonable for your son and yourself to select some one; but (to select) me it is not reasonable; for I know none of that blessed and beautiful learning, although I wish I did; but I am always somehow asserting that I happen to know, I may say, nothing but a mere trifle relating to matters of love.³ But in that kind of learning I lay claim⁴ to being more skilled than any one man of the past or present time.

[10.] Thea. See you, father, how Socrates does not appear to me to be very willing to pass the time with me. For, as to myself, I am ready, if he is willing. But he says this, playing with us. For I know some of the same age with myself, and (others) a little older, who, before they associated with him, were worth nothing; but when they had been with him, in a very little time they appeared to be better than all, to whom they were previously inferior.

Soc. Do you know then, son of Demodocus, how this is?

Thea. Yes, by Zeus, I do; and that, if you are willing, I too shall be able to become such as they are.

Soc. Not so, thou excellent youth; but you are not con-

Stalbaum refers to Boeckh Inscript. Græc. No. 210, and Grotefend De Demis Attic. p. 18.

¹—The whole of this, says Stalbaum, has been taken almost verbatim from Apolog. p. 19, E. § 4.

² Instead of πολὺν, Beck suggested πολὺ, obtained from "multum," in Ficinus.

³ Stalbaum refers to Sympos. p. 177, D. § 5, and Lys. p. 204, B. § 2.

⁴ Here ποιούμεαι is improperly used for προσποιούμεαι, as remarked by Stalbaum.

scious how this occurs; and I will tell you.¹ There is, by a divine allotment, a certain dæmon that has followed me, beginning from childhood. This is a voice, which, when it exists, always signifies to me the abandonment of what I am about to do; but it never at any time incites me. And, if any one of my friends communicates any thing to me, and there is the voice, it dissuades me from that very thing, and it does not suffer me to do it. Of this I will produce you witnesses. You know the beautiful Charmides, the son of Glauco. He once happened to communicate to me that he was about to contend for the stadium² at Nemea; and immediately, on his beginning to say, that he meant to contend, there was the voice. And I forbade him, and said, While you were speaking to me, there was the voice of the dæmon; do not, therefore, contend. Perhaps, said he, the voice signified to you, that I should not conquer; but, though I should not be victorious, yet, by exercising myself at this time, I shall be benefited. Having thus spoken, he engaged in the contest. It is worth while, therefore, to inquire of him, what happened to him after this very act of contending. And if you are willing to inquire of Clitomachus, the brother of Timarchus,³ what Timarchus said to him, when, being about to die, ⁴he went right against the dæmon,⁴ both he and Euathlus, the runner in the stadium, who received Timarchus when he was an exile, will tell you what he then said.

Thea. What did he say?

Soc. O Clitomachus, said he, I indeed am now going to die, because I was unwilling to be persuaded by Socrates.

² The stadium was the course appointed for those who contended in the foot-race, as shown by an Æsopo-Socratic fable, quoted by Galen in Protrept. § 13.

³ I suppose this is Timarchus of Chæronæa, who desired to be interred near one of the sons of Socrates, who had died a little before. I could never find any vestige of this history elsewhere. DACIER. Nor has any one since his day been more fortunate.

⁴—⁴ The Greek is εὐθὺ τοῦ δαίμονιου: which Ficinus has omitted, either from his not understanding those words, or not finding them in his MS. Serranus—"adversus dæmonii mandatum"—of which Ruhnen approves on Timæus, p. 127. But εὐθὺ is never said of a single person; only of a place, or many persons. Stalbaum, in ed. 1, correctly observes, that there is some error here.

But why Timarchus said this, I will tell you. When Timarchus rose from the banquet, together with Philemon the son of Philemonides, with the view of murdering Nicias the son of Heroscomander, they two alone were cognizant of the plot; and Timarchus, as he rose, said to me, What do you say,¹ Socrates? Do you continue drinking; but I must rise up (and go) some where. I will, however, return shortly, if I am successful. And there was the voice. And I said to him, By no means, said I, rise up; for there has been to me the usual dæmon signal. Upon this he stayed. And after a slight interval, he was again going away, and said—Socrates, I am going. And there was again the voice. Again, therefore, I compelled him to stay. The third time, wishing to escape me unnoticed, he rose up without saying any thing to me, and escaped unnoticed, having watched me, while I had my attention otherwise engaged; and thus departing he perpetrated the acts, through which he went away about to die. Hence he told his brother, what I have now told you, that he was going to die, through his not believing in me. Further still, you will hear from many respecting the events in Sicily, what I said concerning the destruction of the army.² And the things that are past, you may hear from those that know them; but you may now make trial of the dæmon signal, if it says any thing to the purpose. For on the departure of Sannio the beautiful³ for the army, there came to me the signal; and he is now gone with Thrasyllus,⁴ to carry on the campaign right through Ephesus and Ionia. And I think ¹ As no mention is made of a previous conversation, it is not easy to understand τί λέγεις.

² By comparing this account with that in Thucyd. viii. 1, it would seem that Socrates proved his dæmon to be a truer prophet than were the oracle-chaunters, who predicted that the Athenians would gain possession of the whole of Sicily.

that he will either die, or that he will meet with an end¹ something near to it. And I very much fear for the rest of the enterprise. [12.] All these things have I said to you, because this power of this dæmon is able to effect every thing with respect to the intercourse of those, who pass their time with me. For it is opposed to many; and it is not possible for those to be benefited by passing their time with me, so that it is not possible for me to live with them. With many, however, it does not prevent me from conversing; and yet they are not at all benefited by being with me. But they, whom the power of the dæmon assists to the intercourse, are those whom you have noticed; for in a short time they make a proficiency. And of those, who make a proficiency, some have the benefit firm and lasting; but many, as long as they are with me, advance in a wonderful manner; but when they separate themselves from me, they again differ in no respect from any person whatever. This did Aristides, the son of Lysimachus and grandson of Aristides, suffer; for, while passing his time with me, he made a very great proficiency in a short period; but afterwards an expedition took place, and he went away, sailing with it. On his return he found Thucydides,² the son of Melesias and grandson of Thucydides, passing his time with me. Now this Thucydides, the day before, had felt some ill against me during a conversation. Aristides, therefore, after he had seen and saluted me, and other matters had been talked of, observed—I hear, Socrates, that Thucydides thinks highly of himself, on some points, and is angry with you, as if he were really something. It is so, said I. What then, said he, does he not know what a slave³ he was before he associated with you? By the gods, said I, it does not seem that he does. But I too, said he, am in a ridiculous situation, Socrates. What is it? said I. It is, said he, that, before I sailed away, I was able to converse with any man whatever, and not to appear inferior to any one in argument, so that I sought the society of men the most elegant; but now, on the contrary, I shun any one, whom I perceive to be instructed, so ashamed am I of my own littleness. But, said I, whether did this power leave you suddenly or by degrees? By degrees, he replied. When was it present with you, said I? Was it present while you were learning something from me, or was it in some other way? I will tell you, said he, Socrates, a thing incredible indeed, by the gods, but true. I never, at any time, learnt any thing from you, as you know. I made, however, a proficiency when I associated with you, even if I was only in the same house, though not in the same room; but more so when I was in the same room with you; and I seemed to myself (to improve) much more when, being in the same room, I looked at you, when you were speaking, than when I looked another way. But I made by far the greatest proficiency, when I sat near you and touched you.¹ Now, however, said he, all that habit has entirely oozed away. [13.] Of such kind then is, Theages, the intercourse with myself; for, if it is pleasing to the god, you will make a very great and rapid proficiency; but if not, not. See, then, whether it is not safer for you to be instructed by some one of those, who have a power over the benefit, with which they benefit men, than by me, who (have the power) to do only whatever may happen.

¹ In lieu of ἔλκειν, which is never found in prose Greek, the two oldest MSS. offer γελαν, from which it is easy to elicit τελεῖν, the Attic future for τελίσκειν.

² Both Aristides and Thucydides are alluded to in Lach. p. 179, A. § 2, as being the unworthy scions of a virtuous stock.

Thea. It appears to me, Socrates, that we should act in this manner, namely, to make a trial of this dæmon by associating together. And, if he is favourable to us, this will be the best; but if not, then let us immediately consult what we shall do, whether we shall associate with some other person, or endeavour to appease the divine power, that is present with you, by prayers and sacrifices, or any other method that the diviners may explain.²

Dem. Do not, Socrates, oppose the lad any longer on these points; for Theages speaks well.

Soc. If it appears proper so to act, let us act so.

INTRODUCTION TO THE RIVALS.

THIS is another of the dialogues considered to be spurious by the generality of modern scholars; and even with Thrasyllus, who lived in the time of Augustus, its genuineness was a matter of doubt, as we learn from Diogenes Laertius ix. 37. Sydenham, however, was so impressed with the conviction of its being really the production of its reputed author, as to remark, that although the dialogue is short, it is nevertheless of considerable value, and exhibits "a fair sample of the rich and plentiful repast provided by Plato in his longer productions; and it has this singular beauty, that the figures of the persons brought forwards are sketched in so exact and lively a manner, that painting itself could scarcely surpass it." On the other hand Stalbaum asserts, while confessing that it exhibits a style of writing at once so pure, chaste, and elegant, as to put it on a par with the writings of Plato and Xenophon, that its matter is such as fully to justify its repudiation by Boeckh, Schleiermacher, Ast, and others; while as regards the notion that Democritus was perhaps one of the anonymous persons alluded to in the dialogue, Stalbaum says it is too absurd to be entertained for a single moment. For he doubtless remembered, although he says nothing to that effect, that, according to Diogenes Laertius, Demetrius Phalereus had denied that Democritus ever visited Athens.

The title of the dialogue is generally 'Ερασαι, "the Lovers:" and so it is quoted by Olympiodorus. But Proclus calls it 'Αντε-ρασαι, "the Rival Lovers;" and this is the name it ought to bear, as shown by the testimony of competent witnesses, produced by Menage on Diog. L. iii. 5, and his decision has been adopted by all subsequent scholars.

they were describing⁵ circles, and imitating by their hands certain inclinations,⁶ with great earnestness. And I, for I was sitting near an admirer of one of the young persons, nudged him with my elbow, and asked—On what were the two youths so earnestly engaged? and I said, Surely it is a subject important and beautiful, on which they have bestowed so serious an attention.—What call you⁷ important and beautiful? said he. They are prating⁸ about things above in the sky, and trifling away their time in philosophizing.—And I, in wonder at such an answer, said—Do you think it, young man, to be a disgraceful thing to philosophize? or why do you speak so harshly?—But another person,⁹ who was a rival admirer (of the youths), and happened to be sitting near, on hearing me asking the question, and the answer, said—It is not for you,¹⁰ Socrates, to ask this man, whether he thinks it disgraceful to philosophize. Know you not that he has spent all his time in being throsted,¹¹ and cramming conspicuous for their knowledge of the same science; for the squaring of the meniscus is attributed to Hippocrates of Chios, by Simplicius, (on Aristot. Phys. fol. 12,) who has shown how it is to be done geometrically. But as no mention is made of Theodorus by name in this dialogue, Proclus (according to Sydenham) imagined that Theodorus was one of the nameless Rivals.

⁵ To avoid the repetition of φαινίσθην, Heusde proposed to read κύκλους γοῦν γράφοντες σφαίρας, similar to “circulos describentes et inflexiones” in Ficinus, who omits φαινίσθην.

⁶ Forster shows, from Diodorus i. § 98, that Cænopides had learnt in Egypt that τὸν ἡλιακὸν κύκλον λοξὴν ἔχειν τὴν πορείαν; and that Anaxagoras knew of the inclination of the poles of the earth.

⁷ To avoid the pleonasm in εἶπε and ἔφη, Sydenham suggested φῆς; but where ποῖον is thus used to express surprise, a verb is rarely found, as shown by the mass of passages quoted by Reisig in Conjectan. p. 74; and though ἔφη is thus inserted after ποῖον in Euthyd. p. 304, E., yet there εἶπε is not added likewise.

⁹ According to Diogenes Laert. ix. 37, Thrasyllus fancied this person to be Democritus, the philosopher of Abdera. See in § 2, n. 21 and 29.

¹⁰ In the formula πρὸς σοῦ, the verb ποιεῖς is not elsewhere found. I have therefore omitted it. Ficinus has correctly “Non expedit tibi.”

¹¹ On the verb τραχηλίζεσθαι, as applied to wrestlers, Sydenham refers to Lucian's Anacharsis; Stutzmann adds Plutarch in Anton. i. p. 97, B. § 33, διαλαμβάνων τοὺς νεανίσκους ἐτραχήλιζε; and Diog. Laert., ὑπὸ τοῦ τυχόντος κορασίου τραχηλίζεται, quoted by Stephens in Thea. L. Gr.

¹⁷ Instead of ὅποτε, Ficinus found in his MS. εἴποτε, answering to his version, “si quando.”

¹⁸ Stutzmann was the first to suggest μεγάλῃ, subsequently found in the four best MSS. Stalbaum, however, is content with μέγα, supported by τῇ φωνῇ μέγα λέγων, in Protag. p. 310, B.

I; does it seem to you possible for a man to know any thing whatever, whether it is disgraceful or honourable, who does not know at all what that thing is?—No, said he.—Know you then, said I, what it is to philosophize?—Perfectly, said he.—What is it then? said I.—What else, (said he,) than according to the sentiment of Solon? For Solon says some where,¹⁹

Even as I grow old, still much I learn.

And it appears to me that the man, who would philosophize, ought to be always learning some one thing at least, when he is either young or old, in order that he may during life learn the greatest number of things.—At first it seemed to me that he had said something to the purpose; but afterwards, on thinking thrice,²⁰ I asked him, whether he considered philosophy to be much learning?—Completely so,²¹ said he.—And do you consider, said I, that philosophy is only honourable? or good likewise?—It is likewise very good, said he.—Do you perceive this to be something peculiar to philosophy? or does it seem to you to be the case in other things likewise? For instance, do you consider a love of gymnastic exercises to be not only honourable but good likewise, or not?—To this²² he said very ironically two things.²³ To this man let it be said, that it is neither; but to you, Socrates, I acknowledge it to be both honourable and good.—(I then asked him), Do you think that in these exercises the undergoing much toil is a love of exercise?—By all means, said he; just as in philosophizing, I consider that much learning is philosophy.—Do you think then, said I, that the lovers of those exercises desire any thing else than that, which will cause the body to be in a good state?—That very thing, he replied.—Do then, said I, many la-

¹⁹ The same verse is quoted in Lach. p. 188, B., and Rep. vii. p. 536, B.

²⁰ Instead of τρις, one MS. has τετ. The two seem to lead to τρις: for thus "tris" is used by Virgil in Æn. i. 109, "Tris Notus—torquet—tris Eurus—urget:" and τρις in Æsch. S. Th. 727.

bours, cause the body to be in a good state?—Certainly, said he; for how should a person have, from little labour, his body in a good state?—Here I thought it best to call²³ upon the lover of gymnastics, in order that he might assist me through his knowledge of the gymnastic art. And I asked him, Why are you silent, O best of men, while this person is talking thus? Or to you likewise do persons seem to have their bodies in a good state from much labour or little?—²⁴ For my part, Socrates, said he, I thought he had known²⁵ the saying,²⁴ that moderate labour is best for the body.²⁶—²⁷ How so? (said I).—(I speak) not of a man²⁷ sleepless, and foodless, and having his neck not worn down²⁸ and attenuated by care.²⁹ On his saying this the youths were delighted, and burst into a laugh; but the other party blushed.—I then said, What then,

²³ So Sydenham. Ficinus has—"provocandus"—as if he found in his MS. αλητιος, in lieu of κνητιος: on which see Heind. at Lys. p. 225, A.

²⁴⁻²⁶ Ficinus has merely "Equidem, O Socrates, asserere ausim—" For his MS. was either deficient; or else he saw that there was nothing in the shape of a proverb, to which the phrase τὸ λεγόμενον δὴ could be referred. Accordingly Knebel would supply τὸ μὴδὲν ἄγαν, to which Plato alludes in Menex. p. 247, E. § 20, and Protag. p. 343, B. 82.

²⁵ After τοῦτο Schleiermacher would insert τοῦτον—But the disease is seated somewhat deeper.

²⁶ Cornarius quotes opportunely Hippocrates on Epidem. vi. 6, πόνος, σιτία, ποτὶς, ὕπνος, ἀφροδίσια, πάντα μέτρια.

²⁷⁻²⁹ The Greek is, πόθεν δὴ; οὐχὶ ἄνδρα γε—Ficinus has, "Unde? inquam; non virum vigilantem dico—" as if he had found in his MS. πόθεν, ἣν δ' ἐγὼ; οὐχὶ ἄνδρα λίγω ἀγρυπνον—Forster, whom Sydenham follows, would insert ὁρᾶς after οὐχὶ—Heusde however, who says that the whole passage is wretchedly corrupt, would read—πόθεν δὲ οὐχὶ; ἄνδρα—ἐστραβῆ. But ἐστραβῆς is found no where else in Greek; nor in the formula πόθεν, used either by itself or with οὐ in a negative sense, do we meet with οὐχὶ. Schleiermacher prefers, ΣΩΚ. πόθεν δ' οὐχὶ οἱ πολλοί; Ἄνδρα γε—whom Beck follows in part. But the whole passage still requires correction.

²⁸ All the MSS. but one offer ἀτριβῆ in lieu of ἀστραβῆ. Ficinus has—"insuetam spinam habentem"—from which it is difficult to discover what he found in his MS. Stalbaum translates ἀτριβῆ τὸν τράχηλον ἔχοντα by "collum nullis pugnīs committentem."

do you now concede that neither much nor little labour causes human beings to have their bodies in a good state, but only what is moderate? or will you contest with us two?—Against him, said he, I would enter the lists with much pleasure, and I know well that I should be competent to support the proposition I have laid down, if I had laid down one weaker than this; for he is nothing. But against you I beg not to contend in favour of a paradox; and I admit, that not many, but moderate exercises³⁰ procure for men a good habit of body.—And what in the case of food? said I. Is it the moderate, or much?—He admitted it in the case of food.³¹ And thus I compelled him to confess that, in the case of all the other things relating to the body, the moderate is the most beneficial, and not the much or little. ³²[And he confessed the moderate]³² and all this he granted me.—What then, said I, as regards the soul? Of the things applied to it do the moderate or the immoderate benefit it?—The moderate, said he.—Is not learning one of the things applied to the soul?—He admitted it.—Of learning then, the moderate quantity benefits, but not the great.—He assented.—[3.] Of whom then, making an inquiry, should we justly inquire what kind of exercise and of food are moderate for the body? We all three agreed that it is a physician or a master of exercise.³³ And ³⁰ A similar sentiment is attributed to Socrates by Xenophon in M. S. i. 2. 4, as remarked by Sydenham.

³¹ The Greek is Kai τὰ σιτία ὁμολόγου. But we must either insert ὡσαύτως, or some other word of like import, or else in lieu of τὰ σιτία read τὰ μίρτια—that the concession here may tally with the two subsequent concessions. S. Schleiermacher, with whom Knebel agrees, considers the whole clause to be superfluous.

³²—³³ The words within the brackets are evidently an interpolation.

of whom (shall we inquire) about the sowing of seeds? About this, we confessed the husbandman. But inquiring of whom, should we justly inquire respecting the planting and sowing of learning in the soul, how many, and of what kinds of it are moderate? We were here all full of difficulty. Upon which I said, by way of a joke, Since we are all at a loss, are you willing for us to ask these youths here? Or perhaps we are ashamed, as Homer (Od. xxi. 285) says the suitors were, who deemed that no one else was fit to stretch the bow.

Since then they now seemed to be dispirited on the question, I endeavoured to view it in another light, and I said—What kinds of learning do we best conjecture those are, which a philosopher ought to learn? since they are not all or many. Whereupon the wiser person, taking up the discourse, observed that the most beautiful kinds of learning, and (the most) becoming, are those by which a person would obtain the highest reputation for philosophy; and that he would obtain the highest, if he seemed to be skilled in all arts;³⁴ and, if not all, at least in as many as possible, and especially those of the greatest account, after having learnt such of them as are fitting for freemen to learn, and are connected with intellect, and not with a handicraft merely.—Do you mean in the same way, said I, as in carpentry? For there you may purchase a tip-top carpenter for five or six minæ;³⁵ but you could not (buy) an architect even for ten thousand drachmas;³⁶ so few of these are to be found amongst all the Greeks. Are you speaking of some such thing?—And he, on hearing, admitted that he was speaking of such a thing.—[4.] I then asked him, if it was not impossible for one person to learn thus³⁷ only two arts, much less, many and great.—Do not understand me, Socrates, said he, as if I were saying that a philosopher ought to know each of the arts accurately, as he does, who makes it his profession; but to be able, as becomes ³⁴ Here is another trait, which Forster and Sydenham apply to Democritus, who had, according to Diogenes Laert. ix. 37, a skill in all kinds of arts; where Sydenham would read πασῶν for πᾶσαν, to suit better with the words here.

³⁵ Less than £20. For the Attic μνᾶ was equal to £3 4s. 7d. English. S.

³⁶ Equal to £322 18s. 4d. For the μνᾶ was worth 100 δράχμαι. S. It differed from the Roman "libra" by only four drachmæ, as remarked by Stutzmann.

³⁷ After οὕτω has dropt καλῶς, or something similar.

a person of a liberal education, to follow better than the persons present, what is said by the handicraftsman; and to give his opinion so as to appear, in what is said and done relating to the arts, to have a finer taste, and more knowledge, than those who happen to be present.—Then I—for I was still doubtful what he meant by his speech—said to him, Do I conceive rightly what kind of person you call a philosopher? For you seem to me to speak of a person, such as are the competitors in five kinds of contest, compared with the runner, or the wrestlers.³⁸ For the former fall short of the latter, as regards the contests of the latter, and are second to them; but of all the other competitors, they are the first, and are the victors.³⁹ Some such thing you mean perhaps that the study of philosophy effects in those, who pursue it, in that they fall short of the first prize,⁴⁰ in the intellect relating to the arts, but in attaining the second, they are superior to all the rest; so that he, who has studied philosophy, becomes in every thing a person under the tip-top⁴¹ man. Some such person you seem to me to point out.—You appear to me, Socrates, said he, to understand correctly what relates to a philosopher, in likening him to a competitor in five contests.⁴² For he is really such a man, as not to be a slave to any thing; nor has he laboured upon any one thing with such accuracy, as,

³⁸ Clericus, in Silv. Philolog. c. 10. 4, was the first to substitute παλαιστικῶς for παιστικῶς; and so three MSS. subsequently collated.

³⁹ Forster quotes Longinus, § 34, where Hyperides is stated, from the variety of his talents, to hold the second place amongst the first-rate orators, but the first amongst the second-rate.

⁴⁰ In lieu of πρώτων, the antithesis in δευτερεῖα requires πρωτίων, as I have translated.

⁴² Sydenham gives here in a corrected form a translation of what Diogenes Laertius has, in xi. 37, quoted from Thrasyllus. "If the Rivals be a dialogue of Plato, says Thrasyllus, the anonymous person there introduced as the friend of those, who were disputing about Cænopides and Anaxagoras, must be this Democritus; who, in the conversation he had with Socrates concerning philosophy, there related, says, that a philosopher is like a competitor in five contests. Now he was himself a five-contest competitor in philosophy. For he had cultivated physica, and ethica, and mathematics, and all the common learning of those times, and had some experience in all the arts."

through his attention to that one thing, to be deficient in all the rest, as are handicraftsmen, but he has touched moderately upon all.

[5.] After this reply, I was anxious to know clearly what he meant, and I inquired of him, whether he considered good persons to be useful or useless.—Useful, surely, Socrates, said he.—If then the good are useful, are not the bad useless?—He agreed.—Well then, said I, do you deem philosophers to be useful, or not?—He acknowledged they were useful; and moreover he said, that he deemed them the most useful (of all persons).⁴³—Come now, (said I,) let us see whether you say what is true. How can these second-rate men be of any use to us? For it is plain that the philosopher is inferior to each of those who possess their respective arts.—He acknowledged it.—Come then, said I, if either yourself were unwell, or any of your friends, for whom you have a great regard, would you, being desirous to recover health, introduce that second-rate person, the philosopher, to your family; or take a physician.—Both of them, said he.—Do not say both, I replied; but which in preference, and the first?—No man, said he, would hesitate about this, that (I would take) the physician in preference and first.—What then, in a vessel tost in a storm? To whom would you rather intrust yourself and your property? To a pilot, or to a philosopher?—To a pilot, for my part, said he.—And so, too, in all other affairs; so long as there is a person of skill in a profession, the philosopher is of no use.—It appears so, said he.—The philosopher, therefore, said I, is some useless person; for there are surely persons of skill in (all) professions. But we have agreed that the good are useful, and the wicked useless.—He was forced to own it.—[6.] “What then, said I, shall I ask you about what comes⁴⁴ after this? or is it not rather rude to put a question?—Ask what you please, said he.—I desire nothing else, said I, than to repeat the concessions already made. Now the matter stands thus. We have conceded that philosophy is an honourable thing, and that we are ourselves philosophers; and that philosophers are good; and that the good are useful,

⁴³ Ficinus alone has “omnium.”

and the wicked useless. Again, on the other hand, we have conceded that philosophers are useless, as long as there are persons of skill in any particular profession; and that such persons are existing at all times. For was not all this conceded?—Certainly, said he.—We concede, therefore, agreeably to your own reasoning, that if it be philosophy to be skilled in arts in the manner you state, such⁴⁵ persons are wicked and useless as long as there are artists.⁴⁶ But see, my friend, if the case be so, and that to philosophize is not to attend to arts, nor to busy oneself about many things, nor to be living like a workman, bending over his work,⁴⁷ nor to be learning many things, but something else? Since I thought, it was a reproach for persons, much occupied in arts, to be called operatives.⁴⁸ [7.] But we shall know more clearly by this means, whether I am speaking truly, if you will answer me this. Who know how to punish horses correctly? Whether they, who make them better, or others?—They who (make them) better.—Well then, do not they, who know how to make dogs better, know how to chastise dogs properly?—Yes.—The same art then makes better, and chastises properly.—I agree, said he.—Well then, is the art, which makes better and chastises properly, the same as that which knows the good and the vicious, or is it a different one?—It is, said he, the same.—Are you then willing, said I, to concede this, in the case of human beings likewise, that the art, which makes men better, is that, which chastises properly, and knows the good and the bad?—By all means, said he.—Does not then the art which (applies)

⁴⁵ Instead of αὐτοὺς, Heusde would read αὐ τοὺς φιλοσόφους—I have translated as if the Greek were τοιούτους—Knebel says that αὐτοὺς agrees with φιλοσόφους, to be got out of φιλοσοφεῖν.

⁴⁶ I have followed Heusde, who correctly suggested τεχνῖται in lieu of τίχναι.

⁴⁷ Such is the literal meaning of κυπτάζειν.

⁴⁸ In Greek, βάνανσος is one who works by means of a furnace. For so Hesychius: Βανανσία, πᾶσα τέχνη διὰ πυρὸς, κυρίως δὲ ἡ περὶ τὰς καμίνους. Plato seems to allude to the metallurgic and the chemical experiments of Democritus; whose treatise, Περὶ τῆς λίθου, related perhaps to the magnet, or loadstone, which, for its peculiar virtues, was called "the stone;" and it was no doubt through fusion by fire that he converted common stones into precious, and carried on his other chemical experiments. The word, however, seems to comprise all those arts we call mechanical; and the chain of reasoning requires it to be used here with the same latitude. S.

to one (apply) to many too, and that which (applies) to many (apply) to one likewise? And so too as regards horses and all other things?—I confess it, (said he.)—What then is the science, which chastises properly the licentious and the lawless in civil states? Is it not the judicial science?—Yes.—Do you mean by justice⁴⁹ any other science than this?—No other.—Do not then men know the good and the bad by that science, by which they chastise properly?—By that.—And he, who knows one, will know many?—Yes.—And whoever does not know many, (will not know one.)—I confess it.—If then a horse, as being but a horse, knows not good and bad horses, he would not know of which kind he is himself?—I admit it.—And if an ox, being but an ox, knows not good and bad oxen,⁵⁰ he would not know of which kind he is himself?—True, said he.—And so too, in the case of a dog?—He admitted it.—What then, if a man knows not the good men and the bad, would he not be ignorant whether he is good or bad, inasmuch as he too is a man?—He agreed.—Now to be ignorant of oneself, is it to be of sound mind,⁵¹ or not sound?—Not sound.—To know then oneself, is to be of sound mind.—I admit it, said he.—To this then, as it seems, the Delphic inscription exhorts, namely, to exercise a sound mind, and justice.⁵²—It seems so.—And by the very same science we know too how to chastise properly.—I admit it, (said he.)—Is not then justice that, by which we know how to chastise properly? but soundness of mind that, by which we have the skill to know our-

⁴⁹ Stalbaum says that the writer has confounded legal justice with justice in the abstract; or, as we should say in England, law with equity.

⁵⁰ Ficinus has "qui sint boni aut mali boves." From which Bekker wished to insert βούς, wanting in all the MS.

⁵¹ No words are more puzzling to translate than σώφρων and its derivatives. For they are employed in different places in different senses; and there is no word in English answering to them every where. Hence to express their precise meaning, different words must be used in different places. In Homer, σωφροσύνη means prudence, or discretion, as in Od. xxiii. 30. Its true etymology is σώα φρήν, "a sound mind;" and so Porphyry says in Stobæus xxi. p. 185, Gesn., καὶ γὰρ σωφροσύνη σοφροσύνη τις. And so too Plato, in Charmid. p. 164, D., by σωφροσύνη understands "soundness of mind;" and both Xenophon, in M. S. i. 16, and Plato, in Rep., oppose it to μανία, "madness." Most commonly, however, Plato applies it to one of the cardinal virtues. S.

⁵² The same interpretation is given in Charmid. p. 164, D. § 27, and Alcibiad. I. p. 124, A. § 41.

the second prize after all, and be useless, so long as there exists any of the first-rate? Or must he in the first place not commit his household to another person, nor have the second place in that business; but ought himself to chastise after being the judge, if his household is about to be administered correctly.—In this he agreed with me.—⁵⁵ And then, said I,⁵⁵ should his friends submit an award to him, or the state order him to decide upon any thing, or to act the judge, would it not, my friend, be disgraceful for him to appear in such cases to be second or third, and not to take the lead?—So it seems to me. To philosophize therefore, thou best of men, wants much of being great in learning, or the busying oneself about arts.—On my saying this, the wise man, ashamed of what he had before asserted, was silent; but the illiterate person said, it was in that way,⁵⁶ and the rest approved of what had been stated.

^{55—55} In lieu of ἔπειρά γε δῆπον, a combination of particles not to be found, I suspect, elsewhere, Stutzmann suggested ἔπειτα δὲ γ' εἶπον, similar to—"Atque ego addidi" in Ficinus.

⁵⁶ In ἔκτινος there is, I suspect, some error. For many MSS. read ἔκτινος. Perhaps the author wrote ἔφη, εἰ καὶ ἄνους, εἰδέναι, i. e. "said he knew, although he was a simpleton."

INTRODUCTION TO THE HIPPARCHUS.

ALTHOUGH this dialogue is found in the list given by Diogenes Laertius, iii. 50, of the genuine productions of Plato, yet even before the time of Ælian, there was some idea of its being spurious. For after quoting it in V. H. viii. 2, the writer adds, "if it be in reality Plato's." Carrying out this hint, Valckenaer was the first to prove, on Herodotus v. 55, that it was not written by its previously-supposed author; and his decision has been admitted by Wolf in Prolegom. Homer. p. cliv., and all the subsequent scholars who have written upon Plato, with the exception of Taylor; who says he "cannot find any thing in its manner or matter, for which its authenticity deserves to be called in question." Boeckh indeed attributes it to Simon the shoemaker, who was a Socratic philosopher, ridiculed probably by Aristophanes, in the Clouds; but Stalbaum would bring it down to the time, when schools of rhetoric were in vogue towards the decline of Greek literature, and he considers it inferior to even the Theages and Rivals, despite the preservation of the anecdote relating to Hipparchus in § 4, who has given the name to the dialogue, and was once thought to have been introduced as a speaker, until, to avoid the anachronism, an unknown friend was substituted in his place.

THE HIPPARCHUS.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES, AND A FRIEND.

SOCRATES.

[1.] WHAT is the love of gain, and who are its lovers?

Fr. They seem to me to be those, who think it worth while to make a gain from what is nothing worth.¹

Soc. Whether then do they seem to, you (to do so), while knowing that the things are of no worth, or not knowing? For if (they do so) not knowing, you call the lovers of gain senseless.

Fr. Nay, I do not call them senseless, but thorough knaves and villains, the slaves of gain, and who know indeed that the things are worthless, from which they dare to make a gain, but yet through their shamelessness they dare to have a love of gain.

Soc. Do you then call a person of this kind a lover of gain? For instance, should a husbandman, while planting, and knowing the plant to be worthless, nevertheless think to make a gain from it when grown up, do you call such a person a lover of gain?

Fr. The lover of gain, Socrates, thinks he ought to make a gain from every thing.

Soc. Do not thus answer me at random, like a person in-jured¹ by some one, but, giving your mind, answer me, as if I were questioning you again from the beginning. Do you not agree with me, that a lover of gain knows the value of that, from which he thinks it worth while to make a gain?

¹ To such persons Horace alludes in his "Rem, si possis, recte; si non, quocunque modo, rem;" so well translated by Coleman—"Get money, if you can with honesty; if not, get money." With regard to the play on the words ἀξίωσιν—ἀξίωv, see at Phileb. § 57, n. 56; § 65, n. 74; Charm. § 49; Hip. Maj. § 41, 45.

Fr. I do.

Soc. Who then is he, that knows the value of plants, and in what time and place it is worth while to plant them? that we also may introduce something² from the words of the wise, which the clever in law-suits employ for the sake of elegance.

Fr. A husbandman, I think.

Soc. Do you then mean by the expression—It is worth while to make a gain—any thing else than to think that one ought to make a gain?

Fr. I mean this.

Soc. Now do not you, who are so young, endeavour to deceive me, your elder, by answering as you do at present, what you do not think; but tell me truly, do you think that a husbandman exists, who knows it is not worth while to plant a certain plant, and yet fancies he will make a gain³ by such a plant?

Fr. By Zeus, not I.

Soc. What then, think you that a horsedealer, who knows that the food which he gives a horse, is of no worth, does not know that it destroys the horse?

Fr. I do not.

Soc. He does not think then that from such worthless food he will make a gain.

Fr. He does not.

Soc. What then, do you think that a pilot, who has furnished his ship with sails and a rudder of no worth, does not know that he will sustain a damage, and be in danger of perishing himself, and of losing the ship and all it carries?

Fr. I do not.

Soc. He will not think then that he will make a gain by worthless articles.

¹ Stalbaum justly objects to ἡδικομήνοσ. For most assuredly an injured person would give an answer not at random, but with bitterness, or in an unseemly manner. Hence in lieu of εἰκῇ one would prefer δεικῇ—

² This alludes to the play on the words ὥρα and χῶρα, which it is impossible to preserve in a translation.

³ Ficinus has "lucraturum," which leads to κερδανεῖν, or κερδαίνειν ἄν, and similarly all through afterwards.

Fr. He will not.

Soc. But does the general, who knows that his army carries worthless arms, ¹ think he will make a gain, or that he is worthy to make a gain by them? ¹

Fr. By no means.

Soc. But if a hautboy-player possesses a worthless hautboy, or a lyre-player a lyre, or a bowman a bow, or, in short, any other artist or skilled person possesses instruments or any other apparatus of no value, does he think he will make a gain by these?

Fr. It appears he will not.

[2.] Soc. Whom then do you call lovers of gain? For surely they are not those, whom we have already mentioned, who, knowing what are things of no value, think they must ² make a gain by them. And thus, O wonderful man, according to what you say, no one is a lover of gain.

Fr. But, Socrates, I mean to say, that those are lovers of gain, who, through insatiable avidity, are perpetually and beyond all measure, greedy after things that are small and worth little or ³ nothing, and thus have a love of gain.

Soc. But surely, thou best of men, they do not know this, that they are worthless; for we have proved against ourselves, that this is impossible.

Fr. So it seems to me.

Soc. If then (they do so) not knowing it, it is evident that, not knowing it, they fancy things of no worth to be of great value.

Fr. It appears so.

Soc. Do not the lovers of gain love gain?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But do you say that gain is contrary to loss?

Fr. I do.

Soc. Is it therefore a good to any one to suffer a loss?

Fr. To no one.

² One MS. omits δεῖν, as in the preceding passages, where the same formula is repeated.

³ I have translated as if the Greek were, ὀλίγου ἀξία ἢ καὶ οὐδενός, not merely ἀξία καὶ—

Soc. But it is an evil?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Are men then injured by a damage?

Fr. They are injured.

Soc. Is then damage an evil?

Fr. It is.

Soc. But gain is contrary to damage?

Fr. Contrary.

Soc. Gain is therefore a good?

Fr. It is.

Soc. Do you then call those, who love a good, lovers of gain?

Fr. It seems so.

Soc. You do not then, my friend, call the lovers of gain mad-men. But do you yourself love what is a good, or not love it?

Fr. I do.

Soc. Is there a good which you do not love, but an evil (which you do)?

Fr. By Zeus, there is not.

Soc. But you love all good things equally?

Fr. I do.

Soc. Ask me, if I also do not. For I also shall acknowledge to you, that I love good things. But besides I and you, do not all the rest of men appear to you to love good things, and to hate evil?

Fr. To me it appears so.

Soc. But have we not acknowledged that gain is a good?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. In this way then,¹ all appear (to be) lovers of gain; but that, in which we before mentioned, no one was a lover of gain. By employing then which assertion, would a person not err?

Fr. Should, Socrates, one rightly apprehend what a lover of gain is,² I think it is right to consider him a lover of gain² who earnestly applies himself to, and thinks it worth

¹ Instead of αὖ one MS. has οὖν, similar to "igitur" in Ficinus. One would prefer οὖν εἶναι—φαίνονται.

² So Taylor with Ficinus, "eum, ut puto, lucri cupidum arbitrabitur." The Greek is, ὁρθῶς δ' ἔστι τοῦτον ἡγείσθαι φιλοκερδήν. But after εἰ τις—ὁρθῶς λαμβάνει, the particle δὲ could not thus follow the repeated ὁρθῶς. The author wrote perhaps ὁρθῶς δὲ ἔστι— while to make a gain from those things, from which the good do not dare to make a gain.

[3.] Soc. But do you not see, O sweetest¹ of men, that we just now acknowledged that to make a gain is to be benefited?

Fr. What then?

Soc. Because this also we previously admitted, that all men always wished for good things.

Fr. We did.

Soc. Do not, then, good men wish to possess every thing gainful, since such things are good?

Fr. But not the things, Socrates, by which they are about to be hurt.

Soc. By "to be hurt" do you mean "to be damaged"? or something else?

Fr. No, but I mean "to be damaged."

Soc. Are persons damaged by gain, or by damage?

Fr. Through both. For they are damaged by damage, and through iniquitous gain.

Soc. Does it then appear to you that any thing useful and good is iniquitous?

Fr. To me it does not.

Soc. Did we not then a little before acknowledge that gain is contrary to damage, which is an evil?

Fr. We did.

Soc. And that being contrary to evil, it is a good?

Fr. We granted this.

[4.] Soc. You endeavour then, you see, to deceive me, by designedly asserting the contrary to what we just now granted.

Fr. By Zeus, I do not, Socrates; but you, on the contrary, are deceiving me; and I know not how, in your reasonings you turn things topsy-turvy.

Soc. Speak fair words. For I should not act correctly, if I were not persuaded by a man good and wise.

Fr. Who is he? and why particularly (say you) this?

Soc. My fellow-citizen, and likewise yours, Hipparchus,

¹ Although Plato uses γλυκύς, in Hipp. Maj. p. 288, B. § 9, in an ironical sense, for "a simpleton," as remarked by Ruhnken on Tim. p. 131, yet this, says Stalbaum, is the only place where the superlative is found.

the son of Pisistratus, one of the Philaidæ,¹ and the eldest² and wisest of the sons of Pisistratus; who exhibited many other illustrious acts of wisdom, and was the first who introduced³ into this land the poems of Homer, and compelled the rhapsodists during the Panathenæa to go through them successively⁴ and in order, just as you know they do at present; and having sent for Anacreon, the Teïan, a ship of fifty oars, brought him to this city, and always had about him Simonides of Ceos, having induced him (to stay) by great rewards and gifts. And this he did, wishing to instruct⁵ the citizens, in order that he might rule over them being the best of men; nor thinking, that he ought to begrudge wisdom to any man, as being himself a highly educated person. And when such of the citizens as were living around the town had been educated well, and admired him for his wisdom, he likewise laid down a plan to instruct those in the country; and he set up for them statues of Hermes⁶ along the roads, in the middle of the city and of each of the wards; and afterwards selecting from his wisdom, on points he had partly⁷ learned, and partly discovered himself,⁷ what he deemed to be the cleverest idea, he put them into elegiac verses, and engraved them (on the Hermæ) as his poems, and specimens of wisdom; in order that in the first place the citizens might not wonder at those wise inscriptions (on the temple) at Delphi, "Know thyself," and "Nothing too much," and the rest of that kind, but that they ¹ So Meursius in Pisistratus, § 1, in lieu of Φιλαίδωνος. For the Philaidæ was a ward of the tribe of Ægeus, as stated by the Schol. here and Steph. Byz. in Φιλαίδαι. See likewise Corsini Fast. Attic. i. p. 246; Heringa Observat. p. 236; Spon. p. 38. 9, quoted by Porson in Miscell. Crit. p. 264.

² According to Thucydides in vi. 54, Hippias was the eldest son.

³ This is attributed by other authors to Solon or Pisistratus. See Perizonius on Ælian V. H. viii. 2; Heyne Excurs. ad Il. T. viii. p. 809; Wolf Prolegom. Homer. p. xcix.—cxl..

⁴ On the expression ἐξ ὑποβολῆς or ἐξ ὑπολήψεως, see Wolf Prolegom. Homer. p. cxl., and Hermann Opuscul. T. v. p. 300.

⁵ Instead of παίδειν, four MSS. read παιδεύειν, similar to "instruere" in Ficinus.

⁶ In lieu of "Hermas." Ficinus has, apparently from a Scholium, "columnas sive quadratos lapides," as in Thucyd. vi. 27.

might deem the words of Hipparchus still wiser; and, in the next place, that passing by them, up and down, they might read them, and have a taste of his wisdom, and come from the fields¹ and be instructed in the remaining branches of learning. And there are two epigrams. In some upon the left-hand sides of each of the Hermæ there is sculptured a ²Hermes, saying that he was standing midway between the city and the ward;² and in others upon the right-hand sides he says:—"This is the memorial³ of Hipparchus. Go on, having just thoughts." There are also many other beautiful poetical descriptions on other Hermæ; and there is this in the Steiriac⁴ road, in which he says—"This is the memorial of Hipparchus. Do not deceive your friend." I would not then have dared to deceive you, being my friend, and disobey so great a man; after whose death, the Athenians were tyrannized over by his brother Hippias; and you have heard from all the old men, that only during those years did there exist a tyranny at Athens, and that during all the other period, the Athenians lived nearly as when Saturn reigned.⁵ But it is said by rather clever persons, that he did not die in the way which the multitude have thought, through the ⁶dishonour done to the sister (of Harmodius) respecting the carrying the sacred basket⁶—for that is a silly reason—but that Harmodius was the bosom friend and pupil of Aristogeiton, who valued himself highly upon ⁷instructing a man,⁷ and fancied that Hipparchus would be his rival. But at that time it happened that Harmodius was the lover of one of the handsome and nobly-born youths—whose name persons have mentioned, but I do not remember—and that this young ¹ Ficinus has "ex agris et silvis," as if he had found in his MS. ἐκ τῶν ἀγρῶν καὶ ὕλῶν.

² According to Stalbaum, both Boeckh in Indic. Lect. Berolin. 1824, and Osann in Sylog. Inscript. p. 241, conceived there was an Hexameter likewise, answering to the words given here in prose—λέγων ὁ Ἑρμῆς ὅτι ἐν μίσῳ τοῦ δαστεος καὶ τοῦ δήμου ἵστηκεν—from which it is easy to elicit Δήμου τ' ἐν μίσῳ εἶμ' Ἑρμᾶς καὶ Φάστεος ἱστώς. To these Hermæ placed by Hipparchus Hesychius alludes in Ἰκπάρχαιος Ἑρμῆς.

³ In lieu of μνῆμα one would expect here ῥῆμα—

⁴ According to the Scholiast and Steph. Byz., Steiria was a ward of the tribe of Pandion.

⁵ So Ovid, "Quam bene vivebant, Saturno rege—"

⁶ The dishonour alluded to is explained by Thucydides vi. 56.

⁷ In the Greek, καιδεύσαι ἄνθρωπον, is an error, which it were perhaps not difficult to correct.

person did for a time admire Harmodius and Aristogeiton, as wise men; but afterwards associating with Hipparchus, he despised them; and that they, being very much annoyed at the dishonour, slew Hipparchus.

[5.] Fr. You run the risk, Socrates, of either not considering me a friend; or, if you do think me a friend, of not being persuaded by Hipparchus: for I cannot be persuaded that you have not deceived me¹ in I know not what manner,¹ during the discourse.

Soc. But indeed, just as in the game of backgammon,² I am willing to put back whatever part you please of the assertions already made, in order that you may not think you have been deceived. Whether therefore shall I retract this assertion for you, that all men desire good?

Fr. Not for me.

Soc. But that to be damaged, and damage itself, is not an evil?

Fr. Not for me.

Soc. But that gain, and to make a gain, are not contrary to damage, and to be damaged?

Fr. Nor this neither.

Soc. But that to make a gain, as being contrary to evil, is not a good?

Fr. Retract nothing of this kind at all for me.

Soc. It appears to you then, as it seems, that of gain one part is a good, and another an evil.

Fr. Yes, to me.

Soc. I retract therefore this for you. For let it be, that one kind of gain is a good, and another kind an evil; but that gain itself³ is not more good than evil. Is it not so?

Fr. Why do you ask me?

Soc. I will tell you. Is there food good, and bad?

Fr. Yes.

¹—¹ The Greek is οὐκ ὁδ' ἔν τινα μὲντοι τρόπον. But Stalbaum has omitted μὲντοι, not remarking that the author of the dialogue had probably in mind a similar introduction of μὲντοι in the passages quoted by Boissonade on Aristænetus, Epist. ii. 2, and the commentators on Phædr. p. 236, E.

² On the metaphor in περιεῖν see the mass of passages quoted by Valckenaer in a MS. note printed by myself on Æsch. Suppl. 14.

³ I have adopted with Taylor αὐτὸ in Stephens in lieu of αὐτῶν—Ficino has—"nihil tamen magis hoc quam illud lucrum est—" The αὐτῶν came from the next question of Socrates. But there the syntax is different.

Soc. Is therefore one of them more food than the other? or are both of them similarly food? and does the one differ in no respect from the other, so far as each is food, but so far as one is good, and the other bad?

Fr. Just so.¹

Soc. And is it not as regards drink, and all other things which are parts of things existing, that some at least are so circumstanced as to be bad, and others, good; and that they differ not at all from each other, in that they are the same; just as one man is good, and another bad?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But one man is, I suppose, neither more nor less a man than another, neither the good than the bad, nor the bad than the good.

Fr. You speak the truth.

Soc. Shall we not then think in like manner respecting gain, that both the good and the bad are similarly gain?

Fr. It is necessary.

Soc. He, therefore, who has a good gain, does not in any respect make a gain more than he, who (has a) bad gain: for neither of these, as we have granted, appears to be more a gain than the other.

Fr. True.

Soc. For to neither of them is the more or the less present.

Fr. It is not.

Soc. But in a thing of this kind, to which neither of these accidents is present, how can any one do, or suffer, more or less?

Fr. It is impossible.

[6.] Soc. Since, then, both are similarly gain and gainful, it is requisite that we should still further² consider this—why do you call both of them gain? and what do you see to be in both the same? ³Just as if you had asked me about the recent question,³ why I called both good and bad food similarly food, I would have said—Because each is a dry aliment of the body, on this account I (called them so). For that this is food, you would surely acknowledge; would you not?

¹ Ficinus has "Est, ut dicis;" for he saw that a single answer, Nai, could not be given to a bipartite question.

² Ficinus has "hoc deinceps,"—in Greek τοῦτ' ἔτι, as in Stephens, more correctly than τοῦτι in Bekker, from four MSS.

³—³ The Greek is ὥσπερ ἀνεί δ' οὐ με ἡρώτας, where Stalbaum rejects δ with Ficinus; whose version is "veluti si ipse modo me rogavisses." But perhaps the author wrote, ὥσπερ ἀνεί, δ' ἐγὼ σὲ τὰ νῦν δὴ, σὺ ἔμὲ ἡρώτας. Compare Alcibiad. I. p. 114, B. § 22, ἐρωτῶν ἔμὲ, ὥσπερ ἐγὼ σὲ. For the reference is to p. 230, A. § 5, as remarked by Stalbaum.

Fr. I would.

Soc. And there will be the same manner of answering respecting drink; that for the moist aliment of the body, whether it is good or bad, the name is drink; and for the rest of things, in like manner. Do you therefore endeavour to imitate me, by answering thus. ¹ When you speak of good gain and bad gain, as being both of them gain, what same thing do you perceive in them, that this too is gain?¹ But if you are not able to answer me in this way,² reflect, while I am speaking. Do you call a gain every acquisition that a person obtains, when he either spends nothing, or when, after spending less, he receives more?

Fr. I seem to myself to call the latter gain.

Soc. Are you therefore speaking of such things as these? If a person after having been feasted and spending nothing, and indulging in good living, should become diseased?

Fr. Not I, by Zeus.

Soc. But if he should obtain health after feasting, would he obtain a gain or damage?

Fr. Gain.

Soc. This then is not a gain, to obtain any acquisition whatever.

Fr. It is not.

Soc. ³ Whether will he, who obtains what is an evil, or at least what is not a good, not obtain a gain?³

Fr. ⁴ It appears so, at least if it be a good.⁴

¹ Ficinus has what is far more intelligible, "Quidnam idem in lucro bono et malo cernis, propter cujus presentiam, utrumque lucrum nominas?" But whether he found in his MS. the Greek answering to his Latin, is another question.

² Instead of αὐτὸς one MS. has οὗτος, which I have adopted to answer to the preceding οὗτος.

³ I have translated into English the Latin version of Stalbaum. The Greek is, ἴαν καὶ τὸν ἢ οὐδ' ἂν ἀγαθόν, for which Cornarius would read ἴαν τε καὶ τὸν, ἴαν τε ἀγαθόν, founded on "sive bonum seu malum" in Ficinus.

⁴ Stalbaum observes that the answer ought to have been, "It appears not; but if it be a good." I cannot however understand the limiting clause, "at least, if it be a good;" nor could Ficinus, who has omitted it.

Soc. But if (he obtains) an evil, will he not obtain a damage?

Fr. To me it appears so.

Soc. See then how you are again running round to the same point? For gain appears to be a good, but damage an evil.

Fr. I really am at a loss what to say.

Soc. Nor unjustly are you at a loss. But, answer me still further this. If any one after having spent less, obtains more, do you say this is a gain?

Fr. ¹I do not say it is an evil,¹ but if after having spent less of gold or silver money, he receives more.

Soc. I too am about to ask you this. For come, (tell me,) should a person spending half a pound² of gold, receive double this weight of silver, would he obtain a gain or a damage?

Fr. A damage surely, Socrates; for, instead of a value twelve times as much, the silver is only twice as much.

Soc. But yet he has received more. Or is not double more than half?

Fr. But silver is not of (the same)³ value as gold.

Soc. It is requisite then, as it seems, that this, namely, value, be added to gain; for in this case do you not say that the silver, although being more than the gold, is not of equal value? ⁴the gold, although being less, you say, is of equal value.⁴

Fr. Very much so: for such is the fact.

Soc. Value, therefore, is gainful, whether it is small or great; but that which is valueless is gainless.

Fr. Yes.

¹ I confess I cannot perceive the relevancy of this answer; nor the reason of the subsequent limitation, thus introduced by the words ἀλλ' ἰδὲ—

² So Taylor translates σταθμόν. But whether σταθμός in Greek, "libra" in Latin, and "pound" in English, are all of the same weight, I am unable to state. Stalbaum refers to Boeckh in Œconom. Athen. i. 30, and to Letronne's "Considerations Generales sur l' Evaluation des Monnaies Grecques et Romaines," Paris, 1817.

³ Instead of Οὐτὶ τῇ ἀξίᾳ, Ficinus found in his MS. Οὐτὶ τῇ αὐτῇ ἀξίᾳ, as shown by his version, "Non ejusdem dignitatis ac pretii—"

⁴ The Greek is ἀξιον—ἀξιον. But two MSS. offer ἀνάξιον—ἀξιον, which evidently leads to ἀνράξιον—ἀνράξιον, where the first ἀνράξιον answers to "æque æstimandum et dignum" in Ficinus; who properly omits the repeated φῆς εἶναι.

Soc. By "value," do you mean any thing else than what it is worthy to acquire?

Fr. I do not.

Soc. But by the expression "it is worthy to acquire," do you mean the useless, or the useful?

Fr. The useful, certainly.

Soc. The useful, therefore, is a good.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Hence, thou most manly of all men, has not the lucrative come to us again a third or a fourth time, as being an acknowledged good?

Fr. So it seems.

[7.] Soc. Do you remember, then, from whence this discourse of ours originated?

Fr. I think I do.

Soc. If you do not, I will remind you. You contended that good men are not willing to make every kind of gain, but of gains the good (alone)¹ but not the iniquitous.

Fr. It did originate from this.

Soc. But has not reason forced us to acknowledge, that all kinds of gain, both small and great, are good?

Fr. It has forced me, Socrates, rather than persuaded.

Soc. But perhaps after this it will also persuade you. Now, however, whether you are persuaded, or in whatever manner you may be affected, you agree at least with us, that all kinds of gain are good, both small and great?

Fr. I do agree.

Soc. And do you agree with me, or not, that all good men wish for all things that are good?

Fr. I do.

Soc. But you said that bad men love gain of every kind, both small and great.

Fr. I did say so.

Soc. According to your assertion, then, all men, both good and bad, would be lovers of gain.

Fr. It appears so.

Soc. If then any person reproaches another with being a lover of gain, he does not correctly reproach him; for the very person so reproaching happens to be such a character himself.

¹ I have introduced "alone" from "duntaxat," in Ficinus

INTRODUCTION TO THE MINOS.

IN placing the Minos in juxta-position with the Hipparchus, I have followed the example of Boeckh ; who published in 1810 those two dialogues, together with four others of the Pseudo-Platonic list, under the title of "Simonis Socratici, ut videtur, Dialogi," &c., after he had proved in a preceding work, printed in 1806, that the Minos was not written by Plato ; although it had been considered genuine by Bentley, and had been quoted as such by him on Phalaris, t. i. p. 327, ed. Dyce. Nor had Fr. Patricius any suspicion of its spuriousness, who, in his Discussion. Peripatet. p. 338, speaks of it as having come down to us in an imperfect state. But according to Stalbaum, so numerous and glaring are the proofs of its being not Plato's, that he is only astonished at the fraud having lain undetected so long ; and similar it would seem are the sentiments of Schleiermacher.

The dialogue is however, says Boeckh, alluded to by Plutarch in Theseus, i. p. 7, A., and by Clemens of Alexandria in Strom. i. p. 151. 33 ; and ii. p. 158. 13 ; to say nothing of the references made to it by Maximus Tyrius, Servius, Proclus, Stobæus, and Alexander Aphrodisiensis in Aristot. Elench. Sophist. fol. 51, b.

According to Boeckh, the author was the shoemaker Simon. For we learn from Diogenes Laertius, that he wrote some short dialogues comprised in one volume, Περὶ Δικαίου, and Περὶ Ἀπερῆς, and Περὶ Νόμου, and Περὶ Φιλοκέρδους. Now as amongst the confessedly spurious dialogues there are two on the two subjects first mentioned, Boeckh conceived that those two, together with the two others, the subjects respectively of the Minos and Hipparchus, made up the four alluded to.

But specious as this induction is, it failed to satisfy Stalbaum, who has contested at considerable length the theory of Boeckh, and eventually arrives at the conclusion, that the author of this dialogue was some Alexandrian writer, who lived in the time of the Ptolemies, a period rife with such forgeries; and that, although he might have drawn something from the work of Simon, yet his great storehouse was the acknowledged writings of Plato, which, unable to imitate, he has been content to travesty.

With regard to the divine origin of law, Taylor observes that Zoroaster ascribed the laws he gave the Persians to Oromazes; Hermes Trismegistus, the Egyptian, to Mercury; Minos, the Cretan, to Jupiter; Charondas, of Catana, to Saturn; Lycurgus, the Lacedæmonian, to Apollo; Draco and Solon, of Athens, to Minerva; Numa, the Roman, to Egeria; Zamolxis, the Thracian, to Vesta; and Plato, when he gave laws to the Magnesians and Sicilians, to Jupiter and Apollo.

With respect to the title of the dialogue, it has, like the Hipparchus, obtained its name, not from any of the speakers, but from the person whose doings form the chief subject of it; a fact not known to Boyle, who fancied, as remarked by Bentley, that Minos, the law-giver of Crete, was one of the Interlocutors.

THE MINOS.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND A FRIEND.

SOCRATES.

[1.] WHAT thing is law with us?

Fr. Of what kind is the law are you asking about?

Soc. What, is it that law differs from law, according to this very thing, in being law? For consider what I happen to be asking you. For I am asking, as if I should inquire what is gold? and if you should in a similar manner ask me, about what kind of gold am I speaking, I should think you would not rightly ask. For neither does gold differ in any thing from gold, so far as it is gold, nor a stone from a stone, so far as it is a stone. And in like manner, neither does law differ in any thing from law; but all laws are (as laws) the same. For each of them exists similarly (as law); nor is one more, and another less so. I ask you, therefore, this very thing as a whole, what is law? and if you have an answer at hand, state it.

Fr. What else, Socrates, can law be, than the things established by law?

Soc. Does speech too appear to you to be the things which are spoken? or sight, the things which are seen? or hearing, the things which are heard? Or is,¹ (not) speech one thing, and the things spoken another? Is (not) sight one thing, and the things seen another? Is (not) hearing one thing, and the things heard another? And is (not) law one thing, and the things established by law another? Does it appear to you in this way? Or how?

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were ἡ οὐκ, and not ἡ simply; so that one negative may refer to all the following questions.

Fr. It now appears to be another thing.¹

[2.] Soc. Law therefore is not the things established by law.

Fr. It does not appear to me that it is.

Soc. What then can law be? Let us consider it thus. If some one had asked us respecting the things just now spoken of—Since you say that things seen are seen by the sight, by the sight being what, are they seen? we should have answered—by that sense, which through the eyes manifests colours to us. And if he had asked us again—Since things heard are heard by hearing, by the hearing being what, (are they heard)? we should have answered—by a sense, which through the ears manifests sounds to us. In like manner, if he had asked us,—Since things are established by law, by the law being what, are they thus established? Is it by a certain sense, or manifestation, in the same manner as things learnt are learnt by some art rendering them manifest through some discovery? just as things discovered are discovered; as, for instance, things salubrious and noxious are discovered through the medical art; and what the gods have in their thoughts, as the diviners say, through the divining art. ²For art is with us the discovery of things:³ or is it not?

Fr. Entirely so.

[3.] Soc. Which of these then may we especially understand law to be?

Fr. Decrees and votes, as it seems to me. For what else can any one say law is? So that it nearly appears that law, about which you were asking, is, taken as a whole, the decree of a state.

¹ Such is the version of the Greek, "Ἄλλο μοι νῦν ἰφάνη, suggested by Stephens, in lieu of 'Ἄλλ' ὁμοίον νῦν ἰφάνη, and confirmed by two MSS. Ficinus has, "Sicne an aliter videtur? Min. Sic utique,"—as if he had found in his MS. οὕτως ἢ πῶς σοι δοκεῖ; Οὕτως.

²⁻³ Ficinus has, "vaticinium namque rerum talium inventio est," as if he had found in his MS. μαντικὴ γὰρ που ἡμῖν εὕρεσις ἐστὶ τοιούτων τῶν πραγμάτων. But as μαντικῇ has just preceded, perhaps the author wrote αὕτη γὰρ που ἡ τέχνη, not ἡ γὰρ που τέχνη, as found in MSS. Leid. and Tub., which is however adopted by Boeckh and Stalbaum, who retain τῶν, and consider the remark as applicable universally.

Soc. You call, as it seems, law, a state-opinion.

Fr. I do.

Soc. And perhaps you speak well; but perhaps we shall know better in the following manner. You call some persons wise?

Fr. I do.

Soc. Are not then the wise, wise by wisdom?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But what, are the just, just by justice?

Fr. Entirely so.

Soc. Are not then the lawful, lawful by law?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And the lawless, lawless by an absence of law?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And the lawful are just?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But the lawless unjust?

Fr. Unjust.

Soc. Are not justice and law therefore things most beautiful?

Fr. They are.

Soc. And are not injustice and lawlessness the least beautiful?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And does not the former preserve cities and every thing else, but the latter destroy and overturn them?¹

Fr. Yes.

Soc. It is necessary then to consider the law as something beautiful, and to seek it as a good.

Fr. How not?

Soc. Now have we not said that law is a decree of the city?

Fr. We have said so.

Soc. What then, are not some decrees good, and some evil?

Fr. They are.

Soc. Law however is not evil.

Fr. It is not.

Soc. It is not correct then to answer thus simply, that law is a decree of the city.

Fr. It appears to me it is not.

Soc. Nor is it suited to reason¹ for an evil decree to be law.

Fr. Certainly not.

[4.] Soc. Law however appears to me too² to be a certain opinion. And since an opinion is not evil, is not this evident, that it is a good one, if law is opinion?

Fr. Yea.

Soc. But what is a good opinion? Is it not a true one?

Fr. Yea.

Soc. Is then a true opinion the discovery of that which is?³

Fr. It is.

Soc. Law therefore would be⁴ the discovery of that which is.

Fr. How then, Socrates, if law is the discovery of that which is, do we not always use the same laws about the same things? since things that are have been discovered by us.

Soc. The law nevertheless would be the discovery of that which is. But if men do not always, as we think,⁵ use the same laws, they are not always able to discover that which law wishes, namely, that which is. But come, let us see if it will hence become evident to us, whether we always use the same laws, or some at one time, and others at another; and if all (use) the same laws, or different persons different laws.

[5.] Fr. But this, Socrates, it is not difficult to know, that neither do the same persons always use the same laws,⁶ nor different persons always different laws.⁶ Thus, for example,

² In lieu of αὐτό μοι, Stephens proposed αὐτῷ μοι, suggested by "mihi quoque" in Ficinus; and so six MSS. subsequently collated.

³ Here, as elsewhere, Ficinus translates τὸ ὄν by "veritas."

⁴ Ficinus has "inventio esse vult." He therefore, found in his MS. βούλεται εἶναι, as read in twelve MSS., in lieu of ἔστιν. On this use of βούλεται in the sense of μέλλει Boeckh refers to various passages, and compares it with a similar usage in θέλει.

⁵ Instead of δοκοῦμεν one MS. has δοκῶ, which would meet the objection started by Stalbaum.

⁶ Ficinus, whom Taylor properly follows, has, what the sense requires, "nec alii semper aliis;" for he doubtless found in his MS. ὅτε ἄλλοι δὲ ἄλλοις, in lieu of ὅτε ἄλλοί γε in two MSS. And though γε is read in all the MSS. after ἄλλοι, I confess I do not understand it; nor it is not a law with us to sacrifice human beings, but it is an unholy act; but the Carthaginians sacrifice them, as being a holy and a lawful act with them; so that some of them sacrifice their sons to Kronos,¹ as perhaps you too have heard; and not only do Barbarians use laws different from ours, but also those fellows in Lycæa,² and the progeny of Athamas,³ what sacrifices do they perform, although they are Greeks! In like manner you surely know by hearsay yourself what laws we formerly used concerning the dead, by cutting the throats of the victims before the dead body was carried out, and sending for the women who collect the bones⁴ of the dead in jars; and those, who still, antecedent to them, buried the dead at home; but we do none of these things. Ten thousand instances of this kind one might mention; for wide is the field of demonstration, that neither do we always have customs in the same manner amongst ourselves, nor do men amongst each other.

Soc. It is by no means wonderful, O best of men, if you are speaking correctly, this has lain hid from me. But as long as you by yourself declare what appears to you in a long discourse, and I again do the same, we shall never, as I think, come to an agreement. But if the inquiry be laid down in common, we shall perhaps think alike. If then you are willing, ask me some question, and consider with me in common. Or, if you wish it, give an answer.

Fr. Nay, I am willing, Socrates, to answer whatever you choose (to ask).

[6.] Soc. Come then, do you think that what is just is unjust, and what is unjust is just? Or that what is just is just, and what is unjust is unjust?

did Boeckh, who suggested ἀλλοι τε, adopted by Bekker and Stalbaum; for οὗτε in one clause is followed sometimes by τε simply, not οὗτε, in another.

¹ On this practice see Wesseling on Diodor. Sic. xx. 14.

² This was a town of Arcadia, as shown by Steph. Byz., and probably situated near the mountain Lycæus, where the tutelary deity was worshipped with human sacrifices; to which Plato alludes in Rep. viii. p. 565, D.

³ On the story of Athamas, see Ovid. Met. iv. 467; Fast. vi. 489; and Pausan. ix. 34.

⁴ So Boeckh understands the word ἐγχευριαστροφίας, applied by the Schol. on Aristoph. Σφήκ. 288, to the women who poured libations on the dead from jars.

Fr. I indeed think that what is just is just, and what is unjust is unjust.

Soc. Is it not so held by all persons as it is here?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Among the Persians also?

Fr. And among the Persians too.

Soc. But is it really always so?

Fr. Always.

Soc. Whether are things, that draw the greater weight, thought by us here to be the heavier, but those that draw the less, lighter? or the contrary?

Fr. No; but those that draw the greater weight, are the heavier, and those that draw the less, are lighter.

Soc. Is this the case, therefore, in Carthage and in Lycia?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Things beautiful, as it seems, are every where held to be beautiful, and things ugly to be ugly; but things ugly are not (thought to be) beautiful, nor things beautiful to be ugly.

Fr. It is so.

Soc. In the case of all things, so to say, the things, that exist, are held to be, not the things that do not exist, both with us and with all others.

Fr. It appears so to me.

Soc. He, therefore, who errs in that which is, errs in that which is lawful.

[7.] Fr. Thus, Socrates, as you say, the same things always appear lawful both to us and to others. But when I consider, that we never cease altering the laws up and down, I cannot be persuaded.

Soc. For perhaps you do not bear in mind that these things, being put into a changed place,¹ are the same. But look at them thus with me. Have you ever met with any² book relating to the health of the sick?

Fr. I have.

Soc. Do you know then to what art that book belongs?

Fr. I know (it belongs to) the medical art.

Soc. Do you then not call those skilled in these matters physicians?

² Boeckh has acutely seen that τινι has dropt out after ἐν γράμματι, as shown by "librum aliquem" in Ficinus.

Fr. I do.

Soc. Do then the skilled think the same about the same, or do some think one thing and others another?

Fr. They seem to me to think the same.

Soc. Do then Greeks alone think the same with Greeks about things of which they know? or do Barbarians likewise (do so) with each other, and with Greeks?

Fr. There is a great necessity for both Greeks and Barbarians, who know, to think the same with ¹themselves and each other.¹

Soc. You have answered correctly. Do they not then always (do so)?

Fr. Yes, always.

[8.] Soc. Do not physicians also write about health what they think to be (true)?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Things relating to medicine and medical laws are the writings of physicians.

Fr. Things relating to medicine, certainly.

Soc. Are not then the writings relating to agriculture agricultural laws?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Of whom then are the writings and institutes relating to gardening?

Fr. Of gardeners.

Soc. These then are the laws about gardening.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. Of those, who know how to manage gardens?

Fr. How not?

Soc. But gardeners possess this knowledge.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And of whom are the writings and institutes relating to the dressing of savoury food?

Fr. Of cooks.

Soc. These, therefore, are the laws of cookery.

Fr. Of cookery.

¹ I have adopted the emendation of Boeckh, αὐτοὺς αὐτοῖς τε καὶ ἀλλήλοις, in lieu of αὐτοῖς simply; who aptly compares Alcibiad. I. p. 111, C., ἀλλήλοις τε ὁμολογοῦσι καὶ αὐτοὶ αὐτοῖς, and E., ὁμολογεῖν αὐτοὶ ἑαυτοῖς ἢ ἀλλήλοις.

Soc. Of those, as it seems, who know how to manage the dressing of savoury food.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But cooks, as they say, know.

Fr. They do know.

Soc. Be it so. And of whom are the writings and institutes concerning the administration of a state? Are they not of those, who know how to govern states?

Fr. It appears so to me.

Soc. But do any others than statesmen and kings know?

Fr. They alone.¹

[9.] Soc. Those writings then relating to a state, which men call laws, are the writings of kings and good men.

Fr. You speak the truth.

Soc. Will then they, who know, write one thing at one time, and another at another, about the same things?

Fr. Certainly not.

Soc. If then we see certain persons doing this at any place whatever, shall we say that those, who do so, are skilled or unskilled?

Fr. Unskilled.

Soc. Shall we then say that what is right is in each case lawful, whether it relate to medicine, or cooking, or gardening?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But that, which is not right, we shall no longer assert to be lawful.

Fr. No longer.

Soc. It therefore becomes lawless.

Fr. Necessarily so.

Soc. Hence, in writings concerning things just and unjust, and, in short, concerning the orderly arrangement of a city, and the manner in which one ought to administer it, that, which is right, is a royal law; ² but that, which is not right, is not a (royal law), because science is wanting: for it is.³

¹ So Taylor, after Ficinus—"Isti soli"—as if he had found in his MS. οὔτοι μόνοι in lieu of Οὔτοι μὲν οὐν.

²⁻³ Such is Taylor's English translation of the Latin of Ficinus—"Non rectum vero nequaquam lex regia, quia scientia deest, esse videtur, quippe cum illegitimum sit."—But the Greek is τὸ δὲ μὴ ὀρθὸν οὐ δοκεῖ νόμος εἶναι τοῖς μὴ εἰδόσιν ἔστιν γὰρ ἀνομον: i. e. but that, which is not right, does not seem to be a law to those not knowing; for it is lawless.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. We have rightly therefore acknowledged that the law is the invention of that which is.

Fr. So it appears.

[10.] Soc. Let us still further consider it in this way likewise. Who is skilled in distributing the seeds to the earth?

Fr. The husbandman.

Soc. Does he then distribute seeds proper for each soil?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. The husbandman therefore is a good distributor of these things, and his laws and distributions in these particulars are right.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And who is a good distributor of pulsations for tunes, and distributes¹ such as are proper? And whose laws are right?

Fr. Those of the piper and the harper.

Soc. He then, who acts most according to law in these things, is, in the greatest degree, a piper.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. But who is the best to distribute nutriment to the bodies of men? Is it not he, who (distributes) the proper?

Fr. Yes.

Soc. The distributions therefore and the laws of this man are the best; and he, who acts the most according to law in these things, is the best distributor.

Fr. Entirely so.

Soc. Who is he?

Fr. The training-master.²

Soc. Does he know how to feed³ the flock of the human body³ in the best manner?

Bekker however has inserted from one MS. δ between οὐ and δοκᾷ: which I cannot understand. I could have understood οὐ, εἰ καὶ δοκᾷ —i. e. "is not, even though it seems—"

¹ Boeckh has altered νείμμαι into νίμμαι on the authority of "impertit" in Ficinus; for νείμμαι, he says, could hardly depend upon ἀγαθός.

² Instead of παιδοτριβῆς, the natural train of ideas seems to demand παιδοτρόφος: although it is true, that when young persons were put under the training-master, he did, like the γυμναστής, decide upon the quantity and quality of the food to be given. See The Rivals, § 3.

³—³ Stalbaum has well exposed the impropriety of this expression, which seems to have been got from the Statesman.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And who is the best to tend a flock of sheep? What is his name?

Fr. Shepherd.

Soc. The laws therefore of the shepherd are the best for the sheep.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And those of the herdsman for oxen.

Fr. Yes.

Soc. And whose laws are the best for the minds of men? Are they not those of a king? Tell me.

Fr. I say so.

[11.] Soc. You speak well. Can you therefore tell me, who among the ancients was a good maker of the laws relating to pipes? Perhaps you have him not in your thoughts. Are you then willing that I should remind you?

Fr. By all means.

Soc. Was not Marsyas said to be so, and his loved Olympus the Phrygian.¹

Fr. True.

Soc. The pipe-playing of these men is most divine, and alone excites and shows forth those who are in need² of the gods; and it alone remains to the present time as being divine.

Fr. Such is the case.

Soc. And who amongst the ancient kings is said to have been a good law-maker, and whose institutions remain even now as being divine?

Fr. I do not recollect.

Soc. Do you not know, which of the Greeks are making use of laws the most ancient?

Fr. Are you speaking of the Lacedæmonians, and of Lycurgus the law-giver?

Soc. These institutions, however, are perhaps not three hundred years old, or a little more. But do you know from whence came the best of their laws?

¹ On this allusion to Marsyas and Olympus, Boeckh refers to Sympos. p. 215, C. § 39, and Schol. on Aristoph. Ιππ. 9.

² In lieu of χρησις, Cornarius suggested χορηγία, by which he probably understood the divine dancing, excited by the pipe, called ἐνθουσιασμός by Aristotle in Polit. viii. 5.

Fr. They say, from Crete.

Soc. Do not they of all the Greeks make use of laws the most ancient?

Fr. Yes.

[12.] Soc. Do you know then who among these were good kings? (Were they not) Minos and Rhadamanthus, the sons of Zeus and Europa, by whom those laws were made?

Fr. They say, Socrates, that Rhadamanthus was a just man, but that Minos was rustic, morose, and unjust.

Soc. You are telling, O best of men, a tale of Attica, and of tragedy.¹

Fr. What, are not such things told of Minos?

Soc. Not by Homer, at least, and Hesiod; and they are more trust-worthy than all the tragic poets, from whom you have heard what you are saying.

Fr. But what do they say about Minos?

Soc. I will tell you, that you may not, like the many, be guilty of impiety. For there is not any thing more impious than this, nor of what we ought to be more cautious, than of sinning against the gods, either in word or in deed; and next, against divine men. But you ought to take ever a very great care, when you are about to praise or blame any man, that you speak correctly; and for the sake of this, it is meet to learn how to distinguish good and bad men. For the deity feels indignant when any one blames a person similar to himself, or praises one dissimilar; ²for this is the good man.² For think not that stones, and wood, and birds, and serpents are sacred, but that men are not so; for a good man is the most sacred, and a depraved man the most defiled of all things. [13.] Now then, since Homer and Hesiod pass an encomium on Minos, on this account I will speak, in order that you, being a man sprung from a man, may not sin in word against a hero the son of Jupiter. For Homer, (in Od. xix.

¹ Boeckh believes there is an allusion to some plays of Sophocles and Euripides, where Minos and the affairs of Crete were introduced.

² The Greek is ἐστὶ δ' οὗτος ὁ ἀγαθός; in lieu of which Boeckh would read ἐστὶ δ' ὁμοίος ὁ ἀγαθός, similar to "Dei vero similis est vir bonus" in Ficinus. For he says that οὗτος would refer, like "hic" in Latin, to the party last mentioned, but ἐκείνος, like "ille," to the one before. Stalbaum however defends the impropriety of the usage of οὗτος by referring to Schæfer on Demosth. i. p. 541, and v. p. 322. Perhaps the author wrote here ἐστὶ δὲ θεῶν ὁμοίος ὁ ἀγαθός.

174.) speaking of Crete, says, there are many men, and ninety cities in it ;

Amongst them Knossus, a great city, where Reign'd Minos, who each ninth year converse held With mighty Zeus.

This then is Homer's praise of Minos, expressed in few words, such as he has not given to even one of his heroes. For that Zeus is a sophist,¹ and that the art itself is all-beautiful, he shows in many other places, and here likewise. For he says that Minos conversed in the ninth year² with Zeus, and went to be instructed by him, as if Zeus were a sophist. That Homer, then, does not bestow the honour of being instructed by Zeus upon any other hero, than Minos, is praise indeed to be wondered at. In the scene of the Odyssey, too, relating to the Dead,³ Homer has represented Minos as a judge, and holding a golden sceptre ; but not Rhadamanthus as judging there, or conversing with Zeus any where. On this account I say that Minos is extolled by Homer beyond all other heroes. For to have been instructed merely by Zeus, when he was the son of Zeus, carries with it no excess of praise. [14.] For the verse—He reigned, and each ninth year conversed with Zeus—means that he was the associate of Zeus ; for by ῥαποι is meant "discourses," and by ῥαπιστής, "an associate in discourse." Hence at each ninth year, Minos went to the cavern of Zeus, to learn some things, and to show forth others ; which, during the preceding period of nine years, he had learnt⁴ from Zeus. There are, however, some who understand by ῥαπιστής, "the associate" of Zeus in drinking and sport ; although any one may make use of this as a proof to show that they, who thus understand the word, say nothing

¹ The word is here taken in its original sense, of a person endued with wisdom. See Blomfield on Prom. 62.

² Such is the literal version of the Greek ἐνάρῳ ἔτει, by which Boeckh understands "during nine years." But according to Valerius Maximus, l. 2, "Minos, Cretensium rex, nono quoque anno in quoddam præaltum et vetusta religione consecratum specus secedere solebat et in eo commoratus, tanquam a Jove, quo se ortum ferebat, traditas sibi leges prærogabat." Hence, as remarked by Stalbaum, the author should have written here ὁ ἐνάρῳ ἔτους, as he has done just afterwards.

³ By Νερύια is meant what is now called book xi. To the same passage Plato alludes in Gorg. p. 526, C.

⁴ Ficinus has "acceperat," who read therefore in his MS. μεμαθήκει, subsequently found in others likewise.

to the purpose ; for although both the Greeks and Barbarians are numerous, there are none, who abstain from banquets, and the sport to which wine belongs, except the Cretans, and next the Lacedæmonians, who were instructed by the Cretans. But in Crete this is one of the other¹ laws, which Minos laid down, "not to drink with each other to intoxication." And it is evident, that what he deemed to be beautiful institutions, these he laid down for his own citizens. For Minos did not, like a knave, think one thing, and do another, contrary to what he thought ; but his intercourse with Zeus was, as I assert, through discourses for the attainment of virtue. Hence he laid down those laws for his citizens, through which Crete has been for all time prosperous, and Lacedæmon likewise, from the time when it began to make use of those laws, as being divine. [15.] But Rhadamanthus was indeed a good man ; for he was instructed by Minos. He did not however learn the whole of the royal art, but that part of it, which ministers to the royal, as far as presiding over courts of justice ; from whence he was said to be a good judge. For Minos employed him as a guardian of the laws in the city ; but Talus for those through the rest of Crete. For Talus thrice every year went through the villages in order to preserve the laws in them, and carried with him the laws written in tables of brass ; from whence he was called "brazen." Hesiod too asserts respecting Minos, what is closely related to this. For, having mentioned his name, he says,

Most regal was he of all mortal kings,
And o'er the most of neighbouring people ruled,
Of Zeus the sceptre holding, ²king like him ;²

and he too means by the sceptre of Zeus, nothing else than the instruction of Zeus, by which he regulated Crete.

[16.] Fr. On what account then, Socrates, was the report spread against Minos, of his being an unlearned and morose man ?

² The Greek is τῷ καὶ πόλει βασιλεῦσι : where Boeckh, whom Bekker and Stalbaum follow, suggested πολίων. But πολίων seems scarcely admissible after πλείστον. I have translated, as if Hesiod had written—τοῦ καὶ πίλας ὢν βασιλεῦσι : while the first line of the fragment, found no where else, has been restored to its original metrical form by Boeckh.

INTRODUCTION TO THE CLITOPHO.

THIS dialogue, like some others already mentioned, has been considered spurious. But it was reckoned amongst the genuine by Thrasyllus, as we learn from Diogenes Laertius iii. 50. It is distinctly alluded to by Arrian on Epictetus iii. 22, and Themistius Or. xxvi. p. 320, D., and covertly by Dio Chrysost. Or. xiii. p. 222, D., and Aristides, T. i. p. 78 ; ii. p. 378, as remarked by Ruhnken on Timæus in Τραγική σκηνή, and Wyttenbach on Julian, p. 42. It contains a summary of the leading doctrines promulgated by Socrates ; the greater part of which have formed the subject of separate dialogues by Plato and others. Its commencement alone has been preserved ; for the remainder was probably lost by its having been written at the end of the Codex Archetypus, that contained the rest of the existing dialogues of Plato ; for it would thus be exposed to the greatest chance of suffering from damp and the other accidents to which books are liable in the lapse of years : I say the Codex Archetypus ; because it is evident that all the MSS. that have been hitherto collated, are to be traced to such an original ; of which the one used by Ficinus was in a more complete state than any that have been examined by Bekker and others, as may be seen from the notes appended to the dialogue.

CLITOPHO.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND CLITOPHO.

SOCRATES.

A CERTAIN person has lately told me that Clitopho,¹ the son of Aristonymus, has been conversing with Lysias, and blaming the passing the time with Socrates, but been praising immoderately the intercourse with Thrasymachus.²

Clit. Whoever he was, Socrates, he has not accurately related to you the conversation I had with Lysias about you. For in some things indeed I did not praise you, but in others I did. But since you are evidently blaming me, although you pretend to care nothing about the matter, I will most willingly go through the conversation myself, especially since we happen to be alone, in order that you may the less imagine that I am ill disposed towards you. For now perhaps you have not heard correctly; so that you appear to be more harshly disposed towards me than is fitting. But if you will grant me the liberty of speech I shall most cheerfully accept it, and am willing to speak.

¹ Of this Clitopho, who is not mentioned elsewhere by Plato, the reader will find all that is known in the useful and learned Onomastic. Aristophan. appended by Holden to his recent edition of the dramatist.

² Of this Thrasymachus, who was a friend and admirer of Gorgias, see particularly Plato in Rep. p. i. p. 336; where his character is delineated in vivid colours. Other passages are quoted by Groen van Prinsterer in Prosopograph. Platon. p. 107—110.

Soc. Nay it would be¹ disgraceful for myself, when you are willing to benefit me, not to bear with you. For it is evident that, when I know in what respect I am better and worse, I shall pursue some things, and avoid others, to the utmost of my power.

Clit. You shall hear then. [2.] For while I am with you, Socrates, I am often astonished on hearing you; and you appear to me, as compared with other men, to speak most beautifully, when, reproving men, you exclaim like a god upon a machine²—"Whither are ye borne along? And—Are ye ignorant, that ye are doing nothing that ye ought, ye, who make every exertion how ye may get money, but neglect your children, to whom ye are to leave it, and the means whereby they may know how to use it justly; and do not find for them teachers of justice, if indeed it can be taught,³ and who, if it is to be made the subject of meditation and exercise, may sufficiently exercise them in it. Nor yet do ye previously attend to yourselves; but, seeing that both ye and your children have learnt sufficiently grammar, and music, and the gymnastic arts, which ye have considered as the perfect discipline of virtue, yet afterwards that ye become no less depraved with respect to riches, why do ye not despise the present mode of education, and seek after those, who will cause you to cease from this illiberal line of life? And yet it is through this neglect of what is right, and indolence, and not through the foot being out of time with the lyre, that brother himself arrays himself against brother, and states against states, and, out of all measure and harmony, are stirring up strife and war upon each other, and do and suffer the extreme of ill. But ye say, that they, who are unjust, are unjust not through the want of instruction, nor through ignorance, but voluntarily;⁴ and again, ye dare to assert that injustice is disgraceful and hateful to the gods. How then can any one voluntarily choose so great an evil? He (does so) ye say, through being conquered by pleasure. Is not this then an involuntary act, since to conquer is a voluntary one? So

² Upon the expression "Deus ex machina," see the commentators on Horace, A. P. 191, "Nec Deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus;" and Ruhnken on Timæus, Τραγικὴ σκηνὴ.

³ Compare the Meno, where the question is mooted at length, whether virtue in general, of which justice is a part, can be taught or not.

⁴ This doctrine is discussed at length in the Gorgias.

that reason perfectly convinces us, that to act unjustly is involuntary; and that every man privately, and all cities publicly, ought to pay more attention than they do at present to their conduct."

[3.] When therefore, Socrates, I hear you perpetually speaking so, I am greatly delighted with you, and pay you in a wonderful manner the tribute of praise. And when you say what follows in order upon this, that they, who cultivate their bodies, but neglect their soul,¹ do something different of this kind,¹ in neglecting that which is to govern, but busily attending to what is to be governed;² and when you assert that it is better for him, who does not know how to use a thing, to leave alone the use of it; for³ if a person does not know how to use his eyes or ears, or his whole body, it is better for him not to hear, nor see, nor to use his body for any need, than to use it in any way; and in a similar manner with respect to art. For it is evident (as you say)⁴ that he, who does not know how to use his own lyre, will not (know how to use) that of his neighbour; nor will he, who (knows not how to use) the (lyre) of others, (know how to use) his own, nor any other instrument or chattel whatever; and this your discourse ended beautifully (by inferring),⁵ that for him, who does not know how to use his soul, it is better to be at rest with respect to his soul, and not to live, than to live and act according to his own caprice; but, if there is any necessity for such a person to live, that it is better for him to lead the life of a slave, than of a freeman. For⁶ that this is to deliver

¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, because they were omitted by Ficinus, who probably could not understand them; nor can I. For though ἑρεπός is sometimes taken in the sense of κακός, as shown by Valckenaer in Diatrib. p. 112, C., yet here such a sense would be out of place. The author wrote perhaps ἀλλότριον, "strange."

² The middle voice, ἀρξόμενον, is to be taken passively. For a mass of middle verbs used similarly see Monk on Eurip. Hippol. 1458.

³ Instead of δή; two MSS. have δέ, i. e. γάρ, as shown by the passages quoted by Schæfer in the Index to Porson's Euripides in Γάρ.

⁴ Taylor has introduced "as you say" from "ut ipse ais" in Ficinus, to which there is nothing to answer in the Greek.

⁵ Here again Ficinus has "ut inferas;" nothing similar to which is to be found in the Greek.

⁶ After δικαιοσύνην in the Greek are two words, ὥς ἐστι, omitted by Ficinus, whom I have followed; although they probably contain some hidden error.

the rudder of the mind, like that of a ship, to another, who has learnt the art of governing men; which, Socrates, you have often called the statesman's art, and said it is the same as that of the judge and justice. [4.] To these, and many other and very beautiful reasonings, in which it is asserted that virtue can be taught,¹ and that a person ought above all things to pay attention to himself, I have scarcely at any time said a word in opposition, nor do I think that I shall ever say. For I deem them to be very exhortatory and useful, and really awakening us, as if we were asleep. I have therefore given my mind to them, as one about to hear what is to follow; and I have asked at first, not yourself, Socrates, but your equals in age, or fellow-thinkers, or friends, or in whatever name one must call the (party)² thus disposed towards you. For among them, I have first of all asked those, who are thought by you to be something, by inquiring what would be the discourse after this; and laying down a subject³ after your manner, I have said to them—How are we to receive for the present, O best of men, the exhortation of Socrates to virtue? as being merely a word,⁴ but that it is not in our power to follow it up in deed, and to comprehend it thoroughly? And will this be our employment through the whole of life, to exhort those who have not been exhorted as yet? ⁵and for them (to exhort) others?⁵ Or is it requisite for us after this to inquire of Socrates and each other, since we confess that this should be done, what is to come next? How, say we,⁶ ought we to begin the discipline relating to justice? As if some one had exhorted us to pay attention to the body, on perceiving that we, like boys, had no notion that the care of the body belongs to the gymnastic

² I have translated as if γένος or φύλον had dropt out after τὸ τοιοῦτον—

³ Instead of ῥέπειν, Ficinus seems to have found τέρειν in his MS. For his version is "questionem exposui."

⁴ The Greek is ὡς ὄντος μόνον τούτου. But though τούτου might be referred to προτροπῆς, yet the subsequent πρᾶγμα plainly shows that the author wrote, as I have translated, ὡς ὀνόματος ὄντος μόνον γ' αὐτοῦ. For ὄνομα and ἔργον are thus perpetually opposed to each other. See Porson on Phæn. 512.

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁶ Ficinus omits φάμεν, which is here quite unnecessary.

and medical arts, and afterwards reproached us by saying, that it was disgraceful to pay every attention to wheat and barley, and vines, and such other things as we labour to obtain for the sake of the body, but that we search after no art or device, so that the body may be rendered in the best condition, and this too when there is such an art. If then we inquired of the person so exhorting us—Do you say there are such arts as these? perhaps he would say, There are the gymnastic and medical arts.¹ And what now, we said, is the art that relates to the virtue of the soul? Let it be mentioned.¹ [5.]² But he, who seemed to be of the greatest strength for giving an answer to these questions, said to myself, that the very art, which you have heard Socrates mention, is no other than justice. And on my saying—Tell me not merely the name of the art,³ but explain it further in this way.³ There is an art called the medical. By this two things are effected; one, that physicians are always forming other physicians in addition to those already existing; the other, to effect health. Now of these one is no longer an art, but the work of the art, which teaches and is taught, which we call health. And in the case of carpentry, there is the building and the art; one the effect, and the other the teaching. So too of justice, one part is to make persons just, as each (of the arts mentioned) above (makes) artists. But what shall we say is the other work, which a just man is able to do for us? State it. One person⁴ has, I think, said in answer to us, that it is “the conducive;” another, that it is “the becoming;” another, that it is “the useful;” and another, that it is “the profitable.” But I rejoined by saying, that these very names exist in each of the arts, namely, to act rightly, profitably, usefully, and the like. But that, to which all these tend, each art will state itself. Thus, the art of carpentry will say, that “the right,”

¹ Ficus has what is very different from the Greek—“eodem pacto nunc, quam artem circa animæ virtutem versari censeamus, respondeat, quisquis peritissimus horum sibi videtur;” which Taylor has adopted, with the exception of the concluding clause.

² Instead of αὐτῶν, two MSS. offer αὐτῷ, which leads to αὐτῷ, as I have translated.

³ The Greek is simply ἀλλ' ὅδε.—But Ficus has more fully—“sed ulterius sic exponas;” which I have adopted.

⁴ Instead of οὗτος, Ficus found ἄλλος, as shown by his “Respondit alius—”

"the beautiful," "the becoming," (tend to this,) that wooden furniture may be (aptly)¹ made; which is not art, (but the work of art).² Let in like manner be mentioned the work of justice. [6.] At last one of your friends, Socrates, who appeared to speak most elegantly, answered me, that this was the work peculiar to justice, which does not belong to any other science, namely, to cause a friendship amongst states. But he, on the other hand, on being interrogated, said that friendship was a good, and by no means an evil. But on being asked about the friendships³ of boys and of wild animals, for by that name we call (their attachments), he did not admit that they are friendships; for it happened that such (friendships) of theirs⁴ were for the greater part hurtful rather than advantageous; and that those, who call them so, call them falsely; but that friendship existing really and truly was most clearly an union of sentiment.⁵ But on being asked whether he meant by an union of sentiment, an agreement in opinion or science, he repudiated the agreement in opinion; for many and hurtful agreements in opinion are compelled to take place amongst men; but he conceded that friendship was entirely a good, and the work of justice; so that he said, an agreement in sentiment was the same as science really existing, but not opinion. But when we were at this part of our discourse, the parties present being in a state of doubt⁶ were competent to find fault with him,⁶ and to say, that the reasoning had run round to the point first mooted; and they affirmed that the medical art is a certain agreement in sentiment; and so are all the other arts; and that they are able to state about what they are conversant; but that the art called by you justice, or

² Here again Ficinus supplies what the train of thought requires, but is wanting in the Greek, "sed artis opus."

³ The word in Æschylus Prom. 501, is σφιγγήθρα. On the feelings felt by animals for each other, see the commentators on Virgil, G. iii. 517, "arator Mærentem abjungens fraterna morte juvencum."

⁴ In lieu of αὐτῶν, two MSS. offer αὐτῶν, which I have adopted.

⁵ So Sallust, "Idem velle atque idem nolle ea demum est firma amicitia." Compare Polit. p. 311, B., 351, D., and Alcib. I. p. 127, A., εἰπερ φιλία ὁμόνοια ἦν.

an agreement in sentiment, it had escaped them as to whither it tends, and that it is not manifest what is its work. At last I inquired of yourself, Socrates, upon these points; and you told me that it is the work of justice to injure enemies, and benefit friends; but afterwards it appeared to you, that the just man will never injure any one, but will act to the advantage of every one in all things. [7.] Having endured this not once, nor even twice, but for a length of time, and being urgent with you, Socrates, I was tired out; thinking, indeed, that you effected in the best manner of all men, the exhortation to the study of virtue; but that¹ one of two things (must take place),¹ either that you are able to effect thus much alone, but nothing further—which might happen in the case of any other art—as, for instance, that he who is not a pilot, may exercise himself in praising the pilot's art, as a thing of great value to man; and similarly in the case of other arts—so a person may perhaps apply the same remark on the subject of justice to yourself, as not having a greater knowledge than others of its nature, because you praise it in a beautiful manner. ²Such however is not my (opinion), but (as I say),² one of two things (take place); either that you do not know (what justice is), or that you are unwilling to impart (the knowledge of it) to me. On this account then, I think I shall go to Thrasyarchus, and wherever else I can, as being in doubt, ³(and where I hope I shall be freed from doubts; nor should I betake myself elsewhere,)³ if you were willing to finish your exhortatory discourses to me. Now, for instance, if I had been exhorted on the subject of the gymnastic art, that I ought not to neglect the body, you would state to me what comes next after the exhortation-speech, what is the nature of my body, and what attention it requires. And let this be done at present. Lay it down then that Clitopho acknowledges it to be ridiculous to pay attention to other things, but to neglect the soul, for the sake of which we labour in other things; and imagine that I have really¹ spoken upon all other points, next in order to those, which I have just now gone through. I beg of you not to act in any respect otherwise, that I may not (hereafter),² as at present, partly praise you before Lysias and the rest, and blame you likewise in part. For I will say, Socrates, that you are worth every thing to the man, who is not yet exhorted; but to him who has been exhorted, you are nearly an impediment to his arriving at the end of virtue, and becoming happy.

² I have followed Ficinus, who has supplied what was necessary to unite the unconnected members of the sentence, "Ego autem non sic existimo; e duobus enim alterum inquam."

³ All the words within the numerals are to be found only in the Latin of Ficinus, "speraveroque a dubitationibus liberari; neque vero alio me conferrem." Something similar to which must have been read in his MS., for it is hardly possible to believe that he supplied them himself to complete the sense.

² Ficinus has "quemadmodum nunc ita et posthac;" what the balance of the sentence evidently requires. He found, I suspect, in his MS., ἵνα μὴ καὶ αὖτις, καθάπερ νῦν—

INTRODUCTION TO THE EPISTLES.

THE last portion of the works of Plato, that have been considered by some scholars to be spurious, and genuine by others, are the Epistles. These, according to Diogenes Laertius, iii. 61, were thirteen in number; and just so many have been found in different MSS., and addressed to the parties mentioned by Diogenes, with the exception of the 10th and 11th; which, he says, were written respectively to Aristodemus and Leodamas, instead of Aristodorus and Laodamas, as found at present—a discrepancy evidently arising from a literal variation merely.

Out of the whole number, all but 1, 10, 11, 12, have been quoted distinctly, or covertly alluded to, by different writers, commencing with Cicero, and ending with some of the Greek fathers. One, however, the 12th, addressed to Archytas, is reported in some MSS. to be spurious; although Diogenes, in viii. 79, states it was written in answer to the letter there preserved from Archytas to Plato.

As scarcely any thing has been written upon the Epistles, with the exception of the notes of Stephens, based for the most part on the version of Ficinus, I have been compelled to say more than I should otherwise have done, with the view of directing attention to passages, where, from the corruptions in the text, I have been unable to see my way clearly.

THE

EPISTLES OF PLATO.

EPISTLE I.¹

DION TO DIONYSIUS—PROSPERITY.²

WHILE I was passing so long a time with you and administering the affairs of your kingdom the most faithfully³ of all, who took in hand your interests,⁴ I had to endure calumnies really grievous. For I know that nothing of a rather cruel kind you ever thought proper to do with my consent. And of this all, who have taken a part in the state with yourself, are my witnesses, with many of whom I have been engaged in a contest, after I had freed them from no trifling calamities. And when in possession of the sole power, I had often preserved for you the state, I have been sent away in a more ignominious manner than it became you to drive out a beggar, and you have ordered me to sail away, after I had resided with you for such a length of time. With regard to my future conduct, I shall consult my interest, somewhat more like a human being ;

¹ Although this Epistle appears to have been written by Dion, it is ascribed to Plato in nearly all the MSS. but the one used by Ficinus. The whole of the superscription is however omitted in one MS., and the word Πλάτων alone in another.

² On the address εὐ πράττειν, adopted by Plato, see Epist. iii. and the elaborate notes of Menage on Diog. L. iii. 61.

³ I have adopted πεπιστευμένος, in lieu of πεπιστευμένος, as suggested by the Bipont editor.

⁴ Such seems to be the meaning of τὰς ὠφελείας ὑμῶν λαμβανόντων. But λαμβάνειν is not, I suspect, to be found elsewhere in this sense. Ficinus has "utilitates vestras captantibus."

Nor fertile furrows of the earth's wide plain
Such self-sufficient power e'er obtain,
As of good men the mind, that thinks the same.¹

Fare thee well, and know that thou hast erred thus much as regards us, in order that you may conduct yourself better towards others.

EPISTLE II.

PLATO TO DIONYSIUS - PROSPERITY.

I HAVE heard from Archedemus, that you think that not only I ought to keep quiet myself, but my familiar friends likewise, on matters relating to yourself, and neither do or say any thing to your disparagement; but that you make an exception in the case of Dion. Now this assertion, that Dion is to be excepted, signifies that I have no power over my connexions. For if I had a power, as well over others as you and Dion, a greater good would be the result both to all of you and the rest of the Greeks, as I assert. But now I am great through rendering myself a follower of the dictates of my reason. And this I say, because Cratistolus and Polyxenus have not given you sound information; for one of them asserted, says common report, that he had heard at Olympia of many of my associates having spoken ill of you. But perhaps he heard more acutely than I did. ² For such a thing I have not heard.³ But it is requisite, as it seems to me, for you to act thus for the future, whenever any one says any thing about any one of us, by sending a letter to inquire of myself; for I shall neither be afraid or ashamed to tell the truth. But to you and me such is the state of circumstances with regard to each other that we are neither of us unknown to any one, so to say, of the Greeks; nor is our intercourse passed over in silence; nor let it be concealed from you, that it will not be passed over in silence in the time to come ; so many have obtained a knowledge of it, as having been neither little nor quietly carried on. But why do I say this ? I will now tell you, beginning from events far back.

¹ From the word ὁμοφράδμων it is fair to infer that φίλων τε have dropt out after ἀγαθῶν, for, as Sallust says, "Idem velle atque idem nolle est —amicitia;" and a similar sentiment is to be found in Pseudo-Plato, Clitoph. § 6, and the passages quoted there.

² The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

Intellect and great power naturally tend to the same ; and these two always pursue, and seek after, and unite with each other. In the next place, men are delighted to speak about these subjects themselves, and to hear about them from others in their private conversations, or in the writings of poets. Thus for example, when persons discourse about Hiero, and Pausanias the Lacedaemonian, they are delighted in bringing forward the intercourse of Simonides with these men, and what he did and said to them ; and they are accustomed to celebrate together Periander of Corinth, and Thales of Miletus ; and Pericles, and Anaxagoras ; and Croesus, and Solon, as being men of wisdom, and Cyrus, a person of power. Poets too, in imitation of this, bring together Creon and Tiresias, Polydus and Minos, Agamemnon and Nestor, Ulysses and Palamedes ; and, as it appears to me, for the same reason, the first men brought together Prometheus and Zeus ; and they sing of some of these, as having a difference, and others a friendship with each other ; and again, of some as having at one time a difference, and at another friendship ; and having similar feelings on some points, and different upon others. Now all these things I mention, as being willing to show that men will not be silent respecting us, when we are dead ; so that we ought to pay an attention to them. For we must, as it seems, pay some regard even to the time to come ; especially since it happens that the most slave-like persons do by a kind of nature, neglect it entirely ; but persons of a more elegant mind do every thing in order that they may be spoken well of hereafter. And this I consider an argument that the dead have a certain perception¹ of things here. For the most excellent minds divine that this is so, but the most depraved deny it. Now the divinations of god-like men are of greater weight than of those who are not so. And I conceive that if it were permitted for those persons of a former age, to whom I am alluding, to correct aught in their intercourse, they would earnestly endeavour that better things be said of them, than at present. This however it is still permitted us to say, god willing, that if any thing has been done not correctly during our former intercourse, either in word or deed, we may correct it. For on the subject of philosophy I assert that a true opinion will be formed of us; a better one if we are persons of worth, but the contrary, if we are worthless. And indeed, if we pay attention to this, we shall not do any thing more pious; nor any thing more impious, if we neglect it. But how this ought to take place, and how it is just, I will explain.

When I came to Sicily, I had the reputation of excelling very much in philosophy; and I wished on my arrival at Syracuse to have you a witness in my favour, in order¹ that philosophy might be honoured by the multitude. But this did not turn out prosperously.² I do not however assign that as the reason which the many would say, but because you appeared unwilling to put implicit confidence in me; but willing to send me away and to send for others, and to inquire what my business was, by this, as it seems, distrusting me. And they, who were proclaiming loudly these matters, were many, affirming that you had a contempt for myself, and were seriously applying yourself to other things. Such were the reports at that time bruited abroad.

Now hear what after this it is just to do, in order that I may reply to your question, how you and I ought to conduct ourselves to each other. If then you have a contempt for philosophy, bid farewell to it. But if you have heard from another, or discovered³ yourself any thing more excellent³ than what you have from me, honour it. But if what (you have heard) from me please you, then must you honour highly myself likewise. Now, therefore, as from the beginning, do you lead and I will follow. For being honoured by you, I will honour you (in return); but not being honoured, I shall keep quiet. Further still, if by honouring me, you take the lead in this,¹ you will seem to honour philosophy; and that very thing,² which you are considering even otherwise,³ will bring you the reputation of being considered by the multitude a philosopher. But by honouring you, when not honouring me, I should seem to be admiring and pursuing wealth; but this we know has a name dishonourable amongst all men; and, to sum up, by your honouring me, there will be an ornament to both of us; but by my (honouring) you, a disgrace to both. And thus much on these matters.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were—οἱ μοι, ἵνα δῇ—not σε, ἵνα δῇ μοι—where μοι has no meaning.

² Why εὐαγής is thus rendered by Ficinus and Ast, I cannot understand. The word is learnedly illustrated by Hemsterhuis in a note printed by Gaisford on Markland's Eurip. Suppl. 662.

³ I have adopted, in lieu of βελτίονα εὐρηκάς—ἐκείνα from one MS. βέλτιον εὐρηκάς τι, and ἐκείνο, similar to "Si quid novisti rectius istius" in Horace.

But the little sphere³ does not answer; and this Archidemus will show you, when he arrives. Moreover, you must explain to him very distinctly respecting the matter, which is far more honourable and divine than this, and respecting which you sent as being in doubt. For you say, according to his report, that there has not been a sufficient demonstration respecting the nature of the first. I must speak to you by enigmas,⁴ in order that, should the tablet meet with any accident in its folds by land or sea, he who reads it may not understand.⁴ For such is the case.

"As regards the king of all, all things are his,⁵ and all are for his sake, and he is the cause of all that is beautiful. But about a second are the secondary things; and about a third the third. Now the soul of man is eager to learn respecting these things of what kind they are, looking to what is allied to itself, none of which it possesses sufficiently. ⁶But respecting the king (himself)⁶ and those of which I have spoken, there is nothing of this kind. But of that, which is after this, does the soul speak. But of what kind, son of Dionysius and Doris, is your inquiry

¹ I cannot understand τούτου: nor could Ficinus; whose version is—"honorare prius me cæperis." Perhaps Plato wrote, αὐτὸς or οὗτος—

² Here again I am at a loss, and so was Ficinus. For he has—"quod tu imprimis cupiebas."

³ What this little sphere was is uncertain. Perhaps it was a kind of orrery. T. See Epist. 13.

⁴ In the Greek words between the numerals lies hid a tragic distich, "Ἴν' ἂν τι δόλος ἐν πτυχαῖς κόντου δια' Ἡ γῆς πάθος, μὴ γινῶ τὸ γράμμα τις τυχών: as may be inferred from Eurip. Iph. T. 1744, ed. Monk.

⁵ I have followed one MS. that reads πάντ' ἐκείνου ἔστι, instead of πάντ' ἔστι καὶ ἐκείνου—

⁶ Ficinus has—"sed in rege ipso et in his," as if he had found in his MS. τοῦ δὲ βασιλέως αὐτοῦ—in lieu of τοῦ δὲ βασιλέως πρίν—

concerning what is the cause of all things evil.¹ Or rather, is it not a kind of labour-throes on this point, which are produced in the soul, and which if a person does not take away from it, (the soul) will never meet with truth existing in reality.

And you told me that you had thought of this in the garden under the laurel trees, and that it was your discovery. And I said, that if this appeared to you to be the case, you had freed me from a long discussion. I said however that I had never met with any other person, who had discovered it, but that it had been a great source of trouble to myself. But perhaps you have heard this from some one; but accidentally impelled in this direction by a divine allotment,² you have not kept firm hold of the demonstrations on this point, and pinned them down;³ but you are dashing on, at one time in this way, and at another in a different way, to what is the object of fancy; but such it is not. Nor has this occurred to you alone; but be well assured, that no one, when he first hears me, is otherwise affected than thus⁴ in the beginning.⁴ And one having more trouble, and another less, are with difficulty liberated from it; but nearly all of them have of it not a little. Such then having been, and is still the case, we have in my opinion nearly discovered that, about which you sent to me, namely, how we ought to be affected towards each other. For since you are testing (my doctrines) by associating with other persons, and⁵ placing them by the side of those (promulgated) by others, and (considering)⁶

¹ In lieu of κακῶν, Proclus, in Theolog. Platon. ii. 4, p. 103, offers καλῶν, adopted by Taylor; and so one MS. collated by Bekker. The other however is the preferable reading. Unless it be said that Plato wrote both, καλῶν τε καὶ κακῶν. For Dionysius, like many philosophers before and after his time, was puzzled with the origin and continuance of evil, introduced by one or more powers, the authors of all good.

² The expression θεία μοῖρα would now be applied to what we call "genius," or "gift of nature."

³ So I have translated κατίδησας. Ficinus has "protulisti," which would lead to κατίδειξας—

⁴ Ficinus omits κατ' ἀρχάς, probably deeming them superfluous after πρῶτον ἀκούσαντι. Perhaps Plato wrote κατὰ παραχάς, "by some confusion."

⁵ The Greek is παραθεώμενος. But there is, I suspect, no such compound in Greek. Ficinus has "cum—comparaveris," from which Faehse was led to παραθίμενος, which I have adopted, and translated as if θεώμενος had dropped out before αὐτὰ καθ' αὐτά.

For I will say, Socrates, that you are worth every thing to the man, who is not yet exhorted; but to him who has been exhorted, you are nearly an impediment to his arriving at the end of virtue, and becoming happy.

² Ficinus has "quemadmodum nunc ita et posthac;" what the balance of the sentence evidently requires. He found, I suspect, in his MS., ἵνα μὴ καὶ αὐθις, καθάπερ νῦν—

INTRODUCTION TO THE EPISTLES.

THE last portion of the works of Plato, that have been considered by some scholars to be spurious, and genuine by others, are the Epistles. These, according to Diogenes Laertius, iii. 61, were thirteen in number; and just so many have been found in different MSS., and addressed to the parties mentioned by Diogenes, with the exception of the 10th and 11th; which, he says, were written respectively to Aristodemus and Leodamas, instead of Aristodorus and Laodamas, as found at present—a discrepancy evidently arising from a literal variation merely.

Out of the whole number, all but 1, 10, 11, 12, have been quoted distinctly, or covertly alluded to, by different writers, commencing with Cicero, and ending with some of the Greek fathers. One, however, the 12th, addressed to Archytas, is reported in some MSS. to be spurious; although Diogenes, in viii. 79, states it was written in answer to the letter there preserved from Archytas to Plato.

As scarcely any thing has been written upon the Epistles, with the exception of the notes of Stephens, based for the most part on the version of Ficinus, I have been compelled to say more than I should otherwise have done, with the view of directing attention to passages, where, from the corruptions in the text, I have been unable to see my way clearly.

THE EPISTLES OF PLATO.

EPISTLE I.¹

DION TO DIONYSIUS—PROSPERITY.²

WHILE I was passing so long a time with you and administering the affairs of your kingdom the most faithfully³ of all, who took in hand your interests,⁴ I had to endure calumnies really grievous. For I know that nothing of a rather cruel kind you ever thought proper to do with my consent. And of this all, who have taken a part in the state with yourself, are my witnesses, with many of whom I have been engaged in a contest, after I had freed them from no trifling calamities. And when in possession of the sole power, I had often preserved for you the state, I have been sent away in a more ignominious manner than it became you to drive out a beggar, and you have ordered me to sail away, after I had resided with you for such a length of time. With regard to my future conduct, I shall consult my interest, somewhat more like a human being;

¹ Although this Epistle appears to have been written by Dion, it is ascribed to Plato in nearly all the MSS. but the one used by Ficinus. The whole of the superscription is however omitted in one MS., and the word Πλάτων alone in another.

² On the address εὐ πρᾶττεν, adopted by Plato, see Epist. iii. and the elaborate notes of Menage on Diog. L. iii. 61.

³ I have adopted πιστευμένως, in lieu of πιστευμένος, as suggested by the Bipont editor.

⁴ Such seems to be the meaning of τὰς ὠφελείας ὑμῶν λαμβανόντων. But λαμβάνειν is not, I suspect, to be found elsewhere in this sense. Ficinus has “utilitates vestras captantibus.”

A tyrant of that kind, shall live alone.¹

As to the splendid gold, which you gave for my departure, Baccheius, the bearer of this epistle, brings it back; for it was neither sufficient for my travelling expenses, nor useful for the rest of life, and it would bring the greatest disgrace upon you as the giver, and not much less upon me, as the receiver. But it evidently makes no difference to you, either to give or receive as much gold as this; so that after getting it again, prove by it your attention to some other of your associates, as you did to me. For you have paid sufficiently an attention to me. And now one may mention opportunely the sentiment of Euripides, that

² When thy affairs shall otherwise fall out,
Thou'lt pray that such a man were standing by thee.³

But I wish to remind you, that the majority of other tragic poets, when they introduce a tyrant, dying at the hands of any one, make him call out,

By friends deserted, do I hapless perish;⁴

but no one represents a tyrant perishing through the want of gold. To those too, who possess any mind, that piece of poetry is thought to be not ill said,

Not glittering gold, 'mongst men⁵ most rare
During a life of hapless care,
Nor steel⁶ nor couch⁷ with silver dight,
By mortals⁸ valued, strike the sight,

¹ In the words ὁ δὲ Τοιοῦτος ὢν τύραννος οἰήσεις μόνος, there is evidently a dramatic fragment, as I have translated; and so there is in the preceding words, ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν—ἀπανθρωπότατον, which it would require no great talent to elicit.

² In λαμπρόν there is a latent irony, and so too in the subsequent ικανῶς.

³ In this distich, as detected by Barnes, I have with Stephens adopted ἄλλως, the correction of Cornarius, in lieu of ἄλλων.

⁴ Compare the sentiment in Gray,

“Deserted at his utmost need,
By friends his former bounty fed,”

when alluding to the death of Richard the Second.

⁵ One MS. has ἐν θνατοῖς, which seems preferable to ἐν θνατῷ or ἐν θνατῶν in the other.

⁶ Taylor translated ἀδάμας by “diamond,” an error into which some other scholars have fallen.

⁷ I have adopted κλίνα, found in one MS., in lieu of κλίνας.

⁸ Here too I have adopted ἀνθρώπων, from the margin of one MS., instead of ἀνθρώπον.

Nor fertile furrows of the earth's wide plain
Such self-sufficient power e'er obtain,
As of good men the mind, that thinks the same.¹

Fare thee well, and know that thou hast erred thus much as regards us, in order that you may conduct yourself better towards others.

EPISTLE II.

PLATO TO DIONYSIUS - PROSPERITY.

I HAVE heard from Archedemus, that you think that not only I ought to keep quiet myself, but my familiar friends likewise, on matters relating to yourself, and neither do or say any thing to your disparagement; but that you make an exception in the case of Dion. Now this assertion, that Dion is to be excepted, signifies that I have no power over my connexions. For if I had a power, as well over others as you and Dion, a greater good would be the result both to all of you and the rest of the Greeks, as I assert. But now I am great through rendering myself a follower of the dictates of my reason. And this I say, because Cratistolus and Polyxenus have not given you sound information; for one of them asserted, says common report, that he had heard at Olympia of many of my associates having spoken ill of you. But perhaps he heard more acutely than I did. ²For such a thing I have not heard.³ But it is requisite, as it seems to me, for you to act thus for the future, whenever any one says any thing about any one of us, by sending a letter to inquire of myself; for I shall neither be afraid or ashamed to tell the truth. But to you and me such is the state of circumstances with regard to each other that we are neither of us unknown to any one, so to say, of the Greeks; nor is our intercourse passed over in silence; nor let it be concealed from you, that it will not be

¹ From the word ὁμοφράδμων it is fair to infer that φίλων τε have dropt out after ἀγαθῶν, for, as Sallust says, "Idem velle atque idem nolle est —amicitia;" and a similar sentiment is to be found in Pseudo-Plato, Clitoph. § 6, and the passages quoted there.

² The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

the rudder of the mind, like that of a ship, to another, who has learnt the art of governing men; which, Socrates, you have often called the statesman's art, and said it is the same as that of the judge and justice. [4.] To these, and many other and very beautiful reasonings, in which it is asserted that virtue can be taught,¹ and that a person ought above all things to pay attention to himself, I have scarcely at any time said a word in opposition, nor do I think that I shall ever say. For I deem them to be very exhortatory and useful, and really awakening us, as if we were asleep. I have therefore given my mind to them, as one about to hear what is to follow; and I have asked at first, not yourself, Socrates, but your equals in age, or fellow-thinkers, or friends, or in whatever name one must call the (party)² thus disposed towards you. For among them, I have first of all asked those, who are thought by you to be something, by inquiring what would be the discourse after this; and laying down a subject³ after your manner, I have said to them—How are we to receive for the present, O best of men, the exhortation of Socrates to virtue? as being merely a word,⁴ but that it is not in our power to follow it up in deed, and to comprehend it thoroughly? And will this be our employment through the whole of life, to exhort those who have not been exhorted as yet? ⁵and for them (to exhort) others?⁶ Or is it requisite for us after this to inquire of Socrates and each other, since we confess that this should be done, what is to come next? How, say we,⁶ ought we to begin the discipline relating to justice? As if some one had exhorted us to pay attention to the body, on perceiving that we, like boys, had no notion that the care of the body belongs to the gymnastic

¹ This Socrates never asserted; at least if any reliance is to be placed on the Meno.

² I have translated as if γένος or φύλον had dropt out after τὸ τοιοῦτον—

³ Instead of τρόπον, Ficinus seems to have found τόπον in his MS. For his version is "questionem exposui."

⁴ The Greek is ὡς ὄνομα μόνον τούτου. But though τούτου might be referred to προτροπῆς, yet the subsequent πράγματι plainly shows that the author wrote, as I have translated, ὡς ὀνόματος ὄντος μόνον γ' αὐτοῦ. For ὄνομα and ἔργον are thus perpetually opposed to each other. See Porson on Phæn. 512.

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁶ Ficinus omits φάμεν, which is here quite unnecessary.

and medical arts, and afterwards reproached us by saying, that it was disgraceful to pay every attention to wheat and barley, and vines, and such other things as we labour to obtain for the sake of the body, but that we search after no art or device, so that the body may be rendered in the best condition, and this too when there is such an art. If then we inquired of the person so exhorting us—Do you say there are such arts as these? perhaps he would say, There are the gymnastic and medical arts. ¹ And what now, we said, is the art that relates to the virtue of the soul? Let it be mentioned. ¹ [5.] ² But he, who seemed to be of the greatest strength for giving an answer to these questions, said to myself, that the very art, which you have heard Socrates mention, is no other than justice. And on my saying—Tell me not merely the name of the art, ³ but explain it further in this way. ³ There is an art called the medical. By this two things are effected; one, that physicians are always forming other physicians in addition to those already existing; the other, to effect health. Now of these one is no longer an art, but the work of the art, which teaches and is taught, which we call health. And in the case of carpentry, there is the building and the art; one the effect, and the other the teaching. So too of justice, one part is to make persons just, as each (of the arts mentioned) above (makes) artists. But what shall we say is the other work, which a just man is able to do for us? State it. One person ⁴ has, I think, said in answer to us, that it is “the conducive;” another, that it is “the becoming;” another, that it, is “the useful;” and another, that it is “the profitable.” But I rejoined by saying, that these very names exist in each of the arts, namely, to act rightly, profitably, usefully, and the like. But that, to which all these tend, each art will state itself. Thus, the art of carpentry will say, that “the right,”

¹ Ficinus has what is very different from the Greek—“eodem pacto nunc, quam artem circa animæ virtutem versari censeamus, respondeat, quisquis peritissimus horum sibi videtur;” which Taylor has adopted, with the exception of the concluding clause.

² Instead of αὐτῶν, two MSS. offer αὐτῷ, which leads to αὐτῷ, as I have translated.

³ The Greek is simply ἀλλ' ὥδε.—But Ficinus has more fully—“sed ulterius sic exponas;” which I have adopted.

⁴ Instead of οὗτος, Ficinus found ἄλλος, as shown by his “Respondit alius—”

"the beautiful," "the becoming," (tend to this,) that wooden furniture may be (aptly)¹ made; which is not art, (but the work of art).² Let in like manner be mentioned the work of justice. [6.] At last one of your friends, Socrates, who appeared to speak most elegantly, answered me, that this was the work peculiar to justice, which does not belong to any other science, namely, to cause a friendship amongst states. But he, on the other hand, on being interrogated, said that friendship was a good, and by no means an evil. But on being asked about the friendships³ of boys and of wild animals, for by that name we call (their attachments), he did not admit that they are friendships; for it happened that such (friendships) of theirs⁴ were for the greater part hurtful rather than advantageous; and that those, who call them so, call them falsely; but that friendship existing really and truly was most clearly an union of sentiment.⁵ But on being asked whether he meant by an union of sentiment, an agreement in opinion or science, he repudiated the agreement in opinion; for many and hurtful agreements in opinion are compelled to take place amongst men; but he conceded that friendship was entirely a good, and the work of justice; so that he said, an agreement in sentiment was the same as science really existing, but not opinion. But when we were at this part of our discourse, the parties present being in a state of doubt⁶ were competent to find fault with him,⁶ and to say, that the reasoning had run round to the point first mooted; and they affirmed that the medical art is a certain agreement in sentiment; and so are all the other arts; and that they are able to state about what they are conversant; but that the art called by you justice, or

² Here again Ficinus supplies what the train of thought requires, but is wanting in the Greek, "sed artis opus."

³ The word in Æschylus Prom. 501, is σπρίγηθρα. On the feelings felt by animals for each other, see the commentators on Virgil, G. iii. 517, "arator Mœrentem abjungens fraterna morte juvenum."

⁴ In lieu of αὐτῶν, two MSS. offer αὐτῶν, which I have adopted.

⁵ So Sallust, "Idem velle atque idem nolle ea demum est firma amicitia." Compare Polit. p. 311, B., 351, D., and Alcib. I. p. 127, A., εἰπερ φιλία ὁμόνοια ἦν.

⁶ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, because they are not found in the version of Ficinus; while in lieu of καὶ τοὶ ἦσαν, the oldest MS. offers a remarkable various reading in ἐπεχίρησαν— an agreement in sentiment, it had escaped them as to whither it tends, and that it is not manifest what is its work. At last I inquired of yourself, Socrates, upon these points; and you told me that it is the work of justice to injure enemies, and benefit friends; but afterwards it appeared to you, that the just man will never injure any one, but will act to the advantage of every one in all things. [7.] Having endured this not once, nor even twice, but for a length of time, and being urgent with you, Socrates, I was tired out; thinking, indeed, that you effected in the best manner of all men, the exhortation to the study of virtue; but that¹ one of two things (must take place),¹ either that you are able to effect thus much alone, but nothing further—which might happen in the case of any other art—as, for instance, that he who is not a pilot, may exercise himself in praising the pilot's art, as a thing of great value to man; and similarly in the case of other arts—so a person may perhaps apply the same remark on the subject of justice to yourself, as not having a greater knowledge than others of its nature, because you praise it in a beautiful manner. ²Such however is not my (opinion), but (as I say),² one of two things (take place); either that you do not know (what justice is), or that you are unwilling to impart (the knowledge of it) to me. On this account then, I think I shall go to Thrasymachus, and wherever else I can, as being in doubt, ³(and where I hope I shall be freed from doubts; nor should I betake myself elsewhere,)³ if you were willing to finish your exhortatory discourses to me. Now, for instance, if I had been exhorted on the subject of the gymnastic art, that I ought not to neglect the body, you would state to me what comes next after the exhortation-speech, what is the nature of my body, and what attention it requires. And let

² I have followed Ficinus, who has supplied what was necessary to unite the unconnected members of the sentence, "Ego autem non sic existimo; e duobus enim alterum inquam."

³ All the words within the numerals are to be found only in the Latin of Ficinus, "asperaveroque a dubitationibus liberari; neque vero alio me conferrem—" Something similar to which must have been read in his MS., for it is hardly possible to believe that he supplied them himself to complete the sense.

this be done at present. Lay it down then that Clitopho acknowledges it to be ridiculous to pay attention to other things, but to neglect the soul, for the sake of which we labour in other things; and imagine that I have really¹ spoken upon all other points, next in order to those, which I have just now gone through. I beg of you not to act in any respect otherwise, that I may not (hereafter),² as at present, partly praise you before Lysias and the rest, and blame you likewise in part. For I will say, Socrates, that you are worth every thing to the man, who is not yet exhorted; but to him who has been exhorted, you are nearly an impediment to his arriving at the end of virtue, and becoming happy.

² Ficinus has "quemadmodum nunc ita et posthac;" what the balance of the sentence evidently requires. He found, I suspect, in his MS., ἵνα μὴ καὶ αὐθις, καθάπερ νῦν—

¹ From the word ὁμοφράδμων it is fair to infer that φίλων τε have dropt out after ἀγαθῶν, for, as Sallust says, "Idem velle atque idem nolle est —amicitia;" and a similar sentiment is to be found in Pseudo-Plato, Clitoph. § 6, and the passages quoted there.

² The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

passed over in silence in the time to come ; so many have obtained a knowledge of it, as having been neither little nor quietly carried on. But why do I say this ? I will now tell you, beginning from events far back :

Intellect and great power naturally tend to the same ; and these two always pursue, and seek after, and unite with each other. In the next place, men are delighted to speak about these subjects themselves ; and to hear about them from others in their private conversations, or in the writings of poets. Thus for example, when persons discourse about Hiero, and Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, they are delighted in bringing forward the intercourse of Simonides with these men, and what he did and said to them ; and they are accustomed to celebrate together Periander of Corinth, and Thales of Miletus ; and Pericles, and Anaxagoras ; and Croesus, and Solon, as being men of wisdom, and Cyrus, a person of power. Poets too, in imitation of this, bring together Creon and Tiresias, Polydus and Minos, Agamemnon and Nestor, Ulysses and Palamedes ; and, as it appears to me, for the same reason, the first men brought together Prometheus and Zeus ; and they sing of some of these, as having a difference, and others a friendship with each other ; and again, of some as having at one time a difference, and at another friendship ; and having similar feelings on some points, and different upon others. Now all these things I mention, as being willing to show that men will not be silent respecting us, when we are dead ; so that we ought to pay an attention to them. For we must, as it seems, pay some regard even to the time to come ; especially since it happens that the most slave-like persons do by a kind of nature, neglect it entirely ; but persons of a more elegant mind do every thing in order that they may be spoken well of hereafter. And this I consider an argument that the dead have a certain perception¹ of things here. For the most excellent minds divine that this is so, but the most depraved deny it. Now the divinations of god-like men are of greater weight than of those who are not so. And I conceive that if it were permitted for those persons of a former age, to whom I am alluding, to correct aught in their intercourse, they would earnestly endeavour that better things be said of them, than at present. This however it is still permitted us to say, god willing, that if any thing has been done not correctly during our former intercourse, either in word or deed, we may correct it. For on the subject of philosophy I assert that a true opinion will be formed of us; a better one if we are persons of worth, but the contrary, if we are worthless. And indeed, if we pay attention to this, we shall not do any thing more pious; nor any thing more impious, if we neglect it. But how this ought to take place, and how it is just, I will explain.

When I came to Sicily, I had the reputation of excelling very much in philosophy; and I wished on my arrival at Syracuse to have you a witness in my favour, in order¹ that philosophy might be honoured by the multitude. But this did not turn out prosperously.² I do not however assign that as the reason which the many would say, but because you appeared unwilling to put implicit confidence in me; but willing to send me away and to send for others, and to inquire what my business was, by this, as it seems, distrusting me. And they, who were proclaiming loudly these matters, were many, affirming that you had a contempt for myself, and were seriously applying yourself to other things. Such were the reports at that time bruited abroad.

Now hear what after this it is just to do, in order that I may reply to your question, how you and I ought to conduct ourselves to each other. If then you have a contempt for philosophy, bid farewell to it. But if you have heard from another, or discovered³ yourself any thing more excellent³ than what you have from me, honour it. But if what (you have heard) from me please you, then must you honour highly myself likewise. Now, therefore, as from the beginning, do you lead and I will follow. For being honoured by you, I will honour you (in return); but not being honoured, I shall keep quiet. Further still, if by honouring me, you take the lead in this,¹ you will seem to honour philosophy; and that very thing,² which you are considering even otherwise,³ will bring you the reputation of being considered by the multitude a philosopher. But by honouring you, when not honouring me, I should seem to be admiring and pursuing wealth; but this we know has a name dishonourable amongst all men; and, to sum up, by your honouring me, there will be an ornament to both of us; but by my (honouring) you, a disgrace to both. And thus much on these matters.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were—οἱ μοι, ἵνα δῇ—not σε, ἵνα δῇ μοι—where μοι has no meaning.

² Why εὐαγέας is thus rendered by Picinus and Ast, I cannot understand. The word is learnedly illustrated by Hemsterhuis in a note printed by Gaisford on Markland's Eurip. Suppl. 662.

³—³ I have adopted, in lieu of βελτίονα εὐρηκας—ἐκεῖνα from one MS. βέλτιον εὐρηκας τι, and ἐκεῖνο, similar to "Si quid novisti rectius istius" in Horace.

But the little sphere³ does not answer; and this Archidemus will show you, when he arrives. Moreover, you must explain to him very distinctly respecting the matter, which is far more honourable and divine than this, and respecting which you sent as being in doubt. For you say, according to his report, that there has not been a sufficient demonstration respecting the nature of the first. I must speak to you by enigmas,⁴ in order that, should the tablet meet with any accident in its folds by land or sea, he who reads it may not understand.⁴ For such is the case.

"As regards the king of all, all things are his,⁵ and all are for his sake, and he is the cause of all that is beautiful. But about a second are the secondary things; and about a third the third. Now the soul of man is eager to learn respecting these things of what kind they are, looking to what is allied to itself, none of which it possesses sufficiently. ⁶But respecting the king (himself)⁶ and those of which I have spoken, there is nothing of this kind. But of that, which is after this, does the soul speak. But of what kind, son of Dionysius and Doris, is your inquiry

¹ I cannot understand τούτου: nor could Ficinus; whose version is—"honorare prius me caperis." Perhaps Plato wrote, αὐτὸς or οὕτω—

² Here again I am at a loss, and so was Ficinus. For he has—"quod tu imprimis cupiebas."

³ What this little sphere was is uncertain. Perhaps it was a kind of orrery. T. See Epist. 13.

⁴ In the Greek words between the numerals lies hid a tragic distich, "Ἴν' ἂν τι δέλφος ἐν πτυχαῖς πόντου δία ἥ γῆς πάθῃ, μὴ γινῶ τὸ γράμμα τις τυχών: as may be inferred from Eurip. Iph. T. 1744, ed. Monk.

⁵ I have followed one MS. that reads πάντ' ἐκείνου ἔστι, instead of πάντ' ἔστι καὶ ἐκείνου—

⁶ Ficinus has—"sed in rege ipso et in his," as if he had found in his MS. τοῦ δὲ βασιλέως αὐτοῦ—in lieu of τοῦ δὲ βασιλέως πέρι—

concerning what is the cause of all things evil.¹ Or rather, is it not a kind of labour-throes on this point, which are produced in the soul, and which if a person does not take away from it, (the soul) will never meet with truth existing in reality.

And you told me that you had thought of this in the garden under the laurel trees, and that it was your discovery. And I said, that if this appeared to you to be the case, you had freed me from a long discussion. I said however that I had never met with any other person, who had discovered it, but that it had been a great source of trouble to myself. But perhaps you have heard this from some one; but accidentally impelled in this direction by a divine allotment,² you have not kept firm hold of the demonstrations on this point, and pinned them down;³ but you are dashing on, at one time in this way, and at another in a different way, to what is the object of fancy; but such it is not. Nor has this occurred to you alone; but be well assured, that no one, when he first hears me, is otherwise affected than thus ⁴in the beginning.⁴ And one having more trouble, and another less, are with difficulty liberated from it; but nearly all of them have of it not a little. Such then having been, and is still the case, we have in my opinion nearly discovered that, about which you sent to me, namely, how we ought to be affected towards each other. For since you are testing (my doctrines) by associating with other persons, and ⁵placing them by the side of those (promulgated) by others, and (considering)⁵

¹ In lieu of κακῶν, Proclus, in Theolog. Platon. ii. 4, p. 103, offers καλῶν, adopted by Taylor; and so one MS. collated by Bekker. The other however is the preferable reading. Unless it be said that Plato wrote both, καλῶν τε καὶ κακῶν. For Dionysius, like many philosophers before and after his time, was puzzled with the origin and continuance of evil, introduced by one or more powers, the authors of all good.

² The expression θεῖα μοῖρα would now be applied to what we call "genius," or "gift of nature."

³ So I have translated καρίδηςας. Ficinus has "protulisti," which would lead to καρίδειξας—

⁴ Ficinus omits κατ' ἀρχάς, probably deeming them superfluous after πρῶτον ἀκούσαντι. Perhaps Plato wrote κατὰ παραχάς, "by some confusion."

them by themselves, ¹they will, if the touchstone be true, still stick to you, and you will be at home with them and us.¹ How then shall these things, and all we have spoken of, not take place?

You have therefore done well in having sent Archedemus; and hereafter, when he shall have reached you, and told you my message, other doubts will perhaps lay hold of you. If then you take counsel of yourself properly, you will send Archedemus to me again; and he, like a travelling trader, will return again to you. And if you do this twice or thrice, and test sufficiently what is sent from me, I shall wonder, if your former doubts be not very different from what they are now. Act then thus boldly; for neither will you send, nor Archedemus act the part of a travelling trader, in a manner more beautiful or more acceptable to the deity, than by a trading of this kind. Be careful, however, that these things do not fall peradventure among men devoid of instruction; for, as it appears to me, there are scarcely any doctrines² which will appear more ridiculous to the multitude than these; nor on the other hand any more wonderful, and producing a greater enthusiasm in those who are well disposed. But when they are often mentioned, and continually heard, and this for many years, they are scarcely at length, and with great labour, purified like gold.

³But hear what is wonderful there;³ for even a good many persons have heard these things, who are able to learn and

¹—¹ Ficinus, apparently not understanding the meaning of προσφύσσειν, has thus given the general sense of the passage—"modo rectum examen peregeris, consentientem nobis te et nostris præbebis;" which Taylor was content to translate literally into English. With regard to οἰκίος, the phrase "at home" keeps closer to the Greek than its usual version, "a familiar friend."

² The Greek is ἀκούσματα, literally "hearings." For previous to the invention of printing, the philosophers of old promulgated their principles partly by writing, but more frequently by word of mouth, before persons who listened to their intellectual "displays," as they were then called; but which would now be called "lectures," a word that means literally "readings," and is applied sometimes to discourses spoken even extempore.

³ The Greek is ὃ δὲ θαυμαστὸν αὐτοῦ γίγνεται, ἀκούσον: where I cannot understand αὐτοῦ. Ficinus has "Nam, quod in hac re mirabile contingere consuevit, id audi." One MS. omits αὐτοῦ. Perhaps Plato wrote εἰ τι— able to remember, and after testing every thing in every way, to come to a decision, being already old men, and who have heard these things for not less than thirty years; and who asserted lately that, what formerly appeared to them to be the least worthy of belief, now appears the most so, and perfectly clear; but what was most worthy of belief then, is the very reverse now. Directing therefore your mind to this, be careful lest it repent you of what has now unworthily fallen from you. Now the greatest guard in this case is in not writing but learning; for what is written, it cannot be but that it will get abroad. On this account, then, I have never at any time written any thing about them; nor is there any composition of Plato (by name), nor will there be; but what has now¹ been said belong to Socrates, who was, even when young, a handsome person.¹ Fare thee well, and be persuaded by me; and, after frequently reading this epistle, burn it. And thus much on these matters.

With respect to Polyxenus, you have wondered that I did not send him to you. But I say now, as of old, respecting Lycophron, and the others who are with you, that, both naturally, and from the method of your discourse, you very much excel them in the art of speaking; nor is any one of them confuted willingly, as some suppose, but unwillingly; and you appear indeed to have treated them with great moderation, and to have bestowed upon them (honourable)² presents. So much

¹—¹ The Greek is τὰ δὲ νῦν λεγόμενα Σωκράτους ἐστὶ καλοῦ καὶ νέου γεγονότος. But Julian in Orat. vi. p. 189, A., quotes φερόμενα, which, says Wytttenbach in Epist. Crit. p. 16, answers better to ἀποφερόμεναι ἐρωτήσεως, in Theætet. p. 148, E. But how Socrates could be said to be at any period of life “a handsome man,” I cannot understand. For he was not only the reverse, but even prided himself on being so. Wytttenbach indeed asserts that the expression καλὸς καὶ νέος is well suited to Socrates, as being ἐρωτικός. But a person may easily be ἐρωτικός without being at the same time καλὸς καὶ νέος. As however the passage is quoted in its present form by Aristides, T. ii. p. 288, and Stobæus cix. p. 355, it seems hazardous to suggest any alteration; else one would suspect that Plato wrote τὰ δὲ νῦν φερόμενα διὰ Σωκράτους ἐστ’ οὐκ ἄνου, καὶ νέου γεγονότος, λεγόμενα, i. e. “but what has now been published is spoken through the mouth of Socrates, who was, even when young, no fool.” To obviate probably the difficulty in καλοῦ, Ficinus translated it “virtute claruit.”

² Ficinus has “et honestis eos muneribus prosecutus,” as if he had found in his MS. καὶ καλῶς δεδωρῆσθαι.

on these matters, which for such matters is much. But if you make use of Philistion at all, make a great use of him; and, if you can, lend Speusippus (something),¹ and send him away. Speusippus too stands in need of you. And Philistion too promised me, that he would very willingly come to Athens if you would dismiss him. You have likewise done well in dismissing him² from the stone quarries. But trifling is the request both respecting his domestics, and Hegesippus, the son of Ariston; for you sent word to me, that if any one injured either him or them, and you knew of it, you would not overlook it. And of Lysiclides it is worth while to speak the truth; for he alone of those, who came from Sicily to Athens, has caused no change as regards our intercourse with each other, but ever continues to say something good, and what is for the best respecting what has occurred.

EPISTLE III.

³PLATO TO DIONYSIUS.³

HAVING put in a letter "all hail," can I have truly found the best address?⁴ or rather⁵ by writing, according to my ¹ Ficinus, not aware that χρῆσον comes from χράω, "I lend," translates "Speusippi opere utere," whom Taylor has followed as usual. It is evident however that τι has dropt out after Σπενσίππῳ. For Plato meant to say, that without some assistance in the shape of a loan, Speusippus could not leave Syracuse.

² After τὸν Stephens suspected that Φιλόξενον has dropt out, or the name of some other person.

³ I have adopted, what Ficinus seems to have found in his MS., as remarked by Stephens.

⁴ With the idea contained in these words may be compared the expression in Eurip. Med. 663, Μήδεια, χαῖρε· τοῦδε γὰρ τοῦ φρομίῳ Κάλλιον οὐδεὶς οἶδε.

⁵ The Greek is ἢ μᾶλλον κατὰ τὴν ἐμὴν συνήθειαν γράφων εὖ πράττειν ὥσπερ εἶωθα ἐν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς τοὺς φίλους προσαγορεύειν. But Ficinus has "an quemadmodum ego solitus sum scribere ad amicos, bene agere," thus omitting the words κατὰ τὴν ἐμὴν συνήθειαν and ἐν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς. On the other hand Menage, on Diog. L. iii. 61, rejects ὥσπερ εἶωθα as an interpretation of κατὰ τὴν ἐμὴν συνήθειαν. Plato wrote, I suspect, ἢ μᾶλλον κατὰ τὴν ἐμὴν συνήθειαν γράφοιμ' ἂν, "εὖ custom, "Prosperity," as I am accustomed to address friends in my letters.⁵ For you, as they who went on a sacred embassy¹ related, addressed the god at Delphi, by this very flattering expression, and wrote, as they say,

Hail, and preserve the tyrant's pleasant life.

But I would exhort not even a man, much less a deity, by an invocation, to do this; not a deity, because I should give a command contrary to his nature, since the deity is seated far from pleasure and pain; nor a man, because pleasure frequently begets mischief,² and pain produces² in the soul indocility, and forgetfulness, and silliness, and insolence. And thus much let it be said by me on the subject of the address; and do you, after having read this, receive it as you are willing to receive it.

Not a few report, that you stated to certain persons sent to you, that, when I heard you saying that you were about to establish Grecian cities in Sicily, and to relieve the people of Syracuse by changing the government from an absolute to a limited monarchy, I prevented you from doing³ so; although, as you assert, you were very eager on the matter; but that now I have taught Dion to do the very same thing himself; and that, according to your notions, we are depriving you of your power. You indeed know whether you are benefited by such assertions. You are however injuring me by stating the contrary to what really occurred; for I have been sufficiently prejudiced by Philistides and many others in the eyes of the hired troops and the mob of Syracuse, through my remaining in the Acropolis; while they without (I think)⁴ would, had any error taken place, have turned it all against myself, by assert-πράττειν," ἐν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς πρὸς φίλους προσαγορεύων, i. e. or rather shall I write according to my custom "Prosperity," while addressing friends in my letters.

² I have translated as if the Greek were γεννᾷ, καὶ λύπη, not καὶ λύπη γεννᾷ. For thus while pleasure begets mischief (to the body), pain affects the soul in a similar manner.

³ In lieu of ἔρα, Ficinus found in his MS. δρᾶν, as shown by his "ne faceres."

ing (tenaciously)¹ that you were persuaded in all things by me. But you knew yourself most clearly, that of my own accord I meddled very little with politics, except at first, when I thought I might do something beneficial, and that I was moderately engaged in some other trifling matters, and upon the Proœms of the Laws, with the exception of what you and some one else have written as an addition; for I hear that some persons after you have been tampering with them.² Each portion will however be plain to those, who are able to distinguish my manner. But, as I just now said, I do not stand in need of calumny before the Syracusans, and certain others, if you can persuade them (by speaking) in this way; but I am much more in want of an apology against the former calumny, and that, which has now been produced after it, both greater and more violent.

Against these two (calumnies) therefore, it is necessary for me to make a two-fold apology (by saying), in the first place, that I properly avoided taking a share with you in the affairs of the city; and in the second place, that ³I know it was not my advice, as you have asserted, that exhorted you, nor³ was I an impediment to you, when about to establish the Grecian cities. Hear then first the commencement of those matters, about which I have spoken the first.

I came to Syracuse invited by yourself and Dion, who had already passed an ordeal with me, and had been of old my guest; and who was of the middle and staid period of life—(men) of whom there is altogether a need to such as possess

¹ The Greek is in some MSS. οὐ φάσκοντας τίνας, where Stephens would omit τίνας, not found in Ficinus, nor in three other MSS. One however has σε τίνας φάσκοντας, which leads to ἀπενὶς φάσκοντας σε, where ἀπενὶς is a Platonic word, found in Rep. vii. p. 547, E., ἀπενεῖς ἀνδράς, and explained by Suidas, συνεχίς—ἀγαν ἰσχυρῶς: while Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 53, has given some instances of its loss and corruption.

² If after the laws of Plato had been thus tampered with, the author himself never put forth an unadulterated edition, it will be difficult, despite what he says in the next sentence, always to separate the genuine from the spurious matter.

³ The Greek is οὐκ ἔμην ταύτην εἰρηκας συμβουλήν οὐδε διακώλυσιν μίλλοντι in some MSS., but in others διακωλύσειν, and in one διδασκαλίαν. Ficinus has “meum illud consilium non fuisse, quod tu ais, ut suaderem tibi—” From whence I have elicited οὐκ ἔμην ταύτην, ἣν εἰρηκας, συμβουλήν εἶναι οἶδα διακελεύουσιν οὐδὲ—where διακελεύουσιν, is confirmed by κελεύων in p. 319, B.

even a little intellect, when they are about to consult about affairs such as yours were then; while you were very young, and had great inexperience on those points, in which it behoved you to have been skilled, and you were perfectly unknown to me. After this, some man, or god, or fortune, did in conjunction with yourself drive out Dion, and you were left alone. Think you then at that time I would have held any communion with you on affairs of state, when I had lost a sensible partner? and when I saw a senseless person was left with many and wicked men, not ruling in reality, but fancying himself to be a ruler, although he was ruled over by men of such a kind? Under these circumstances, what ought I to have done? ¹Is it not of necessity, from what occurred afterwards,¹ just what I did do? To bid farewell to state affairs, and to be cautious of the calumnies arising from envy, and to endeavour to make all of you, although separated and at variance, friends as much as possible to each other. And of this you are the witness, that in bringing this about I never abated a jot. And though with some difficulty, it was nevertheless agreed that I should sail homewards, since a war detained you; but that, when peace took place, I and Dion should come to Syracuse again, and that you should invite us. Such were the circumstances that occurred, touching my first sojourn at Syracuse, and of my safe return home.

On peace being made, you invited me a second time; not, however, according to the agreement; but you wrote to me to come alone; and said that you would send for Dion afterwards. On this account I did not come, and displeased Dion; for he thought it would be better to come and hearken to you. In a year after this a trireme arrived, and letters from yourself; and the language of the letter began (by saying), that if I would come, the affairs of Dion should be settled according to my mind; but the contrary, if I did not come. I am ashamed to say, how many letters then came both from you and others through you from Italy and Sicily, to myself and to such as were my relations and acquaintances, all of them exhorting me to go, and begging me by all means to yield to your request. It seemed therefore good to all, beginning from Dion, that I should set sail, and not act the coward.² And yet I put forward before them my period of life; and I strenuously urged with respect to yourself, that you would be unable to defend me against those calumniating us, and wishing us to become free. For I saw then, and I see now, that the great and over-swollen property of private persons and almost monarchs, that the greater they are, the more do they nourish calumniators many and mighty, and who associate for the sake of pleasure, together with mischief of a shameful kind; an evil greater than which neither does wealth produce, nor the influence of any other power. Bidding, however, farewell to all these ideas, I came, after thoroughly reflecting, that not one of my friends would have to accuse me, in that through my negligence, their interests had been, when they might have been safe, destroyed. On my arrival—for surely you know all that occurred thereupon—I thought it right, according to the compact made in your letters, that you should in the first place bring back Dion and restore him to your familiar intercourse; such familiar intercourse, I mean, as that, by which,¹ if you had been persuaded by me, something better, than what has taken place, would have happened to yourself, and Syracuse, and the rest of the Greeks, at least as my opinion divines. And then I thought it right that the relations of Dion should have his property, and that those, whom you know² did divide it, should not have divided it. Moreover I thought that what was customary should be sent to him each year, and rather more, and not less, be sent on account of my being present. But succeeding in none of these demands, I determined to depart. After this, however, you persuaded me to remain a year, by saying that you would sell³ all the property of Dion, and send one half to Corinth, and leave the residue to his son. I could relate many other things, not one of which, after promising, you have performed; but, on account of their multitude, I will cut them short. For after you had sold all the property of Dion, without having persued him to that step, although you said you would not do so, without first persuading him, you have put, O wonderful man, a most glorious¹ finish² to all your promises. For you discovered a plan neither honourable, nor clever, nor just, nor advantageous, to frighten me, as being ignorant of what had taken place at that time, in order that I might not require the money to be sent. For when you were intending to banish Heraclides, an act that did not seem just to the Syracusans, or to myself, and on that I did, together with Theodotus and Euribius, request you not to do so, you laid hold of this as a sufficient pretext, and said that I had evidently been for some time past caring nothing for you, but only for Dion, and his friends and relatives; and that since Theodotus and Heraclides are now calumniated, as being the relatives of Dion, I am devising in every way for them not to suffer punishment. And thus much on the subject of the intercourse between you and myself on state affairs. And if you have seen any estrangement in me towards yourself, think it only reasonable for all this to have happened in this way, and do not wonder at it; for to any one possessing any intellect, I should justly appear to be a knave, if I were induced by the greatness of your power, to betray an old friend and guest, when doing badly through you, and being, so to say, not inferior to yourself, and to prefer you, when committing an act of injustice, and to do whatever you ordered, for the sake, it is evident, of money; for no other reason would any one have assigned for this change in me, if changed I had been. But these events, occurring in this way, have through yourself produced a kind of wolf-friendship,³ and a want of cordiality between you and me.

¹ In lieu of ἦν, which has nothing to govern it, the sense and syntax require ᾗ; and just afterwards, βέλτιον τι τῷ—τοῦ, in lieu of βέλτιον τῷ—τοῦ.

² Instead of εἶδα, Ficinus seems to have found some other word in his MS.; for his version is "præfeceras—"

³ Ficinus, disregarding the difference in meaning between ἀποδοῦναι and ἀποδοθεῖν, renders ἀποδομενός by "redditurum;" and he is followed, as usual, by Taylor.

¹ Literally, "most youth-like." Compare νιανικός φόβος in Eurip. Hipp. 1204, which is explained by "vehement." I suspect, however, that νιανικώτατον here conceals some corruption, as νιανικωτάτου does in Alcib. I. § 2, where I have suggested μεγαλειστότου, in allusion to the grandfather of Alcibiades on his mother's side.

² Literally, "Colophon"—On the meaning of the metaphor, see at Euthyd. § 71.

³ This is, I suspect, an allusion to an Æsopo-Socratic fable, in which a shepherd forms a friendship with a wolf; who, after being taught to carry off the sheep of other owners, feasts on those of its own friend. Something similar is still extant in MS. Flor., in No. 105. Ficinus, not aware of this circumstance, has translated, "succensendi"—Gataker, however, on Marc. Antonin. xi. 15 says the allu-

The discourse has now come nearly ¹to the point, connected ¹with what has just now occurred, and for which I said I must in the second place apologize. Attend therefore diligently, and consider whether I appear to you to tell a falsehood, and not the truth. For I assert that you did, when Archedemus and Aristocritus were present in the garden, about twenty days before my departure homewards from Syracuse, find fault with me on the points you have just now mentioned, how that I was more concerned for Heraclides, and all the rest, than for you. And you likewise asked me in their presence, whether I remembered that on my first coming to Syracuse, I exhorted you to establish the Grecian cities. And I acknowledged that I did remember; and, even now, it appears to me that it is best (to do so). I must likewise relate, Dionysius, what was said at that time after this. For I asked you whether I advised you (to do) this alone, or something else besides this. But you answered me in a very angry and insulting manner, as you thought; and on this account the insult of that period has become ²a day-dream, instead of a night one.² For ³you said laughing in not a feigned manner, if I remembered, that you had exhorted me, after I had been instructed, to do all these things or not.³ I replied, that you had very properly reminded me. You then said—Was it after being instructed in geometry? or how? After this I did not say what it came into my mind to say, through sion is to Æsop. Fab. 237, and would read here ἀκοινωνήσις, in lieu of ἀκοινωνία, which he says is not a correct Greek word; while the other is found in Aristotle, Polit. ii. 3, and in the letter of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, preserved by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vi. 43, τὴν ἀκοινωνήσιαν αὐτοῦ καὶ λυκοφιλίαν. Gataker quotes likewise Menander, Fr. Inc. 203, Λυκοφιλοὶ μὲν εἰσιν αἱ διαλλαγαί.

² i. e. "a true vision instead of a false one." On the expression ὑπάρ' ἀντ' ὁσιπάρως, see at Phileb. § 75.

³ This I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus; whose version is "Rogasti autem me—si bene quid memini—an ista præcepissem tibi quasi docto an non;" but whether he found the Greek in his MS. corresponding to the Latin may be fairly doubted. There is evidently something wrong here, which better MSS. alone will enable us to correct.

the fear that, on account of a trifling word, the sailing-away, which I expected, 'would be in a narrow instead of a wide space.¹ This then is for the sake of all what has been said by me.² Do not calumniate me by saying that I did not permit you to colonize the Grecian cities, subverted by the Barbarians, and to assist the Syracusans by your changing to a limited monarchy instead of an absolute one. For you cannot state any falsehood against me, which is less suited to myself than this.

If there appeared to be any where a sufficient power of deciding, I could give in addition to these, arguments still clearer, (to prove) that I exhorted you to act in this way, but that you were unwilling to do so. And in truth it is not difficult to show clearly, that had this been done, it would have been the best for yourself, the Syracusans, and all the Siceliotes.³ If then you deny you have said so, after you had so said, I have a right of action against you. But if you confess you did (say so), consider after this that Stesichorus was a wise man, and imitating his recantation,⁴ betake yourself from a false assertion to a true one.

EPISTLE IV.

PLATO TO DION OF SYRACUSE—PROSPERITY.

I THINK that my readiness with respect to events as they occur, is apparent at all times, and that I give much of a serious attention to their being brought to pass for the sake of nothing

¹—¹ The words Μή μοι στενός γίνουτ' ἀντ' εὐρυχωρίας evidently conceal an iambic verse, Μή μοι γίνουτ' ἀντ' εὐρυχωρίας στενός, which eventually became a proverb amongst the sea-faring Athenians; who knew, as the English do, that there is little danger as long as there is plenty of sea-room; and that it is only in a strait, or in shallow water, that a sailor feels any fear.

² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "cæterum ad illud jam redeamus, quo tendunt hæc omnia."

³ The indigenous inhabitants of Sicily were called Σικελοί: the foreigners, who settled there, Σικελιώται.

⁴ To the same recantation of Stesichorus there is an allusion in the Phædrus, § 44. See Blomfield in Stesichor. Fragm. 5, in the Museum Criticum, T. i. p. 263.

sion is to Æsop. Fab. 237, and would read here ἀκοινώνησις, in lieu of ἀκοινωνία, which he says is not a correct Greek word; while the other is found in Aristotle, Polit. ii. 3, and in the letter of Cornelius, bishop of Rome, preserved by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vi. 43, τὴν ἀκοινωνήσιαν αὐτοῦ καὶ λυκοφίλιαν. Gataker quotes likewise Menander, Fr. Inc. 203, Λυκοφίλιοι μὲν εἰσιν αἱ διαλλαγαί.

¹—¹ The Greek is εἰς λόγον—λόγος—ξυνεχῆς. But Ficinus has “oportune sermo,” omitting entirely ξυνεχῆς τῷ νῦν δὴ γενομένῳ. Hence Stephens supposed that Ficinus found in his MS. εἰς καλὸν in lieu of εἰς λόγον. I have translated as if the Greek were εἰς τόπον—λόγος—ξυνεχῆ—to which I was led by finding ξυνεχεῖς, i. e. ξυνεχῆς, in one MS. On the loss of τόπον I have spoken elsewhere.

²—² i. e. “a true vision instead of a false one.” On the expression ὑπάρ ἀντ’ ὀνείρατος, see at Phileb. § 75.

³—³ This I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus; whose version is “Bogasti autem me—si bene quid memini—an ista præcepissem tibi quasi docto an non;” but whether he found the Greek in his MS. corresponding to the Latin may be fairly doubted. There is evidently something wrong here, which better MSS. alone will enable us to correct.

the fear that, on account of a trifling word, the sailing-away, which I expected, ¹ would be in a narrow instead of a wide space.¹ This then is for the sake of all what has been said by me.² Do not calumniate me by saying that I did not permit you to colonize the Grecian cities, subverted by the Barbarians, and to assist the Syracusans by your changing to a limited monarchy instead of an absolute one. For you cannot state any falsehood against me, which is less suited to myself than this.

If there appeared to be any where a sufficient power of deciding, I could give in addition to these, arguments still clearer, (to prove) that I exhorted you to act in this way, but that you were unwilling to do so. And in truth it is not difficult to show clearly, that had this been done, it would have been the best for yourself, the Syracusans, and all the Siceliotes.³ If then you deny you have said so, after you had so said, I have a right of action against you. But if you confess you did (say so), consider after this that Stesichorus was a wise man, and imitating his recantation,⁴ betake yourself from a false assertion to a true one.

EPISTLE IV.

PLATO TO DION OF SYRACUSE—PROSPERITY.

I THINK that my readiness with respect to events as they occur, is apparent at all times, and that I give much of a serious attention to their being brought to pass for the sake of nothing

¹—¹ The words Μή μοι στενός γίνουι' ἀντ' εὐρυχωρίας evidently conceal an Iambic verse, Μή μοι γίνουι' ἀντ' εὐρυχωρίας στενός, which eventually became a proverb amongst the sea-faring Athenians; who knew, as the English do, that there is little danger as long as there is plenty of sea-room; and that it is only in a strait, or in shallow water, that a sailor feels any fear.

² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "cæterum ad illud jam redeamus, quo tendunt hæc omnia."

³ The indigenous inhabitants of Sicily were called Σικελοί: the foreigners, who settled there, Σικελιώται.

⁴ To the same recantation of Stesichorus there is an allusion in the Phædrus, § 44. See Blomfield in Stesichor. Fragm. 5, in the Museum Criticum, T. i. p. 263.

else rather than a love of honour in the case of things honourable. For I consider it just, that they, who are in good truth worthy men, and who act in this manner, should obtain the renown due to them. At present, matters are, to speak with god's will, doing well; but in those that relate to the future there is the greatest contest. For to excel in fortitude, swiftness, and strength, would seem to be in the power of some others;¹ but to excel all the others in truth, justice, magnificence, and the graceful bearing relating to all these, any one would agree to honour in reason those, who establish their claim to qualities such as these. Now then what I am saying is manifest. But at the same time we ought to remind ourselves, that it is proper² to excel the rest of men, whom you know more than boys.³ Hence we ought to become manifest, as being such as we say; especially since, so to say, with god's will, it will be easy: for to others it has happened that it was necessary for them to have wandered in many a place,⁴ if they were about to be known.⁵ But that which is now existing about you is such, so that persons from the whole of the inhabited (earth), if one may speak in rather an arrogant style, are looking to one spot, and in that spot to yourself especially. Since then you are beheld by all men, prepare to exhibit yourself, as that celebrated Lyncurgus of the olden time, and Cyrus, and if there is any one else, who has ever been thought to excel in moral and political (virtues); especially since many, and indeed nearly all here say, there is a great expectation that, when Dionysius is taken off, affairs will be in a ruinous state, through the ambition of yourself, and Heraclides, and Theodotus, and others of your acquaintances.

Let then, the most of all, such a person not exist. But if he should exist, do you appear as a healer,⁶ and ye will proceed

²⁻³ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, which I cannot understand; nor could, I suspect, Ficinus, whose version is, "oportere nos, ut te non latet, plus ab aliis quam viros a pueros differre—" unless it be said that he found in his MS., as remarked by Stephens, προσέκει πλέον ἢ παιδων ἀνδρας, τῶν ἄλλων ἀνθρώπων διαφέρειν, ὥς οἶσα δῆπου.

⁴⁻⁵ The Greek is εἰ μᾶλλονσι γνωσθῆναι. Ficinus has "ad id consequendum."

⁶ Such is the translation of the Greek. But Ficinus has "ut res in melius deducantur," as if he had found in his MS. πρὸς τὸ βέλτιον ἀνελθοι πᾶν, not πρὸς τὸ βέλτιστον ἐλθοιτ' ἂν. One MS. subsequently collated reads βέλτιον.

on to what is best.⁴ It appears perhaps to you ridiculous for me to mention these things, because you are yourself not ignorant of them. But I see that in the theatres the combatants are incited by children, to say nothing of their friends, whom one might suppose would through a kind feeling cheer them on with earnestness. Now then do you enter the contest, and send me word by a letter if you require at all my assistance. Affairs are here very nearly as when you were present. Inform me too what has been done, or what you are now doing; for though we hear many things, we know nothing. And now letters from Theodotus and Heraclides have come to Lacedæmon and Ægina. But we, as has been stated, although we hear many things¹ about those here,¹ know nothing. Bear in mind that you seem to some to be less attentive than is fitting. Let it therefore not escape you, that by pleasing men it is possible to do (something); but that austerity has its dwelling in a desert. May good fortune be thine.

EPISTLE V.

DION² TO PERDICCAS—PROSPERITY.

I HAVE advised Euphræus, as you enjoined in your letter, to occupy himself about all³ that is a care to you. And I am justified in giving you advice, suited to a host, and what is called holy,¹ respecting the other things² of which you may speak,³ and how you ought for the present to make use of Euphræus. For the man is useful in many ways, but mostly so in that, where you are through your time of life deficient, and through there not being many counsellors of the young on that point. Now there is a voice from each form of polity, as it were from certain animals; one from a democracy, another from an oligarchy, and another again from a monarchy. Very many persons assert that they understand these voices. But, except a few, they are very far from understanding them. Whichever then of these polities speaks with its own voice, both to gods and men, and produces actions, correspondent to its voice, it flourishes ever, and is preserved; but when it imitates another voice, it is destroyed. For this point then Euphræus will be useful to you in no small degree, although he is possessed of fortitude in other things likewise; for I hope that he will discover the reasons for a monarchy not less than those who are in your employment. If then you make use of him for this purpose, you will be benefited yourself, and greatly benefit him.

¹—¹ The words περὶ τῶν τῶδε, which are at variance with the train of ideas, are omitted in five MSS. Ficinus has what is at least intelligible—"audientes multa de rebus vestris nihil aperte percipimus." Perhaps the author of this letter wrote παρὰ τῶν τῶδε—i. e. from persons here.

² Taylor has here tacitly followed the earlier editions, where this letter is ascribed to Dion; and in the Classical Journal, No. 60, p. 305, he says that, from the mention of Plato in it, the writer must have been some other person. It is however quoted as Plato's by Cicero in Epistol. ad Divers. i. 9; but that, says Stephens, might have happened, not because Cicero conceived Plato to be the writer, but because it alluded to something said in his person.

³ Instead of ταῦτα, which I cannot understand, I have translated as if the Greek were πάντα.

But if any one on hearing this, should say, Plato, as it seems, professed indeed to know what is conducive to a democracy; but though he might have spoken amongst the people, and given them the best advice, yet he never got up and addressed them. To this it may be said, that Plato was born late in his paternal land, and that he came amongst a people, already grown rather old,³ and accustomed by those prior to him do many things contrary to his advice; for he would have consulted most willingly for its good, as for that of his own father, had he not thought he should vainly expose himself to danger. And I think he would do the same thing (with respect to)⁴

¹ On the expression ἐπὶ συμβουλῇ, see at Theag. p. 122, A. § 2. From the union of ἐνικτὴν καὶ ἱερὰν, it would seem as if the advice were called "holy" from its being given and received by persons connected by the sacred bonds of hospitality.

²—³ The words ὣν δὲν φράζης are rightly omitted by Ficinus; unless it be said that the author wrote ὣν αἰετὶ φράζεις.

³ If Cicero's quotation is to be depended on—"quum offendisset (Plato) populum Atheniensem prope jam desipientem senectute," it would lead to ὑπὸ γῆρας κρονικώτερον in lieu of πρεσβύτερον.

⁴ Ficinus alone found in his MS., as remarked by Stephens, the preposition περί requisite for the syntax; as shown by his version, "circa meum consilium."

my advice; for if we should appear to be incurable, he will bid a long farewell to us, and will abstain from advising either me or mine. May good fortune be thine.

EPISTLE VI.

PLATO TO HERMIAS, ERASTUS, AND CORISCUS.—PROSPERITY.

It appears to me, that some god has kindly and abundantly procured for you good fortune, if you will only receive it properly. For you live neighbours to each other, and have need to benefit each other in the greatest degree. To Hermias, (I say) that neither a multitude of horses, nor of any other alliance¹ for war, nor of gold present to him, would be of greater power for every emergency, than of friends, who are firm and possess a sound moral conduct. But to Erastus and Coriscus I say, although I am an old man, that besides the beautiful wisdom, relating to species, there is a need of that wisdom, which possesses a guardian and defensive power against the base and unjust; for they are inexperienced through their having passed much of their life with us, who are men of moderation and without guile. On this account I have said, that they stand in need of those two² things, in order that they may not be compelled to neglect true wisdom, and pay more attention than is proper to human and necessary³ wisdom. But Hermias appears to me to have received this power⁴ from nature, which is not yet cognate,⁴ and from art through experience. What then do I say? To you, Hermias, do I, having made a greater trial of Erastus and Coris-

¹ In lieu of πολέμικης συμμαχίας, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. πολεμικῆς παρασκευῆς—for his version is “belli apparatus—”

² I have adopted Taylor’s “those two;”—the Greek was probably τούτοις προσδεῖν δυοῖν, not simply τούτων προσδεῖν—

³ Coray in a note on Levesque’s Thucydides iv. 117, would read μὴ ἀναγκαίως—

cus than you have, assert, indicate, and testify, that you will not easily find habits more worthy of confidence than those of your neighbours. I advise you, therefore, to hold to yourself by every honest means men of such kind, nor to consider it an act of secondary moment. And on the other hand I advise Erastus and Coriscus to stick close to Hermias, and to endeavour, by such grapplings¹ with each other to arrive at one common bond of friendship. But if any one of you shall determine to dissolve this (union), for human affairs are not altogether stable, send hither to me and my friends² an accusing letter of blame.³ For I think that the reasons sent by those here, (and based) on justice and a feeling of respect, will, unless the rupture happens to have been very great, weld⁴ and bind you together better, than any incantation,⁴ into your pre-existing friendship and communion; by which,⁵ if all, both we and you, philosophize as far as we are able, and it is permitted to each, what has now been oracularly delivered will be ratified. But I will not say the same,⁶ should we not act in this manner; for I divine a good omen, and I say, that if a god is willing, you⁷ will do all good deeds.

It is requisite for you to read this letter all three together; but if not, two in common,⁸ as often as you can, (and) as it is

¹ I have adopted this word, remembering the expression in Shakespeare,

"Grapple him to thine heart with hooks of steel."

²⁻³ Ficinus has "accusatoriam delinquentis epistolam," translated literally by Taylor, "an epistle containing an accusation of the delinquent." Did Ficinus find in his MS. τοῦ μεμφθέντος κατηγορον ἐπιστολήν, in lieu of μομφῆς κατηγορον ἐπιστολήν?

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were συμφυῆσαι, not συμφῦσαι, remembering the expression in Sympos. p. 192, D., συντῆξαι καὶ συμφυῆσαι. The Latin word answering to συμφυῆσαι, and used similarly in a metaphorical sense, is "conflare." Ficinus omits συμφῦσαι, it being probably unintelligible to him.

⁴ Compare Hippol. Eurip. 478, Εἰσὶν δ' ἐκφῶσαι καὶ λόγοι θελκτήριοι—

⁵ Instead of ἦν, which is without regimen, two MSS. read ἦ—From the two I have elicited ᾗ—

⁶ In lieu of τοῦ, one MS. had τοῦτο, which evidently leads to ταῦτο — Ficinus has "nihil equidem præfabor," translated by Taylor, "I will not relate the consequences."

⁷ Ficinus found in his MS. ὑμᾶς, confirmed by another subsequently collated, instead of ἡμᾶς.

⁸ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus. They are not only unnecessary, but present an insufferable tautology.

possible,¹ and to make use of a compact, and a decisive law, which is indeed a just thing, and at the same time [taking an oath]¹ with attention, not devoid of taste,² and amusement,³ the sister⁴ of attention, and swearing by the god, who is the ruler of all things present and future, and by the father (and) lord of the ruler and cause, whom, if we philosophize truly, we shall all clearly know, as far as is possible for men under a good genius.⁵

EPISTLE VII.

PLATO TO THE KINDRED AND FRIENDS OF DION—PROSPERITY.

YE have written to me, that I ought to think your sentiments⁶ are the same as those which Dion held; and, moreover, you exhort me to make a common cause, as far as I can, in word and deed. If ye have the same opinion and desires with him I agree to unite with you; but if not, to take frequent counsel with myself. Now what his sentiments and desires were, I can tell pretty nearly, not by conjecture, but by having known them clearly.

For when I came originally to Syracuse, being then nearly forty years old, Dion was of the age that Hipparinus is now; and the opinion he then held, he has still continued to hold, namely, that the Syracusans ought to be free and live according to the best laws. So that it is by no means wonderful, if some god has caused the latter to agree in the same opinion with the former on the subject of a polity. But what was the method of producing this, is a thing not unworthy for the young ¹ I cannot understand ἐπομύντας here. It seems to have come from the end of the sentence, where one MS. omits it.

² This is the only version I can give here of μη ἀμούσῳ.

³ To this passage Wyttenbach, in Epist. Critic., p. 14, says Lucian alluded in Amor., p. 455, σπουδῇν—καὶ παιδιὰν εὐμουσον.

⁴ On the metaphorical use of ἀδελφός see Ruhnken on Tim. p. 2, and Blomfield on Æsch. S. Th. 343.

⁵ Such I presume is the meaning here of εὐδαιμόνων.

⁶ Ficinus has “eandem mentem in republica esse vobis conservandam,” as if he had found something in his MS., wanting at present in all the rest.

and not young to hear; and I will endeavour to relate it to you from the beginning; for the present events offer the opportunity.

When I was a young man, I was affected as the many are. I thought, if I became quickly my own master, to betake myself immediately to the public affairs of the state. Now some such circumstances as these fell out relating to state affairs. Of the polity existing at that time, when it was abused by many, a change took place; and over the change one and fifty men presided as governors, eleven in the city, and ten in the Piræus; and each of these had a jurisdiction about the Agora,¹ and whatever else it was necessary to regulate in the cities,² while thirty of them were invested with supreme authority. Some of these happened to be my relatives and acquaintances; and they forthwith invited me (to attend) to state-affairs, as being a suitable pursuit. And how I was affected is, on account of my youth, not at all wonderful. For I thought that they would, by leading the city from an unjust mode of living to a just one,³ administer it in the way it was meet;³ so that I diligently gave my mind to what they did. But when I saw these men proving in a short time that the previous form of government had been (as it were) gold,⁴ and that they committed other acts (unjustly),⁵ and sent my friend Socrates, advanced in years, whom I am not ashamed to say was nearly the most righteous man of those then living, together with certain others,⁶ against one of the citizens, ¹ This probably alludes to the office called Ἀγορανόμος, or "controller of the market," of which there were five for the Piræus, as stated by Harpocration on the authority of Aristotle.

² By the cities are meant the towns in Attica, that, like cities and boroughs in England, had previously their own municipal officers.

³ The Greek is διοικῆσαι δὴ—But Ficinus has "debere convertere," as if he had found in his MS. διοικῆσαι δεῖν. From the two I have elicited ἡ δέον—

⁴ In lieu of χρυσὴν, Hemsterhuis on Lucian Necyomant. § 4, would read χρυσὸν: and so two MSS. subsequently collated; for that is the perpetual word in this expression. Boissonade however on Eunapius, p. 483, and Stalbaum here, are content with χρυσὴν.

⁵ I have followed the version of Ficinus—"et alia multa injuste fecerunt." The Greek is simply τὰ τε ἄλλα—

and to bring him by force, in order that he might be executed, so that he (Socrates) might have a share in their deeds, whether he wished it or not, and that he did not comply, but ran the risk of suffering every thing, rather than take any part in their impious acts—all this when I saw, and other similar acts of no trifling kind, I felt indignant, and withdrew myself from the evil men of that period.

Not long after this, the power of the thirty fell by a revolution, together with the whole of the then existing form of government. Again, therefore, but somewhat more slowly, did a desire still drag me on to engage in public and political affairs. Now in these, as being in a troubled state, many things took place, at which any one might be indignant; nor was it wonderful, that in revolutions the punishment of hostile factions should have been rather severe in the case of some; although they who returned acted with considerable clemency.¹ But by some chance some of those in power brought before a court of justice our friend Socrates, laying upon him an accusation the most unholy, and belonging the least of all to Socrates. For some brought him to trial, and others gave their vote against him, and destroyed the man, who had been unwilling to share in the unholy act of a removal relating to one of his then exiled² friends,³ when the exiles themselves were unfortunate.³ On reflecting then upon these matters, and on the persons who managed political affairs, and on the laws and customs, the more I considered them, and I advanced in years, by so much the more difficult did it appear to me to administer correctly state affairs. For it is not possible to do so without friends and faithful associates; whom, existing at that time, it was not easy to find—for our city was then no longer administered according to the manners and institutions of our fathers—and it was impossible to acquire new with any facility; while the written laws and customs were corrupted,⁴ and (unholiness) was increasing to a degree how wonderful!⁴

¹ According to C. Nepos in Thrasybulus, § 2, only the thirty tyrants themselves suffered.

² So Ficinus renders φευγόντων. But perhaps the word means here, "put on their trial." For φεύγων is thus opposed to διώκων, "the pursuer," in Scottish law-phrase.

³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus. For he could not very well understand them; nor can I.

⁴ The words καὶ ἐπεὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλος ὅστις are omitted by Ficinus,

So that I, who had been at first full of ardour towards engaging in affairs of state, did, upon looking at these things and seeing them carried along in every way and on every side, become giddy; but not so as to withdraw from considering how at any time something¹ better might take place respecting these very matters, and likewise the whole form of government, but to be wisely² waiting continually for opportunities of acting. ³At last I perceived³ that all states existing at present were badly governed. For what relates to their laws is nearly in an incurable state, without some wonderful arrangement in conjunction with fortune. I was therefore compelled to say, in praise of true philosophy, that through it we are enabled to perceive all that is just as regards the state and individuals; and ⁴hence that the human race will never cease from ills, until the race of those, who philosophize correctly and truthfully, shall come to political power, or persons of power in states shall, by a certain divine allotment, philosophize really.⁴

Holding these sentiments I arrived in Italy and Sicily,⁵ when I first came there.⁵ But on my arrival, the life, which is there called happy, pleased me at no time or manner; (a life) full of the tables prepared by Italiotes and Syracusans; and where one is filled twice a day; and never lies alone by night, and (has) such other pursuits as follow a life of this kind. For from these habits, no man under heaven, having such pursuits from his youth, would ever become prudent,⁶ not even if he were because, I suspect, he could not understand them; nor could I have done so, had I not seen that τὸ ἀνόσιον was to be restored probably after θαυμαστὸν ὄσον. With this use of ὄσον after an adjective compare οὐπάριον ὄσον in Aristoph. Bacch. 78.

¹ The Greek is ἀμεινον ἀν γίγνοιτο. But Ficinus has "melius quid eveniret." He therefore found in his MS. ἀμεινον ἀν τι γίγνοιτο.

² I have adopted εἰ, found in one MS., in lieu of αὐ—

³ Ficinus has "tandem vero compertum est mihi," as if he had found in his MS. τελευτῶν δὲ ἐνόησα instead of τελευτῶντα δὲ νοῆσαι—

⁴ On this celebrated doctrine of Plato, which is repeated in different words in Rep. v. p. 473, D., § 18, it will be sufficient to refer to Ruhnken on Rutilius Lupus, p. 21.

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

mixed up with a wondrous nature by some god;⁶ ¹ but to become temperate it will never be his care.¹ And the same thing may be said respecting the remaining portion of virtue. Nor will any state rest quietly according to any laws whatever, while men conceive that it is proper to waste every thing on excesses, and deem that they ought to be idle in every thing except good living and drinking, and the laboured exertions made for sexual intercourse. But it is necessary for such states never to cease changing their tyrannies, oligarchies, and democracies, and for the powerful in them not to endure even the name of a polity just and with equal laws.

With these and the above-mentioned sentiments I passed over to Syracuse; perhaps through an accident of fortune; at least it seems that by the planning of some superior being a beginning was laid of the doings, that have lately taken place relating to Dion and of those too relating to Syracuse, and, there is a fear, to still more persons, if you do not yield to me, when giving advice a second time. How then do I assert that my journey to Sicily was the beginning of all the then doings? For while associating with Dion, then a young man, and pointing out to him by words that, what seemed good to me would be the best for mankind, and counselling him so to act, I was nearly ignorant that I was unconsciously planning in some manner the dissolution of a tyranny. For Dion being very docile, both with respect to other things, and the reasons urged by me, he heard so quickly and attentively, as not one ever did of the young men whom I had fallen in with; and he was desirous of passing the remainder of his life in a manner superior to the majority of the Italiotes and Siceliotes,² by loving virtue ³ rather than pleasure³ and the rest of luxuries;

¹—¹ Here again Ficinus has led the way to the truth by his version, "temperatus esse certe nunquam curabit." For the Greek is at present σώφρων δὲ οὐδ' ἂν μelleσαι ποτὶ γενεσθαι. But it was originally, I suspect, σώφρων δὲ οὐδὲν μέλλου ποτὶ γενίσθαι: where μέλλου is supported by μέλλου in two MSS.

² By the "Siceliotes" were meant foreigners settled in Sicily; the name of the natives was "Sicilians," in Greek Σικελοί.

³—³ Such is Taylor's version of περὶ πλείονος in Greek, and of "potius quam" in Ficinus. But until a parallel passage is produced of περὶ πλείονος thus used in the sense of πλείον or μᾶλλον, I shall continue to believe that Plato wrote ἀρετὴν περὶ τοῦ λυσιονος—"a virtue relating to something better than pleasure—" and hence he lived rather odious to those, who passed their lives according to tyrannical institutions, until the death of Dionysius occurred. Subsequently, however, he perceived that the sentiments, which he held under the influence of correct reasoning, did not exist in him alone, but in some others; not numerous indeed, but amongst some, one of whom he thought would be probably Dionysius (the younger),¹ if the gods assisted; and should this take place, that both his own life, and that of the other Syracusans, would turn out to be beyond all measure happy. He thought, moreover, that I ought by all means to come as quickly as possible to Syracuse, to take part in these doings; for he remembered how our mutual intercourse had easily worked him up to the desire of a life the most beautiful and best; which if he could but accomplish, as he was attempting to do, in the case of Dionysius, he had great hopes that he could, without slaughter and death, and the evils which have now taken place, make, in the whole of the country, life to be happy and rational.

With these correct sentiments Dion persuaded Dionysius to send for me; and he himself requested me by all means to come as quickly as possible, before certain other persons, associating with Dionysius, should turn him aside to a life different from the best. ²But it is necessary to relate what he requested, although² it is a rather long story. What opportunity, said he, shall we wait for, greater than that through a certain divine fortune? and giving a statement of their command over Italy and Sicily, and of his own power in it, and of the youth of Dionysius, and of the desire he felt so vehemently for philosophy and instruction, and saying how his cousins and kindred were to be easily exhorted to the reasoning and mode of life ever laid down by myself, and that they were most competent to exhort Dionysius, so that now, if ever, all the hope would be fulfilled of the same persons becoming philosophers and rulers of mighty states. Such then and many others of a like kind were his exhortations. But a fear still possessed my mind, as to how, perchance, the conduct of the young men would turn out; for the passions of such persons are hasty, and are often borne along in a direction contrary to themselves. I knew, however, that Dion was naturally of a steady disposition and of a moderate age. Hence, while I was considering and doubting¹ whether I ought to go, or how,¹ the balance inclined² that I ought (to go). For if perchance any one should attempt to give effect to my ideas upon laws and a form of government, I ought to attempt it now. For by persuading only one person, I should work out every good. With these ideas and confidence, and not from what some imagined, I set sail from home; feeling for myself the greatest shame, lest I should seem to myself to be altogether mere talk,³ and never willing to lay hold of any thing to be done; and run the risk of betraying first the hospitality and friendship of Dion, exposed in reality to no small dangers; and should he suffer aught,⁴ or, being driven out by Dionysius and his other enemies, fly to us, and, making an inquiry,⁵ say—"I am come to you, Plato, an exile; but I am neither in want of cavalry nor of heavy-armed soldiers to ward off my enemies, but of words and persuasion; by which I know you are especially able to turn young persons to what is good and just, and to place them on each occasion on terms of friendship and fellowship with each other; through the want of which on your part I have now left Syracuse, and am present here. What relates to myself indeed will bring upon you less disgrace; but the philosophy, which you are always praising, and which you

¹ Taylor has introduced this word from "junioem" in Ficinus, although wanting in the Greek; while he has omitted "if the gods assisted," duly found in the "Diis bene juvantibus" of Ficinus.

² The Greek is λέγων δὲ τὰς ἐδεῖτο, εἰ, where Stephens suggested ἐδεῖτο, ἃ καὶ, and translated, "His dictis addebat preces, quas longum esset commemorare;" to which he was led by finding in Ficinus "cohortationem insuper precibus longam adjunxit." I have translated as if the Greek were λέγειν δὲ τὰς, ἃ ἐδεῖτο, δεῖ, εἰ, to which Taylor led me by translating, "It is necessary to relate—"

¹— Ficinus has "utrum eundem parendumque foret, necne," answering to πότερον εἴη πορευτήριον καὶ ὑπακουστήριον ἢ ὅ in Ald., which, as regards ἢ ὅ, is preferable here to ἢ πῶς. For the question is not about the manner of going, but of going or not.

² The verb ἔπεισε is here used impersonally.

³ Compare Eurip. Herc. F. 111, where old men are called ἔρεα μόνον, "words merely."

⁴ In εἰ πάθῃ τι is the usual euphemism for "should he perish."

⁵ I cannot understand ἀνέρωτο, nor could Ficinus, who has omitted it; unless it refers to the question feigned to be put subsequently by Dionysius.

say is held¹ in dishonour by the rest² of mankind, how is it not now betrayed by you together with myself, as far as depends upon you? If, indeed, we had been inhabitants of Megara, you would surely have come to me as an assistant for what I had called you, or I should have considered you the meanest of men. But now, excusing yourself by the length of the journey,³ and the danger of the voyage, and the greatness of the trouble,³ think you that you shall avoid perchance the charge of cowardice? It will be far from this."

To language like this, what would have been a becoming answer? ⁴There is none. But⁴ I came with reason and justice, as much as it is possible for a man, having left my own pursuits, which were not unbecoming, under a tyranny, which was neither suited to my discourses nor myself. But by my coming I liberated myself (from any charge), and exhibited myself to be unreprieved by Zeus, who presides over hospitality and the allotment of philosophy, which would have been exposed to reproach, had I acted an effeminate part, and through cowardice shared in disgrace and shame. On my arrival then—for there is no need to be prolix—I found all the affairs of Dionysius full of sedition and calumnies on the part of a tyranny respecting Dion. I defended Dion, therefore, to the utmost of my power; but I was able to do but little. But nearly in the fourth month after my arrival, Dionysius accused Dion of plotting against his power, and putting him on board a small vessel, sent him out with dishonour. Whereupon all of us, who were the friends of Dion, were fearful lest he should accuse and punish some one of us as an accomplice in the plot of Dion. And a report went abroad at Syracuse, that I had been put to death by Dionysius, as being forsooth

¹ In lieu of φείσεσθαι, Plato wrote either φθίψεσθαι, "wanders," or στρίψεσθαι, "tost about."

² The phrase in Plato is perpetually τῶν ἄλλων. Hence for λείπων I should prefer ἄλόγων, "irrational—"

⁴ The Greek is οὐκ ἴστιν ἄλλ' ἦλθον. Plato wrote οὐκ ἴστιν ἄλλη ἢ ἦλθον, i. e. There is no other than that I came—the cause of all that happened at that time. But on perceiving that we were all thus¹ disposed, and dreading lest something of greater consequence should arise from our fear, he received all of us most kindly into his favour, consoled me, and exhorted me to be of good cheer, and requested me by all means to stay; for there would be an advantage to him from my not flying away, but from my remaining; and on this account he pretended to make an urgent request. We know however that the requests of tyrants are mingled with necessity. By a contrivance, therefore, he prevented my sailing-away. For taking me to the Acropolis, he made me reside there; from whence no ship-master could carry me off, not through Dionysius forbidding it merely, but unless Dionysius himself sent a person with an order, commanding him to lead me out. Nor was there any foreign trader, nor even one of those having jurisdiction over the departures² from the country, who would have overlooked my going away alone; but he would immediately have laid hold of me and brought me back again to Dionysius; especially since it had been already bruited abroad contrary to what had been done before, that Dionysius was again holding Plato to his arms in a wonderful manner. And indeed this was the case, for it is necessary to speak the truth. He did indeed hold me to his arms, ever as time went on, more (and more) in respect to the intercourse³ of my manner and habits. But he wished me to praise him more than Dion, and to hold him as a friend in a far greater degree than the other; and for such an end he made wonderful efforts. But the way by which this might have taken place in the best manner, if it took place at all, ⁴he omitted; for he shrunk⁴ to become familiar and to associate with me, by ⁵hearing and learning⁵

² From this it would appear that there was at Syracuse an office, where passports were given to those leaving the country with the permission of the government, who had the power of issuing, what in England would be called a writ "ne exeat regno."

³ Ficinus has here what is more intelligible, "et gaudebat moribus nostris et consuetudine." Perhaps Plato wrote κατὰ τὴν—σύνεσιν, "according to his knowledge—"

⁴ The Greek is in some MSS. ᾤκνει ὡς δὴ, in others ᾤκνει ἱσως δὴ. But as Ficinus has "neglexit; hæc enim fuerat—" he probably found in his MS., what the sense requires, ἔλασε ᾤκνει γὰρ—

⁵ Ficinus has avoided the ἑσπερον πρότερον in μανθάνων και

discourses on philosophy, through the fear lest, (according)¹ to the language of calumniators, he should be shackled, and Dion administer all affairs. However I endured every thing, keeping to the original sentiments, with which I arrived, if by any means he should come to the desire of a philosophic life. But he, by his pulling in a contrary direction, obtained the victory. In this way then happened to turn out the first period of my sojourning and pursuits in Sicily. After this I went away and came back again, through Dionysius having sent for me with all earnestness. But on what account (I came),² and what I did, as being reasonable and just, I will, having first advised you what you ought to do, after what has just now taken place, subsequently relate in detail, for the sake of those who are inquiring with what view I came a second time to Sicily; and that deeds of no moment may not happen to be mentioned as deeds of moment.

³ I say then something what I ought to say.³ For the party, who gives advice to a sick man and to one who uses a diet improper for good health,⁴ it is especially necessary in the first place to change the mode of living, and to recommend to the patient, willing to comply, the other things that are proper;⁵ but if he is unwilling, I consider that he, who retires from advising such a person, acts like a man and a physician; but that he, who stays, like a person unmanly and devoid of art. The same is the case of a state, whether its master be one or many. If, while the government is proceeding in a right road according to the constitution, it takes counsel about what is conducive to its interest, it is the part of a man with mind to give to such parties δεύων by translating "in audiendis addiscendisque," whom I have with Taylor followed.

¹ The Greek is φοβούμενος τοὺς—λόγους μή πη— But Ficinus has "timens ne, quemadmodum asserabant calumniatores"—He therefore found, I suspect, in his MS. φοβούμενος, κατὰ τοὺς—λόγους, μή πη—

² Ficinus has alone what the sense requires, "quam vero ob causam rursus accesserim," as if his MS. read ὡν δὲ ἵνα ἀνῆλθον.

³⁻⁴ The Greek is λέγω δὲ τὰδε· ἰγώ. But as there is no verb to which ἰγώ can be referred, I have translated as if the Greek were λέγω δὲ τι, ὃ δεῖ λέγειν. The verb supplied by Ficinus is "reor."

⁴ In lieu of ἄλλο τι, which Ficinus has omitted as unintelligible, and Stephens attempted to correct by reading, what Stalbaum approves of, ἄλλα τι καὶ ὅτι, Plato wrote, I suspect, μάλιστα, as I have translated.

⁵ The sense manifestly requires ἀ, or γ, δεῖ in lieu of ἦδη.

advice; but in the case of those, who are proceeding entirely out of a straightforward polity, and not at all willing to walk in its steps, and who proclaim to the adviser to leave alone the form of government, and not to disturb it—since, if he does disturb it, he shall suffer death—and at the same time exhort him to minister to their wishes and passions, and to advise in what way these may for all time to come be gratified,¹ I should consider the person, who endures to give such advice, unmanly; but him, who does not endure, a man.

Holding then such sentiments, whenever any one consults with myself about any thing of the greatest moment relating to his life, such as the acquisition of wealth, or the care² of his body or soul, I readily advise with him, if he appears to me to live day by day in an orderly manner, or is willing to be persuaded by me when giving advice, nor do I desist, as if I have gone through merely a formal rite.³ But if either he does not consult me at all, or is evidently not about to follow my advice, I do not go self-called to such a person to counsel him, nor would I do so by compulsion, even if he were my son. But I would give advice to a slave, and force him, even unwilling, (to follow it.) I should however think it not holy to force my father or mother, unless they were, through disease, afflicted with silliness. But if persons are living an established mode of life, pleasing to themselves, but not to me, I should not, when admonishing them in vain, dislike them, nor yet by flattering, minister to them, and afford them the means of gratifying their desires, which if I were to embrace, I should not wish to live. With the same sentiments respecting a state a prudent man ought to live, and speak out, if it appears to him not to have a good form of government, (and) if he is about not to speak in vain, nor to lose his life by speaking; but never to apply violence⁴ to his country on account of⁴ a change in the form of government, unless it cannot become the best without

² Ficinus has “corporis vel animi purgationem,” as if he had found in his MS. καθάρσεως, instead of ἐπιμέλειαν, which would lead to ἡ περὶ σώματος ἐπιμέλειας ἡ ψυχῆς καθάρσεως.

³ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows as usual, has “non prius desino, quam initium pro viribus usque ad finem perduxerim.” On the use and meaning of ἀποσιῶσθαι, see Ast on Legg. vi. p. 752, D.

⁴ The Greek is παρπιδι. But one MS. has παρπιδι διὰ, which evidently leads to παρπιδι διὰ—the banishment and slaughter of persons ; but leading a quiet life, to pray for the good both of himself and of the state.

In this very manner I would advise you (to act); and so did I together with Dion advise Dionysius ¹ to live day by day, so that in the first place ¹ he might be about to become the master of himself, and acquire faithful friends and associates, in order that he might not suffer what his father did ; who, after he had got possession of many and great cities in Sicily, which had been laid waste by the Barbarians, was not able to establish and preserve in each of them forms of government, faithful under his associates, or strangers ² coming from any part whatever, ² or brothers, whom he himself had brought up as being younger, and had made them rulers, after being merely private persons, and remarkably rich, after being (very) poor. For among these he could not attach to himself a single one as the sharer of his dominion, although working upon them by persuasion, and teaching, and kindnesses, and alliances ; and he was sevenfold worse off than Darius ; who, placing a trust in persons not his brothers, ³ nor brought up by him, but in those alone associated with himself in their mastery ⁴ over the eunuch, ⁴ divided amongst them seven parts of his dominions, each larger than the whole of Sicily, and made use of them as faithful associates, and attacking neither himself, nor each other ; and gave likewise an example of what a lawgiver and a king ought to be. For he established laws, by which he has preserved even now the Persian power ; and besides this the Athenians, although they had not colonized themselves many Grecian cities, which had been overturned by the Barbarians, but merely got hold of them, when already inhabited, preserved their empire over them for seventy years, through having persons friendly to them in each of the towns.

¹—¹ The Greek is ζῆν μέντοι τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν πρῶτον. But five MSS. omit τὸ, and two πρῶτον. Ficinus has "ea videlicet ratione quotidie vivere," as if he had found in his MS. ζῆν καθ' ἡμέραν τοῦτον τὸν τρόπον.

²—² Instead of ἄλλων δὲ ποθεν, correct Greek requires ἄλλοθεν δὲ ποθεν.

³ I have adopted the idea of Stephens, who unites οὐκ with ἀδελφοῖς, not, as others do, with πιστεύσας.

⁴—⁴ The Greek is τῆς τοῦ Μήδου τε καὶ εὐνούχου. But Μήδου τε καὶ, or Μίδου τε καὶ, as Ficinus found in his MS., is evidently an incorrect explanation of τοῦ εὐνούχου, whose name was Smerdis, as we learn from Herodotus iii. 61.

But Dionysius having through his wisdom brought together the whole of Sicily into one state, yet, through confiding in no one, was with difficulty saved. For he was poor in persons friendly and faithful; than which there is no greater sign as regards virtue and vice, than in being destitute or not of men of that kind. I therefore and Dion advised Dionysius, since what he had received from his father had come to him unacquainted with instruction, and unacquainted too with befitting associates, in the first place to proceed in that direction, to procure for himself friends, different from his relations, but both his equals in age and in accordance with him respecting virtue. But we particularly advised him to be in accord with himself; for that he was wonderfully deficient in this we asserted, not indeed in such clear terms—for this was not safe—but in hints and contending in our discourses, that in this way every man will preserve both himself and those over whom he is the ruler; but that by not turning himself in this direction he will bring to pass every thing the very reverse. But if, after going on, as we said, and rendering himself prudent and temperate, he peopled the cities of Sicily, that had been made desolate, and bound them together with laws and forms of government, so as to be of one family with himself and an assistance to each other against the Barbarians,¹ he would not only double his ancestral dominion, but make it in reality much larger. For if this were done, it would be much more easy to enslave the Carthaginians, than was the slavery effected by them during the reign of Gelon; ² but not as now on the contrary,³ his father fixed the tribute he was to carry to the Barbarians.

. This is what was said and the advice given to Dionysius by us, who were plotting against him, as the reports were circulated on many sides. Such, that after prevailing with Dionysius, they caused him to drive out Dion, and threw myself into a state of terror. But, that I may bring to a close not a few events ³ which occurred in a short time,³ Dion, ¹ departing from ¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were τά, not τὰς, for βοηθείας must belong to the cities in Sicily.

² The words ἀλλ' οὐχ ὥσπερ νῦν τοὺν αὐτίον I cannot understand. Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, "contra quam accidit patri —"

³ Such is the translation of πράγματα τὰ ἐν ὀλίγῳ χρόνῳ. But Ficinus has "non pauca in paucis—" as if his MS. omitted τὰ ἐν—Taylor translates the whole phrase "in short—"

Peloponnesus and Athens, admonished Dionysius indeed.¹ Since then (Dion)² had liberated and twice restored the town to the citizens, the Syracusans were affected in the same manner towards him, as Dionysius had been, when he endeavoured by educating and bringing him up to make him thus a worthy partner of his power through the whole of life. But ²(he gave his ear)³ to those that were calumniating Dion, and saying that he was doing all that he did at that time, while plotting against the absolute power of Dionysius, in order that the one, being lulled in his mind by his attention to instruction, might neglect his kingdom, and commit it to Dion, and the other make it his own by fraud, and cast out Dionysius from his dominions.

These reports being then bruited a second time among the Syracusans prevailed by a victory very absurd and disgraceful to those who were the causes of it. For how it happened it is proper for those to hear, who are calling upon me on the subject of the present affairs.

Being an Athenian, and the associate of Dion, and one who had battled with him against the tyrant, I arrived, that I might produce a peace instead of a war; but while battling against the calumniators I was overcome. But Dionysius, attempting to bribe me by ⁴honours and riches,⁴ to become on his side a witness and a friend, touching the propriety of his casting out Dion,⁵ failed in all of these things happening to him. And Dion afterwards, on returning home from exile, brought with him two Athenian brothers, who had become his friends, not through philosophy, but through that acquaintance, which runs through ⁶the generality of friends,⁶ and which they formed

¹— Here is evidently something wanting to preserve the connexion of ideas in the narrative.

² The Greek is 'Ἐπειδὴ δ' οὖν—But two MSS. ἔπει οὖν—Ficinus has "Cum ergo—Dion—" He therefore found in his MS. ἔπει δὲ Δίων, and subsequently ἀπορίσ for ἀπρίσ, as shown by his version, "civibus."

³— To complete the sense and syntax Cornarius proposed to insert ἐπιστάνει after ὁ δὲ—Perhaps Plato wrote ὁ δ' ἔδω τὸ οὖς τοῖς—as I have translated.

⁴— Ficinus has "non verbis solum sed pecuniis et honoribus."

⁵ I have translated as if αὐτῷ γίγνεσθαι followed διήμαρπεν, not Δίω-νος, where those words are unintelligible.

⁶— Although πλείστων φίλων might perhaps stand, yet one would prefer πλαστοῦς φίλων, as I suggested in Bailey's Hermesianax, p. 155, com-from paying the rites of hospitality, and from being ¹Mystæ and Epoptæ.¹ Moreover these two, by having brought Dion back, had become his friends, and, from such causes, and the assisting him in his return from exile, his companions. But when, on their arrival in Sicily, they understood that Dion had been exposed by those Siceliotes, who had become free through him, to the calumny of plotting to become a tyrant, they not only betrayed their associate and guest, but became, as it were, the perpetrators of a murder, in that, with weapons in their hands, they stood by to assist the murderers. However, I neither pass by this base and unholy deed, nor do I detail it; for to many others it (has been)² a care to hymn it, and it will be so at some future time.

But the charge, which has been alleged respecting the Athenians, how that it was they, who bound this disgrace around the city, I will take away. For I say that he too was an Athenian, who did not betray this very person, when it was in his power to obtain wealth and many other honours. For he did not become a friend through a shop-mate friendship, but through the communion of a liberal education; to which alone he, who is endued with mind, ought to trust, rather than to the alliance of souls³ and bodies; so that those two were not fit to bring disgrace on the city through having murdered Dion, as being persons of no account at any time. All this has been said for the sake of the advice given to the friends and kindred of Dion.

I give you besides the same counsel, and for the third time address you three in the same words. Do not place Sicily, or any other city, as a slave under persons with despotic power, but under laws; such⁴ at least is my dictum. For this is not the better either for the enslaving or the enslaved, or for their children or their children's descendants; but the experiment is altogether a destructive one. For souls, whose habits are little and illiberal, love to seize upon gain of this kind, as knowing nothing of what is good and just for the future and present time, nor of things human and divine. Of this I endeavoured to persuade Dion first, and secondly Dionysius, and now I do you the third. Be persuaded then by me, for the sake of Zeus the third saviour.¹ In the next place look to the case of Dionysius and Dion; the former of whom by not being persuaded is now living not honourably; whereas the latter, by being persuaded, died honourably. For it is a thing altogether correct and honourable for him, who aspires after things the most honourable both for himself and his country, to suffer whatever he may suffer; for not one of us is naturally immortal; nor, if this should happen to any one, would he become happy, as it seems he would to the multitude. For in things inanimate there is nothing either good or evil worthy of mention; but good or ill will happen to each soul, either existing with the body or separated from it. But it is ever requisite to trust really² to the sacred³ accounts of the olden time, which inform us that the soul is immortal, and has judges of its conduct, and suffers the greatest punishments, when it is liberated from the body. Hence it is requisite to think it is a lesser evil to suffer, than to do, the greatest sins and injuries. This, indeed, the man who is fond of money and poor in soul does not hear; and should he hear, he laughs it down, as he imagines, and impudently snatches from all sides whatever he thinks he can, like a wild beast, eat or drink, or can contribute (aught)⁴ to the mis-called pleasure of sexual intercourse, at once servile and graceless. ⁵(For) being blind, he is not able to see how great an evil, ever united to each act of wrong, follows the never being satisfied with the unholy perpetration of such snatchings;⁵ which it is

² Ficinus has "narraverunt atque narrabunt," as if he had found in his MS. ἐπιμελὲς ἦν—μελήσει. But who are the parties alluded to as having hymned these events, is not, I believe, mentioned elsewhere.

³ This disparagement of a friendship formed by kindred souls seems rather strange in the mouth of Plato. There is an error here, which it would be not difficult to correct by the aid of the proverb in Suidas, Ζεὶ χύτρα, ζῇ φιλία, i. e. "Where boils the pot, There friendship's hot." Ficinus has "animorum conjunctioni et corporum consanguinitati."

⁴ Instead of ὃ γ'—Stephens suggested ὥς γ'—similar to "ut—" in Ficinus.

² Ficinus, "revera," answering to ὕψους found subsequently in all the MSS.

³ Here is probably an allusion to the Orphic hymns, real or pretended, which were in circulation during the time of Plato.

⁴ The pronoun τι seems to have dropt out before πορεύειν, or else before περὶ, for otherwise πορεύειν will want its object.

⁵ In this most intricate passage Ficinus has been of signal service, by showing that the words αὐτῷ τῷ μὴ πίμπλασθαι were in his MS. found in a different place to where they are commonly read. For his version necessary for him, who has acted unjustly, to drag along with himself, both while he is moving about upon the earth, and when he takes¹ under the earth a journey without honour, and thoroughly miserable in every way.

By detailing these and other reasons of the like kind, I was enabled to persuade Dion. And I should have felt most justly against those, who murdered him, an anger, in a certain manner, almost as great as against Dionysius; for both had injured myself and all the rest, so to say, in the highest degree. For² the former had destroyed a man, who was willing to make use of justice; while the latter (was) unwilling to make use of it through the whole of his dominions, although possessing the greatest power. In which (dominions) had philosophy and power existed really, as it were³ in the same (dwelling), they would have set up amongst all men, both Greeks and Barbarians, an opinion not vainly⁴ shining, (and) in every respect the true one, that neither a state nor a man can ever be happy, unless by leading a life with prudence in subjection to justice, whether possessing those things themselves, or by being brought up in the habits of holy persons their rulers, or instructed in justice.

This injury did Dionysius inflict. But the rest would have been a trifling wrong, as compared to these. But he, who murdered Dion, did not know that he had done the same deed is, "et quasi cæcus non cernit se frustra contendere inexplabilem explere concupiscentiam; neque rursus cernit, quantum sit impietas malum quibusque insit rebus, semper injustitiæ mixta." In other respects however his translation is too loose to be a safe guide. The Greek was perhaps originally to this effect, Τυφλὸς ὢν γὰρ οὐχ ἔχει ὁρᾶν ὡς κακὸν ἡλικὸν δαί μετ' ἀδικήματος ἐκάστου ξυνέπεται αὐτῷ τῷ μὴ πίμπλασθαι τῶν ἀπαγαμάτων ἀνοσιούργια: and so I have translated.

¹ On νόστος and νοστεῖν, taken in the sense of going, not as usual of returning, see my note on Philoct. 43. Here, however, the idea of a return is to be kept in mind. For the dead are said to return to the earth. See at Menexenus, § 6, and compare the language of Walter Scott, who says of the person, who has no love for his father-land, that he

"Living shall forfeit fair renown,
And doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust, from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonour'd, and unsung."

² To preserve the syntax ἦν must be inserted after οὐδὲν—

³ Ficinus has "vere in idem quasi domicilium"—he therefore found in his MS. ὁντως ὡς ἐν ταύτῳ οἴκῳ, not merely ὁντως ἐν ταύτῳ—

⁴ The Greek is here ἱκανῶς, the sense requires οὐ κενῶς—

as Dionysius. For I clearly know, as far as it is possible for one man to speak confidently of another, that if Dion had retained his power, he would never have changed it to any other form of government than to that, by which he first (caused) Syracuse,¹ his own country, after he had delivered it from slavery, to look joyous, and had put it into the garb of freedom; and after this, he would by every contrivance have adorned the citizens with laws both befitting and the best; and he would have been ready to do what followed in due order after this; and have colonized the whole of Sicily, and have freed it from the Barbarians, by expelling some and subduing others, more easily than Hiero did. But if these things had taken place, through a man just, and brave, and temperate, and who was a philosopher, the same opinion of virtue would have been produced amongst the multitude, as would have been amongst all men, so to say; and have saved² Dionysius, had he been persuaded by me. But now some dæmon surely, or some evil spirit, falling upon³ with iniquity and impiety, and, what is the greatest matter, with the audacity of ignorance, in which all evils are rooted, and from which they spring up, and afterwards produce fruit the most bitter to those, who have begotten it,⁴ this⁵ has a second time subverted and destroyed every ¹ By omitting with six MSS. καὶ before φαιδρόνας, the syntax is indeed completed; but there is still some error in the words μὲν πρῶτον, which it is not difficult perhaps to correct.

² Such is the literal version of ἀπίσωσι. But Ficinus—"quæ et salvare—viguisset," as if he had found in his MS. ἐν σίσωστο, where the pluperfect passive would want, as it often does, its augment; as shown by Matth. Gr. Gr. 165.

³ The Greek is ἐμπέσων, which I cannot understand; nor could Taylor, who translates "replete," as if he was thinking of ἐμπλήως. Ficinus has "his sese objiciens." But ἐμπέπτειν does not mean "se objicere;" and if it did, there is nothing to answer to "his." Perhaps Plato wrote ἀλιτήριος συμπίσων ἀνομία. On the corruption of συν into ἐμ, see Schæfer on Dionysius Περὶ Συνθεσ. p. 147, and in Index under Σύν.

⁴ Instead of τοῖς γεννήσασι, Ficinus has "qui producentur;" as if he had either read in his MS., or wished to read, τοῖς τῆς γέννης οὖσι— thing. However, let us, for the sake of a good augury, keep for the third time a well-omened silence.

⁵ Stephens justly objected to αὐτῇ: which cannot be applied to the preceding δαίμων or ἀλιτήριος. But he did not perceive that if we read ἡ θεὰ τίς ἐλατήριος in lieu of ἡ τίς ἀλιτήριος, and place those words before ἐξ ἧς, the pronoun will recover the noun to which it belongs, and θεὰ ἐλατήριος will be a proper description of the Fury, whose business it is to urge on evil-doers to their ruin. But even thus the passage is not restored to its original state, nor will it be perhaps, till better MSS. are discovered.

I advise therefore you, my friends, to imitate Dion, in the good-will he felt for his country, and in his temperate mode of living, but for the better. But¹ ² under what auspices you ought to endeavour² to fulfil his wishes, and what they are, you have clearly heard from me. But upon the person, who is among you unable to live according to his country's customs in a Dorian fashion, but adopts the life of the murderers of Dion, and what is followed in Sicily, do not call; nor believe that he will in any thing ever act faithfully and sincerely. But call upon the rest to form a settlement of the whole of Sicily, and introduce both from Sicily itself and all Peloponnesus an equality of laws, and do not fear the Athenians; for men are there, who surpass all others in virtue, and who hate the daring of guest-murderers.

But if these things be done at a later period, and the differences, produced each day by factions, are many and of all kinds and hasten you on, it is requisite surely for every man, to whom a divine fortune³ has imparted even a small degree of correct thinking, to know that there will be no cessation of evils to those engaged in revolts, until the victors in battle and in the banishment and slaughter of persons shall cease to have a recollection of wrongs, and to turn themselves to the punishment of their opponents; but, having a mastery over themselves, shall lay down laws common to all, and no less acceptable to themselves than to the vanquished party, and compel them to use these laws, by the two-fold necessity of fear and shame; of fear, through their being superior, by showing their strength; and of shame, on the other hand, through their seeming to be superior in the being both willing and able to be (the masters)⁴ over pleasures, and the slaves of

¹ Ficinus has "magis magisque complectentes." For he was not perhaps aware that μμεῖσθαι is united to two accusatives, and that ἐπὶ τῷ λόγῳ follow here μμεῖσθαι, as ἐπὶ τὰ αἰσχύω precede μμενόμενας in Politic. p. 297, C., and ἐπὶ τὰ γελιότερα follow μμεμνημένοι in Phileb. p. 40, C.

² Ficinus has "quibus auspiciis." For his MS. read not ὥς but ὣν, found subsequently in all the others. It read likewise περᾶσθαι ἀποτελεῖν ἔδει—αὶ δὲ, as shown by his version, "perficere conandum vobis sit."

³ Ficinus has "sors—divina," which would be in Plato θεία μοῖρα—

⁴ As τοῖς νόμοις depend upon δουλεύειν, so to balance the sentence

the laws. For it is not possible otherwise for a state, divided against itself, to cease from ills; but divisions and enmity, and hatred and distrust, are ever wont to arise in states thus arrayed themselves against themselves. It is then ever requisite for those, who have gained the power, when they are desirous of preserving it, to choose from amongst themselves, in preference to the rest, such as they hear are the best; in the first place, old men, who have children and wives at home,¹ and ancestors the most in number and renown, and all possessing a competence. ² Now for a city of ten thousand persons fifty such will be sufficient.³ These should be sent for from their home with prayers and the greatest honours possible; and ³ they, who have sent for them, should take an oath, and beg and request them³ to lay down laws, and give not more to the victors than to the vanquished, but what is equal for, and common to, the whole state; and when the laws have been fixed, ⁴ all things are in this.⁴ For when the victors exhibit themselves more subject to the laws than the vanquished, all things will be full of security and felicity, and there will be an escape from every ill. But if not, call not upon me or any other to take a part for him, who is not persuaded by the precepts now conveyed. For these are the sisters of what I and Dion did with good intentions attempt to do for Syracuse; although they were, on the second occasion; for the first were those, which were first attempted to be done in conjunction there ought to be a verb united to περὶ τὰς ἡδονὰς. Hence Ficinus has "tum in voluptatibus superandis tum in legibus observandis," as if he had found in his MS. ὑπὲρ τὰ ταῖς ἡδοναῖς—δυνάμενοι εἶναι καὶ δουλεύειν. For thus εἶναι καὶ might have been easily lost after δυνάμενοι.

²— Such is the literal translation of this passage; which Taylor has thus misrepresented: "But ten thousand and fifty inhabitants will be sufficient for a city of this kind."

³— The Greek is μεταπειθαμένους ὁμόσαντας δεῖσθαι, of which I have given a literal translation, that I cannot understand. Nor could Ficinus, as shown by his version, "evocantes autem precari atque jurejurando astringere;" where he has given to μεταπειθαμένους a passive meaning, at variance with the genius of the language, and translated ὁμόσαντας as if it were ὁρκώσαντας. What Plato wrote can only be guessed at.

⁴— Here again I am at a loss in the words ἐν τούτῳ δὴ τὰ πάντα ἵσταν. I could have understood—ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ δὲ τὰ πάντα ἱστάναι—"all things must needs stand in their own place."

with Dionysius, a common good to all. But a certain fortune, superior to man, scattered them all. Do you then attempt to accomplish all at present more prosperously, with the aid of some kind destiny, and a luck god-sent. And thus much be it said about my advice and letter, and first visit to Dionysius.

But in my second journey and voyage to Sicily, how reasonably and carefully they took place, he, who feels any interest may hear what followed. For the first period of my sojourn in Sicily passed away, as I have stated, before I could advise the relatives and associates of Dion. But subsequently I persuaded Dionysius, as far as I was able, to let me go. But on peace being made—for there had been then a war in Sicily—we both came to an agreement; for Dionysius said that he would send for Dion and myself again, after he had established for himself a state of affairs connected with his government more securely than before; and he thought it proper for Dion to understand that this was not a banishment at that time, but merely a change of residence.¹ And on these conditions I agreed to come.

On peace being made, Dionysius sent for me; but he requested Dion to stop² another year; but he thought it proper for myself to come by all means. Dion then exhorted and entreated me to set sail. For a strong report had gone abroad from Sicily, that Dionysius had become again wonderfully eager after philosophy at that moment; and on this account Dion earnestly begged of me not to decline the invitation. But I knew that many such things happen to young men in the case of philosophy. However it seemed to me to be more safe, at least at that time, to bid a long farewell to Dionysius and Dion; and I gave offence to both by answering that I was an old man; and that nothing of what was now being done had taken place according to the agreement. But after this it seems³ that Archytas⁴ had betaken himself to Dionysius; now

² Instead of ἵκασθαι, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἀπουσίαν πάσχειν. For his version is "absentiam tolerare."

³ Ficinus has "audivi," as if he had found in his MS. ἀκήκοα instead of ἴδον—

⁴ Of this Archytas, who, as appears from the line in Horace, "Te maris et terræ numeroque carentis arenæ," attempted to measure the before my departure having made a hospitable and friendly acquaintance with Archytas, and certain other Tarentines, the guests and friends of Dionysius, I sailed away.¹ There were likewise certain other persons at Syracuse, who had heard some of the doctrines of Dion, and among these some others, filled with wrong notions about philosophy, and who seemed to me to attempt to discourse with Dionysius about things of this kind, as if Dionysius had heard all such matters as I had in my thoughts. But in other respects he was not without natural talent or the power to learn, and had a love of honour in a wonderful degree. Perhaps then the discourse of these men was pleasing to him, and he was manifestly ashamed that he heard nothing from me when I was sojourning there.² Hence he came the same time to the longing to hear me more clearly, and at the same time his love of honour urged him on. But on what account he did not hear me during my first sojourn, I have detailed in the account given above.

After I had returned home safe, and refused on his inviting me a second time, as I have just now mentioned, Dionysius appeared to be thoroughly³ on fire through his love of honour,³ lest I should seem to some persons to hold him in contempt, and that, as being acquainted with his nature and habits, and mode of living, I was unwilling to be annoyed by going to him. But I am justified in speaking the truth, and in enduring,⁴ if any one, on hearing what had occurred, should despise my philosophy, and think that the tyrant possessed a mind. For Dionysius sent to me the third time a trireme for the sake of making easy the voyage. He sent also Archedemus,⁵ whom he quantity of matter contained in the earth; little is known; but of that little the whole is to his credit; especially the fact of his being the means of saving the life of Plato, when he was near losing it by the orders of Dionysius.

¹ Ficinus omits ἀτίπλεον, which seems superfluous after πρὶν ἀπύνααι. But in that case we must read ἐποίησα, in lieu of ποιήσας, similar to "adduxeram," in Ficinus.

² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "cum ad eum profectus sum." But such is not the meaning of ἐπιδημεύειν.

³ Out of φιλοτιμηθῆναι, which I cannot understand, it is easy to elicit φιλοτιμίᾳ ἀφθῆναι, from "honoris sui causa ardere," in Ficinus. Compare a similar metaphor a little below, ἐξημμένος ὑπὸ φιλοσοφίας, ὥσπερ πυρός.

⁴ I cannot understand ὑπομένειν, nor "ferre æquo animo," in Ficinus. I could have understood ἀπαμύνειν, "to repel."

⁵ Stephens tacitly reads here Ἀρχίδαμον, instead of Ἀρχίδαμον, con-thought I valued the most of all the associates of Archytas, who were then in Sicily, and others of his (own)¹ acquaintances. And all these told to us the same story, that Dionysius had wonderfully increased in² philosophy. He sent too a long letter, well knowing how I was affected towards Dion, and that Dion was desirous I should set sail and come to Syracuse. With a view to all these particulars, therefore, the letter was composed, and at the commencement it said somehow to this effect—"Dionysius to Plato." After saying what usually follows, he said nothing previous to this, except that—"should you at my persuasion come now to Sicily, in the first place the matters relating to Dion shall be put into a train in the way you may wish yourself; for I know that you wish what is moderate, and I will accede to them; otherwise³ nothing that relates to the affairs of Dion,³ nor upon other points, nor as regards himself, will take place."—This is what he said. But the rest that was said would be here prolix, and foreign to the purpose. Other letters likewise came to me from Archytas, and others at Tarentum, speaking in high terms of the love of wisdom shown by Dionysius; and that, unless I came now, I should bring into a state of calumny the friendship existing with Dionysius, which had been effected through me, and which was of no little moment to their political affairs.

Such then being the state at that time of the sending for me, some of those from Sicily and Italy dragging me thither, and others at Athens pushing me away plainly by their entreaties, the same reason returned,⁴ that I ought not to betray Dion, nor my guests and friends⁵ at Tarentum; and it occurring no doubt that the person here alluded to is the same as the one mentioned in Epist. 3, p. 319, A.

¹ I have inserted "own," in allusion to Dionysius. To avoid the tautology in τῶν συγγεγονότων, and γνωρίμων, Ficinus has "nobiles," but that is the meaning of εὐγενεῖς, not of γνωρίμων. Hence αὐτοῦ has probably dropt out before ἄλλους or τῶν.

² Ficinus has "deditum esse." But that would be in correct Greek δεδωκώς, or ἐνδεδωκώς, not ἐπιδεδωκώς.

³ Ficinus—"nihil impetrabis quæ pro Dione optas," which is not the Latin for οὐδέν σοι τῶν περὶ Δίωνα ἔξει πραγμάτων. Perhaps he found in his MS. σὺ τῶν περὶ Δίωνα ἂ εὗξω ἔξει.

⁴ Instead of ἦκεν, Stephens proposed ἦρει, suggested by "ratio dictaret" in Ficinus. But one MS. has correctly, πάλιν ἦκεν, i. e. "returned."

⁵ Bekker has adopted ἐταίρους in lieu of ἐρίπους, found in only one MS.

curred to me, that it was nothing wonderful that a young man, who had heard incorrectly of things worthy of mention, should come with a docile spirit to the love of the best life; and that I ought to prove clearly, in what state the matter stood, and not by any means to betray it, nor to become myself the cause of a disgrace so truly great, if the case was in reality such as reported. Clothing myself then in this reasoning, I departed, fearing much, and prophesying, as it seems, not altogether well. Arriving then the third time, ¹for the saviour this at least I did in reality.¹ For I was again² luckily saved. And for this it is meet for me to give thanks to Dionysius, after the deity, because, when many were wishing to destroy me, he prevented them, and gave up to pity some portion of my affairs.

When therefore I arrived, I thought I ought first to obtain some proof whether Dionysius was in reality touched by philosophy, as by a fire, or whether this great report had come to Athens in vain. Now there is a certain method of making an experiment upon matters of this kind, by no means ignoble, but truly adapted to tyrants, and especially to such as are full of incorrect notions; which, as soon as I arrived, I perceived was very much the case with Dionysius. To such it is requisite to show what (philosophy)³ is, and of what kind, and through how great deeds how great a labour it demands. For he who hears this, if he is truly a lover of wisdom, and related to it, and worthy of it, as being a divine person, thinks he has heard of some wonderful road, and that he ought forthwith to betake himself to it, and that life is not to be endured by him, who acts otherwise. After this he does not, putting both himself and his leader on the stretch, give up the road, until he puts a finish upon all things, or obtains a power so as not to be unable to conduct himself without a person to show the road.

¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek τῷ σωτῆρι τοῦτό γε οὖν ἔπραξα ὄντως: which I cannot understand. For τῷ σωτῆρι is without regimen. Ficinus has "Profectus—sub servatore; id enim revera consecutus sum." What Plato said, I think, originally, was, that he made a sacrifice in honour of the deity, who had saved him from the perils of a sea-voyage.

² Three MSS. have πάλιν for πάλαι, agreeing with "rursus" in Ficinus.

³ Ficinus has alone preserved the word "philosophy," necessary for the sense.

In this way and with these thoughts does such a person live, acting (correctly)¹ in whatever transactions he may be engaged; but before all things perpetually keeping close to philosophy, and (making use of)² that food for the day, which may especially render him quick to learn, and of a good memory, and able to reason in himself,³ by abstaining from wine; and by which he becomes the hater of a practice contrary⁴ to this.

But they, who are not lovers of wisdom in reality, but have a coating of colour in their opinions, like those, whose bodies are sun-burnt, when they perceive how many things are to be learnt, and how great is the labour, and what temperance in daily food is requisite for that thing, they deem it too difficult and beyond their powers, and become unable to attend to it at all. But some of them persuade themselves that they have sufficiently heard the whole, and want no further exertions. This kind of experiment is clear and the most safe, when employed in the case of those living luxuriously and unable to endure labour, through the person throwing the blame not upon the guide but on himself, as being unable to attend to all that is requisite for the matter in hand.

In this way was, what has been now stated, mentioned to Dionysius. But neither did I detail them all, nor did Dionysius require it. For many things, and of the greatest moment, he pretended to possess sufficiently himself through the incorrect notions he had heard from others. And I hear that he afterwards wrote about what he had then heard, as if he were composing what was his own art,⁵ when there was nothing of his own,⁵ as I hear. However, of this I know nothing. But I know that certain others have written about the same things, but who they are⁶ not they themselves.⁶

¹ I have inserted the word εὖ, which has evidently dropt out before ἐν—

² Ficinus has "victu quotidiano utitur;" thus supplying the verb requisite for the sense.

³ I scarcely understand ἐν αὐτῷ.

⁴ The feminine, ἐναντίαν, seems to agree with πράξιν, to be got out of πράξει just before; or else ὁδόν has dropt out before οἱ δὲ—

⁵ Bekker's text, adopted by Stalbaum, is οὐδὲν τῶν αὐτῶν ὧν ἀκούοι: which I cannot understand. Ficinus has "cum nihil tamen horum revera ipsorum inesset, ut equidem audio." For he found, no doubt, in his MS. ὡς ἀκούω, as read in three others, and probably οὐδὲν αὐτῶν αὐτοῦ ὄν—an absolute sentence, in lieu of οὐδενός—ὄντος, to avoid the accumulation of genitives.

⁶ Here again I am in the dark. Ficinus leaves the difficulty as he Thus much however I can say about all, who either have written, or shall write, and state that they know about what things I am occupied, whether they have heard from myself or others, or have discovered themselves, that it is not possible for them to know any thing according to my opinions upon the matter; for there is not, and never will be, any composition of mine about them. For a matter of that kind cannot be expressed by words, like other things to be learnt; but by a long intercourse with the subject and living with it a light is kindled on a sudden, as if from a leaping fire,¹ and being engendered in the soul, feeds itself upon itself. Thus much I know, however, that what has been written or said by me, has been said in the best manner; and moreover that what has been written badly, does not pain me in the least.

But if it had appeared to me that such matters could be written or spoken of sufficiently before the masses, what could have been done by us more beautiful in life than to impart a great benefit to mankind, and to bring nature to light before all? I think, however, that the attempt² in favour of such being promulgated,² would not be beneficial except to a few, who are able with a little showing to make discoveries for themselves. But of the rest, some it will fill not correctly with a contempt by no means in reason, and others with a lofty and vain hope, as if they had learnt something solemn. And it has now come into my mind to say something further still. For perhaps by what I am about to say a portion of what has been said will become more clear. For a certain true account is the antagonist of him, who dares to write any thing whatever about matters of this kind; and which, although it has been stated by me frequently before, seems it must be stated at present likewise.

found it, by his literal version, "quicumque vero hi fuerint, ne ipsi quidem seipsos." Taylor—"but without understanding what they wrote."

¹ By "a leaping fire," Plato meant perhaps "a flash of lightning," or else what is called "ignis fatuus," "a will-o-the-wisp," or "jack-a-lantern," that rises from marsh lands, and is seen to move from place to place. I suspect however that for πηδῆσαντος we ought to read πελά- σαντος, "being near:" for one MS. has πηλήσαντος.

²—³ The Greek is περὶ αὐτῶν λεγόμενην. But Ficinus has more correctly—"in his edendis," as if he had found in his MS. περὶ τούτων λεγόμενων, and so I have translated.

There are three things belonging to each of those, through which it is necessary for science to be produced. But the fourth is science itself. And as to the fifth, it is requisite to establish that which is known and true. Of these one is its name; the second its definition;¹ the third its resemblance; the fourth its science. Now if you are desirous of understanding what has been just now asserted respecting one example, take it, and imagine thus² respecting all. A circle is called something, to which there is the name we have just mentioned. Its definition is the second thing, composed of nouns and verbs. For that, which is every where equally distant from the extremes to the middle, would be the definition of that, to which the name is of a round, and a circumference, and a circle. But the third is the circle, painted or blotted out, and made by a turner's wheel, or destroyed. By none of which accidents is the circle itself, of which all these properties are predicated, affected, as being of a different nature. But the fourth is science and intellect, and a correct opinion about them. And the whole of this again must be laid down as one thing, which exists neither in voice, nor in a corporeal figure, but is in the soul; by which circumstance it is manifest, that there is something different from the nature itself of the circle, and the three previously mentioned. But among the number of these, intellect, by its relation and similitude, approaches the nearest to the fifth; while the rest are more remote. The same is the case with respect to a thing straight, and circular, and with figure, and with colour, and of a thing good, and beautiful, and just, and of every body, both fashioned by the hand, and produced according to nature, and of fire, and water, and all things of that kind, and of every animal, and of the habit in souls, and of all actions and passions. For unless a person does, after a certain manner, understand of these things all the four, he will never perfectly participate in the science relating to the fifth. Moreover these (four) no less endeavour to show forth the quality, as respects each thing, than the being of each, through the want of power in words. On this account, no one possessing a mind will ever dare to³ place under the same view, and this too never to be changed, the objects, which are perceived by the mind, and those, that are represented by figures, which is the case with those four.³

¹ So Taylor has translated λόγος by "definition." Ficinus here, as elsewhere, when in doubt, introduces two words, "oratio sive ratio."

² Ficinus has "similiter," which leads to ὡσαύτως in lieu of οὕτως.

³ The Greek is εἰς αὐτὸ τιθεῖν τὰ νενοημένα καὶ ταῦτα εἰς ἀμείναι.

And this again, what has just now been said, it is requisite to learn. Every circle described by its doings,¹ or fashioned by a turner's wheel, is full of that, which is contrary to the fifth; for it every where² touches upon the straight line.² But we assert that the circle in the abstract has neither more nor less in itself of a contrary nature; and we assert too, that there is no fixed name for any thing; for there is nothing to prevent things, that are now called round, from being called straight, and those straight, round; nor will there be any less stability in them, when they are changed and called³ by a contrary name. The same assertion is likewise true of a definition, that, since it is composed of nouns and verbs,⁴ there is nothing stable in a sufficiently stable manner.⁴ And there is an infinity of reasons respecting each of the four, that it is uncertain. But what is of the greatest moment is, that since there are, as I have stated a little before, two things, being and quality, when the soul seeks to know, not the quality of a thing, but κίνητον, ὃ δὴ πάσχει τὰ γεγραμμένα τύποις: which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus, whose version is "in idem atque id immutabile referre, quæ ab ipso intelliguntur, atque quatuor illa; quod utique patiuntur, quæ designantur figuris." From which it is evident that he found in his MS. εἰς ταὐτό, καὶ ταῦτα, ἀμετακίνητον, τὰ νοημένα καὶ τὰ τέτταρα. But the words καὶ τὰ τέτταρα, by which are meant the four mentioned above, ὄνομα, λόγος, εἶδωλον, and ἐπιστήμη, all of which are represented by figures in the shape of letters, belong to πάσχει, and are opposed to the νοημένα: and so I have translated.

¹ Ficinus, unable it would seem to understand ἐν ταῖς πράξεσιν, has "inter hominum manus—" Perhaps the expression answers to the English "practically."

² By this Plato meant, I presume, that no circle formed materially is perfectly true; and if so, some part of it touches upon a straight line. So the moderns assert that it is impossible to make materially a straight line; for it touches some where upon a curve.

³ Instead of καλοῦσι, which is here unintelligible, we must read καλεῖται—Ficinus has "nominibus in contrarium permutatis."

what it is, ¹ unless each of these four previously sought for by the soul through reason and effect, and at last turns out correctly discussed by the senses, through all things that are said and shown, ¹ it fills every man, so to say, with all doubt and uncertainty.

In such cases then as through a depraved education we are not accustomed to seek the truth, but the image of it, which is placed before us, is sufficient (for us to touch upon), ² we do not become ridiculous to each other, the interrogated to the interrogating; but we are able to bandy about those four, and to examine them. ³ But in such cases as we compel a person to exhibit that fifth, any one of those, who are able to reply, and to overthrow, is the superior, ³ ⁴ and causes him, who is explaining (this fifth) either by speech, or writing, or answers, to appear to the multitude of his hearers entirely ignorant of the things, about which he attempts either to write or speak, persons being sometimes ignorant, that it is not the soul of the writer or speaker that is confuted, but the nature of each of the four (spoken of), ⁴ when it is existing improperly. ⁵ But the procession through all these, while changing its place towards each upwards and downwards, scarcely at length generates the knowledge of a thing existing naturally well in a person existing naturally well. ⁵ But when it exists naturally

¹—¹ Such is the literal translation of the Latin version by Ficinus, who could not understand the Greek, nor can I, τὸ δὲ μὴ ζητούμενον ἕκαστον τῶν τεττάρων προτεῖνον τῇ ψυχῇ λόγῳ τε καὶ κατ' ἔργα αἰσθήσιν ἐβέλεγκτον τὸ τε λεγόμενον καὶ δεικνύμενον αἰὶ παρεχόμενον ἕκαστον—where the reading πρότερον, found in his MS. for προτεῖνον, and αἰσθήσιν for αἰσθήσιν, have been confirmed by two others. What Plato wrote, remains still to be discovered.

² This was added apparently by Ficinus to fill up the sense.

³—³ The Greek is ἐν οἷς ὃ ἂν τὸ πέμπτον ἀποκρίνασθαι καὶ δηλοῦν ἀναγκάζωμεν, ὃ βουλόμενος τῶν δυναμένων ἀνατρίπειν ἐραεῖ. Ficinus has "Ubi vero necessitas cogit quantum ostendere, quivis eorum, qui possint subvertere atque retractare, pervincit;" where he has omitted ἀποκρίνασθαι in the first clause, and introduced "retractare" in the second, as if his MS. read something wanting at present in the Greek. Taylor translates ἀποκρίνασθαι "to separate:" but that is ἀνατρίπειν. I have translated as if ἀποκρίνασθαι καὶ were inserted before ἀνατρίπειν.

⁴—⁴ Plato appears to give here a description of the method, by which the Sophists seemed to confute their opponents, and as he did themselves.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus, as shown by his paraphrase—"Traductio vero, ill, as exists naturally the habit of the soul of the multitude, with respect to learning, and to what are called morals, and these¹ are depraved, not even ²Lynceus himself can cause such as these to see.³ And in one word, neither docility in learning nor memory will cause (a person to do so), who is not germane to the matter; for they are not originally inherent in foreign habits; so that neither they, who are not naturally close to, and allied with, what is just, and the other things that are beautiful, but are docile and of a good memory, some with respect to some things, and others to others, nor they, who are allied, but are indocile and of a bad memory, will ever learn, as far as is possible, the truth relating to virtue and vice. For it is necessary to learn these, and at the same time the falsehood and truth of the whole of being, with all exertion and much time, as I stated at the commencement. But after each of these have been rubbed together, names and definitions, and the sense of seeing, and (the other) senses, and have been tried by tests in a kindly spirit, and by questions and answers without a feeling of envy, there has with difficulty shone forth³ an intellectual perception respecting each, and a mind putting itself on the stretch, as far as it is possible for human power to do so.

On this account, let every careful man be very far from writing about things truly⁴ worthy of care, lest at some time, by writing amongst men,⁵ he throw (himself)⁶ into envy and per omnia illa sursum deorsumque in unumquodque discurrendo perveniens, vix tandem scientiam parit intrinsecus; scientiam inquam ipsius quod naturaliter bene affectum est in animo, ad ipsum quoque bene naturaliter affecto."

¹ Instead of τὰ δὲ διέφθαρται, Plato wrote, I suspect, τὰ δὲ δ̄ (i. e. τὰ τὰ) διέφθαρται.

² Here is some error here. For Lynceus had only the power to see acutely himself, not to cause others to do so.

³ The metaphor in τριβόμενα—ἐξέλαμψε will be best understood comparing Rep. iv. p. 435, A., τριβόντες, ὥσπερ ἐκ πυρείων, ἐκλάμπει ποιήσαιμεν τὴν δικαιοσύνην.

⁴ From "revera," in Ficinus, Faehse suggested ὄντως instead ὄντων.

⁵ This mention of "men" seems rather strange; as if a person were to write for others than men. In lieu of ἀνούς we must read ἀνοίας, i. e. "without mind." In a similar spirit Pindar says that he "wrote for intelligent what, in the case of the many, would require an interpreter."

⁶ After καταβάλω is required an accusative. Read therefore αὐτὸν in lieu of ποτε—difficulties.¹ But, in one word, it is requisite to know from hence, when any one sees the writings of another, either of a legislator upon laws, or of any person whatever² upon other subjects, that these are not those, on which he has been the most careful, if he is himself a careful person; but that the objects of his pursuit are situated some where in a country the most beautiful. But if the subjects, on which he has been the most careful, are committed to writing, then not the gods but men themselves have their own intellect destroyed.³

Now he, who follows this story and digression, will understand correctly whether Dionysius has written any thing of the highest and first kind respecting nature, or any other person inferior or superior to him; since, according to my reasoning, he has neither heard or learnt any thing sound about what he has written; for he would have venerated them equally with myself, nor have dared to cast them forth into a state unfitting and unbecoming; nor has he written about them for the sake of remembering them; since there is no fear that any one will ever forget them, if he has once comprehended them by the soul; for of all things they lie in the smallest compass. But⁴ (perhaps he did so)⁴ for the sake of base ambition, considering them as his own, or as sharing in a kind of instruction, of which he was unworthy, and loving the renown arising from such a participation.

If however this occurred to Dionysius after one meeting, the fact may be so. But let Zeus,⁵ says the Théban, know how it occurred. For I went through these matters, as I have said, only once; and never afterwards at all. In the next ¹ What Plato says of writing, Euripides applies to learning and speaking in Med. 287—296. The doctrine, which evidently emanated from the school of Pythagoras, is touched upon more in detail in Protagor. p. 316, B. § 20.

² Instead of ἄττ' οὖν, which are never thus united in Greek, correct language requires δρουοῦν, opposed to νομοθίρον.

³ There is here an allusion, as remarked by Stephens, to a line of Homer, Ἐξ ἄρα δὴ τοι ἔπειτα θεοὶ φρίνας ὤλεσαν αὐτοί: while as regards the clause θεοὶ μὲν οὐ, βροτοὶ δέ, see Dobree on Aristoph. Plut. 555.

⁴ The Greek is εἶπερ ἔνεκα, without any apodosis to the sentence, which is not required by the version of Ficinus, "Forte vero—id fecit," which would lead to ἔνεκα—ἔποιε τιγράμμα, "he composed some writing."

place, he, who is interested in discovering what occurred relating to those matters, and how it occurred, ought to consider through what reason it was we did not go through them a second and a third time and oftener; whether it was that Dionysius, having heard them only once, thought he knew them, and did know them, sufficiently? or that he discovered them himself, or had learnt them previously from others, or that what had been said was trifling? or thirdly,¹ that they were not according to his standard, but greater; and that thus² he would not be able to live, if he paid any regard to prudence and virtue? For if³ (it be said that he considered)³ the matters frivolous, he will oppose many witnesses, who assert the contrary, and who are much more competent to judge about things of this kind than Dionysius; but if, that he discovered or learnt them, and that they are worthily suited for the instruction of a liberal soul,⁴ how should he, not being a wondrous man himself,⁴ have so readily dishonoured the leader and the lord in these matters?

And how he did dishonour him, I will relate. After an interval of no long time, although he had previously permitted Dion to possess and enjoy his property, he did not permit his guardians to send it to Peloponnesus, as if he had entirely forgotten his letter; for (he said) it was not Dion, but Dion's son, of whom, as being his own nephew, he was according to law the guardian. Such were the transactions of that time that took place up to this period. And from these occurrences I clearly saw the desire Dionysius had for philosophy; and it was lawful for me to be indignant, whether I wished it or not. For it was already summer at that time, and ships were sailing out. But it seemed I ought not to be more offended with Dionysius than with myself, and with those, who compelled me to come the third time to the strait about Scylla, ¹ As three alternatives have been stated already, it is evident that for ῥήσιν we must read τίσιν.

² I have adopted εἶναι, read in one MS. after καθ' αὐτόν, and οὕτως, found in two MSS., in lieu of οὕτως.

³ The words within lines are found only in the version of Ficinus, "existimasse dicatur."

⁴ Although Stephens had correctly pointed out the error in the translation of Ficinus, "quis non id mirum putet Dionysium sic affectum," Taylor has been content to follow it implicitly.

"And dread Charybdis measure still again."¹ and to tell Dionysius, that it was impossible for me to stay with him, while Dion was treated so dirtily. But he soothed me, and begged me to stay, thinking it would not be well for him should I be so swift a messenger of such doings; but unable to persuade me, he said he would prepare the means of sending me away. However, I determined to go on board and sail amongst the vessels outward bound,² being enraged, and thinking I ought to suffer every thing, if he should attempt to stop me, as I had been injured, although I had plainly done no injury. But on seeing that I had no desire at all to stay, he devised a plan of this kind, for delaying my sailing away. On the day after this had taken place, he plausibly addresses me. From myself and you, said he, let Dion, and the affairs of Dion, be removed out of the way, for the sake of our (not³) being frequently at variance about them. For I will, said he, thus act on your account, to Dion. I think it right for him to take away his property and to reside in Peloponnesus, not as an exile, but as one, who may come hither, when it shall seem good to him, to me, and to you who are his friends; and this shall be, if he forms no plot against myself; and you, and your relations, and his here shall be his sureties; and let him give you a guarantee; and let the property, which he takes away, be deposited in Peloponnesus and at Athens, with those you shall think fit; and let Dion enjoy the use of it, but not the power to take it away without your consent; for I have not any very great trust in him that, if he can use the property, he will be just towards myself; for it will not be trifling. But I have greater confidence in you and yours. See, therefore, if this is agreeable to you, and remain on these terms for this year, and then depart to your well-doing,⁴ taking with you the property; and well I know, that Dion will be greatly indebted to you for having managed matters in this way on his behalf.

On hearing⁵ this speech I felt indignant; but still I said I would take counsel of myself until the following day on these points, and communicate my resolves. This was our compact at that time. I hereupon, being all alone, and very confused, took counsel of myself. And this consideration first presented itself as taking the lead in my designs. What, if Dionysius intends to do nothing that he says, but on my departure both he and many others of his friends should write¹ in a plausible manner to Dion, what he has now said to me, that Dionysius indeed was willing, but I unwilling, for him to do what he urged me, and that I entirely neglected his (Dion's) concerns; and moreover should Dionysius be unwilling to send me away, and himself give no orders to any master of a vessel (to take me), and easily signify to all men, that I was sailing away without his consent, what sailor would be willing to take me on board, while I was hastening from the dwelling of Dionysius? For in addition to other evils, I dwelt in the garden² which surrounds the dwelling, from whence the porter would not be willing to let me out, unless an order were sent from Dionysius. And should I remain a year, I could indeed send an account of these doings to Dion, and in what state I was, and what I was doing. But should Dionysius do aught of what he says, my conduct would be not entirely ridiculous; for perhaps the property of Dion, if one rightly values it, is not less than a hundred talents.³ But if what is now looming⁴ should, as is likely, take place, I shall be at a loss how to conduct myself. At the same time it is perhaps necessary for me to labour for a year longer, and to endeavour to prove the designs of Dionysius by his deeds.

Having thus determined with myself, I told Dionysius on the following day that I had made up my mind to stay. I hold it right however, said I, for you not to consider me as the master of Dion, and that you should, together with myself, send letters to inform him of the determination, and to ask him whether he was satisfied? and if not, whether he wished for and demanded any thing else? and to send word as soon as possible; but that you should do nothing new in his affairs. This was said (by me), and this agreement did we make nearly in the manner just now detailed.

¹ After αὐτοῦ the Greek has διακαλυόμενος, which I cannot understand; nor could Ficinus, who has omitted the word. I could have understood, αὐτῷ δὲ καλυόμενοι, i. e. "being ordered by him," and thus one can account for αὐτῶν, found in four MSS.

² Elsewhere it is said that Plato was confined in the Acropolis.

³ i. e. upwards of £13,300.

After this the vessels sailed, and it was no longer possible for me to depart; when Dionysius, ¹while speaking, remembered ¹ that the half of Dion's property ought to remain with his son, and that the other half should be sent to Dion; and he said he would sell it, and after it had been sold, deliver one half to myself to send to Dion, and leave the other half for his son; for that this would be the most equitable arrangement. Astonished at the statement, I thought it would be very ridiculous to say any thing further. I told him however, that we ought to wait for the letter from Dion, and again send him an account of these matters. But Dionysius immediately after this did, in a very bold ² manner, sell the whole of Dion's property at what time, and in what manner and to whomsoever he pleased; nor did he say any thing whatever about it to myself; and in like manner I said nothing to him about the affairs of Dion; for I thought I should be able to do nothing more in the matter.

Thus far was assistance given by myself to philosophy and my friends. But after this, I and Dionysius were so living, that I, like a bird, was (always) ³ looking out, and longing to fly away; while he was devising in what manner he might frighten me off, ⁴ and give up none of the property of Dion. We gave out however through the whole of Sicily, that we were friends forsooth.

Dionysius had attempted to reduce the pay of the veteran mercenaries now to a lower rate than according to the custom of his father; and the soldiers, being enraged, collected together in a body, and declared they would not permit it.

² The Greek is νανικῶς: where I should prefer τυραννικῶς, as a little below—μάλα τυραννικῶς—ἔφη.

³ Ficinus has "semper," as if he had found here in his MS. δεῖ—

Dionysius therefore endeavoured to force them, by closing the gates of the Acropolis; but the soldiers immediately rushed to the walls, raising a kind of barbarous cry and warlike psan; at which Dionysius being terrified, conceded all demands, and even more to those of the light-shield-bearers, who had been collected together. But a report was quickly spread, that Heracleides was the cause of this disturbance. On hearing which, Heracleides took himself out of the way and disappeared, while Dionysius endeavoured to lay hold of him; but being in a difficulty, he sent for Theodotes to come to the garden, in which I happened to be then walking. Now of the rest of their discourse I neither knew nor heard; but what Theodotes said in my presence to Dionysius, I both know and remember. For, said he, Plato, I am persuading Dionysius here, that if I am able to bring Heracleides hither to a conference respecting the charges now laid against him, and if it does not seem good (to Dionysius) for him to dwell in Sicily, I think it is proper for him to take his wife and son, and sail to Peloponnesus, and reside there, doing no injury at all to Dionysius, and enjoying his own property. I have therefore sent to him already, and I will now send to him again. But whether he hearkens to my first or second application, I deem it right to request of Dionysius, that ¹if any one falls in¹ with Heracleides, either in the country or here, no ill shall happen to him, but that he shall be removed from the country, until Dionysius shall decide upon something else. To this, said he, do you accede? addressing Dionysius. He answered, I do accede; nor shall he suffer any ill, contrary to what has now been stated, should he make his appearance at your house.

However, on the evening of the following day, Eurybius and Theodotes came to me in great haste and wonderfully alarmed; and Theodotes said to me, Plato, you were present yesterday at the compact which Dionysius made with me and you respecting Heracleides? To which I replied, How not? But now, says he, the soldiers with light shields are running all round seeking to lay hold of Heracleides; and it appears almost that he is some where here. Follow us then, by all means, to Dionysius. We went therefore and came to him; and they indeed stood silent and in tears, but I said, These persons, ¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and consequently by Taylor.

Dionysius, are afraid lest you should do something of a novel kind¹ to Heracleides, contrary to the compact made yesterday; for it seems to me, that he has returned and is clearly some where here. And he, on hearing this, burnt with rage, and ²assumed all kinds of colours² such as a person in anger does. But Theodotes falling at his feet, and laying hold of his hand, burst into tears, and implored him not to do any such thing.³ Then I, taking up the discourse, consoled him and said, Cheer up, Theodotes; for Dionysius will not dare to act contrary to the compact made yesterday. But he looking at me, and in a very tyrannic manner, With you, says he, I made no compact, either great or small. By the gods, said I, you (did agree not to do) what this man now requests you not to do. After saying this, I turned from him and went out.

After this Dionysius endeavoured to hunt down Heracleides. Theodotes, however, sent messengers to him, and exhorted him to fly. But Dionysius sent Tisias and the soldiers with light shields, and ordered them to pursue him. Heracleides, however, as it is said, anticipated them, and escaped in the small part of a day into the dominions of the Carthaginians. Hereupon the old plot for his not giving up the property of Dion seemed to Dionysius to offer a plausible pretext of enmity against myself. And in the first place he sent me from the Acropolis, framing an excuse, that it was requisite for the women to perform some ten-day sacrifice in the gardens where I resided. He therefore ordered me to remain out during that period with Archidemus. While I was there, Theodotes sent for me, and felt very indignant respecting the transactions of that time, and found fault with Dionysius; who, hearing that I had been with Theodotes, made this another pretext, and the sister⁴ to the former, for enmity against me, and sent a person to ask me, whether I had really been with Theodotes on his sending for me? and I readily replied, I had. The

² On this expression Stalbaum refers to Boissonade on Aristænetus, p. 396.

³ Unless τοιοῦτον is to be referred to the preceding νεώτερον, one would prefer τι άνιανον. For άνιανον would be thus used as an euphemism for θάνατον, as άνήκιστον is in Thucyd. iii. 39, 45.

⁴ On the metaphorical use of άδελφός, see Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 3, Porson on Aristoph. Plut. 550, Blomfield on S. Th. 343.

party therefore said, Dionysius has ordered me to tell you, that you are acting by no means correctly in always making much of Dion and the friends of Dion. This is what was said; and after this Dionysius never again sent for me to his residence; as it was now clear that I was the friend of Theodotes and Heracleides, and his enemy; and he no longer considered me well affected towards him, because the property of Dion had been consumed entirely.

After this I dwelt out of the Acropolis among the mercenary soldiers; but others, Athenians, and some likewise my fellow-citizens, who were in the service of Dionysius, came and told me that I had been calumniated by the light-shield soldiers, and that certain persons had threatened to kill me, if they could lay hold of me. I devised therefore the following plan for my preservation. I sent to Archytas, and other friends at Tarentum, telling them in what state I happened to be; and they, making some pretext of an embassy to the city, sent a ship of thirty oars, and Lamiscus,¹ one of my friends; who, on his arrival, made a request to Dionysius on my behalf, saying that I wished to depart, and begged of him ²not to act otherwise.² And he consented, and sent me away after providing me with means for the voyage. However, I neither asked for the property of Dion, nor did any one give it me.

On reaching Peloponnesus at the Olympic games, I met with Dion, who was a spectator there, and I told him what had happened. And he, calling Jupiter to witness, immediately declared to me and my relations and friends, that he would prepare to revenge himself upon Dionysius, both for his having deceived me, his guest—for thus he spoke and thought—and for his own unjust expulsion and banishment. On hearing this, I advised him to call upon his friends, if they were willing. But as for myself, I said, you together with others had by force caused me in some manner to share in the food, and the hearth, and the sacred rites of Dionysius;³ who perhaps has thought, in consequence of many calumniat-

¹ Ficinus has "Salmiscum," similar to Σαλαμίσκον in three MSS.

³ Ficinus has a supplement here, marked in Italics, not found in the Greek—"suasi ut—me putaret quasi medium quandam æquumque utrinque esse debere, præsertim cum—"

ing me, that I was plotting in conjunction with you against him and his tyranny, and yet he did not put me to death, but treated me with respect. Besides I am of an age to take a part with scarcely any one in war; but I would be a common friend to you all, if at any time in want of a friendly feeling towards each other you should wish to do any good; ¹ but if you are desirous (of doing) evil, ¹ call upon others. This did I say through a feeling of disgust to my wandering about Sicily, and adverse fortune in it.

By ² not obeying and being not persuaded ² by the reasonings (urged) by myself, they have been themselves the cause of all the evils that have at present happened to them; of which nothing, humanly speaking, would have occurred, had Dionysius given Dion his own property, or had been perfectly reconciled to him. For I could easily have restrained Dion from both by my will and power. ³ But now they have rushed against each other, and filled all things with evils. And yet Dion had the same wish, which I would say both myself and any other moderate person ought to have, ⁴ who should consider, touching his own power, and that of his friends, and of his own city, how, by doing a benefit when in power, things of the greatest moment would be in the greatest honour. ⁴ But this will be, ⁵ not if a person enrich himself and his friends and city, by laying plots and bringing together conspirators, when he is poor and has no command over himself, through his yielding to cowardice, ⁶ as

²—³ I must leave others to explain the difference between ἀπειθῶντες and οὐ πειθόμενοι.

³ Ficinus has "voluntate mea et consilo et auctoritate," as if he has found in his MS. τῷ βούλεσθαι καὶ τῷ βουλευέσθαι καὶ τῷ δύνασθαι. Perhaps Plato wrote βουλευέσθαι after δύνασθαι. At least one MS. reads βουλευέσθαι for βούλεσθαι.

⁴—⁵ The version of Ficinus is here so different from the Greek, as to render it impossible to ascertain what he found in his MS.

⁵ Instead of ἔστι δὲ, the sense evidently requires ἔσται δὲ τὰδε, similar to "neque vero id fit" in Ficinus.

⁶ Although δειλίας seems to be defended by the expression in Eurip. Phœn. 600, πλοῦτος ἦν φιλόψυχον κακόν, yet one would rather expect here δουλείας. For not only would there be an oxymoron in ἡττημένος ὑπὸ δουλείας, but a more natural flow of ideas likewise in δουλείας τῆς πρὸς ἡδονᾶς than in δειλίας τῆς πρὸς ἡδονᾶς. For persons are said to be slaves, rather than cowards, as regards pleasure.

regards persons, and subsequently by destroying those, who possess property, and calling them enemies, scatters the wealth of such persons, and exhorts his fellow-citizens and friends (so to act, that no one shall, by saying that he is poor, bring a charge against him. After the same manner, he who benefits his city, will be harassed by it, in consequence of distributing by voting¹ the property of a few among the many; or when any one being the president of a great city, and one ruling over many lesser cities, unjustly distributes to his own city the property of the lesser. For in this way, neither Dion, nor any other person, will ever voluntarily proceed to power, pernicious to himself and family for all time, but to a form of government and the establishment of laws, the most just and best, and effected through the fewest deaths and banishments.

This conduct did Dion lately adopt, by choosing to suffer rather than to do unholy deeds, yet taking care lest he should suffer; still, however, did he stumble, after he had arrived at the very point of being superior to his foes. Nor did he suffer any thing to be wondered at. For a man holy, temperate, and prudent, will never be deceived entirely² respecting unholy things, respecting the soul of such.³ But it would perhaps be not wonderful, should he suffer the suffering of a good pilot,⁴ from whom a storm about to be has not entirely lain hid; but from whom the violence unusually great and unexpected of tempests may have lain hid, and, having lain hid, have by their force overwhelmed him. The same thing upon a small scale⁴ caused Dion to stumble. For they, who tripped

¹ Between παρὰλειπόμεναι and ἔνεος there seems to have dropt out ταύτῃ προήσται, a fact that appears to have escaped Ficinus; who has consequently given here a translation not answering to the Greek.

² As this ἐνὶ ψηφισμάτων is at variance with the subsequent μη κατὰ δίκην, and the preceding mention of acts of violence done by the victorious party during a revolution, one would prefer ἐν οἷς ψηφισμάτων, "by not-voting," i. e. by power.

³ The Greek is ὅτιος γὰρ ἀνθρώπος ἀνοσίων πέρι, and at the end of the sentence τῆς ψυχῆς τῶν τοιούτων πέρι: which I cannot understand. The version of Ficinus is, "Pium enim virum temperatumque et prudentem omnino quidem in rebus ejusmodi impii nunquam fallunt." From which it is easy to see that he found in his MS. not ἀνοσίων πέρι, but παρ' ἀνοσίων, i. e. "by unholy persons," to whose unholy doings it is to be referred the expression τοιούτων πέρι.

⁴ So I have translated οἱ ὀλιγίστων, which Bekker has rejected, with one MS., although acknowledged by "aliquantum" in Ficinus.

him up, did not lie hid from him, as being wicked men; but what a depth of ignorance, and of the rest of depravity, and of greediness insatiable they possessed, this did lie hid; and stumbling on this point, he lies (dead), and Sicily wraps in sorrow infinite.

What therefore I advise you to do, after the facts just now detailed, has been nearly told, ¹and let them be told.¹ But it appeared to me necessary to show, why I undertook the second journey to Sicily, ²and, as it were, of somewhat a compulsory² kind, on account of the absurdity and irrationality attached to the transactions. If then what has been now said has appeared to any one to be more reasonable, and it seems to any one that the excuses for what have occurred are sufficient, what has been now said will have been (said) moderately and sufficiently (well).³

EPISTLE VIII.

PLATO TO THE RELATIONS AND FRIENDS OF DION—PROSPERITY.

By considering what matters (correctly)⁴ you will do well in reality, I will endeavour, according to my power, to go through in detail. And I hope I shall advise what is conducive not to you alone, ⁵especially at least however to you,⁵

Plato wrote, I suspect, δι' ἀλογίστων, "through things not to be calculated upon," similar to the preceding ἀπροσδόκητον.

¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

² Ficinus has "quasi compulsus," as if he had found in his MS. ἀφείν την δυνείραν καί τι ἀναγκαῖον οἶον, in lieu of ἀφείν την δυνείραν ἀναγκαῖον εἶναι—where Stephens was the first to object to the pleonasm in ἀναγκαῖον εἶναι and the subsequent δεῖν.

³ In lieu of εἶη, the sense requires εὖ εἶη, as I have translated.

⁴ Stephens endeavours to defend "A δὲ thus placed at the commencement of a letter, not aware that δὲ is a corruption of εὖ, for thus εὖ διανοηθέντες would be properly balanced by εὖ πράττοιτε."

and secondly to all those at Syracuse, and thirdly to your foes (at home) and enemies (abroad), unless some one of them shall have been guilty of an unholy act. For these things are incurable, nor can any one ever wash them out.¹ But bear in mind what I now say.

The tyranny having been dissolved through the whole of Sicily, there is now with you an universal strife about these very things; some wishing to resume the former government; but ²others to put the finish to the escape from tyranny.² Now the counsel relating to such matters appears on each occasion to the multitude to be right, that it is requisite to advise what will effect the greatest evils to foes, and the greatest good to friends. It is however by no means easy for him, who inflicts many evils on others, not to suffer many himself. Nor is it necessary to go far to see this clearly; but what has taken place ³here and there³ relating to Sicily would suffice;⁴ while some are attempting to do, and others to ward off the doers; and by relating them as a tale to others; ye would become on each occasion competent instructors. In these matters then there is scarcely any difficulty. But what would be conducive to all, both foes and friends, or the least of an evil to both, this it is neither easy to see, nor for a person seeing to accomplish. The consultation of such a kind and the attempt to speak look like a prayer. Let it then be in every respect a prayer. For it is meet to begin from the gods in every thing, both in speaking and thinking; and may it eventually indicate to us some such discourse as this.

¹ Although there appears at first sight little to offend in the words οὐκ ἂν ποτὶ τις αὐτὰ ἐκνίψαι, yet on such an occasion there should be a reference not to a person washing out a stain, but to a river, as in Soph. Œd. T. 1218, Οἶμαι γὰρ οὐρ' ἂν Ἰστρον οὔτε Φᾶσιν ἂν Νίψαι καθαρμῶ τῇδε τὴν στεγὴν. Hence Plato wrote, I suspect, Οὐκ ἂν ποτ' Ἰστρος αὐτὰ γ' ἐκνίψαιεν ἂν, which was a line probably of Sophocles, imitated by Seneca in Hippol. 715, Quis eluet me Tanais?

²—³ The translation of Ficinus is too remarkable to be omitted, "alii tyrannidis memoriam omnem prorsus extinguere."

³— The Greek is τῇδε αὐτοῦ περὶ. Ficinus omits the words τῇδε αὐτοῦ, which he could not understand, nor can I. Hence I have translated, as if the Greek were τῇδε τ' αὐτοῦ τε περὶ—

⁴ Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "satis exemplo nobis esse possint," to which there is nothing to answer in the Greek, unless we read—ἀποκοίη ἂν, ἃ ἄλλοις—in lieu of ἃ καὶ ἄλλοις—

From the time that the war began, nearly one family has been ruling over both you and your enemies; whom your fathers established firmly, when they came into all kinds of difficulty at the period, when there was to that part of Sicily under Greeks a danger extreme of their becoming Barbarians, through their being entirely overthrown by the Carthaginians. At that time they chose Dionysius, as being a person young and warlike; for the affairs of war suited him; but Hipparinus, his superior in age, as an adviser; and both, for the safety of Sicily, with absolute power, calling them, as they say, tyrants. Now whether any one is willing to think that a divine fortune and a god, or the talents of the rulers, or both, together with the citizens of that time, were the cause of the safety of Sicily, let this be as he conceives. Safety however did take place to the men of that time. As then they were in such a state, it was surely just to return thanks to their preservers. But if the tyranny did in after-times use somewhat improperly the gift of the city, for this it has partly had accusations¹ against it, and let it partly suffer the punishment. But what accusations would have been necessarily correct after what had occurred to them. For if you had been able to escape from them easily and without great danger and trouble, or they to recover easily again their power, it would not have been possible to give the advice about to be spoken. But now it is requisite for both of you to bear and call to mind, how often each of you have been in the hope of fancying yourselves to want only a mere trifle towards the accomplishment of every thing according to your mind. Now, this very trifle happens on each occasion to be the cause of great and numberless mischiefs; nor has yet any end been reached; but the old end² seems to be ever combining² with a new beginning; and by this circle (of events), the whole of the tyrannic and popular kind (of government) will be near to be destroyed; and the whole of Sicily, should some event probable, but to be deprecated, take place, will come to nearly a desert, as regards

¹ In lieu of δικας τὰς, three MSS. read δικαστὰς: and so Ficinus found in his MS., as shown by his "judices," contrary to the genius of the language.

² The Greek is ξυνάπτει—τελευτή δοκούσα. The sense requires, as I have translated, ξυνάπτειν—τελευτή ἤν δοκούσα.

the language of Greece, by being transferred to some Phœnician or Opic¹ dynasty and power. Against this it is requisite for all the Greeks, with all readiness, to prepare² a remedy. Now if any one has any thing more correct and better than what will be said by myself, let him bring it forward, and be justly called a lover of Greece.

But what now presents itself to me, I will, with all freedom of speech, and making use of a mediatory and just discourse, endeavour to point out. I declare then, speaking in the manner of an arbitrator,³ to two persons, one ruling over, and the other ruled by, a tyrant, my old advice, as if given to each singly.⁴ And now my language of advice would be for every tyrant to fly from the name and the thing itself, and to change his power as a tyrant, if possible, into that of a king. And possible it is, as the wise and good Lycurgus showed by his acts; who, on seeing that the family of his relations in Argos and Messene had proceeded from kings to tyrants, and had been destroying both themselves, and each his own city, felt a fear both for his country and race, and applied as a remedy the government of elderly men, and the bond⁴ of the Ephori, as a preservative of kingly rule; so that it has been preserved for so many generations with glory; since law became the lord and⁵ authorized king of men, and not men the tyrants over the laws. To this my discourse now exhorts all men, aiming at tyranny, that they turn away themselves, and fly with celerity, from the felicity of men insatiably⁶ hungry and without mind, and that they endeavour to come round to a form of kingly government, and to become subservient to laws made by a king, and thus to obtain the greatest honours with the consent both of men and laws,

² Literally "to cut." On the phrase τίμνειν φάρμακον see Blomfield on Æsch. Agam. 16.

³ Ficinus evidently did not find in his MS. what is here read in the other MSS., for his version is, "quemadmodum jamdiu consuevi, tam exercenti quam patienti tyrannidem, consulam—"

⁴ I have adopted from a var. lect. in one MS., δεσμὸν in lieu of δασμὸν, which Ficinus has omitted. Taylor translates it "division—"

⁵ I have followed Stephens, who proposed to insert καὶ before βασιλεὺς—

⁶ Instead of ἀπλήστῳ, Heusde suggested ἀπλήστως, found subsequently in two MSS.

But those, who are in the pursuit of free institutions, and are flying from a servile yoke as an evil, I would advise to be cautious lest, through an insatiable desire for unseasonable liberty, they fall at some time into the disease of their ancestors; which the persons of that period suffered through an excessive anarchy, from making a bad use¹ of their measureless love of freedom. For the Siceliotes, who possessed the power² before Dionysius and Hipparinus, lived as they thought happily, because they lived luxuriously, and ruled over even rulers themselves; for they pelted and stoned to death³ the ten military chiefs prior to Dionysius, having judged them according to no law, in order that they might not be the slaves of any one either with justice or law as the despot, but be in every way entirely free. From hence arose the tyrannies over them. For slavery and freedom, when excessive, are each an evil; but, when moderate, altogether a good; for moderate is the slavery to a god, but that to a man immoderate; and, to temperate men god is a law, but to the intemperate, pleasure.

Since then such is naturally the case, what I am advising, I exhort the friends of Dion to proclaim to all the Syracusans, as the common advice of Dion and myself. But I will interpret what, had he been living and able, he would have said⁴ to you. What then was the reasoning, some one may say, which the advice of Dion shows forth to us touching the present state of affairs? It was this.

"Receive, O Syracusans, before all things such laws, as appear to you not about to turn your thoughts or desires to money-making and wealth; but as there are three things, soul, body, and moreover wealth, put the worth⁵ of the soul in the place of highest honour; that of the body

¹ Ficinus has "abusi," as if his MS. read καταχρώμενοι, not χρώμενοι.

² Bekker has adopted ἀρξάντων from two MSS., but Stalbaum has retained ἀρξάντες: which Ficinus found in his MS., as shown by "qui-gubernabant—"

³ Ficinus has "deposuerunt atque pepulerunt," as if he had found in his MS. κατέλυσαν ἐκβάλλοντες. But Bekker has edited more correctly from other MSS. κατέλυσαν βάλλοντες—

⁴ From "diceret," in Ficinus, Stephens suggested εἶπεν ἂν in lieu of εἶπεν—The correction is attributed to Bekker by Stalbaum.

⁵ Taylor's translation is, "it is requisite that that care of the soul should rank:" who has thus followed the text of Stephens, ἐπιμέλειαν ἔχειν δεῖ, in lieu of which six MSS. read ἀρετὴν ἐντιμοτάτην ποιοῦντες— in the mind, but under the soul; but in the third and last, that of wealth, as being the slave both of the body and soul. Now the institution, that effects this, will be a law rightly laid down by you, and render those, who make use of it, truly happy. But the language, which calls the rich happy, is itself senseless, as being the senseless language of women and children: and it makes those who are persuaded of it of the same kind. Now that I am exhorting you to what is true, you will know in fact, if you shall try what has now been said by me on the subject of laws, by having received such laws,¹ which appears to be the truest test in all cases. For since danger is keeping down Sicily, and you are neither sufficiently the conquerors nor manifestly the conquered, it will perhaps be just and conducive to all of you to take a middle path, both those who are flying from the severity of power and those who desire to have it again; the ancestors of whom did in their time, what is a thing of the greatest moment, preserve the Greeks from the Barbarians; so that it is now lawful to hold discourse about a form of government. For had they perished then, there would have been left no where nor any how either a discourse or hope. Now then, let there be to some a liberty combined with kingly government; but to others a kingly government under control, by the laws having a despotic power not only over the other citizens, but over the kings themselves, should they act contrary to the law. And in addition to all this, do ye together with the gods, in a spirit guileless and sincere, appoint a king; first my own son on account of two-fold favours, from myself and father. For he at that period freed the city from the Barbarians; but I have now done so twice from tyrants, as yourselves are the witnesses; and make him the second king, who has the same name as his own father, I mean the son of Dionysius, for the sake of the assistance which he now affords, and of his pious conduct; who, born from a father who was a tyrant, has voluntarily made the city free, and obtained for himself and his race similar to "virtutem animi maxime anteponant" in the genuine version of Ficinus.

² I have united the words δεξάμενοι δὲ τοὺς τοιοῦτους νόμους, and changed δὲ into ὅτι, to avoid the necessity of an absolute sentence, and to carry out the train of ideas.

ever-living honour, instead of a tyranny lasting for a day, and at the same time unjust. To become the third king of Syracuse it is proper to invite Dionysius the son of Dionysius, if willing, over a willing city, who is now the general of the enemy's army; if he will consent of his own accord to change himself into the form of a king, while fearing his fortunes and commiserating his country and the want of attention shown to sacred rites and sepulchres, and lest through a love of contention he shall destroy every thing in every way, and become an object for Barbarians to rejoice over.

These three kings do ye, whether giving or depriving them of the power they possess at Lacedæmon, by common consent establish after some such manner as this, which has indeed been mentioned to you before; but still do ye hear it now again. If the family of Dionysius and Hipparinus are willing for the safety of Sicily to cease from their present ills, and to obtain honour for themselves and family, both for the future and the present time, on this condition, call them as I have said before, (to power,) ¹ appointing as ambassadors with full powers for the reconciliation, whomsoever they wish; whether they are from their own country, or strangers, or both; and as many as they shall agree to. And let it be for them on their arrival first to lay down laws, and a form of government, such that in it the kings are to be with full power over things sacred, and whatever else it is fitting for those, who are the benefactors of their country; and to make guardians, thirty-five in number, of the laws; and for these, together with the people and senate, to have the rule on questions of war and peace; and to establish different courts of justice, some for one purpose, and others for others; but for the thirty-five guardians of the laws to be the judges of death and banishment; and that in addition to these for jurymen to be chosen from those, who during the last year have been in office, one from each office, who may have been voted the best and most upright; and that these during the following year are to decide on such points as relate to the death and imprisonment and removal of the citizens; but for the king to be not permitted to be a jurymen in such matters, as being a priest, and undefiled by murder, bonds, and banishment. These things I, when living, intended to take place for your benefit, and so I intend now ;¹ and then indeed, after having with you overcome my enemies, I should, had not foreign² furies prevented me, established matters in the way I intended ; and subsequently, if deeds had followed upon thoughts, I would have colonized the rest of Sicily, after depriving the Barbarians of the land which they now occupy, with the exception of such as had fought for a common liberty against tyranny ; and I would have reinstated the former inhabitants of Grecian places in their ancient and paternal abodes. The very same things do I even now advise you to think upon and to execute, and to invite all to these doings ; but to consider the person, who is unwilling to do aught, as a common enemy. Nor is this impossible. For he who judges those things to be impossible, which happen to be in the souls of two persons, and which it is easy to discover from reasoning are the best, does not think correctly. Now by the two, I mean the soul of Hipparinus the son of Dionysius, and that of my son. For if these two agree together, to the rest of the Syracusans, and all who have any care for their country, I think (the same things)³ will appear to be correct. But paying to all the gods honours combined with prayers, and to others also, whom it is proper, together with the gods, do ye persuade and exhort both friends and those at variance, gently and altogether,⁴ nor stand apart, until what has now been stated by us, like god-sent dreams standing over those awake, you shall work out clearly, and bring to a happy end."

¹ This would seem to be a strange expression in the mouth of a dead person, were it not that the ancients thought as it would appear that the dead had the same feelings and pursuits as they had when living, as shown by Virgil in Æn. vi. 653.

² I cannot understand ξενικαὶ ἱερνύες, nor could Ficinus ; whose version is "externi furiaequæ," as if he had found in his MS. ξῖνοι καὶ ἱερνύες. But the disorder, although seated somewhat deeper, would not, I think, be difficult to cure.

³ To complete the sense and syntax, I have translated as if ταῦτα had dropt out before τοῖς ἄλλοις : where τε in one MS. after τοῖς and τε in another, have unitedly preserved a portion of the missing word, while ἀν has dropt out after πᾶσιν.

⁴ In πάντως there is an evident error.

EPISTLE IX.

PLATO TO ARCHYTAS OF TARENTUM—PROSPERITY.

ARCHIPPUS and Philonides¹ have come to us, bringing with them the letter which you gave them, and relating the state of your affairs.² Such things then, as appertain to the city, they have accomplished without difficulty; for they were not in every respect laborious. But as to what relates to yourself, they said that you bear it ill in not being able to be released from your close attention to public affairs. Now that it is indeed the most pleasant thing in life for a man to attend to his own affairs, especially if he chooses to do what you are doing, is evident nearly to every one; but you ought also to consider this,³ that each of us is not born for himself alone; but that our country claims one part of our birth, our parents another, and our friends the remainder.³ Much too is given to the occasions, that overtake us in life. Since then your country calls⁴ you to public affairs, it would perhaps be absurd not to hearken;⁵ for at the same time too it happens that (you) leave a place for inferior men, who take the road to politics not for the best. But of these things enough. At present we are taking care of Echecrates,⁶ and shall do so for ¹ Although the phrase οἱ περὶ τινα sometimes means the parties attached to any person, yet here it is to be applied to the person himself. See at Hipp. Maj. § 2.

² Ficinus has "de rebus tuis." For his MS. read, no doubt, περὶ instead of κατὰ, and omitted κατὰ σοῦ just afterwards, as he does.)

³ To this saying of Plato Cicero refers, De Offic. i. 7, 22: "Præclare scriptum est a Platone, 'non nobis solum nati sumus, ortusque nostri partem patria vindicat, partem amici:'" and again, De Finibus, ii. 14. But as in both passages he omits all mention of the parents, it is evident that he quoted from memory; nor did he know that Plato merely put into prose, what he found in the following tristich, probably of Euripides—Ἐκαστος ἡμῶν γίγονεν οὐχ αὐτῷ μόνον. Τὸ μὲν γὰρ ἡμῶν ἡ πατρις μερίζεται. Τὸ δ' οἱ τεκόντες, τὸ δ' ἐν τοῖσι φίλοι. Whence we must read τὸ δ' ἐν τοῖσι φίλοι in lieu of τὸ δ' οἱ τοῖσι φίλοι, where οἱ τοῖσι is perfectly unintelligible. A similar idea is to be found in Lucan; who says that Cato, "Non sibi sed toti natum se credidit orbi."

⁴ On a voice thus given to one's country, see Cicero Catilin. i. 7.

⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which I cannot think Plato wrote.

⁶ Of this Echecrates mention is made in the Phædo, p. 88, D. § 85.

the remainder of the time both for your sake, and that of his father Phrynon, and of the young man himself.

EPISTLE X.

PLATO TO ARISTODORUS—PROSPERITY.

I HEAR that you are now amongst the chief of the friends of Dion, and have been all through exhibiting a conduct the most wise in things relating to philosophy. For I assert that firmness, fidelity, and integrity, is true philosophy. But as to the rest of wisdom and skill, which tend to other things, I conceive that by calling them elegant subtleties, I am giving them a correct appellation. But now farewell; and abide in the conduct in which you are now abiding.

EPISTLE XI.

PLATO TO LAODAMAS—PROSPERITY.

I HAVE written to you before, that your coming to Athens makes a great difference with respect to all you say. But since you assert it is impossible, the second step after this is for myself to come, if possible, or Socrates,¹ as you have said in your letter. Socrates however at present labours under the infirmity of a strangury; and it would be unseemly in me to come and not accomplish that, for which you are inviting me; but that such will take place I have not great hopes; but why (I say so) would require a long letter, were I to go through all the reasons. Moreover I am on account of my age not sufficiently well in body to be wandering about and to risk the dangers, which (a person) meets² with by land and sea; and at the present every thing in travelling is full of danger.

¹ This Socrates is supposed to be the one mentioned in the Statesman.

² I have translated as if νῆς had dropt out after ἀναστῆναι.

I have it however in my power to advise you¹ and the colonists¹ what Hesiod through me, as the relater, says,

To fancy's easy, to think deep is hard.

For if they fancy that a city can be ever well put into order by the mere laying down of any laws whatever, without some person² in authority having the care of the daily manner of living in the city, in order that it may be, in the case both of slaves and of free-born, temperate and manly, they do not think correctly. But if there are persons worthy of this very office, this should take place. But if there is a need of some one to instruct them, I think there are not amongst you either a person to teach, or those to be taught; it remains then for you to pray to the gods.³ . . . For nearly in this way have cities in former times been put into order, and subsequently well administered,⁴ during the concurrence of matters of great moment, which have happened amidst war and other transactions, when a man shall have arisen on such occasions, with bodily and mental qualifications, and in the possession of large powers. But previously it is meet to feel a readiness (to act), and it is necessary to think deeply upon what I am saying, and not to behave sillily through thinking that you can do any thing off-hand. Be good fortune thine.

EPISTLE XII.⁵

PLATO TO ARCHYTAS OF TARENTUM—PROSPERITY.

How wonderfully delighted did we receive the memorials which came from you, and admired in the greatest possible

² Six MSS. read τινα, in lieu of τι, answering to "aliquis" in Ficinus.

³ Here is evidently a lacuna. The sense of the missing words was to this effect, "to send some divine teacher, and disciples with minds willing to be taught."

⁴ In lieu of ἐκχρησαν, five MSS. offer ἐκκισθησαν, similar to "excultæ sunt" in Ficinus.

⁵ The genuineness of this letter has been contested, as we learn from all the MSS.

manner 'every thing of the winter's.' To us he appeared a man worthy of his celebrated ancestors. For they are said to have been ten thousand² in number; and they were, as the story handed down declares, the best of all³ these Trojans, who during the reign of Laomedon removed themselves from their native land.

With respect to the memorials in my possession, about which you have sent to me, they are not yet in a sufficient state. However, such as they are, I have sent them to you. With respect to the safe care of them, we are of one mind, so that there is no need of exhortation.

EPISTLE XIII.

PLATO TO DIONYSIUS, TYRANT OF SYRACUSE—PROSPERITY.

¹LET the commencement of the letter and at the same time the symbol, be that it is from me.⁴

When you were once feasting some young men of Locri, and were reclining at table at a distance from myself, you rose up (and came) to me, and courteously addressed to me a kind word, as it seemed to me and to the person reclining by me. Now he was one of the handsome youths, who said at that time—Surely, Dionysius, you are benefited much, with respect to wisdom, by Plato. Whereupon you observed—And with respect to many other things; especially since the time of my

¹— In lieu of τοῦ γράψαντος ἀπὸ, which is hardly intelligible, I have translated as if the Greek were τὰ τοῦ γράψαντος πάντα—

² Instead of μυρία, Diogen. Laert. viii. 81, offers Μυρᾱίοι, i. e. the people of Myra, a town in Lycia. One MS. has μυρᾱίοι.

sending for him, through this very thing ¹[because I had sent for him]¹ I have been benefited forthwith.

This then I must keep in mind, in order that our mutual benefit may be to us ever on the increase. And in preparation for this event I am sending ²a person of the Pythagorean and the divisions,² as it seemed to me then, of whom both you and Archytas, if indeed Archytas has come to you, will be able to make use. His name is Helicon; his family is of Cyzicum; and he is a disciple of Eudoxus; with all of whose doctrines he is elegantly conversant; and still further, he has associated with one of the disciples of Isocrates, and with Polyxenus, one of the friends of Bryson; and, what is moreover a rare thing, he is neither disagreeable to meet with, nor like an ill-mannered person, but would seem rather to be volatile and of an easy temper. I say this however with some fear, as I am expressing an opinion respecting a man, who is no mean an animal, and one easily changed, except in the case of some few persons and on a few points; and with respect to him I am thinking with fear and without confidence, as I have met with him myself, and made inquiry of his fellow-citizens, and not one of them has said a bad word against the man. Do you therefore reflect yourself, and exercise caution. But above all things take lessons from him, and study philosophy upon any other points, if you have any leisure; but if not, set him to teach some one,³ so that you may, when at leisure, by learning become better, and in good repute,⁴ in order that in your being benefited by myself there may be, in your case, no remission.

²—² The Greek is τῶν διαίρεσεων, for which H. Valesius wished to read τῶνδε αἰρέσεων or τῶνδε αἰρέσεων. But the deictic pronoun would be here unintelligible. Nor can I understand καὶ ἀνδρα. Perhaps Plato wrote τῶν Ἰταλῶν αἰρέσεων ἱκανὸν ἀνδρα, i. e. "a man sufficiently versed in the Pythagorean doctrines and the sects in Italy." Compare Plutarch De Socratis Genio, ii. p. 579, viii. p. 289, R., ἀνδρα γενναῖον—μετὰ γενναίας—ἀρεμῆς τῆς προαιρέσεως—ἐξ Ἰταλίας τῶν Πυθαγορικῶν.

³ In lieu of τινά, which is not sufficiently definite, I should prefer γένηται. For amongst the ancients not a few women, such as Aspasia, and Diotima, and others, were given to philosophy; a list of whom has been collected by Menage, and appended to his notes on Diogenes Laertius.

⁴ I cannot understand here εἰδοξής. I could have understood ἐνδειγής, "you may show—"

With regard to the articles you bade me send you, I have caused to be made the Apollo,¹ which Leptines is bringing, by a young and clever workman. His name is Leochares. There was another work by him, very elegant, as it appeared to me. I therefore purchased it, wishing to present it to your wife; because she had attended me both in health and sickness in a manner worthy of me and you. Present it then to her, unless it seems otherwise good to you. I send you likewise twelve jars of sweet wine for your children, and two of honey. But I came too late for putting up the dried figs; and all the myrtles, that had been put up for you, have rotted. I will however take better care at another time. Leptines will tell you about the plants.

The money in silver for these things² and for the contributions of some persons to the state I have received from Leptines; and told him, what appears to me to be the most becoming and true to state, that, what I had expended on the Leucadian vessel, amounting to nearly eleven minæ, was mine. This therefore I have taken; ³and after taking, I have made use of it myself, and I have sent away these to you.⁴ As to what follows with regard to the money, hear how the case stands. I shall make use of your money, as I told you then, in the same way as I do that of my other acquaintances; but I use it in as small quantities as possible; (for)⁴ such things as seem to be necessary or just or becoming to myself or to the person, from whom I may receive it. Now something of this kind has happened to me. Of my nieces, who died at the period, when I was not crowned, although you had ordered it, there are four daughters living; one is of a marriageable age; another eighteen years old; another a little more than

² The Greek is εἰς ταῦτα ἕνεκα τῶν τοῦτων καὶ εἰσφορῶν. But ἕνεκα τούτων is superfluous after εἰς ταῦτα. Plato, I suspect, wrote, what I have translated, εἰς ταῦτα καὶ τὰ εἰσφορῶν τινῶν.

⁴ In lieu of δοῦναι, correct Greek requires εἰς δοῦναι—On this use of εἰς, see Aristoph. Plut. 983, δράχμας—εἰκοσὶν εἰς ἑμῶν ὅπως δ' ἂν εἰς ἐπιδήματα.

three years old; and another not yet one year old. All these it will be for myself and friends¹ to give out in marriage, should I survive them; but let those, whom I do not survive,² fare as they may;³ while for those, whose fathers may become richer than myself, I shall not have to provide. At present however my means are greater than theirs. For the marriage of their mothers likewise I have provided with the aid of others and of Dion. One of them is married to Speusippus, of whose sister she is the daughter. For this one there is need of not more than thirty minæ; since the marriage portions given by myself are moderate. Moreover should my mother die, there would be need of not more than ten minæ for erecting her tomb. Such are the sums requisite at present for what are almost necessities. But should any other expense occur, of a private or public nature, through my coming to you, it will be requisite, as I stated then, for me to labour⁴ and to make a vigorous effort for the expenditure to be the least possible; but where I am unable (to do aught), for the expense to be yours. ⁵What I mean after this touching the expenditure on the other hand⁵ of your money at Athens,⁶ is in the first place this;⁶ that should it be needful for me to expend any thing on a choregy,⁷ or any office of that kind, there is no friend⁸ of yours here, who will advance it for you, as I imagine; since even if it made a great difference to you, that a sum would, if expended, be a benefit to you, but an injury, if it were not expended and delayed, until some one should arrive from yourself, such a circumstance would turn out⁹ disgraceful in addition to its being detrimental. For of this I have a proof by having sent Erastus to Andromēdes of Ægina; from whom, as being your

¹ Amongst these was probably Dion, who, as we learn from Diogenes Laertius iii. 3, furnished the means to enable Plato to undertake a choregy at Athens.

² In Greek χαίρω is used in a good sense; but χαίριτω in a bad one; just as in Latin "vale," and "valeas."

³ I have translated as if the Greek were πονεῖν, not ποιεῖν.

⁴ The Greek is ὃ δὴ μέγα ταῦτα λέγω—περὶ τῶν σὺν αὐτῷ χρημάτων—where I cannot understand μετὰ ταῦτα, and still less αὐτῷ—

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἐστὶ τοῦτο πρῶτον μὲν, ὅτι ἴδεν—not ὅτι πρῶτον—

⁷ On the choregy and all the matters connected with it, see Donaldson's Theatre of the Greeks.

⁸ Literally "a friend connected by ties of hospitality."

⁹ The sense requires ἐστὶν, what I have translated, not ἐστὶ—finical, you ordered me to get, what I wanted, as you wished him to send even more than you had stated by letter. But he said, what was reasonable and as any person would do, that he had previously laid out money for your father, and had with difficulty got it back again; and that he would now advance a small sum, but nothing more. Thus I received a something from Leptines; and for this it is proper to praise Leptines, not only for having advanced the money, but for doing so readily; and he was in other respects, by speaking of you, and performing what he could, evidently a friend to your interests. For it is meet, respecting such matters and the contrary, for me to tell you in what light each person has appeared to me as regards yourself. On the subject of money, at least, I shall speak with freedom; for it is just; and at the same time I shall be speaking about persons near you, of whom I have some experience; who, after ¹previously stating on each occasion what they think they shall expend for you, do not subsequently mention ¹the subject, as if forsooth they should be disagreeable to you. Do you then accustom them and even compel them to speak upon these points and others too. For you ought to know the whole, as far as you can, and to be a judge, and not to fly from knowing. For this will be the best for your government. For, as regards other things, and the possession itself of money, ²you too have said, and will say, that it is good to know, ²that the expenditure is made correctly and correctly accounted for. Let not then those, who profess to care for you, bring a reproach upon yourself in the eyes of mankind. For this appears to be neither good nor fair to your reputation, ³in the case of your agreements.³

¹ The Greek is ἐὶ προσγγίλλοντες—εἰσγγίλλων, οὐκ ἐθέλοναι προσγγίλλων. But προσγγίλλων could not be thus repeated; nor, if it could, would εἰσγγίλλων be thus introduced between the repeated verb. Stephens' version, for the whole epistle is wanting in Ficinus, is "Qui tibi assidue pollicentur se de iis sumptibus, quos faciendos arbitrantur, te admonituros, admonere tamen nolunt—" which has led me to suggest that εἰσγγίλλων is a corruption for εἰς τὰ ἐὰν τελεῖν—For τελεῖν is thus perpetually used in the sense "of paying," as shown by Ast in "Lexicon Platonicum;" while to preserve the balance of the sentence, we must read προσγγίλλοντες as opposed to προσγγίλλειν: and so I have translated.

² Instead of καὶ σὺ δὴ φῆς ἀγαθὸν καὶ φήσεις, which I cannot understand, the sense evidently requires καὶ σὺ γ' ἔφη ἀγαθὸν εἶδέναι καὶ φήσεις—

³ In lieu of δοκεῖ ξύμβολον, three MSS. read δοκεῖ αἰς ξύμβολον, four

In what follows I shall speak of Dion. Upon other points I am not able to speak, before the letters, which¹ you have mentioned, arrive from yourself. But upon those, which you did not permit me to mention to him, I have mentioned nothing, nor conversed at all. I have merely tried whether he bears ill or easily² what is reported; and it seems to me that he will not brook it quietly, if it should turn out a fact.³ But in other respects Dion appears to me to use moderation both in word and deed.

Let us present to Cratinus, the brother of Timotheus, and my friend, a breastplate of the handsome kind worn by the heavy-armed foot soldiers, and to the daughters of Cebes three outer-dresses, seven cubits long, not, however, of the expensive kind from Amorgus,⁴ but of Sicilian linen.⁴ With the name of Cebes you are duly acquainted; for he is mentioned in the Socratic dialogues, as holding, together with Simmias, a conversation with Socrates [in the dialogue]⁵ respecting the soul, and as a man of the same clique with, and well disposed to, all of us.

Of the symbol relating to my letters, I think you have a recollection touching such as I write with care and such as I do not; nevertheless, reflect upon it, and bear it in mind. For many persons insist upon my writing, whom it is not easy to put off. The more important letter a god commences, but the less, gods.⁶

δοκεῖν αἰς ξύμβολον, and two δοκεῖ ξύμβουλον. Hence it is easy to elicit δοκεῖ εἰς ξυμβόλαια, as I have translated.

¹ The Greek is ὥσπερ ἔφησ—Stephens' version is, "quas dicis," as if he wished to read ἄσπερ ἔφησ.

²⁻³ I cannot understand οἷσι γιγνόμενων—εἰ γίγνοιτο. I have translated as if the Greek were οἷσι τὸ λεγόμενον, which is at least intelligible.

⁴ Amorgus, one of the Cyclades, was famous for its fine flax or cotton, as we learn from the Greek Lexicographers quoted by Berkelius on Steph. Byz. Ἀμοργός.

⁵ The Greek is ἐν τῷ περὶ ψυχῆς λόγῳ. But ἐν τῷ λόγῳ could not be thus repeated after ἐν τοῖς Σωκρατικοῖς λόγοις.

⁶ Had Plato meant to say, as Bentley supposed, that the more important letters were indicated by the words σὺν θεῷ, and the less by σὺν θεοῖς, some reason would have been given, I think, for this change of number. Hence in lieu of θεοί, I would read θεά. For by the masculine θεός was

The symplicians Marinus have requested me to write, as was Marinus. For they were maritally praise both you and me over Marinus: and not the Marin Philagrus, who at that time,¹ was something the matter with his hand; and Philides, who has more than the great king,² has spoken about you; and if I had not the matter for a long letter, I would have written more what he said: but at present inquire of Leptines.

Marin was used the Marin or any thing else, about which I have written, inquire them to any you wish; or otherwise in Marin.³ He is one of those, who is continually inquire to and for, and is attached to myself, and upon other subjects, and these are relating to philosophy, is a person of superior mind, and is a relation of Tison,⁴ who was, at the time when I sailed away, the prefect of the city.⁵

May you increase in health and philosophy, and convert others who are wronger to it: and embrace for me all our inlove-symplicians,⁶ and enjoin the others and Aristocritus, mean the superior power of mind; but by the feminine God, the inferior power of matter.

¹ Here, as elsewhere in this letter, by rére, "at that time," is intended the last movement of Plato in Sicily: unless it be said that rére is sometimes yet for rére, an idea first promulgated by Markland on Eurip. Symon. Act. Ep. A. 46, and adapted by Bruck on Aristoph. Thesm. 13, Plat. Act. Ep. A. 46, and Schaefer in Julian. Prof. p. iv.

² By "the great king," is meant the king of Persia.

³ Although Epist. might perhaps stand here, yet the word was probably Epist. the name of the Sicilian mechanist, who invented the famous ball for Phalaris.

⁴ The person here called Tison is, I suspect, the same as Tisic, mentioned in Epist. 7.

⁶ So I have translated symplicians, in allusion to the little sphere mentioned in Epist. 2, about which there had probably been a meeting of Syracusan "Savans," forming an astronomical and geographical society; for it appears that Eudorus, whose disciple was the Helicon, mentioned above, was the first to introduce the knowledge of the sphere, which he had acquired in Egypt, to the Greeks. But as the latitude of Syracuse was not the same as of Alexandria, one can easily understand, why the sphere did not answer so well its purpose at one place, as it did at the other. For this idea I am partly indebted to Scaliger's note on Manilius, p. 155. 6, ed. 1579. Ast, with Stephens, translates "in pilis ludo collusores."

should any message or letter arrive, relating¹ to you, that they take care you know of it as quickly as possible, and that they put you in mind of it, in order that you may attend to the matter mentioned in the letters. And for the present do you not neglect the repayment of the money to Leptines, but repay it as quickly as possible, so that others, looking to him, may be the more ready to minister to myself.

Iatrocles, who at that time was, together with Myronides, dismissed as a freed-man by myself, sails now with the things sent by me; keep him in your pay, as being well disposed towards you; and make use of him in any way you please,² and know yourself either the letter itself, or if a memorandum of it is preserved.³

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were, what the sense requires, περί σέ, not, as at present, παρά σέ—

² The words between the numerals I cannot understand. Stephens's version is "et epistolam aut ipsam, aut, si ipsius exemplar servatur, tute cognosce." But ὑπόμνημα is not the Greek for "exemplar," but for "commentarius." The Greek is καὶ τὴν ἐπιστολὴν ἢ αὐτὴν ἢ, εἰ ὑπόμνημα αὐτῆς σώζεται, καὶ αὐτὸς ἴσθι. One MS. however has ἢ αὐτὴν: two omit εἰ: one reads αὐτοῖς for αὐτῆς, and one καὶ ὁ αὐτός: all which are proofs of some deep-seated disorder here. The sense seems to have been originally something to this effect, "and acquaint yourself with the letter from itself, or, if it be not preserved, from the memorandum of the person who has heard it"—in Greek, καὶ τὴν ἐπιστολὴν ἢ αὐτὴν ἢ, εἰ μὴ σώζεται, διὰ τὸ ὑπόμνημα αὐτὴν τοῦ ἀκηκόετος ἴσθι. So in Euripides, Iphigenia is represented as telling the contents of the letter she is putting into the hands of Pylades; for to use her own words in v. 744, ἦν μὲν ἰκωσὺς γραφὴν, αὐτὴ φράσει σιγῶσα τάπισταλμένα: "Ἦν δ' ἐν θαλάσῃ γράμματ' ἀφανισθῇ τάδε, τὸ σῶμα σώσας, τοῖς λόγοις σώσεις ἑμοί. i. e.

"If you preserve the writing, 'twill itself
The matter of the missive silent tell;
But if by the sea the writing disappears,
Saving your body, you will save my words."

As the foregoing Epistle was considered by Serranus to be spurious, Stephens was led to defend it by observing that it was referred to by Plutarch in T. ii. p. 533, B., and Theodoret, p. 27, ed. Sylb. So too when Collins had in his "Discourse on Free Thinking" reiterated the opinion expressed by Cudworth in his Intellectual System, p. 403, ed. 1678, of the Epistle being spurious, Bentley in his Remarks, p. 411, ed. Dyce, observed that the internal character of the letter exhibits all the marks of genuineness; for it is not a mere mass of common-place, such as the letters forged by Sophists generally are, but one of business, and with the circumstantial account of persons and things, suited to the writer and the times in which he lived; as in the passage, where allusion is made to the Greek statement of Lucianus, who, as we learn from Pliny, H. N. lib. 34, cap. 11, was a celebrated artist, subsequent to the time when he was quoted as by Plato as a young man; and that the other is quoted by Erasmus in Prop. E. cap. 13, p. 530. From these authorities a Doctor Fabricius was probably led to say that he could discover nothing of antiquity, when his opinion was asked by P. Wesseling, who in his "Tractatus de Veteribus," p. 35, has produced fresh testimony in its favour by mentioning a Pausanias in Dion. T. i. p. 966, E., and i. p. 47, L. where Paus. is related to. He conceives, however, that the Doctor may have mistaken the one; and that the first ended was indeed the monument of Lucianus, bringing with him the Apollo of Lucianus. In Pausanias i. p. 253 speaks of the words quoted from the Statues as being towards the close of it. And so far is Wesseling from believing the Poet to be not genuine, that he calculates it was written about A. C. 114.

Doctores, however, the point then brought forward by Stephens, Bentham and Wesseling, with whom Wetzelbach in Phœdon, p. 108, agrees, Erasmus in a Commentarius Sacrosancti Reg. Göttingen, A. D. 1783, endeavoured to show its antiquity by arguments to which Tennemann has replied in his "Lehrbuch und Metaphysik der Scholastiker über Unsterblichkeit," Bonn, 1791, as I learn from Heichen on Fabricius Biblioth. Gr. T. ii. p. 185. On the other hand Teyler in a note on the 12th Epistle, says that he has noticed the 12th as being not genuine, from the allusion there made to the difference between one and many gods—an argument to which I have replied by supposing the existence of a corruption, antecedent even to the time of Erasmus.

With regard to the articles you bade me send you, I have caused to be made the Apollo,¹ which Leptines is bringing, by a young and clever workman. His name is Leochares. There was another work by him, very elegant, as it appeared to me. I therefore purchased it, wishing to present it to your wife; because she had attended me both in health and sickness in a manner worthy of me and you. Present it then to her, unless it seems otherwise good to you. I send you likewise twelve jars of sweet wine for your children, and two of honey. But I came too late for putting up the dried figs; and all the myrtles, that had been put up for you, have rotted. I will however take better care at another time. Leptines will tell you about the plants.

The money in silver for these things² and for the contributions of some persons to the state I have received from Leptines; and told him, what appears to me to be the most becoming and true to state, that, what I had expended on the Leucadian vessel, amounting to nearly eleven minæ, was mine. This therefore I have taken; ³and after taking, I have made use of it myself, and I have sent away these to you.³ As to what follows with regard to the money, hear how the case stands. I shall make use of your money, as I told you then, in the same way as I do that of my other acquaintances; but I use it in as small quantities as possible; (for)⁴ such things as seem to be necessary or just or becoming to myself or to the person, from whom I may receive it. Now something of this kind has happened to me. Of my nieces, who died at the period, when I was not crowned, although you had ordered it, there are four daughters living; one is of a marriageable age; another eighteen years old; another a little more than

² The Greek is εἰς ταῦτα ἕνεκα τῶν τεούτων καὶ εἰσφορῶν. But ἕνεκα τούτων is superfluous after εἰς ταῦτα. Plato, I suspect, wrote, what I have translated, εἰς ταῦτα καὶ τὰ εἰσφορῶν τινῶν.

⁴ In lieu of ὅσα, correct Greek requires εἰς ὅσα—On this use of εἰς, see Aristoph. Plut. 983, δράχμας—εἰκοσὶν εἰς ἑμᾶτιον ὁπρὶ δ' ἂν εἰς ὑποδήματα.

three years old; and another not yet one year old. All these it will be for myself and friends¹ to give out in marriage, should I survive them; but let those, whom I do not survive, ²fare as they may;² while for those, whose fathers may become richer than myself, I shall not have to provide. At present however my means are greater than theirs. For the marriage of their mothers likewise I have provided with the aid of others and of Dion. One of them is married to Speusippus, of whose sister she is the daughter. For this one there is need of not more than thirty minæ; since the marriage portions given by myself are moderate. Moreover should my mother die, there would be need of not more than ten minæ for erecting her tomb. Such are the sums requisite at present for what are almost necessities. But should any other expense occur, of a private or public nature, through my coming to you, it will be requisite, as I stated then, for me to labour³ and to make a vigorous effort for the expenditure to be the least possible; but where I am unable (to do aught), for the expense to be yours. ⁴What I mean after this touching the expenditure on the other hand⁵ of your money at Athens,⁶ is in the first place this;⁶ that should it be needful for me to expend any thing on a choregy,⁷ or any office of that kind, there is no friend⁸ of yours here, who will advance it for you, as I imagine; since even if it made a great difference to you, that a sum would, if expended, be a benefit to you, but an injury, if it were not expended and delayed, until some one should arrive from yourself, such a circumstance would turn out⁹ disgraceful in addition to its being detrimental. For of this I have a proof by having sent Erastus to Andromēdes of Ægina; from whom, as being your

¹ Amongst these was probably Dion, who, as we learn from Diogenes Laertius iii. 3, furnished the means to enable Plato to undertake a choregy at Athens.

² In Greek χαίρει is used in a good sense; but χαίριτω in a bad one; just as in Latin "vale," and "valeas."

³ I have translated as if the Greek were πονεῖν, not ποιεῖν.

⁴ The Greek is τὸ δὲ μετὰ ταῦτα λέγω—περὶ τῶν σῶν αὐτοῦ χρημάτων—where I cannot understand μετὰ ταῦτα, and still less αὐτοῦ—

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἔστι τοῦτο πρῶτον μὲν, ὅτι ἴδω—not ὅτι πρῶτον—

⁷ On the choregy and all the matters connected with it, see Donaldson's Theatre of the Greeks.

⁸ Literally "a friend connected by ties of hospitality."

⁹ The sense requires ἔσται, what I have translated, not ἔστι— friend, you ordered me to get, what I wanted, as you wished him to send even more than you had stated by letter. But he said, what was reasonable and as any person would do, that he had previously laid out money for your father, and had with difficulty got it back again; and that he would now advance a small sum, but nothing more. Thus I received a something from Leptines; and for this it is proper to praise Leptines, not only for having advanced the money, but for doing so readily; and he was in other respects, by speaking of you, and performing what he could, evidently a friend to your interests. For it is meet, respecting such matters and the contrary, for me to tell you in what light each person has appeared to me as regards yourself. On the subject of money, at least, I shall speak with freedom; for it is just; and at the same time I shall be speaking about persons near you, of whom I have some experience; who, after¹ previously stating on each occasion what they think they shall expend for you, do not subsequently mention¹ the subject, as if forsooth they should be disagreeable to you. Do you then accustom them and even compel them to speak upon these points and others too. For you ought to know the whole, as far as you can, and to be a judge, and not to fly from knowing. For this will be the best for your government. For, as regards other things, and the possession itself of money, ²you too have said, and will say, that it is good to know,² that the expenditure is made correctly and correctly accounted for. Let not then those, who profess to care for you, bring a reproach upon yourself in the eyes of mankind. For this appears to be neither good nor fair to your reputation, ³in the case of your agreements.³

— The Greek is οἱ προσαγγέλλοντες—εἰσαγγέλλειν, οὐκ ἐθέλουσι προσαγγέλλειν. But προσαγγέλλειν could not be thus repeated; nor, if it could, would εἰσαγγέλλειν be thus introduced between the repeated verb. Stephens' version, for the whole epistle is wanting in Picinus, is "Qui tibi assidue pollicentur se de iis sumptibus, quos faciendos arbitrantur, te admonituros, admonere tamen nolunt—" which has led me to suggest that εἰσαγγέλλειν is a corruption for εἰς τὰ σὰ ἀν ταλεῖν—For ταλεῖν is thus perpetually used in the sense "of paying," as shown by Ast in "Lexicon Platonium;" while to preserve the balance of the sentence, we must read προσαγγέλλοντες as opposed to προσαγγέλλειν: and so I have translated.

— Instead of καὶ σὺ δὴ φῆς ἀγαθὸν καὶ φήσεις, which I cannot understand, the sense evidently requires καὶ σὺ γ' ἔφης ἀγαθὸν εἶδέναι καὶ φήσεις—

—³ In lieu of δοκεῖ ἔμβολον, three MSS. read δοκεῖ αἰς ἔμβολον, four

In what follows I shall speak of Dion. Upon other points I am not able to speak, before the letters, which¹ you have mentioned, arrive from yourself. But upon those, which you did not permit me to mention to him, I have mentioned nothing, nor conversed at all. I have merely tried whether he bears ill or easily² what is reported; and it seems to me that he will not brook it quietly, if it should turn out a fact.³ But in other respects Dion appears to me to use moderation both in word and deed.

The ambassadors likewise have requested me to write, as was natural. For they very heartily praise both you and me every where; and not the least Philagrus, who at that time,¹ had something the matter with his hand; and Philaides, who has come from the great king,² has spoken about you; and if I had not had matter for a long letter, I would have written down what he said; but at present inquire of Leptines.

meant the superior power of mind; but by the feminine θεά, the inferior power of matter.

¹ Here, as elsewhere in this letter, by τότε, "at that time," is intended the last sojourn of Plato in Sicily; unless it be said that τότε is sometimes put for πότε, an idea first promulgated by Markland on Eurip. Suppl. 551, Iph. A. 46, and adopted by Brunck on Aristoph. Thesm. 13, Plut. 1117, Soph. El. 278, and Schäfer in Julian. Præf. p. iv.

² By "the great king," is meant the king of Persia.

³ Although Τερύλλης might perhaps stand here, yet the word was probably Παρίλλης, the name of the Sicilian machinist, who invented the brazen bull for Phalaris.

⁴ The person here called Τίσων is, I suspect, the same as Τισίας, mentioned in Epist. 7.

⁶ So I have translated σφαιροφίλοι, in allusion to the little sphere mentioned in Epist. 2, about which there had probably been a meeting of Syracusan "Savans," forming an astronomical and geographical society; for it appears that Eudoxus, whose disciple was the Helicon, mentioned above, was the first to introduce the knowledge of the sphere, which he had acquired in Egypt, to the Greeks. "If you preserve the writing, 'twill itself
The matter of the missive silent tell;
But if by the sea the writing disappears,
Saving your body, you will save my words."

As the foregoing Epistle was considered by Serranus to be spurious, Stephens was led to defend it by observing that it was referred to by Plutarch in T. ii. p. 533, B., and Theodoret, p. 27, ed. Sylb. So too when Collins had in his "Discourse on Free Thinking" reiterated the opinion expressed by Cudworth in his Intellectual System, p. 403, ed. 1678, of the Epistle being spurious, Bentley in his Remarks, p. 411, ed. Dyce, observed that the internal character of the letter exhibits all the marks of genuineness; for it is not a mere mass of common-place, such as the letters forged by Sophists generally are, but one of business, and with the circumstantial account of persons and things, suited to the writer and the times in which he lived; as in the passage, where allusion is made to an Apollo, sculptured by Leochares, who, as we learn from Pliny; H. N. xxxv. 2, and Pausanias, i. 1 and 3, v. 20, became a celebrated artist, subsequent to the period when he was spoken of by Plato as a young man; and that the letter is quoted by Eusebius in Præp. Evang. x. 13, p. 530. From these remarks of Bentley Fabricius was probably led to say that he could discover no proofs of spuriousness, when his opinion was asked by P. Wesseling; who, in his "Epistola ad Venemam," p. 36, has produced fresh testimony in its favour by appealing to Plutarch in Dion, T. i. p. 966, E., and ii. p. 474, D., where Plato is referred to. He conceives, however, that two Epistles have been moulded into one; and that the first ended just before the mention of Leptines, bringing with him the Apollo of Leochares; for Plutarch, in ii. p. 533, speaks of the words quoted from the Epistle, as being towards the close of it. And so far is Wesseling from believing the Epistle to be not genuine, that he calculates it was written about Ol. ciii. 4.

Despite, however, the proofs thus brought forward by Stephens, Bentley, and Wesseling, with whom Wytttenbach on Phædon, p. 108, agrees, Meiners has, in Commentat. Societat. Reg. Gottingen, A. D. 1783, endeavoured to show its spuriousness by arguments to which Tennemann has replied in his "Lehren und Meinungen der Sokratiker über Unsterblichkeit," Iena, 1791, as I learn from Harless on Fabricius Biblioth. Gr. T. iii. p. 106. On the other hand Taylor, in a note on the 12th Epistle, says that he has omitted the 13th as being not genuine, from the allusion there made to the difference between one and many gods—an argument to which I have replied by supposing the existence of a corruption, antecedent even to the time of Eusebius.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PREFACE.

IN this volume, which completes the Works of Plato, generally admitted to be genuine, will be found the only English translation of the Laws, hitherto made directly from the Greek. For although they form part of Taylor's publication, it is not too much to say that he can scarcely have looked at the original, but must have depended on the Latin version of Ficinus; and this too not the genuine one, but the refiction of it which was made by Symon Grynæus to suit the printed text.

Of the grounds on which this suspicion rests, numerous proofs will be found in the notes. Not only has Taylor tacitly followed Ficinus in his omissions, and insertions, but in numerous instances, where the genuine version had preserved the sense of the original, he has neglected it, in accordance with the revised version by Grynæus.

For this dereliction of the first duty of a translator, Taylor would perhaps have pleaded, that, as he never presumed to rival Ficinus in his knowledge of Plato, whose writings the Italian scholar had studied from his earliest years, he conceived it far more advisable to follow the Latin version than to attempt to unravel the original Greek; where so numerous are the difficulties and so unaccountable the corruptions, as to render it frequently impossible to give even a readable, much less an elegant, rendering. And so too, it would seem, thought the French translator Grou; who, as remarked by Cousin, has frequently followed Ficinus; and even the German translator Schulthess seems to have found it easier to translate from the French than the Greek. Cousin has himself been content to adopt Grou's translation, as a basis, rather than make a new one from the original ; which he says is full of novelties of syntax, or rather of the want of all syntax, differing in this respect from the other dialogues of Plato—a discrepancy, he thinks, owing to the fact, that the Laws had not received the last touches of the author's hand.

That the Laws have come down to us in a very unsatisfactory state, is well known, and was long since ably shown by Boeckh ; and it was doubtless owing in part to this conviction that, after penning some first-rate remarks on the three opening books, he gave up the task in despair ; he saw that the nine remaining presented a series of obstacles, which it was useless to encounter and hopeless to overcome.

The labour, however, that Boeckh was unwilling to undergo was subsequently undertaken by Ast ; to whose exertions the reader will find I have been not a little indebted. Since his day, although the Greek text has been edited and improved partially with the aid of MSS. by Bekker,—for those, which were collated for Stalbaum's edition, have afforded nothing new or valuable,—yet little has been done in the way of conjectural criticism, either by those scholars, or by the united efforts of Orelli, Baiter, and Winckelmann, in their two Zurich editions. Now though Porson said, as we learn from Kidd, in the Pref. p. xlv. to " Porson's Miscellaneous Criticisms," that in depth of thought Plato was without a rival ; still the stream of his ideas generally flows as clear as if it were the shallowest of rills ; and hence Porson was led to remark, that if the text had not been obscured by numerous interpolations, it had lost a portion of its original transparency.

Equally barren of results has been the search amongst the few Academic Dissertations, written by the scholars of Germany, nearly all of which have passed through my hands. I consider it a fortunate circumstance that my attention has been recently directed to the Notes of Sydenham, published by Matthias, at the end of his edition of the works of Thomas Gray, the poet ; where are anticipated some of the better emendations of subsequent critics. And in the Remarks of Gray himself, it will be seen that, although they are less critical than those of Sydenham, he has forestalled some of had been really put in practice—the rest, which were a reform rather of existing institutions, than the construction of a code perfectly novel, would be equally practicable, if they were submitted to the same test.

Of the persons of the dialogue, Clinias the Cretan, and Megillus the Lacedæmonian, are supposed by Boeckh to be fictitious characters merely. But as in all the other dialogues of Plato, whenever a speaker is mentioned by a specific name, there is no reason for believing that he is a mere coinage of the author's brain, but every reason for a contrary supposition, it is surely fair to infer that two persons of those names were really living in the time of Plato, although not the least mention of them is to be found, it would seem, elsewhere. Far better founded is the suspicion of the Scholiast, that by the anonymous Athenian Plato himself was intended; and so too thought Cicero, as may be inferred from the language adopted De Legg. i. 5, and Plutarch after him, De Isid. et Osirid. ii. p. 370, E., as Boeckh was the first to remark.

With regard to the time when the Laws were written, Bentley and Boeckh refer it to Ol. cvi. 1, when Plato had passed his seventy-fourth year; while according to a tradition, mentioned by Diogenes Laert. iii. 37, it was not published by Plato himself, but by a friend and disciple, Philip the Opuntian. Hence Wolf in Prolegomen. Homer, p. cliii., and Cousin after him, were led to believe that the treatise never received the author's last touches. Similar too are the sentiments of Schneider in Prefat. Xenophont. Cyrop. p. xiv.; who conceives however, that although the greater part exhibits only a sketch of what the Philosopher intended to say, yet to some passages he had given the last polish. Now if this were the fact, it would be a work of supererogation to attempt even to correct the numerous passages, where errors of every kind are to be met with. But on this point I confess myself to be rather sceptical. For I cannot understand what could induce an author like Plato, who said that writing was the grave of thought, to scribble down his first and crude ideas upon parchment, when a little time and reflection would have furnished him with matter far more fit to be read. How much more reasonable is it to suppose, that all the faults are to be referred to some other source than the author himself. For as he lived to the advanced age of eighty-one years, and died, as we learn from Cicero, De Senect. § 5, in the very act of writing, he had plenty of time during a period of seven years to re-touch, what he had written at first only imperfectly. And hence I have every where been led to adopt in the text or notes, whatever has been furnished by the collations of MSS. and the conjectures of critics, in harmony with the genius of the language and the flow of thought. And hence too the argument against the genuineness of the Laws, which Ast has drawn from the imperfection of the style, will only then be considered of the least value, when it shall be shown that

INTRODUCTION.

PLATO, having in his imaginary Republic delineated what he conceived to be the best form of government, and prescribed the course of instruction, by which the people living under such a polity, might be brought up and fitted for it, has in the Laws detailed some of the leading enactments, which such a constitution would require.

To carry out this idea, he supposes that three elderly statesmen come together, belonging respectively to Athens, Crete, and Lacedæmon; and that the first is requested by the second to lay down a code of laws, which the Cretan is desirous of submitting to his countrymen, previous to their re-establishment of a city which had been depopulated. For Clinias had been appointed as one of the ten Commissioners of Cnossus, authorized to draw up a code, such as they might think of themselves, or obtain from any other quarter.

For the preference thus shown to the statesmen of Crete and Lacedæmon, as being the parties who could best appreciate the best code of laws, Plato has furnished the clue in Protagoras, § 80. For he there states distinctly, that in those very cities a most beautiful philosophy was to be found, which had been handed down from ancient times; although it was designedly concealed, with the view of preventing other nations from profiting by the knowledge of it. So too in Hipp. Maj. § 8, Lacedæmon is represented as a city well regulated by laws; doubtless because the masses, who were the masters at Athens, possessed only a little power at Lacedæmon.

So plainly indeed had Plato, according to Aristotle in Polit. ii. 2, 3, exhibited his feelings in favour of a mixed form of government, as recommended in the Republic, that the Stageirite insinuates that the philosopher of Athens had imagined merely, what was actually realized at Lacedæmon. But if that were the case, Plato would surely never have wasted his time in writing two elaborate treatises on matters already well known, when it would have been sufficient to point out, in the Statesman especially, the institutions of Lycurgus, as the pattern, if not of a faultless government, at least of one, that approached the nearest to perfection. Hence we may fairly suspect that Aristotle merely meant to infer that Plato's notions were not original; a charge to which the philosopher might have replied by saying, that they were all the better on that very account; for it was thus shown that, as some of them were practicable—since they added the Definitions, attributed to Speusippus, and also what has hitherto passed under the name of Timæus Locrus; none of which, with the exception of the Epinomis, has hitherto appeared in an English dress. And that nothing may be wanting in this translation, relating to the Platonic writings, there will be subjoined the three existing Greek Lives of the philosopher, and the Introduction of Alcinous, all for the first time translated into English.

the objections brought forward by the more recent impugnors of the genuineness of the Letters.

On arriving at the 11th Book, I learnt, for the first time, that there existed in MS. (Harl. 3261) a hitherto unedited version of the Laws and Epinomis, by Gregorius, or, as it should be written, Georgius Trapezuntius. It is not however so much a version as a full abridgment of those two treatises. But it exhibits this remarkable phenomenon, that not only does it agree almost verbatim with the translation of Ficinus, where the latter is at variance with the Greek; but it differs likewise in other passages to such an extent as to show that the MS. he used was the same as, or the counterpart of, the one that fell into the hands of Ficinus. Now as the two translators were contemporary, and the version of Ficinus was not put to press till 1483, and did not appear till 1484, two years before the death of Georgius Trapezuntius at a very advanced age, according to the authority, quoted by Leo Allatius de Georgiis, p. 375, it was scarcely possible for Trapezuntius to have made use of the version of Ficinus. Nor, on the other hand, was it likely that Ficinus would have inserted in his own translation, passages taken from the version of Trapezuntius, not found in the Greek MS. before him; even if we admit that he, who considered Plato to be almost an inspired writer, would have condescended to look into a translation made by the very individual, who had done all in his power to throw down Plato from his former pedestal of honour, and to place Aristotle, Plato's great opponent, in his stead.

As the MS. used by the two translators was either one and the same, or of the same character, it is fair to infer that the variations from the usual text are derived from a MS. far superior to any since discovered; and hence in the case of the other dialogues, where there is no opportunity of testing the version of Ficinus with that of a contemporary translator, there can be no sufficient reason for doubting his good faith in neither adding nor omitting any thing but upon MS. authority.

Had the Epinomis not been confessedly a spurious treatise, it would have been added to the present volume. As it is, it will find a more fitting place in the next, which will contain six other dialogues, all presumed to be spurious; but which are usually given in the more complete editions of the Greek text. To these will be the imperfection is to be referred to the author alone, and not to the bad faith of interpolators and the carelessness of transcribers.

So far, however, does Ast appear to have been aware of this reasonable solution of the difficulties of the construction, that he has thought proper to startle the learned world with a paradox; and to assert that it is sufficient to read only a page of the Laws to be convinced that the treatise was never written by Plato. But as Aristotle distinctly acknowledges the Republic and Laws to be the production of the same writer, it seems quite futile to fancy that the Stageirite was the dupe of a personated Plato; and still more to draw any inference, but the reverse of what has been drawn by Ast, from the anecdote recorded by Stobæus, in xiii. p. 147; for it proves that Plato did really employ himself in writing Laws, after the publication of the Republic. The story is that—"Diogenes once inquired of Plato, whether he was writing Laws? He was, said the other. But what, have you not written the Republic? Certainly. What then, had not the Republic laws? It had. Why then was it requisite to write laws again?"—To this, says Cousin, Plato might have given a ready reply, by stating that in the Republic the enactments were purely of a moral kind; but in the Laws, of a penal character likewise. For in the former treatise, the whole superstructure of a state is supposed to rest on the basis of moral habits, resulting from a correct education; in the latter, the arm of the law is called upon to restrain by punishment the deviations from a correct moral conduct.

And a similar answer may be given to the arguments deduced from the discrepancies to be found in the Republic and Laws; on which Ast appears to have laid no little stress, as affording a convincing proof that the two treatises could not have emanated from the same head and hand. For Apuleius, quoted by Dilthey, in his dissertation published at Gottingen, in 1820, under the title of "Platoniorum Librorum de Legibus Examen," and written in refutation of the theory of Ast, observed long ago, that "in a polity, such as Plato has feigned, there would be no need of any laws whatever;" for their place would be supplied by a virtuous education. Now as the Laws are supposed to be laid down for a state not merely ideal, but one to be put into practice, we need not be surprised at finding that specific enactments are suggested, relating to covenants and dealings in trade, which are rejected in the Republic, as being useless in a well-regulated state; for there persons would be uninfluenced by that pursuit of gain, which leads mankind to evade the spirit, and sometimes to defy the letter, of the law, and to run the risk of a punishment uncertain and remote.

To meet, on the other hand, the arguments drawn in favour of the genuineness of the Laws, from the similarity in sentiment with the ideas promulgated in the Dialogues, which Ast himself acknowledges to be genuine, he is compelled to have recourse to a theory, for which there is not even the shadow of proof. For he supposes that the author of the Laws was some moral philosopher of the school of Socrates; who, not understanding the spirit of the Republic, amused himself with drawing up a treatise, which was to be rendered of a more practical character, by the rejection of what he considered to be objectionable in the Republic; and that it is to this cause we must attribute the absence of all reference to the doctrines, promulgated in the Republic, relating to a community of goods, women, and children. But surely it is far more reasonable to suppose that such doctrines were not touched upon by Plato, from his perceiving that they could not be carried out, unless the whole frame of society was remodelled; and that he was therefore content to select, what he considered to be the wisest enactments in the existing codes of different states, and to add to them others, against which there would be no prejudice in favour of any prescriptive ideas of right or wrong. Now that Plato did in all probability make such a selection, may be inferred from the facts brought forward by C. F. Hermann, in his two Academic Dissertations, published at Marburg, in 1836, under the titles respectively of "De Vestigiis Institutorum Veterum, imprimis Atticorum, per Platonis de Legibus libros indagandis"—and "Juris domestici et familiaris apud Platonem in Legibus cum veteris Græciæ inque primis Athenarum institutis comparatio."

With regard to the matter of the treatise, it is to be regretted that Plato did not, what he might have done very easily, treat it in a more formal manner, by detailing the duties which men owe to the gods, to themselves, and their fellow-creatures; and by mentioning what rewards and punishments ought to be assigned for deeds of a virtuous and contrary character. Instead, however, of adopting so obvious and almost necessary a plan, he has thought proper to imitate the desultory conversation of a garrulous old age, and to make one third of the treatise little more than an Introduction to the remainder; where, while some laws are introduced with an elaborate preface, others are dismissed without any; and instead of the rights of persons and things being defined within strongly marked limits, they seem to be discussed just as his fancy led the writer to touch upon each question, no matter how important, or the reverse.

Of this inattention to the natural order, in which the subjects should have been taken, no better proof can be furnished than by referring to the passage in ix. § 13, where it is stated that—"It is necessary to lay down laws for men, and for them to live according to law, or else to differ in no respect from animals in the wildest state of nature;"—a sentiment, which ought to have been prominently brought forward at the very commencement of the treatise, and made the basis of all legislation; and an additional support would have been thus given to the doctrine, broached in the Protagoras, that laws are required to check the weakness and the depravity of human nature. Instead, however, of assuming a broad basis like this, on which to build the superstructure of his code, Plato commences with an inquiry of a very limited kind—although well suited to the institutions of Crete and Lacedæmon, which appear to have had a great affinity with each other—whether the fortitude exhibited in war is any and what part of virtue; an inquiry that ought rather to have found a place, where laws are laid down relating to the duties of soldiers, who should have been urged to take as their rule of conduct, the sentiment expressed by Bias, and subsequently by Horace,

Oderunt peccare boni virtutis amore.

The good, through love of virtue, hate to sin.

In defence, however, of this want of method, Cousin has boldly stepped forward, and asserted that, despite an appearance to the contrary, there is to be found in the Laws a perfect regularity, which reveals itself to those, who study that treatise attentively; while they, who are not sufficiently versed in the philosophy of Plato, will doubtless be unable to follow the thread of the discourse, when it seems to be broken by numerous digressions; for the art, which reigns through the whole treatise, is a kind of snare for a reader of modern times, or a labyrinth with its thousand intricacies, totally unlike the regular and easy road laid down by modern writers on jurisprudence.

What credence this assertion of Cousin may gain with others, I know not; but to myself it is far less satisfactory than his defence of the prefaces to the different Laws, with which Seneca found such fault. For, as Cousin remarks correctly, Plato adopted them, to show that the law-giver ought to treat men, as creatures of reason, and possessing free-will; and that he should employ persuasion as well as force; and explain the moral intention of the laws he introduces; and found the obedience to them rather on the light of reason than the dread of punishment. This very doctrine had indeed, according to Cicero, De Legg. ii. 6, been inculcated by Charondas and Zaleucus; but it was left for Plato to enforce it with greater power, and to put it in a clearer light.

Although there are not a few subjects, dispersed through the whole treatise, that can scarcely fail to excite the surprise of a modern reader, the one most conspicuous perhaps is that relating to the importance attached to the cultivation of music and dancing, as something beyond a mere amusement and accomplishment, as they are deemed at present. For though it may be true, that certain kinds of music, even without words, have a tendency to elevate and purify the soul, and to prevent it from seeking a gratification in grovelling and gross pursuits, yet it may be fairly doubted whether any one was ever corrupted by music alone; although he might be by witnessing the dancing, which travellers tell us is to be seen even at this day in Spain and other countries on the shores of the Mediterranean, and which is evidently only the still surviving remnant of the Satyric dance of the olden time.

The last point to which it is requisite to draw the reader's attention, is the diminutive size of the state, for which Plato has framed his elaborate code of laws. For though it is true, as remarked by Cousin, that it faithfully represents the spirit of the times, when persons legislated for small republics, yet Plato must have known, from what he had seen or heard of, that it would be impossible to preserve his chosen number of 5040 families and the lands assigned to them, even should the increase of births be remedied by emigration, or the population suddenly diminished by pestilence or famine; and it was therefore not without reason, that at the close of the treatise he looks forward to some power to preserve, what he felt, no doubt, carried within itself the germs of future decay, which the largest empires in the East and the smallest republics elsewhere have been destined to feel alike.

As the work of Cousin is not likely to be readily accessible to the readers of this translation, I have transcribed from his note on v. § 8, p. 171, the list of the 59 divisors of 5040, which is more correct and full than the one given by Cornarius.

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 15, 16, 18, 20, 21, 24, 28, 30, 35, 36, 40, 42, 45, 48, 56, 60, 63, 70, 72, 80, 84, 90, 105, 112, 120, 126, 140, 144, 168, 180, 210, 240, 252, 280, 315, 336, 360, 420, 504, 560, 630, 720, 840, 1008, 1260, 1680, 2520.

For a similar reason I have extracted the parallelisms between the Laws of Plato and Holy Writ, as they are noticed in "Luxdorphiana e Platone," which Olaus Wormius edited at Copenhagen in 1790, although some of them might be omitted, as being irrelevant; while in lieu of the pages of ed. Lugd. 1590, I have substituted those of ed. Steph.

THE LAWS.

BOOK I.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

AN ATHENIAN GUEST, CLINIAS OF CRETE, AND MEGILLUS OF LACEDÆMON.

[1.] HAS a god, or some man, obtained from you, O guests, (the fame of being) the cause of the laying down of laws?

Clin. A god, O guest, a god, to say what is most just; with us indeed, Zeus; but amongst the Lacedæmonians, from whose country is this person here, I think, they mention Apollo.¹ Is it not so?

Megil. It is.

Athen. Say you then, according to Homer,² that Minos did constantly on the ninth year³ go to a conference with his father, and according to the oracular responses given by him, lay down the laws found in your states?

Clin. It is so said by us; and, likewise, that his brother Rhadamanthus—for you have heard the name—was the most just [of men]. Now we Cretans would say that he obtained this praise from his distributing at that time things pertaining to justice in an upright manner.

¹ There is not a little difficulty in φάναι τούτους. For τούτους could hardly follow παρὰ Λακεδαιμονίων. Ficinus has "Apollinem dicturos istos existimo." Taylor, "I think Apollo dictated the laws."

² Od. xix. 178, Μίνως Ἐννέωρος βασίλευε Διὸς μεγάλου δαριστὺς.

³ Ficinus, "semper per novennium," as if he had found in his MSS. συνουσίαν ἐκάστοτε δι' ἐνάτου ἔτους. This interpretation is adopted by Boeckh on Pseudo-Platon. Minos, § 13. But Ast prefers the account given by Valerius Maxim. i. 2, "Minos—nono quoque anno—a Jove—traditas sibi leges prærogabat."

Athen. And honourable is the renown, and very becoming to the son of Zeus. But since both you and this person here have been brought up in legal institutions of this kind, I expect it will not be unpleasant for us at present to have a dissertation, by speaking and hearing respecting a form of government and laws, and at the same time to be taking a walk. Now the way from Cnossus to the cavern and temple of Jupiter is, as we hear, altogether sufficient,¹ and the resting-places along the road are, as is proper, during the present sultry weather, shady amongst lofty trees; and it will be suited to our age to rest in them frequently, and by relieving each other during the conversation, to go in this way through the whole walk with ease.

Clin. There are indeed, O guest, to a person as he goes on, in the groves cypress-trees of wondrous height and beauty, and meadows, in which while we rest, we may discourse.

[2.] Athen. Speak you correctly?

Clin. Entirely so; and we shall say so more, on seeing them. But let us go with a good fortune.

Athen. Be it so. But tell me, why has the law ordained for your joint-feasts gymnastic exercises and the handling of arms?

Clin. I conceive, O guest, that it is easy² even for every one² to apprehend these customs of ours. For you see that the nature of the whole country of Crete is not a plain, like that of Thessaly. On this account, they make use of horses more; but we of running. ³ Now as this irregular [ground]³ is more adapted to the exercise of foot-races, it is necessary for a person in such a case to have light arms, and not to run⁴ holding what has a weight.⁴ Now the lightness of bows and arrows seems to be fitted (for this). All these therefore have been adopted by us in war; and all this has the legislator, as it appears to me, looking to this point, ordained; especially

¹ In lieu of ικανή, I should prefer οὐ κακή "not bad—"

²⁻³ Ficinus, finding probably a difficulty in the words καὶ παντὶ, has neglected them; and so after him has Taylor. The sense requires either the omission of καὶ, or the reading καὶ παιδὶ "even to a child." On the loss or confusion of παῖς in this formula, see at Phileb. § 32.

³⁻³ The Greek is ἥδε γὰρ ἀνῶμαλος αὖ, where γὰρ and αὖ are equally unintelligible. They are omitted by Ficinus, who has "hæc inæqualis est."

⁴⁻⁴ Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "ne pondere suo cursum impediatur." At all events μη βαρὺς ἔχοντα are superfluous after ἐλαφρὰ—

since he nearly seems to have instituted the joint feasts, through perceiving how all persons, when engaged in war, are then compelled by the thing itself, for the sake of their own defence, to feast ¹ at that time together.¹ In truth, he appears to me to have condemned the multitude of stupidity, for their not learning that there is constantly through life a war to all with all states. Now if during the time of war it was necessary to feast in common for the sake of defence, and for certain persons, both rulers and ruled, to be drawn up as their defenders, this should be done in the time of peace likewise. For that, which most men call peace, is only a name; but in reality there is a war, not proclaimed by a herald, according to nature, to all ² against all states. For by thus considering, you will almost discover, that the Cretan legislator has, looking to war, ordained for us all institutions both public and private, and ordered us to guard the laws in such a manner, as if nothing else were useful, either of possessions or pursuits, unless one became victorious in war, and all the goods of the vanquished became the property of the victors.

[3.] Athen. You appear to me, O guest, to have been well practised in seeing through the laws of Crete. But tell me still more clearly this. For ³ by the definition you have laid down³ of a well-regulated state, you seem to me to say that one ought to administer it, so arranged in order, as to be victorious over the rest of states in war. Is it not so?

Clin. Just so; and I think it will seem so to this person here.

Megil. For how can any Lacedæmonian whatever, O thou divine man, answer otherwise?

Athen. Whether, then, is this right in the case of states towards states, but otherwise in the case of one village towards another?

Clin. By no means otherwise.

Athen. But it is the same?

Clin. Yes.

² Instead of πάσαις the train of ideas leads to πᾶσι, as shown by the preceding πᾶσι πρὸς ἀπάσας τὰς πόλεις.

³—³ The words within brackets, in Greek, ὃν γὰρ ὅρον ἔθου, are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor; who here, as elsewhere, has paid no attention to the original.

Athen. What then, is it the same in the case of one family towards another family, and in the case of one man towards another?

Clin. The same.

Athen. But in the case of a person towards himself, shall we consider him in that of an enemy towards an enemy? Or, how shall we say?

Clin. O Athenian guest,—for I am not willing to call you Attic, because you appear to me rather to deserve to be called after the name of the goddess Minerva,¹—you have, by correctly carrying back the reasoning to its principle, made it clearer; so that you will more easily discover that it has just now been rightly said, that all persons are enemies to all, both publicly and privately, and² each individual to himself.

Athen. How hast thou, O wonderful man, said this?

Clin. ³ And these, too, O guest; it is the first and best of all victories for a man to conquer himself; but to be vanquished by himself is of all things the most shameful and vile. For these words⁴ signify that there is a war in each of us against ourselves.

Athen. Let us then turn back our discourse. For, since each of us is ⁵ one better and another⁶ worse than himself, shall we say that a family, and a village, and a state, have this same thing in them, or not?

Clin. Do you mean that (one)⁶ is better than itself in some things, and the other worse?

Athen. Yes.

Clin. Concerning this too you have rightly inquired. ⁷ For ¹ Namely, Athéné. Plato meant to say that the guest was Athéné-like, not merely born in Attica, where there were many persons not at all like Athéné, the goddess of wisdom.

² Ficinus has "et," answering to καὶ in MS. Voss. alone.

³ Ast explains καὶ ἐν αὐθᾷ by "in the latter case," viz. of an individual. But ἐν αὐθᾷ could hardly be thus applied. There is doubtless some error here.

⁴ Namely, "to conquer and be conquered." Ast.

⁵ Instead of ὁ μὲν—ὁ δὲ, which could scarcely thus follow εἰς ἑκαστὸς ἡμῶν, one would prefer τό μὲν—τό δὲ, similar to κρίνω—τίνα in the next speech of Clinias.

⁶ Ast says that τῇν μὲν is to be supplied in the first clause, answering to τῇν δὲ in the second, and refers to Heusde Specim. Crit. p. 76, Heind. on Gorg. § 24, and Hermann on Viger. p. 699.

⁷ Ficinus has, "non enim minus civitatibus id contingit; immo a thing of this kind occurs very and much, not the least in states.⁷ For, in the case of those, in which the better conquer the multitude and the worse, such a city would be correctly said to be better than itself, and be most justly praised for such a victory. But the contrary where the contrary (occurs).

Athen. Now the question, whether the worse is at any time more excellent than the better, let us lay aside; for it would be a long discussion; but for the present I understand what is asserted by you; that sometimes citizens of the same family and of the same city, being unjust and numerous, will, by coming together, forcibly attack the just, fewer in number, and enslave them; and that, when they conquer, the city may be justly said to be inferior to itself, and at the same time depraved; but, when they are conquered, better than itself, and good.

Clin. What is now said, guest, is very strange; but yet it is most necessary to confess it.

[4.] Athen. Hold then, and let us again consider this. Many brothers may surely be born from one man and from one (woman).¹ Nor is it at all wonderful that the greater² part of them should be unjust, and the lesser just.

Clin. It is not.

Athen. Nor will it be proper for me and you to investigate this, that, when the base vanquish, both the family and every kind of relationship may be called inferior to themselves, but better than themselves, when the base are vanquished. For we do not investigate these things at present for the sake of some elegance or inelegance in words, according to the discourse of many, but for the sake of discovering what is a natural rectitude and error in the case of laws.

Clin. You speak most truly, O guest.

Megil. To me too so much appears to be well said.

Athen. Let us look into this likewise. Can any one become a judge of the brothers just spoken of?

Clin. Doubtless.

Athen. Which then will be the better judge? He, who cuts off such of them as are bad, and orders the good to maxime in eis perspicuum," which is far more intelligible than the Greek, πάντων γὰρ ἔστι καὶ σφόδρα τὸ τοιοῦτον οὐχ ἥκιστα ἐν ταῖς πόλεσιν.

² Instead of πλείους, two MSS. πλείους, similar to "plures" in Ficini.

govern themselves? or he, who causes the good to govern, but suffers the bad to live, being willing to be governed? But let us mention a third judge, if such there be, with respect to virtue; who, receiving a single clan at difference with itself, will not destroy any person; but, after having reconciled the parties, will lay down for them laws relating to each other, and be able so to guard them, that they may be on friendly terms.

Clin. Such a judge and legislator would be the better by far.

Athen. And he would frame laws for them, looking to a purpose contrary to war.

Clin. This indeed is true.

Athen. But what is he, who brings a state together? Would he, by looking to external war, better put in order its life than (by looking) to the wars produced constantly within itself, which is called sedition? which every one would particularly wish not to occur in his own state; and when it has occurred, to be released from it as quickly as possible?

Clin. (By looking), it is evident, to this (the latter).

Athen. Whether would any one choose that peace should result from sedition, through one party being destroyed, and the other¹ victorious, or that, by peace and friendship resulting from a reconciliation, they should necessarily² direct their attention to external wars?

Clin. Every one would rather wish it to happen to his own state in this way than in that.

Athen. Would not a legislator too in a similar manner?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Would not every one lay down all laws for the sake of that which is best?

Clin. How not?

Athen. But neither war nor sedition is the best of things, ³—for to be in want of these is a thing to be prayed for—³ but ¹ Ficinus has "cum altera pars victoria potita sit," which led Stephens to alter τῶν πορίων, hitherto found in all the MSS., into τῶν ἐρίων, as the sense evidently requires.

² This "necessarily" seems rather strange, instead of "more readily."

³—³ Ficinus, unable to understand ἀνευκρόν δὲ τὸ δεηθῆναι τούτων, renders these words, "omnes enim deprecantur ne quid horum sibi in-eundum sit." Taylor's version, "for to be in want of these is execrable," shows by its closeness the absurdity of the original. Plato wrote ἀνευκρόν, as I have translated.

peace with, and kindly feelings towards, each other. Moreover, for a state to vanquish itself, is not, it seems, one of the best, but of necessary things; just as if¹ any one should think a body in sickness would, when meeting with medicinal cleansing, be then doing the best, but should pay no attention to the body, which needed (the cleansing) not at all. Should any one in like manner have his thoughts directed to the happiness of a state or an individual, he will never become correctly² a statesman, while looking only and primarily to external war; nor will he be an accurate legislator, unless he lays down laws respecting war for the sake of peace, rather than laws respecting peace, for the sake of war.

[5.] Clin. This reasoning, O guest, appears somehow to have been stated correctly. But still, I wonder whether the institutions existing with us, and still more those relating to Lacedæmon, have not given rise to all care for the sake of those things.

Athen. This may perhaps be the case. We ought not, however, to contest the matter at present in a harsh manner; but quietly to ask questions, as both we and they have especially an interest in things of this kind. Do ye then keep pace with my discourse. In the first place, we will place before you Tyrtæus³—who was by birth an Athenian, but afterwards a fellow-citizen with these persons here; and who has the most of all men been engaged on these points—where he says, “I would not bear in recollection the man, nor hold him in any account, not though he were the most wealthy of men, and possessed many good things,”—and he enumerates nearly all,—“who is not always the best in the affairs of war.” For you have surely heard of his poetry. For this person here is, I think, saturated with them.

² Instead of ὀρθῶς, Boeckh suggested, and Ast approved of, ὀρθός, so that πολιτικὸς ὀρθός might correspond to νομοθίτης ἀκριβής. Stalbaum is, however, content with ὀρθῶς, which he would perhaps translate, with Ficinus, “revera.” But such is not the meaning of the word.

³ Tyrtæus was an elegiac poet, lame, and despised by the Athenians. The oracle of Apollo, however, ordered the Lacedæmonians to use him as their general, in the war in which they were then engaged with the Messenians. Arriving at Lacedæmon, he did by his poetry so animate the Lacedæmonians, that they vanquished the Messenians. He flourished B. C. 684. T.

Megil. Entirely so.

Clin. And they have reached us likewise, having been brought from Lacedæmon.

Athen. Come then, let us interrogate in common this poet somehow in this fashion. Thou, most divine poet, Tyrtæus,—for you appear to us to be wise and good, because you have celebrated excellently well those, who excel in war,—and as myself, and this person here, and Clinias the Cnossian, happen, as we seem, to agree very much with you in this particular,—we wish to know clearly, whether we are speaking about the same men or not,—do tell us, whether you too think, as we do, that there are two kinds of war? Or how (say you)? To this I think that a man, much inferior to Tyrtæus, would say the truth, that there are two kinds; one, which we now call sedition, which is the most grievous of all wars, as we just now asserted; but the other kind of war, which we employ in our differences with those out of the state, and of a different tribe, we will lay down, as being milder than the other.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Come now, (inform us) what men, and for what kind of war, have you so transcendently praised (some)¹ and blamed others. For you appear to have praised ²those (engaged) in a foreign (war).² For you have said in your poems thus—that you by no means endure those,

Who dare not upon gory slaughter look,
Nor with the hand, close standing, clutch the foe.

Hence, as an inference, we should say that you, Tyrtæus, are praising, it seems, those, who have been eminently conspicuous in a foreign and external war. Surely he would say this and confess it.

Clin. How not?

Athen. But we, although these are good, assert that those are far better, who are conspicuously the best in the greatest war. We have too the poet Theognis as a witness, a citizen of Megara in Sicily, who says, ¹ On the omission of τοὺς μὲν in the first clause, to be supplied from τοὺς δὲ in the second, see above, § 3, n. 6.

²—² In lieu of πρὸς τοὺς ἑκτὸς, Boeckh was the first to suggest, what the context requires, τοὺς πρὸς τὸν ἑκτὸς—

The man, who, when the strife of party's high,
Is faithful, is in gold and silver worth
His weight.

Now, such a one we say is in a more difficult war altogether superior to the other, by nearly as much as justice, temperance, and prudence, when coming to the same point, are superior ¹ to fortitude (by itself alone).¹ For no one can be found faithful and sound in seditions, without the whole of virtue. But, as Tyrtaeus says, there are a great number of mercenaries who fight ² standing firmly with their legs apart,² and die willingly in battle—among whom are the most ³ bold, and unjust, and insulting,³ and nearly⁴ the most thoughtless of all (men) except some very few. But to what does this story tend? And what did he wish to render clear, when he said this? It was evidently this above all; that both he, who laid down laws here from Zeus, and every one else, from whom there is even a little advantage, will lay down his laws, while always looking for the most part to nothing else than the greatest virtue. But it is, as Theognis says, a faithfulness in things of dread, which a person may denominate perfect justice; but that, which Tyrtaeus has praised so highly, is indeed beautiful, and opportunely celebrated by the poet, yet it may most rightly be called the fourth in number and in the power of being in honour.

[6.] Clin. Shall we, O guest, throw⁵ our legislator away amongst the remote legislators?

Athen. Not (him)⁶ indeed, most excellent man, but ourselves, should we imagine, that both Lycurgus and Minos laid down their laws in Lacedæmon and here, looking especially to war.

^{1—1} In lieu of μετ' ἀνδρίας, Proclus on Rep. p. 402, has preserved αὐτῆς μόνῃς τῆς ἀνδρίας, first pointed out by Boeckh, whom Ast has followed. Stalbaum is content with the common reading.

^{2—2} On this gesture of a man fighting see Homer, Il. xii. 458.

^{3—3} In confirmation of the character given here to mercenary soldiers, it is sufficient to refer to Thucydides, vii. 29.

⁴ Clemens Alexandr. correctly omits σχεδὸν ἀπάντων, words quite superfluous, when followed by ἐκτὸς δὲ τινων μάλα ὀλίγων.

⁵ Ficinus has "rejiciemus"—which leads to ἀποβαλοῦμεν in lieu of ἀποβάλλομεν.

⁶ Ficinus has, "Non illum—sed nos ipsos—" as if he had read in MS. Οὐχ ἡμεῖς γ' ἐκείνον, what the antithesis requires.

Clin. What then, (and) how ought we to say?

Athen. ¹As truth and justice, I think, require those to speak, who discourse about a divine (republic).¹ Not looking to some part of virtue, and that the most trifling, but to the whole of virtue, ²he laid down, and according to their species to seek the laws, not what those seek who place species before those now²—for that, of which each person is in want, does he laying aside³ seek; one, the laws about inheritances; ⁴another, those about sole heiresses; ⁴ another, those about an assault; and others, about ten thousand other matters of a similar kind. But we assert that the inquiry about laws is the business of those, who properly inquire, as we have just now begun (to do). And I am in every way delighted with your attempt to give an explanation on the subject of laws. For it is right to begin from virtue, by asserting that for its sake a person has laid down laws. But when you said that the legislator had laid down all (laws) with reference to a part of virtue, and this too the least, you did not appear to me to speak correctly any longer; and on this account did I speak all this subsequent speech. Do you, then, wish me to say in what ¹—¹ Such is Taylor's translation of the Latin of Ficinus; who seems to have found in his MS. the Scholium, discovered in other MSS. also, where it is stated that πολιτείας is to be supplied after θείας. But as such an ellipse would be inadmissible, Stephens suspected that something was wanting in the Greek—"Ὡς περ τό τ' ἀληθές, οἶμαι, καὶ τὸ δίκαιον ὑπὲρ γε θείας διαλεγόμενους λέγειν, literally, "As (it is meet) for those, I think, who converse about a divine, to say what is true and just"—for χρῆν might be supplied from the preceding speech of Clinias.

²—² Such is the literal translation of the Greek text, given by Bekker and Stalbaum. Ficinus has, what is not quite so unintelligible—"ipsos respexisse putandum, et per singulas earum species leges quæsisse, nec eas species investigasse, quas multi modo proponentes quærent." From whence Stephens was led to read ἐξήτει, found subsequently in one MS., and to suggest the insertion of πολλοί before τῶν νῦν—Ast however would supply πολιτειῶν after τῶν νῦν, and alter ζητεῖν αὐτῶν into ζητεῖν αὐτόν (the lawgiver), so that there may be a change from a direct to an indirect form of speech. What Plato really wrote it is difficult to state positively, but it is easy to see what is required by the natural connexion of ideas.

³ Ficinus, unable, I suspect, to understand παραθέμενος, has omitted it in his version, "id enim quisque maxime quærere solet, quo maxime indiget.

⁴—⁴ The Greek words καὶ ἐπιελήρων are omitted by Ficinus.

manner ¹I am still willing for you to speak in detail, and myself to hear.¹

Clin. Entirely so, O guest.

Athen. It is proper to assert that the laws of the Cretans are not vainly held in very great esteem by all the Greeks. For they are in a correct state by their making those, who use them, happy; for they impart every good. Now there are two kinds of good; one human, and the other divine; and the former hangs upon the divine; and if any state receives the greater, it possesses likewise the lesser; but if not, it is deprived of both. But the lesser are those, of which ²health is the leader, beauty the second in order, and strength for running, and all other movements of the body, the third; but the fourth is, Plutus, (wealth,) ³not blind indeed, ³but seeing acutely, if it follows prudence. Now that which is the first ⁴good (and) ⁴the leader of the divine, is prudence; but the second, after intellect, ⁵is a temperate habit of the soul; from these (two) mixed up with fortitude, ⁶the third in order will be justice; and the fourth, fortitude. Now all these are naturally arranged before those, and so must they be arranged by the lawgiver; ⁷and after these he must enjoin upon the citizens the other ordinances that look to these.⁷

²—² The same order is repeated in the Laws, ii. § 6, and in Gorg. p. 451, E. § 14, where it is assigned to a Scolion preserved by Athenæus, xv. p. 694.

³ On the blindness of Plutus see Aristophanes in the play of that name, and Plato Rep. viii. p. 554, B. § 8. Theophrastus, says the Scholiast, observed, that if Wealth had life, it would come only to the good; but now, since it is without life, it falls to the bad likewise.

⁴—⁴ Instead of αἰ, which has no meaning here, and is omitted by Theodoretus, the sense requires καὶ—while ἀγαθῶν in two MSS., in lieu of ἀγαθόν, answers to "bonorum," in Ficinus.

⁶ In the enumeration of the four cardinal virtues, each is generally considered to stand alone, not, as here, one to be mixed up with another one.

⁷—⁷ The Greek is μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα τὰς ἄλλας προστάξεις τοῖς πολίταις εἰς ταῦτα βλέπουσας αὐτοῖς εἶναι διακελευστίον—where I cannot make out either syntax or sense; nor could, I think, Ficinus; whose version is—

But of these the human look to the divine, and all the divine to their leader intellect. ¹ And he ought to have a care respecting marriages contracted by each other, and after these in the procreation and education of children,¹ such as are male and female, and likewise of those still young, and of those advancing in years to old age, and to hold correctly in honour and dishonour;² directing, in all the intercourse of these persons, his attention to their pains, and pleasures, and desires, and eagerness in all matters of love; and acting as a guard over them to blame and praise correctly through the laws themselves. In the case of anger and fear, and what perturbations soever in the soul arise through misfortune, and whatever escapes from them exist in prosperity; and whatever sufferings happen to men through disease, or wars, or poverty, or the contraries to these, in all such occasions he must teach and define what is beautiful, or not, in the arrangement of each. And after this, it is necessary for the legislator to watch over the property and expenditure of the citizens, in whatever way it may take place, and the unions with and separations from each other in all persons (acting) with their free will or without it; and to have an eye to what is just or not, and in what things it exists or is wanting, and to distribute honours to those who obey the laws, but to inflict upon those, who do not obey, punishments ordained (by law); until, having reached the end of all polity, he shall perceive in what manner it is meet for the burial of the dead to take place, and what honours to pay to them. And after perceiv-

“et mandet omnibus ut semper ad hæc ipsa respicientes in singulis operentur”—thus translated by Taylor, “and should command the citizens to look to these divine goods in all their actions.”

¹—¹ This passage, says Boeckh, is most difficult and corrupt. Viger on Eusebius, Præp. Ev. xii. p. 589, wished to transpose μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα—and to place those words before περὶ τῶν γάμων—For he found in Ficinus—“curet præterea oportet nuptias inter cives et generationes—”

² After “dishonour” there is evidently something wanting, supplied by Ficinus; whose version is, “et eos, qui recte in hisce se gerunt, ut decet, honoret”—adopted, as usual, by Taylor; who has in the sentences following been content, without looking at the Greek, to translate the Latin translation of Ficinus, as altered by Grynæus; for the genuine one has, “contra vero dolores, voluptates, cupiditates in omni conversatione vituperet: considerabit etiam diligenter, ad quæ studia quemque raptat amor; rectaque officia per leges laudabit, vituperabit contraria.”

ing, he who has laid down the laws shall place over them all, as guardians, some persons on account of their prudence, and some who have gone through a truthful reputation; so that intellect, binding all these together, may exhibit them as following temperance and justice, and not riches or ambition. In this manner, O guests, I did wish, and still do wish now, that you would explain how all these particulars exist in the laws said to be from Zeus, and in those of the Pythian Apollo, which both Minos and Lycurgus laid down; and how, after they have assumed a certain order, they become evident to a person skilled in the business of law, either through art or certain customs; while to us, the rest of mankind, they are by no means apparent.

[7.] Clin. How then, O guest, ought we to speak of what comes after these?

Athen. It appears to me that we ought to go through again from the beginning, as we have begun (in part), in the first place, the pursuits of fortitude; and afterwards we will go through another species of virtue, and again another, if you are willing; and that we may go through the first subject, we will endeavour, by laying down a pattern, and conversing about the others in this way, to make for ourselves a beguilement of the road; and afterwards we will show, if god is willing, that the things relating to the whole of virtue look thitherward.

Clin. You speak well. Endeavour then, in the first place, to sift for us this praiser of Zeus.

Athen. I will endeavour likewise (to sift) both you and myself. For the discourse is common. Speak therefore. Shall we say that the joint-feasts and gymnastic exercises were invented by the lawgiver for the purposes of war?

*Megil.*¹ Yes.

Athen. And that a third or fourth thing (was invented)?
²For perhaps it is necessary for a person thus to make an enumeration respecting those of the rest of virtue, whether it is right to call them of parts, or any thing whatever, only showing clearly what he means.²

¹ Boeckh was the first to substitute Megil. for Clin.

² Such is the literal version of the Greek text, which, I confess, I cannot understand. Ficinus has "Forte enim ita dinumerare oportet, Megil. The third thing, as I and any Lacedæmonian whatever likewise would say, he discovered was hunting. ¹ And a fourth, and even a fifth, ² thing let us try, if we can, to mention. ¹ I then would endeavour to mention the fourth thing, namely, that which takes place to a great extent with us, in the endurance of pain, which occurs constantly in fighting with hands against each other, and ³ in certain snatchings in the midst of many blows. ³ There is, moreover, what is called a concealment, ⁴ wonderfully laborious as regards endurance (of pain); and the being in winter without shoes and without a bed, and waiting without servants upon themselves, while wandering night and day through the whole country. Still further, in the exercises of naked persons, ⁵ there is a severe endurance amongst us when contending with the violence of intense heat; and there tum in hoc virtutis genere, tum in cæterarum virtutum sive parte, sive quomocunque aliter, declarationis duntaxat gratia, nominare deceat." From which it is evident that either his MS. was more complete than any subsequently collated, or that he supplied, from conjecture, what he considered to be necessary for the sense. What Plato really wrote, only a bold conjecturist will be able, I suspect, to restore.

^{1—1} The words within the numerals Stephens says have been assigned to the Athenian Guest; an arrangement of which Ast and Baiter approve. Winckelmann however considers the whole sentence to be spurious; but he does not state why, when, or by whom it was interpolated.

² The Greek is ἡ πέμπτου. But Ficinus has "et quintum:" which leads to ἡ καὶ πέμπτου.

^{3—3} Ast explains this by saying that the boys at Sparta were taught to steal; but that, if they were detected, they were beaten, not for the theft, but for doing it clumsily; and he refers to Xenophon Laconic. i. 8.

⁴ Respecting the Spartan κρύπτεα Ast refers to Plutarch in Lycurg. p. 56, E.; who says that such of the young men as were supposed to be of a superior mind were sent through the country with small swords and the necessaries of life, but nothing else; and that during the day they concealed themselves, and took their rest in retired spots; but at night they went to the public roads, and murdered such of the Helots as they could lay hold of. A similar account is given in a fragment of Heraclides Ponticus. According to the Scholiast, it was a form of exercise suited for war. For the young men were stript naked, and ordered to wander for a whole year out of the city, among the mountains, and to support themselves by theft, and other stratagems, but in such a manner that no one might detect them. Hence this was called κρύπτεα, a concealment: for they were punished if they were at any time discovered.

⁵ These "naked exercises" took place at the summer solstice; and hence the allusion to the intense heat, to which those, engaged in them, were exposed.

are very many other things ¹(of this kind),¹ in detailing which a person would ²nearly never cease.²

Athen. You speak well, O Lacedæmonian guest. But come, whether shall we put down fortitude as a contest merely with fears and pains? or with desires likewise and pleasures, and certain vehement fawnings of flattery, which soften³ the minds of those, who deem themselves objects of worship, and mould them like wax?⁴

Megil. ⁵I think thus,⁵ (that it is) a contest with all these.

Athen. If then we call to mind the previous discourse, this person here said, that both a state is inferior in some things to itself, and ⁶a man (to himself).⁶ Was it not so, Cnossian guest?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Now then, whether shall we call him the inferior,⁷ who is subdued by pain, or him rather, who is subdued by pleasure?

Clin. Him, it appears to me, who is subdued by pleasure. And surely we all much rather say that he, who is vanquished by pleasures, is disgracefully inferior to himself, than he, who (is vanquished) by pains.

Athen. Surely the legislator through Zeus and he through Apollo did not lay down by law that fortitude is lame, and able to march against things only on its left hand, but unable (to do so) against elegancies and flatteries on its right hand? or (is it able to march against) both?

Clin. Against both, I think.

Athen. Let us, then, mention again what those pursuits are, in both of your states, which give a taste of pleasures, and do not avoid them in the same manner, as they do not avoid

²—² Ficinus, conceiving perhaps that σχεδὸν—οὐκ—ἐκάστοτε could not be united, has "quæ non facile quispiam enumeraret," adopted by Taylor.

³ All the MSS. omit μαλάττουσαι, and some too κηρίνους. Ficinus has "animos flectunt, et quasi cereos faciunt," which leads to κάμπτονται, ὅλον κηρίνους πλάττουσαι; as in vii. 2, p. 789, E., πλάττειν, ὅλον κήρινον.

⁴ Ast quotes opportunely from Horace, "Cereus in vitium flecti."

⁵—⁵ The words Οἷμαι μὲν οὕτω are omitted by Ficinus, and the MS. Z, from which Aldus printed the ed. pr.

⁶—⁶ Ficinus alone has "et virum aliquem inferiorem se ipso," thus supplying what is requisite to preserve the balance of the sentence.

⁷ Instead of κακὸν Boeckh would read κακίον, from "inferiorem" in Ficinus.

pain, but bring persons into the midst of them, (pleasures,) and induce them, partly by force, and partly by honours, to vanquish them. Now where is the same thing ordained in your laws respecting pleasures (as respecting pains)? Let it be stated, what is that, which in your case causes the same persons to be similarly brave, both with respect to pain and pleasures, while they are victorious over those things, in which they ought to be victorious, and to be by no means inferior to enemies the nearest to them and the most difficult (to contend with).

Megil. In the same manner, O guest, as I had the power to mention many laws opposed to pains, I should not thus perhaps possess the means of speaking about pleasures according to their great and conspicuous parts; but according to their small I might perhaps have the means.

Clin. Nor should I be able myself to do any thing of this kind clearly in the case of the laws of Crete.

Athen. This, O ye best of guests, is by no means wonderful. But should any one of us, who is desirous of seeing what is true, and at the same time the best, find fault with any thing in the laws of our respective countries, let us receive (the words)¹ from each other not harshly, but with mildness.

Clin. You speak well, O Athenian guest; and we must obey you.

Athen. ² For no other conduct than this² would become men of our age.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. Whether then a person finds fault rightly or not with the Laconian and Cretan polity, is another question. But perhaps I can better tell what is said by the multitude than either of you can. For although the laws are regulated even moderately well, yet there would be with you one law the most beautiful, not to permit any youth to inquire which laws are well or ill established, but (to ordain) all to proclaim, with one voice, and with one mouth, that they are all beautifully laid down, since the gods were the parties who gave them; and that, if any one says otherwise, persons should not endure

¹ Both the syntax and sense require τὰ ἔπη δεχόμεθα, in lieu of ἀποδεχόμεθα, similar to τὰ λεγόμενα—δεχομένῳ shortly afterwards.

² The Greek is Οὐ γὰρ ἂν—πρέπει τοιοῦτον. But Ficinus has "Profecto non aliter—facere decet," which leads to Οὐ γὰρ ἄλλ' ἂν—πρέπει ἢ τὸ τοιοῦτον.

to hearken to him : and that if any old man has any thoughts respecting them, he shall place his reasons before a ruler and his equals in age, but not in the presence of a young man.

Clin. You speak most properly, O guest : and, like a seer, although you were absent from the then thoughts of the party who laid them down, yet you appear to me to have made a conjecture reasonably correct, and to have spoken what is very true.

Athen. There is then a freedom now from the presence of young men ; but we, on account of our old age, are permitted by the lawgiver to speak about the laws among ourselves, without doing any wrong.

Clin. Such is the case. Do not then be remiss at all in reproving our laws. For it is not dishonourable to know aught of what is not beautiful ; but by this means it happens that a remedy exists to a party receiving what is said with not an envious feeling, but with a good will.

[8.] Athen. (You speak) correctly. I shall not however speak in reprehension of the laws before diligently considering them to the utmost of my power ; or rather, (I shall speak) doubtfully. For upon you alone of all the Greeks and Barbarians, of whom we hear, the legislator has enjoined to abstain from the greatest pleasures and sports, and not to taste them ; but on the question of pains and fears, which we have lately discussed, he was of opinion, that if any one should avoid them thoroughly from his infancy, he would, when he came to endure necessary labours, and fears, and pains, avoid those, who are exercised in them, and would become their slave. The same lawgiver ought, I think, to have thought the same respecting pleasures, and to have said to himself that, if the citizens shall from childhood be inexperienced in the greatest pleasures, and be unpractised in bearing up against pleasures, so as¹ not to be compelled to do any thing base for the sake of the sweetness arising from pleasure, they would suffer the same as those, who are vanquished by fear, and become the slaves in a different and still baser manner to those, who are able to bear up against pleasures, and are the masters of what relate to pleasures, although they are sometimes the worst of men ; and they would have their soul partly a slave, and partly free, and be unworthy to be called wholly brave and free. Consider therefore whether aught of what has been now said appears to you to be according to reason.

Clin. It appears so ¹ to us somehow, on the speech being spoken.¹ But immediately (and) readily to be confident about questions of such moment would be the act rather of young and senseless persons.

Athen. But if, O Clinias and Lacedæmonian guest, we discuss some one point of those,² which we proposed—for after fortitude let us speak of temperance—what difference shall we find between these politics and those, which are laid down at random,³ as the things relating to war just now?³

Megil. It is nearly not easy.⁴ But it seems that the joint-feasts and gymnastic exercises have been well invented for both.⁵

Athen. It appears then, O guest, to be a difficult thing for what is incontestable⁶ on the question of politics to exist in deed as well as in word. For it seems almost that, as in the case of bodies, it is not possible to order any one regimen for any one body, because⁷ the very same thing would be seen to do

¹—¹ All the words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, either because they were wanting in his MS., or because he thought them unnecessary; and he is followed tacitly, as usual, by Taylor.

² I have translated as if the Greek were 'ἄλλ' εἰ μετὰ ταῦτα διεξιοῦμέν τι ὦν—not 'ἄλλ' εἰ τὸ μετὰ ταῦτα διεξιοῦμεν ὦν—where τὸ is at variance with the sense, and ὦν with the syntax. Ficinus, "quemadmodum," as if he found in his MS. ὥς in lieu of ὦν—

³—³ Such is the literal translation of the words ὥσπερ τὰ περὶ τὸν πόλεμον νῦν δὴ. Taylor has, "in the same manner as we have now spoken about war." Perhaps Plato wrote ὥσπερ εἰρηται περὶ—For νῦν δὴ are perpetually united to a past tense.

⁴ After Σχεδὸν οὐ ῥᾶδιον Ast would supply εἰπεῖν. But he says nothing about σχεδόν, which could hardly be thus united to οὐ ῥᾶδιον.

⁵ Ast refers ἀμφοτέρως to ἀνδρίαν and σωφροσύνην. But in that case Plato would, I think, have written ἀμφοτέρως ἀρετὰς: and so perhaps he did.

⁶ Instead of ἀναμφισβητήτως, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἀναμφισβήτητον. For his version is "tutum aliquid certumque." Ast, however, says that the adverb is put for the adjective, and refers to his note on μετρίως γίγνεται, in Rep. vi. p. 504, C.

⁷ The Greek is ἐν ᾧ οὐκ ἂν—where Ast was the first to object to ᾧ, which he says must be referred to ἐπιτήδευμα, to the detriment of the sense. But his correction δ οὐκ ἂν—I confess, I cannot understand. I have translated, as if the text were ὁδοῦντες ἂν—for the negative particle is at variance with the train of reasoning, and is properly omitted by Taylor;

an¹ injury to some of our bodies, and a benefit to others,² (so too in a state);³ since these gymnastic exercises and joint-feasts are on many other grounds now beneficial to states, but in seditions are hurtful. This do the children of the³ Milesians and Bœotians and Thurians³ make evident. And in truth this very institution, ⁴legalized of old, appears to have perverted the natural⁴ pleasures of Venus, not only in the case of men, but of beasts.⁵ And of such things a person may accuse your cities the first, and such others, as have chiefly adopted gymnastic exercises. And whether one ought to consider things of this kind in a jocose or serious manner, still we must consider that, to the male and female sex, proceeding to a participation in production, the pleasure arising from the act seems to have been imparted according to nature; but, that the copulation of males with males, or of females with females, is contrary to nature; and that the daring attempt of those who first did so, arose from the non-mastery over pleasure. We all of us indeed bring an accusation against the Cretans, as having invented the story respecting the fable of Gany-mede. (For), since their laws are believed by them to have been from Zeus, they have put together this fable against Zeus, in order that they may enjoy this pleasure, by following forsooth the example of the god. But let us bid farewell to although it is acknowledged by Ficinus, "quod aliis prodesse, aliis obesse eidem corpori non videatur," a version that plainly proves his inability to make any sense out of the Greek words before him.

¹ The MSS. read βλάπτουν τὰ ἡμῶν, which leads to βλάπτουν τι ἡμῶν, for the article could not be repeated after τὰ μὲν—

²⁻³ The words between the numerals, absolutely requisite to complete the sense, are found only in the version of Ficinus, "sic et in civitate."

³⁻⁵ On the seditions that took place at Thurii and Miletus, Boeckh and Ast refer to Diodor. Sic. xii. 11, and xiii. 104; but for those that occurred in Bœotia they do not produce any authority, observing merely that many happened there: alluding perhaps to the frequent differences between Thebes and Platæa for example, as detailed by Thucydides; for Thebes itself is stated by Plato, in Criton, § 15, to have been a well-regulated city; and consequently not exposed to seditions.

⁴⁻⁵ I have adopted Boeckh's conjectures, πάσαι δὲ νόμιμον, in lieu of παλαιὸν νόμιμον, and τὰς κατὰ φύσιν instead of καὶ κατὰ τὰς—to which last he was led by finding in Ficinus "naturales Venereorum voluptates."

⁵ This mention of beasts seems rather strange; for they have not naturally, as men have by law or custom, γυμνάσια and συσσίτια. Boeckh says that the word θηρίων is introduced hyperbolically, and refers to Legg. xii. p. 942, D. Rep. viii. p. 562, E., 563, C. But an hyperbole would be here out of place. In θηρίων lies hid, I suspect, θεῶν θ' ἡρώων τε—

the fable; but of those, who direct their attention to laws, nearly the whole consideration is with regard to pleasure and pain, in the case of states and the morals of individuals. For these two fountains are permitted to flow by nature; from which he who draws at what place and at what time and what quantity he ought, is happy; and so is a state, and an individual, and every animal: but he, (who draws) unskilfully and at an improper time, will live in a manner the contrary to that person.

[9.] Megil. This, O guest, is surely said beautifully. Nevertheless a want of speech does not lay hold of me as to what I ought to say against it. Still to me at least it seems correct that the Lacedæmonian lawgiver exhorted persons to fly from pleasures. But with respect to the Cnossian laws, this person here will, if he pleases, assist us. But those at Sparta relating to pleasures seem to me to be laid down most beautifully of all.¹ For that, by which men chiefly fall into the greatest pleasures and insulting conduct and all kinds of folly, the law casts out from the whole of our country; nor would you see in the fields or in the cities, over which there is to the Spartans a care, banquets or such things as attend upon them, and excite, according to their power, every kind of gratification. Nor is there one, who, meeting with a person revelling from intoxication, would not immediately inflict on him the greatest punishment; nor would he let the party go free, pleading as an excuse a Dionysiac festival, as I once saw was the case with your people when (riding) in carts;² and at Tarentum, amongst our colonists, I have seen the whole city intoxicated during the Dionysiac festival; but with us there is nothing of the kind.

Athen. O Lacedæmonian guest, all such things are to be praised, where there are certain endurances of pain; but, where there is a remission of the latter, the former are rather of a stupid kind. For some one, defending our institutions, would very quickly lay hold of you by showing the free manners of your

² Plato alludes to the custom of persons riding in carts to and from the places where revelry was going on during the festivals devoted to Dionysus, the god of wine, and cutting their saucy and ribald jokes on the passers-by. Ast refers to Demosth. on the Crown, p. 268; the Scholia on Aristoph. Plut. 1015; Harpocration in Πομπείας, and other authors.

women. Now in all these cases, occurring at Tarentum, and with us, and with you, one answer appears to free them, so that they are not in a bad state, but in a correct one. For every one may answer and say to a stranger, expressing wonder on his beholding what is unusual in his own country—Wonder not, O guest. This law exists amongst us; but with you perhaps there is upon the same points a different one. At present however our discourse is not, O friends, about different men, but about the vice and virtue of the lawgivers themselves. But let us speak more fully about all kind of intoxication. For it is not a thing of a trifling nature; nor to know it thoroughly is it the province of an inferior lawgiver. I am not speaking about drinking wine or not, in general, but about intoxication itself, whether it is to be adopted, as the Scythians and Persians use it, and still more the Carthaginians, and Celts, and Iberians, and Thracians, all of whom are warlike nations; or, as you use it; for you, as you say, abstain from it entirely. But the Scythians and Thracians use it entirely unmixed with water, both women and men, and pour it on their garments, and imagine they are engaged in a beautiful and blessed occupation. But the Persians make much use of other luxuries, which you reject, yet, O thou best of men, in a more orderly manner than these.

Megil. All these, however, we pursue¹ when we take arms into our hands.

Athen. Do not, thou best of men, say this. For many flights and pursuings have been, and will be, without a proof; on which account, we cannot at any time give a clear definition, but (rather) a doubtful one, about occupations honourable or not, when we speak of victory and defeat in battle; especially since the greater states, when fighting, overcome and enslave the lesser; as the Syracusans did the Locrians,² who were thought to be regulated by the best laws of all those around that district; and as the Athenians did the Cceans;³ and we could find numberless other instances of a similar kind. But let us endeavour by speaking to persuade ourselves of each pursuit taken by itself; and let us for the present put out of the account victories and defeats, and let us state how a pursuit of this kind is honourable, but of that kind not honourable. But first hear from me, how we ought to consider what is useful or not as regards those very things.

¹ Ficinus has "fundimus atque fugamus," as if his MS. read διώκομεν δὲ φύγῃ instead of διώκομεν δὲ γε—

^{2, 3} Respecting the well-regulated city of the Locrians, whose lawgiver was said to be Zaleucus, Boeckh refers to Bentley on Phalaris; and respecting the Cceans, to Heraclides Polit. § 9.

Megil. How then say you?

[10.] Athen. All those, who in talking lay hold upon any pursuit and propose to praise or blame it immediately it is enunciated, appear to me to act by no means according to reason; but to do just the same, as if, while one person is praising wheat¹ as good, another should immediately blame it, without having heard either its operation or utility, (and) in what manner, and for what, and with what² and how it has itself, and to persons how having themselves, it is useful.³ The very same thing do we seem to do now in the case of our discourses. For after merely hearing about drunkenness, some of us immediately blame,³ and others praise³ it, and very absurdly too; for making use of witnesses and those who praise, we each of us praise,⁴ and some of us think we say something decisive, because we adduce many (witnesses); but others, because we see that those, who do not make use of it (wine), are victorious when fighting. But this too has been considered doubtful by us. If then we go through in this manner each of the other laws, it will not be to me at least according to sound sense. But⁵ I am desirous of speaking in the manner, which it seems we ought, by endeavouring, if I can, about this very matter⁵ [drunkenness],⁶ to point out the right road for us in all such cases; since ten thousands upon ten thou-

² The Greek is καὶ ὅπως ἔχοντα καὶ ὅπως προσφέρειν ἔχουσι—which Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, as usual, to the letter, thus translates, "quomodo præparantes et quomodo affectis corporibus offerri debeat."

³—³ Megillus, the Lacedæmonian, had blamed, but the Athenian had praised, the use of wine.

⁴ Instead of ἐπαινοῦμεν Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. αὐτὸ ποιοῦμεν: for his version is "id facimus." Boeckh would however omit ἐπαινοῦμεν.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal translation of the Greek text. Taylor has merely, "But adducing intoxication as an instance."

⁶ The words τῆς μέθης are evidently an interpretation of αὐτοῦ τούτου.

sands of nations are in doubt upon these points, and would contend in a discourse with your two states.

Megil. If indeed we possess any correct method of inquiry touching these matters, we must not shrink from hearing it.

Athen. Let us then consider somehow in this way. Come now, should one person praise the rearing of goats, and the animal itself, as a beautiful possession, but some other person blame it, from having seen goats feeding apart from the goat-herd, in cultivated grounds,¹ and doing mischief,¹ and from seeing that every kind of cattle is either without a ruler, or under bad rulers,² should thus find fault,³ should we hold that the blame of such a person has blamed any thing whatever soundly?

Megil. How should we?

Athen. But is a commander in ships,³ who possesses merely nautical skill, useful, should he be troubled with sickness or not? or how shall we say?

Megil. ⁴By no means (useful); should he have in addition to his skill the suffering you mention.⁴

Athen. And what is the commander of armies? Is he competent to command, if he possesses the science of war, although he may be timid in danger, and be sick with ⁵the drunkenness of fear.⁵

Megil. How can he?

Athen. But what if he does not possess the art, and is timid?

Megil. You are speaking of a person, who is in every respect vile, and by no means ⁶a ruler of men, but of some very women.⁶

¹—¹ The words within the numerals are omitted by Taylor, although found in the version of Ficinus—"damnumque facere—"

²—² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, omits the words between the numerals. Perhaps Plato wrote ἰδὼν δρῶν τὰυτὸ, not ἰδὼν οὕτω, i. e. "seeing every animal doing the same thing."

³ As the same commander cannot be in two ships at the same time, one would prefer ἐν πλοῖς, "in sailings," unless it be said that πλοίοις means here "a fleet of many ships" under one commander.

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Taylor's translation is, "This passion, which you speak of, is not in any respect connected with the nautical art."

⁵—⁵ Although Ast endeavours with some learning to defend this violent expression, yet one would wish that MSS. had given ὑπὸ μέθης, ὡς τοῦ φόβου ναυτίας, i. e. "be sick with fear, as with drunkenness."

⁶—⁶ As the whole train of argument has a reference to a commander merely, and not to the persons, over whom he has the command, there is probably some error here, which it would not be difficult to correct.

Athen. But what (say you) of him, who praises or blames a community, over which is naturally a ruler, and which with him (the ruler) is useful? ¹ But he, who has never seen it in communion with a ruler over itself, but always without a ruler, or in communion with bad rulers, ² can we imagine that such inspectors of such communities ² will blame or praise any thing usefully?

Megil. ³ How can those, who have never seen or been connected with any one of such-like communities rightly constituted? ³

Athen. Attend then. Out of many communities, shall we not lay down, that fellow-drinkers and fellow-drinkings are a certain single association?

Megil. Yes, very much so.

Athen. Has any one then ever seen this existing in a proper manner? Now it is easy for you to answer, that no one has ever (seen it) at any time; for it is neither according to your country nor laws. But I have met with many, and in many places; and moreover I have diligently inquired, as I may say, about all; and I have seen or heard of scarcely one whole (community) existing correctly. And though (there are) a few and small portions, ⁴ yet the whole together, so to say, are for the most part in error.⁴

Clin. How say you, guest, this? Speak still more clearly. For we, as you say, through our inexperience in such matters, would perhaps, even when meeting with them, not immediately know what in them is right or not.

Athen. You say what is reasonable; but, while I am speaking, do you endeavour to learn. Do you then acknowledge, that, in all associations and communions of any doings whatever, it is proper every where for each to have a commander?

Clin. How not?

¹ Before $\delta \delta \epsilon \mu \acute{\eta} \theta' \epsilon \omega \rho \alpha \kappa \omega \varsigma$ there seems to be something wanting.

²⁻² The words between the numerals Taylor has omitted after Ficinus; who saw that $\tau \omicron \upsilon \delta \epsilon \varsigma \tau \omicron \iota \omicron \upsilon \theta \epsilon \tau \omicron \upsilon \varsigma \theta \epsilon \omega \rho \omicron \delta \epsilon$ could not be said of persons, who had not seen at all. Hence we must insert $\omicron \upsilon$ before $\theta \epsilon \omega \rho \omicron \delta \epsilon$, i. e. "non-inspectors." Compare $\tau \alpha \varsigma \omicron \upsilon \pi \omicron \lambda \iota \tau \epsilon \iota \alpha \varsigma$ in viii. § 3, p. 832, B.

³⁻³ Here again Taylor follows to the letter the abbreviated version of Ficinus. "Quo pacto id faciet, qui nunquam societatem recte gubernatam perspexerit?"

⁴⁻⁴ Or we may render the Greek, $\tau \alpha \pi \omicron \lambda \lambda \alpha \delta \epsilon \xi \acute{\iota} \mu \pi \alpha \nu \theta' \omega \varsigma \epsilon \iota \pi \epsilon \iota \nu$, $\delta \eta \rho \eta \tau \eta \mu \acute{\epsilon} \nu \alpha$, "the majority are entirely, so to say, in error."

Athen. But we have just now said, that the commander of persons fighting ought to be brave.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Now the brave man is less disturbed by fears than cowards are.

Clin. And this too is so.

Athen. If there were any plan of placing a general over an army, who was not at all timid, nor confused, should we not have done so by all means?

Clin. Most certainly.

Athen. But we are now speaking not of a person about to command an army amongst associations of men, the foes of foes during a war, but of friends, sharing during a peace in the kind feelings of friends.

Clin. Right.

Athen. But an association of this kind, if it is attended with drunkenness, will not be without confusion. Is it not so?

Clin. How should it be (without)? ¹Nay, I imagine quite the contrary.¹

Athen. In the first place then they have a need of a ruler.

Clin. How not, as for any thing else?

Athen. Must one then furnish a ruler, if possible, not confused?

Clin. How not?

Athen. And he ought, it seems, to be thoughtful with respect to associations. For he is the guardian of existing friendship, and has the care of it still becoming greater, through the previous association.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. It is proper, therefore, to place over the drunken a sober and wise ruler, and not the contrary. For, if the ruler of the drunken is himself drunk, young, and not wise, he must have great good luck indeed, if he does not perpetrate some mighty mischief.

Clin. Very great indeed.

Athen. Should then any one blame such associations, when existing as correctly as possible in states, while he is finding fault with the thing itself, he will perhaps properly blame it. But if a person blames a pursuit through seeing it erring as much as it can,¹ it is evident, in the first place, that he is ignorant that this existed not correctly; and, in the next place, that every thing will in this manner appear improper, when it is done apart from a sober master and ruler. Or, do you not understand, that when a pilot, and each ruler of each thing, is drunk, he will overturn every thing, whether ships, or chariots, or an army, or whatever else is ruled by him?

[11.] Clin. You have said, O guest, this at least what is altogether true. But tell me moreover² what good would it do us, should this regulation respecting drinking be correct?² just as what we lately stated, that should an army meet with a correct leading, there would be victory in war, a no small good to those who followed; and so as regards the rest. But what great advantage will accrue either to individuals or states from a drinking association being placed properly under an instructor?

Athen. What great advantage can we say would arise to a state from one boy, or one chorus,³ being properly instructed? Or shall we not say, when asked this question, that the state derives very little advantage from the education of one person? But if you inquire universally about the education of youth, how does it profit greatly the state, it is not difficult to say, that persons well educated will become good men; and becoming such will act in other respects in an honourable manner; and still further, that they will conquer their enemies in battle. Discipline therefore brings with it even victory; but victory sometimes produces a want of instruction. For many become more insolent through victory in war, and through their insolence are replete with a thousand other ills. Now discipline indeed has never at any time been Cadmeian;⁴ but there have been, and will be, many victories of this kind among men.

¹ Ficinus alone adds here, "propterea que omnem computationem vituperet," which certainly seem required to complete the chain of reasoning.

²⁻³ Here again Taylor has translated not the Greek, but the Latin of Ficinus—"quid nobis computationes istæ, si recte aguntur, conferent."

³ In the word "chorus" is an allusion to the chorus in musical and dramatical performances, on whose education both money and time was expended to a great amount at Athens.

⁴ Here is an allusion to the proverb of a "Cadmean victory," which was said of those, who, like the Theban brothers, Eteocles and Clin. You seem to say, friend, that the passing the time in common over wine, if it be done properly, tends in a great part to instruction.

Athen. How not?

Clin. Shall you after this be able to state that, what has been just now asserted, is true?

Athen. To assert positively for truth, O guest, that such is the case, while many persons are in doubt, is the province of a god; but, if it be requisite to state what seems to me, there will be no grudging; since we have rushed onwards to make for ourselves a discourse about laws and a polity.

Clin. Let us then endeavour to learn what is your opinion upon these doubtful points.

Athen. It is proper to do so; and that you for the purpose of learning, and myself for that of teaching, should endeavour by some means to lengthen out our discourse. But first of all, hear from me some such thing as this.

All the Greeks consider this city of ours as fond of talking and of many words; but that Lacedæmon and Crete practise, the former a brevity in speech,¹ but the latter, an abundance in thought rather than in words. But I am considering lest I shall give you an idea of my speaking much about a trifling matter,² while cleansing a very long speech² about drunkenness. ³But the rectification of it according to nature would not be able, without musical rectitude, to take off in discourses either clear or sufficient; and on the other hand, music would not be able without the whole of education.³ Now Polynices, the sons of Œdipus, gained a victory over each other, as destructive as a defeat.

¹ To the Spartan brevity of speech the earliest allusion is in Æsch. Suppl. 265. Other passages from more recent authors are quoted by Ast.

² Such is the literal translation of the Greek—παμμήκη λόγον ἀνακαθαίρομενος. But even if a speech could be said "to be cleansed," yet here περί μικροῦ πράγματος παμμήκη λόγον could scarcely be repeated after περί μικροῦ πολλὰ λέγειν in the sentence preceding. There is evidently an error here, which it would perhaps be not difficult to correct.

³ Such is the literal translation of the Greek text; where, since there is no syntax, neither Wytttenbach, quoted by Ast, nor Ast himself, have been able to elicit a satisfactory sense. The version of Ficinus, "Computationis autem ipsius recta secundum naturam constitutio nunquam poterit sine recta musicæ regula aperte et sufficienter oratione tractari." Unless I am greatly mistaken, Plato alluded to the well-known all this is the work of very many words. Consider then, what we are to do, if we leave these things for the present, and pass on to some other discourse about laws.

Megil. Perhaps you do not know, Athenian guest, that our (family) hearth is the public guest¹ of your city. Perhaps then into all the boys² of each of us the public guests,³ when they hear that they are the public guests of some city, a certain kind feeling enters immediately from their youth towards that city, as being a second country after their own. And this very same thing has now taken place with myself. For immediately on hearing the boys, when the Lacedæmonians were blaming or praising the Athenians for something—How your city, Megillus, say they, has done to us not well or well—on hearing this, and contending⁴ against these assertions, in your behalf, I have ever had every kind feeling towards those, who are bringing the city into blame.⁴ And now, indeed, both story of some drunken persons becoming sober, on hearing a solemn strain of music. See Iamblich. Vit. Pythag. p. 214, ed. Kiesling; Fabricius on Sext. Empiric. advers. Music vi. p. 357; and Bergk on Anacreont. Fragm. p. 188. But to arrive at the very words of the philosopher would require more alterations than can be stated here.

¹ On the word πρόξενος and the duties of the public host or guest, see Valckenaer on Ammonius, p. 201, and Herodotus vi. 57, and the commentators on Soph. El. 1443.

² As νίος, "young," was applied to a person older than παῖς, "a boy," the expression παισιν—ἐκ νέων could not have been used by Plato; who probably wrote ἐξ οὐνύχων, rendered correctly by Ficinus, "a teneris usque annis." On the phrase ἐξ οὐνύχων, or ἐξ ἀπαλῶν οὐνύχων, see Bailey on Hermesianact. 62, where Blomfield happily elicited ἐξ οὐνύχων from ἐκ συνόχων.

³ The words within the numerals, ἕκαστον ἡμῶν τῶν προξένων, found between ἐνδύεται and τῇ πόλει, are omitted by Ficinus, because he could not, nor can I, understand them. But by merely altering ἕκαστον into ἑκάστων, and placing the words after παισιν, all will be perfectly intelligible; and it will be seen, what was not before, that not all boys were meant, but only those, whose families were public guests. Ast indeed asserts that both παισιν and ἕκαστον are governed by ἐνδύεται, and refers to Lobeck on Aj. 716, ed. 1, for similar instances of two different cases thus following the same verb. But all the passages quoted there are evidently corrupt, and may be easily emended.

⁴ Here again Ficinus shows by his translation that he could make nothing out of the unintelligible Greek text. His version is, "pugnabam adversus eos, qui vos vituperabant, magna erga vos affectus benevolentia." All however will be well by reading προσάντης (vulg. πρὸς αὐτὰ) ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ᾗ (vulg. ἀεὶ) πρὸς τοὺς τὴν πόλιν εἰς ψόγον ἀγοντας, ᾗ πᾶσαν εὐνοίαν ἔσχον: i. e. "I went head-foremost in your behalf against those, who were bringing into blame the city, for which I had every kind feeling.

your voice is grateful¹ to me; and that too which is said by many, that such of the Athenians, as are good, are so pre-eminently, appears to be most truly asserted. For they alone, without necessity, by their very nature, and from a divine allotment, are truly and not feignedly good. Therefore on my account at least you may, my friend, boldly say whatever is agreeable to you.

Clin. And in truth after hearing and receiving, O guest, a word from myself, do you with confidence speak what you please. For you have perhaps heard, that Epimenides was held here a divine man, who was of our family, and ten years prior to the Persian war came to your city, according to the oracle of the god,² and performed certain sacrifices, which the god had enjoined; and he told, moreover, the Athenians, who were terrified at the expedition of the Persians, that they would not come for ten years; and that, when they did come, they would depart without having done a single thing they expected, and suffer greater evils than they inflicted. At that time our ancestors were hospitably received by yours; and hence both myself and my parents have a kind feeling towards you.

Athen. You therefore, as it seems, are prepared to hear; and I too am prepared as regards my will, but not very easy as regards my power. I must however make the attempt. In the first place then, as (preparatory) to our discourse, let us define what education is, and what power it possesses. For we say that through this must proceed the discourse taken for the present in hand by us, until it arrives at the deity.³

Clin. Let us altogether do this, since it is agreeable to you.

Athen. While then I am saying what it is proper to assert that education is, do you consider whether what is asserted is agreeable to you.

Clin. Say on.

[12.] Athen. I say then and assert⁴ that he, who is about to be a good man in any thing whatever, ought immediately

¹ With φωνῇ προσφιλεῖς may be compared φιλατον φώνημα in Soph. Phil. 234.

² To point out the god alluded to, Plato probably wrote τοῦ Πυθίου, not τοῦ θεοῦ.

³ Ficinus has "ad deum ipsum," as if he had found in his MS. πρὸς αὐτὸν τὸν θεόν.

⁴ As καὶ φήμι could hardly thus follow λέγω δὲ, there is probably some error here. Ficinus has merely "Assero equidem."

from childhood to practise, when engaged in playful and serious pursuits, the very thing suited to each particular of the object in view. Thus he, who is about to be a good farmer or house-builder, ought, the latter ¹to play at building children's houses; the former, on the other hand, at tilling the ground; ¹ and he, who brings up each of them should provide for each small instruments, the imitations of the true ones; and moreover, they should learn previously what is necessary to learn previously. For instance, a workman, to measure or use a rule; and he, who (is to be) a warrior, should in sport ride on horse-back, or do ² something else of a similar kind; and ³ (the master of the children should) ³ endeavour by sports to turn the pleasures and desires of the children thither, where, when they arrive, it is proper for them to have an end. We say then, that the very head of instruction is a right bringing up, which will lead as much as possible the soul of him, who sports, to the love of that which it will be requisite for him, when he has become a complete man, to ⁴ lay down as a part ⁴ of the virtue of the thing. See then whether, up to this point, what has been asserted does, as I said, please you.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Let not then that, which we assert instruction is, be undefined. For now, when we blame or praise the bringing up of each person, we say that one has been educated, but another uneducated; although the men have sometimes been very well educated for ⁵ retail trades, and those of ship-owners, ⁵ and for ⁶ the profits from some other things of this kind. ⁶

¹—¹ Taylor has followed to the letter the version of Ficinus, "oportet a prima ætate vel colere terram vel pueriles quasdam domos ædificare."

² Instead of ποιούντα, Boeckh correctly suggested ποιεῖν, similar to "facere" in Ficinus.

³—³ Taylor has properly inserted these words; from which I have been led to suggest, that Plato wrote perhaps καὶ περᾶσθαι δεῖν διὰ τῶν παιδιῶν τὸν παιδαγωγὸν—For δεῖν might easily have been lost through διὰ, and τὸν παιδαγωγὸν through τῶν παιδιῶν.

⁴—⁴ Instead of εἶναι τῆς—I have translated as if the words were θεῖναι τι τῆς—Ficinus has "quod in virili ætate perfecte comparata virtute operis est acturus." Ast's interpretation of the passage, I confess, I cannot understand.

⁵—⁵ The κάπηλος, "a retail-trader," is opposed to ναύκληρος, "a foreign-merchant," who was a ship-owner, in the Statesman, p. 290, A. § 29.

⁶—⁶ The Greek is ἄλλων τοιούτων μάλα πεπαιδευμένων σφόδρα ἀνθρώπων. But in the first place, there is nothing to govern the genitives

For of those, who, it seems, consider such things to be education, there would be now no account; but that (we say) is the education from childhood towards virtue, which causes a person to feel a desire of, and a love for, becoming a perfect citizen, and to know how to govern and to be governed with justice. Such a bringing up this discourse would, as it seems to me, define, and be willing to call it the only education; but that, which tends to the acquisition of wealth, or to any bodily strength, or any other cleverness, apart from intellect and justice, is a handicraft trade and illiberal, and not worthy to be called education at all. Let us not then contend with them¹ about a name; but let the assertion, which has been assented to just now, remain, that those, who are properly educated, become nearly (all of them)² good. And it is by no means meet to hold education in dishonour; since when it is present to the best men, it is the first of things the most beautiful. And if at any time a person goes astray, and it is possible for him to set himself right, this must ever be done by every one according to his ability, through (the whole of)³ life.

Clin. Right; and we agree with what you are saying.

Athen. And we formerly agreed, that those are good, who are able to govern themselves, but those bad, who are not.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Let us then resume in a still clearer way the very point we were speaking of; and do you receive me through ἄλλων τοιούτων; and in the next, μάλα and σφόδρα could not be both united to πεπαιδευμένων. To meet the first objection, Ast would read πράγματα for μάλα, and πεπαιδευμένον, found in one MS., and ἀνθρωπον from conjecture, similar to "quamvis artem cæteraque hujusmodi calleat" in Ficinus. But though Stalbaum says he has thus overcome all the difficulties of the text, yet πράγματα ἄλλων τοιούτων seems very doubtful Greek. In μάλα, I suspect, lies hid λήμματα, "profits," as I have translated. On the word λήμματα see my note on Æsch. Suppl. 357.

¹ Instead of αὐτοῖς, Ast reads αὐτοῖς, with two MSS., in the sense of ἀλλήλους, "each other."

² Ficinus has, what the sense evidently requires, "omnes ferme probi evadunt;" for σχεδόν could not stand here by itself. He adds likewise, "qui contra, improbi." But whether from his MS. or not is a matter of uncertainty.

³ From "per totam vitam," Bernard, in Act. Literar. Societ. Traject. i. p. 107, suggested διὰ παντός βίου, subsequently found in the two best MSS.

some resemblance, if perchance I am able to render clear to you a thing of this kind.

Clin. Only speak.

[13.] Athen. Do we not consider each of us ourselves¹ as one?

Clin. Yes.

Athen. But that each has in himself two counsellors, opposite and thoughtless, which we denominate pleasure and pain?

Clin. Such is the case.

Athen. And in addition to both these, there is the opinion about things to be, to which is given the common name of expectation; but individually the expectation, prior to pain, is fear; but that, which is prior to its contrary, is confidence. But in the case of all these there is a reasoning process, as to which of them is better or worse; which, when it becomes the common determination of the city, is denominated law.

Clin. I scarcely follow you. However, say on, what comes after, as if I were following you.

Megil. And the very same state of suffering is to myself likewise.

Athen. Let us then think upon these matters in this manner. Let us consider that each of us is a kind of animal, the wonder of the gods,² and put together, either as their plaything, or through some serious act; for on this point we are ignorant; but this we do know, that these passions are inherent in our nature, and that they pull us, like nerves or ropes, and being themselves contrary, draw us to contrary actions, where virtue and vice are situated apart from each other. For reason says, that each ought always to follow one of the pullings, and, never abandoning it, draw in a contrary direction by the other nerves; and that this is the ¹golden and sacred leading¹ of the reasoning power, which is called the common law of the state; but that the other (pullings) are hard, and iron-like; but that this is soft, as being golden, ²(and moreover it is uniform,) ³but that the rest are like every variety of forms. It is necessary for us then to assist always the most beautiful leading, belonging to the law. For inasmuch as the power of reasoning is beautiful and gentle, and not violent, its leading has need of assistants, in order that the golden race in us may vanquish the rest of the races. And thus the story of virtue ³relating to our being a wonder, ³will be preserved; and the expression, to be superior or inferior to oneself, will in a certain manner become more clear, as to what it means; and that both a state and a private individual ought, the latter, after receiving in himself the true reason respecting those pullings, to live conformable to it; but that a state, after receiving reason from some of the gods, ⁴or from the very person who knew these particulars, ⁴ought to lay down reason as a law, ¹—¹ In the words ἀγωγὴν χρυσήν, Ast says there is an allusion to the golden chain, mentioned by Homer, Il. O. 17, and to which Plato has referred distinctly in Theætet. p. 153, C. § 27.

¹ In lieu of αὐτῶν, Ast has adopted αὐτὸν from one MS. and Eusebius, and says that αὐτὸς ἕκαστος means "pro se quisque." The reading is received by Stalbaum, who wonders that Bekker should have left αὐτῶν. But though αὐτῶν is unintelligible, αὐτὸν is scarcely correct Greek. Perhaps Plato wrote ἀν ὅντα τιθεῖμεν—For the negative οὐκ οὖν could not be united to the subjunctive τιθεῖμεν, and the inductive οὐκοῦν would be here without meaning.

² In lieu of τῶν ζώων θεῶν, from which no sense can be elicited, I have adopted τῶν θεῶν ζώων, the conjecture of Muretus. Boeckh would read τῶν ζώων θείων, by which he understands "the living gods," referring to Plato in Timæus, p. 39, E., from which passage Taylor was led to explain "the divine animals," by the mundane or junior gods.

²—² The words within the numerals, evidently requisite for the antithesis, were found only in the version of Ficinus, “et uniformem præterea,” until a MS. subsequently collated furnished the Greek καὶ μονοειδῆ.

¹and to have an intercourse with itself and the rest of states.¹ Thus vice and virtue would be more clearly disjointed; and this taking place rather conspicuously, both education and the rest of pursuits would be perhaps more apparent, and especially that relating to the passing the time in drinking,² about which it might appear despicable to discourse any further.²

Clin. But perhaps it would appear to be not unworthy of a long discourse.

Athen. You speak well; and let us go through whatever is worthy of the present (mental) exercise.

Clin. Say on.

[14.] Athen. If to this wonder³ we bring drunkenness, what thing shall we make of him?

Clin. Looking to what do you ask this?

Athen. 'To nothing particular.'⁴ But if this (the wonder-thing) should be combined with that, (drunkenness,) what would happen to be the result? But I will endeavour to explain more clearly what I mean. For I am asking some such thing as this. Does the drinking of wine cause pleasure, and pain, and anger, and love, to be more violently on the stretch?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. Does it on the other hand cause the senses, and memory, and opinion, and prudence, to be in like manner more vehement?⁵ or do these entirely leave him, who may have become saturated with drunkenness.

¹—¹ Ficinus has what is far more intelligible than the Greek, "ad ejusque normam officia sua secum et cum aliis civitatibus instituere."

²—² So Taylor translates literally the Latin of Ficinus—"de qua longiorem habere sermonem vile fortassis putabitur." The Greek is ἡ δοξασθείη μὲν ἂν εἶναι φαῦλον περί μῆκος πολὺ λόγων περιττὸν εἰρημένον: which Stephens would correct by reading ἡ δοξασθείη μὲν ἂν εἶναι φαῦλον καὶ φαῦλον περί, but Ast by merely altering ἡ into οὐ—I should prefer εἰ δοξασθείη μὴ ἂν εἶναι φαῦλον περί του λίαν μῆκος λόγων περιττὸν εἰρημένον, i. e. "unless it be thought that there would be a superfluous length of words spoken upon a very trifling subject." For thus πολὺ, which is useless after μῆκος, might have been easily the corruption of τευλιαν. Schramm would alter ἡ into οὐ governed by περί—

³ By θαῦμα is meant "man," as shown in § 13, θαῦμα ἕκαστον ἡμῶν.

⁴—⁴ So Taylor. The Greek is Οὐδὲν πω πρὸς ὃ τι: where Stephens would read Οὐδέπω from Ficinus, "Nondum dico ad quid," adopted by Ast, but rejected by Stalb. But to the question, πρὸς τί, the answer is perpetually πρὸς ὃ, τι; by itself. Hence in οὐδὲν πω there is probably some error, which it would be not difficult to correct.

⁵—⁵ Here again Taylor has looked merely to the version of Ficinus, Clin. They leave him entirely.⁵

Athen. Does he not return then to the same point, (as regards)¹ the habit of the soul, which he had when he was a boy?

Clin. How not?

Athen. At that time then he would have the least control over himself.

Clin. The least.

Athen. Is not then such a one, we say,² the most wretched?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. Not the old man then, as it appears, is alone twice a child,³ but the man likewise who is drunk.

Clin. You speak, guest, in the best manner.

Athen. Is there any reason, which should endeavour to persuade us, that we ought to have a taste of this pursuit, and not avoid it, as far as possible, with all our might.

Clin. It appears there is; at least you just now said you was prepared to show it.

Athen. You have correctly reminded me; and I am now prepared, since you have both said that you are willing to hear me with alacrity.

Clin. How should we not hear you, if on no other account, yet for the sake of the wonderful and the absurd, if it is meet for a man at any time to voluntarily throw himself into every kind of depravity?

Athen. Are you speaking of the soul?

Clin. Yes.

Athen. But what (say we) of the deformity, the leanness, and ugliness, and imbecility of the body? should we wonder, my friend, if at any time some one should voluntarily arrive at a thing of that kind?

“an prorsus extinguat, si quis ebrietate fuerit occupatus.” Clin. Omnino certe extinguit. For his translation is—“or does it entirely extinguish these, when any one has drunk of it to intoxication.” Clin. It entirely extinguishes these.

¹ The margin of MS. Voss. supplies κατὰ, which is wanting to support the syntax of τὴν—But Ast seems to wish to read καὶ before τὴν—

² Instead of φάμεν one MS. has μὲν. I should prefer ὥς ἔφαμεν. See § 3, where it is said that the person, who is inferior to himself, is in a wretched state

³ On this saying, which seems to have been first used by Sophocles, Ast refers to a host of authors and commentators.

Clin. How not?

Athen. What then, do we think that those, who go to medical shops for the sake of drinking drugs, are ignorant that, for a short time afterwards, and for many days they will have the body in such a state, that, if they were about to endure to the end, they would not accept of life? or, do we not know that those, who go to places of exercise and labour, do for the time being become weak?

Clin. All this we know.

Athen. And that they willingly go for the sake of the subsequent benefit?

Clin. (You speak) most beautifully.¹

Athen. Is it not, then, requisite to think of the rest of pursuits in the same manner?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. In the same manner, then, we ought to think about the occupation of (drinking) wine, if it is lawful to think correctly upon this amongst those.

Clin. How not?

Athen. If it should appear to us to possess any utility, not inferior to the occupation relating to the body, it is superior at the very outset to bodily exercise, in that, the latter is (attended) with pain, but the former, not.

Clin. You speak correctly. But I should wonder, if we are able to perceive any such thing in it.

Athen. This, then, as it seems, I must now endeavour to explain to you. And tell me—Are we able to perceive two kinds of fear, nearly opposite?

Clin. Of what kinds?

Athen. Such as these. We surely are in fear when we expect that ills will arise.

Clin. Yes.

Athen. And we are often in fear of opinion, thinking we shall be considered bad characters, by doing or saying something not good; which fear, I think, both we and all others call shame.

Clin. How not?

Athen. These then are the two fears I spoke of; one of which is contrary to pain, and the rest of other fears; and contrary likewise to the most in number and the greatest in kind of pleasures.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Does not then a legislator, and every one, from whom there is derived even a little, reverence this fear with the greatest honour? and calling it shame, does he not denominate the contrary to this, boldness and shamelessness? and has he not held it to be the greatest evil to all, both in a public and private view?

Clin. You speak correctly.

Athen. This fear then preserves us in many other and great matters; and not a single thing, taken by itself, works out so greatly both victory and safety in war. For there are two things which work out victory, confidence on the part of foes,¹ and the fear of shame on the ground of cowardice² amongst friends.

Clin. It is so.

Athen. It is necessary therefore for each of us to be fearless and fearful. But on what account, either the one or the other, we have defined.

Clin. Completely so.

Athen. When we wish to render any one fearless, in combination with law, we make him such by leading him to the fear of many terrible³ things.

Clin. So we appear to do.

Athen. But what, when we endeavour to render any one fearful in combination with justice, must we not cause him to overcome those, who are arrayed with, and previously exercised in, shamelessness, by his having contended with his own lusts; and⁴ by contending with and overcoming his usual mode of ¹ Such is the literal translation of θάρρος πολεμίων. But the sense requires, what Ficinus has, "adversus hostes audacia." This would be in Greek θάρρος εἰς πολεμίους, or θάρρος κατὰ πολεμίων.

² Ast with Ficinus unites αἰσχύνης with κακῆς. But as αἰσχύνη is always taken in a bad sense, I have translated κάκης "cowardice—"

³ The Greek is φόβων—εἰς φόβων, which Taylor and Heindorf were equally unable to understand. Hence the one translated "terrible" and the other suggested φοβερῶν: while Ast once wished to read θόρυβον in lieu of φόβων: but he was subsequently satisfied with the verbiage in the text, and so too is Stalbaum.

⁴ Instead of ἢ "or," the sense requires καὶ "and."—On the change of those two words see Bast in Palæograph, p. 815.

living, he must needs become perfect in fortitude ; but whosoever is unexperienced and unexercised in contests of this kind, he will not become even the half of himself as regards virtue.¹ But how will any one be perfectly temperate, who has not fought with, and overcome by reason, and labour, and art, in sport and in earnest, many pleasures and lusts,¹ that urge him to act with shamelessness and injustice, but who is impassive with respect to all such things.

Clin. It is by no means probable that he can.

[15.] Athen. What then, is there a god, who has given any medicine for fear to man, so that by how much the more desirous is any one of drinking it, by so much the more from every draught he thinks himself unhappy, dreads every thing present and to come, and at last, although the bravest of men, proceeds to every kind of fear ; and yet, after having slept, and being released from the effect of the potion, will always become the same man again.

Clin. And what potion of this kind, shall we say, O guest, exists amongst men ?

Athen. None. Yet if such a potion had been from any quarter, it would,² be assured of that,² have been useful ;³ and we should have been able to converse with him much in such a manner as this respecting it.³ Come, (say,) thou legislator, whether you have laid down laws for the Cretans, or any other people whatever, are you in the first place willing to be able to receive a touchstone of the citizens, as regards fortitude and timidity ?

Clin. It is plain that every one would say (he was).

Athen. What, with security, and without great danger, or the contrary ?

Clin. And this too every one will acknowledge, with security.

²—² Instead of ἔσθ' ὅτι, I have translated as if the text were ἴσθ' ὅτι. Respecting this parenthetic clause, see my Poppe's Prolegomena, p. 128.

³—³ Such will doubtless seem to be a sufficiently intelligible translation of the Greek words, οἷον τὸ τοιόνδε περὶ αὐτοῦ καὶ μάλα εἶχομεν ἂν αὐτῷ διαλίγεσθαι: in which there are some errors that I can, and some that I cannot, correct satisfactorily to myself.

Athen. Would you make use (of this drinking)¹ by leading them to fears and trying them during their sufferings, so as to compel (one person)² to become fearless, by exhorting, and advising, and honouring him; but disgracing another, who would not be persuaded by you to become in all things such as you enjoin him; and would you dismiss him unscathed, who had exercised himself in a proper and manly manner, but impose a punishment upon him, who (had exercised himself) badly? or would you not use the potion at all, having no other fault to find with it?

Clin. Why should (one) not use it, O guest?

Athen. There would be, friend, an exercise contrary to those at present, and wonderful for its facility, as regards one individual and a few and as many as a person would wish. And whether any one, being alone in solitude, should place the idea of disgrace before his eyes, and thinking that he ought not to be seen,³ before he is in a good condition,³ should thus exercise himself against fear, and prepare merely a potion in preference to ten thousand other acts, he would do something proper; or whether some one trusting to himself to be properly prepared by nature and careful practice, should not hesitate in the company of many fellow-drinkers to show his power,⁴ in the necessary difference of the drinking,⁴ by being superior (to others) and being (his own) master,⁵ so as neither to stumble in one great matter through unseemliness, nor to be

² Ast understands τὸν μὲν in the first clause, to answer to τὸν δὲ in the second.

³—³ Ficinus has "antea quam fortior sit."

⁴—⁴ I willingly confess myself utterly unable to understand the words between the numerals. All the MSS. and Ficinus acknowledge διαφορῇ. In Stephens it is διαθορῇ, which Taylor translates "consumption." But διαφθεῖν πῶμα would mean, "to destroy a draught," by a mixture of ingredients. I could have understood ἐν τῇ τοῦ πώματος ἀναγκαίᾳ περιφορῇ, "in the compulsory handing round of the drink," unless it be said that διαφορῇ has the same meaning.

changed (in manner) through virtue,¹ but should² depart, before he reached the last drinking,² ³fearing the defeat which all men suffer through drinking.³

Clin. Certainly. For such a one, by thus acting, would conduct⁴ himself with temperance.

Athen. Let us thus then say again to the legislator this. Be it so, lawgiver, that neither has a god given nearly⁵ to mankind such a medicine for fear, nor have we devised one ourselves—for I say nothing of sorcerers⁶ at a banquet—but is there a potion for fearlessness and for excessive confidence, and (doing) unseasonably what is not meet? Or how say we?

Clin. There is, he will perhaps say, meaning wine.

Athen. Has this a property contrary to that which was just now spoken of? Does it make a man drinking it, to be in the first place immediately more cheerful than before; and by how much the more he tastes it, by so much the more to be filled with good hopes and an opinion of his own power; and at last is such a person filled, as if he were wise, with all freedom of speech and of behaviour and of all fearlessness, so as to say any thing whatever without hesitation, and do so likewise?

Clin. Every one, I think, will agree to this.

Megil. How not?

Athen. Let us then recollect this, that we said that two things in our souls ought to be cultivated; one, that we may

¹ With ἀπερὴν here may be compared the expression in Horace, "Narratur et prisca Catonis Sæpe mero caluisse virtus."

²⁻² Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus has, "ac juxta ultimam potionem ante ebrietatem discedat."

³⁻³ The Greek is τὴν πάντων ἡτταν φοβούμενος ἀνθρώπων τοῦ πώματος. But all men, as shown in the case of Socrates, are not overcome by liquor. Hence in lieu of ἀνθρώπων, I should prefer ἀνων (senseless) ὑπὸ—For τοῦ πώματος can hardly dispense with a preposition to govern it. Taylor's translation is, "fearing any human potion the least of all things," where he evidently confounded ἡτταν, "defeat," with ἡττον, "less."

⁴ Since all the MSS. have σωφρονοῖ, it is evident that ἀν has dropt out after γὰρ—It was found in the MS. of Ficinus; for his version is, "moderatus evadet."

⁵ I cannot understand σχεδόν thus standing by itself.

⁶ This allusion to sorcerers is made here, because they were supposed capable of curing disorders that had baffled the regular practitioners in medicine.

be as confident as possible ; the other, the very contrary, that we may be as fearful as possible ?

Clin. These, I think, you said belonged to shame.

Athen. You very properly remind me. But since it is meet to practise fortitude and fearlessness in fears,¹ let us consider whether the contrary ought to be cultivated in the case of things contrary.

Clin. It is at least probable.

Athen. In those things, which when we suffer, we are naturally remarkably confident and audacious, it will be proper, as it seems, to meditate, how we may become the least possible shameless and full of boldness, but fearful with respect to daring on each occasion to speak, or suffer, or do any thing base whatever.

Clin. It seems so.

Athen. Are not then these the things, in which we are such, (namely) anger, love, insolence, ignorance, the love of gain, cowardice,² and these too, riches, beauty, strength, and all such things as make a person, drunk with pleasure, to be mad ? Now to the making in the first place an easy and harmless experiment in all these, and afterwards to the meditating upon them, ³with the exception of the touch-stone furnished by wine and sport, what pleasure more in measure, can we mention should it exist in any degree with caution ?³ For, let us consider. Of a disposition morose and savage, from which ten thousand acts of injustice arise, ⁴is it more dangerous for a person, ¹ In lieu of τοῖς φόβοις, one would expect rather τοῖς φοβεροῖς : for thus the two adjectives φοβεροῖς and ἰσχυροῖς would answer, as they should do, to each other.

² Ast, justly objecting to δειλία, "cowardice," as being thus reckoned with the things, that render a person bold, would expunge the word entirely ; for it owes its origin, he says, to the repetition of the letters—δεια in φιλοκέρδεια.

³ Such is the literal translation of the Greek ; which I confess my inability to understand. Ast is content to give the version of Cornarius. Ficinus has "Ad horum omnium facile et innocuum periculum faciendum inducendamque exercitationem, nullam habemus voluptatem commodiorum ea, quæ in vini ludo mores examinat, si modo prudens quædam cautio adhibeatur."

⁴ Here again I have given a literal version of the Greek text, which has baffled both Boeckh and Ast ; the former of whom conceives there is something wanting, which he has attempted in part to supply ; while the latter says there will be nothing to desire, if we merely read ἀσφα- when going for the purpose of contracts, to make a trial, and so run a risk respecting them, or when present at the shows of Dionysus?⁴ or to a disposition, yielding to venery, to apply a touchstone, by intrusting to it one's own daughters, and sons, and wives,¹ and thus by running a risk in things the most dear, to see the moral condition of the soul? ²and by mentioning ten thousand things, a person would not accomplish,² by how much excels³ the contemplating in sport, and without a fixed purpose, and without a reward, bringing damage.³ ⁴And this very thing,⁴ we think, that on these points at least, neither the Cretans nor other persons would doubt of this being a reasonable experiment of each other, and of its superiority, as compared with other touchstones, (on the ground)⁵ of its slightness, and security, and despatch.

Clin. This at least is true.

Athen. This, then, will be one of the most useful things, to know the nature and habit of souls by that art, whose business it is to cure them. Now this, I think, is the business of the statesman's art. Is it not?

Clin. It is entirely so.

BOOK II.

[1.] AFTER this, it appears, that point must be considered respecting them, whether this alone has a good, namely, to λίστερον for σφαλερώτερον. What Plato really wrote, will perhaps remain for ever unknown.

² Ficinus has "permulta insuper afferre quis poterit neque verbis consequetur," which is more intelligible than the Greek.

³ Here too a literal version shows how utterly unintelligible is the Greek; which Ficinus thus translates—"cum joco simpliciter sine damno hominum mores exquirere," as if he had found in his MS. something to this effect, τὸ μετὰ παιδιᾶς ἀπλῶς ἀνευ ζημίας εἶδος ἀνείτων ἡθους θεωρεῖν: where ἀνείτων is the usual abbreviation for ἀνθρωπείων.

⁴ The words within numerals are omitted by Ficinus; for he could not understand them; nor can any one else. In the letters καὶ δὲ καὶ τοῦτο μὲν αὐτὸ lies hid, I suspect, an answer of Clinias, εἰκοι δὲ πᾶν τοῦτό μοι ἐννοοῦντι, "All this seems reasonable to me on reflection."

⁵ The genitives are here used, says Ast, as if Plato had written accusatives with κατὰ—I have translated as if ἔνεκα had dropt out before καὶ.

see how we possess our natures, or whether some greatness of advantage likewise, that deserves much care, is inherent in the proper use of wine-parties. What then do we assert? It is inherent, as our reasoning seems desirous to point out. But when, and how, let us hear by giving our attention, lest peradventure we are shackled by it.

Clin. Speak then.

Athen. I am desirous therefore of again recalling to memory what we stated a correct education to be. For its preservation, as I now conjecture, consists in this employment being properly directed.

Clin. You speak largely.

Athen. I say then, that the first puerile ¹ perception of children ¹ is pleasure and pain; and that these two ² exist in those, to whose soul vice and virtue are present for the first time. ³ But (as to) reflection and opinions true (and) firm, ³ that man is happy ⁴ to whom they are present even to old age. And that man is perfect, who possesses these and all the goods in them. Now I call the virtue, which is first present to children, education; but ⁵ should pleasure, and friendship, and pain, and hatred be correctly produced in the soul of those not yet able to understand a reason; but of those, who have understood reason, should they agree with the reason, ⁶ to have been cor-

¹—¹ The Greek is τῶν παίδων παιδικήν, where Ficinus omits τῶν παίδων. For those words are the explanation of παιδικήν.

² Ficinus, "hæc duo," as if he found in his MS. τοῦτω, not ταῦτα. But if ταῦτα is to be referred to αἰσθησις, we must read τοῦτ, with one MS.

³ The Greek is φρόνησιν δὲ καὶ ἀληθεῖς βεβαίους—where for the syntax, says Ast, we must understand κατὰ, and for the sense read ἀληθεῖς δόξας καὶ βεβαίους, similar to δόξαι καὶ πιστεῖς γίγνονται βέβαιοι καὶ ἀληθεῖς in Temp. p. 37, B.

⁴ In lieu of εὐτυχίς Ast reads εὐτυχής, from "felix est" in Ficinus; and so doubtless found Cicero in his MS. For he says, De Finib. v. 21, "Præclare enim Plato, Beatum, cui etiam in senectute contigerit, ut sapientiam verasque opinionones assequi possit;" omitting however βεβαίους.

⁵ Ast says that δὲ here means the same as γὰρ—But that it never does. The particle is omitted by Ficinus.

⁶—⁶ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, where I can discover neither syntax nor sense. Ficinus has "propter superiorem bonorum morum consuetudinem," as if, says Boeckh, he had found in his MS. τῷ ὁρθῶς εἰθίσθαι ὑπὸ τῶν προσηκόντων ἡθῶν. The whole passage is quoted by Eusebius in Præpar. Evang. xii. 18, p. 591, D., but the only variation there is of λόγων for λόγῳ before λαμβάνειν, adopted by Boeckh rectly accustomed by fitting customs.⁶ This very consent is the whole of virtue; but its proper nurture is relating to pleasures and pains, so as to hate what it ought to hate, immediately from the beginning to the end, and to love what it ought to love, ¹after having cut off this very thing by reason,¹ and calling it education, you would according to my (mind) rightly call it.

Clin. Both formerly, O guest, and likewise now it seems to have been correctly spoken by you on the subject of education.

Athen. Correctly indeed. ²For of these pleasures and pains, after having been rightly brought up by existing education,² the greater part is relaxed and corrupted by men³ during life; but the gods, pitying the naturally laborious race of man, have ordained for it, as remissions from labour, the returns⁴ of feast-days in honour of the gods, and have given the Muses, and Apollo, the leader of the Muses, and Dionysus, as fellow-feasters, in order that they may correct⁵ the nurture that has taken place in the feasts with the gods.⁵ It and Ast, and shortly afterwards of αὐτῇ ἔσθ' ἢ—for αὐτῆς θ' ἢ—similar to “hæc ipsa consensio” in Ficinus.

¹—¹ The words ἀποτεμὼν τῷ λόγῳ I confess I cannot understand: nor could Ast; who prefers τοῦ λόγου, what Ficinus, he says, seems to have read; for his version is “si per se ipsam seorsim ratione consideratam.”

³ In lieu of τοῖς ἀνοίς, where the article is unnecessary, I would suggest τοῖς ἀνοίς “the senseless.” On the perpetual confusion of ἀνοίς and ἀνοίς see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 106.

⁵—⁵ Here again a literal translation best shows the difficulties of the is meet then to see whether the account is hymned by us truly according to nature, or how? For it says that the whole, so to speak, of youth is unable to keep quiet in its body and voice, but is ever seeking to be moved and to speak, at one time leaping and skipping, as if dancing with joy and full of fun, at another uttering all kinds of sounds; and that the rest of animals have no perception of either order or disorder in their movements, to which¹ is given the name of ²rhythm and harmony²; but that the gods, whom we have said were given to us as fellow-choristers, have given to us the perception likewise of what is in rhythm and in harmony in combination with pleasure, by which they excite us and lead the dance, uniting us with each other by means of songs and dances, and given the name³ of dance from the inherent name of pleasure.³ [2.] Shall we then in the first place receive this? Shall we lay down that the first education was through the Muses and Apollo? or how?

Clin. Thus.

Athen. He therefore, who is uneducated, will be with us one, who has not joined a choir; but him, who has been educated, we must lay down as one, who has sufficiently engaged in a choir.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. But a choir, as a whole, is dancing and singing.

Clin. It is necessarily so.

Athen. He then, who is properly educated, would be able to sing and dance well.

text, ἵν' ἐπανορθῶνται τὰς τροφὰς γενομένας ἐν ταῖς ἐορταῖς μετὰ θεῶν: where it is evident that ἐπανορθοῦσθαι could not be applied to τροφὰς γενομένας—μετὰ θεῶν, but to some deviation from or corruption of the rites. Opportunely then do all the MSS. read τὰς τε τροφὰς: from which we may easily elicit τὰς ἀποστροφὰς, and still more easily μετ' ἀθίῶν from μετὰ θεῶν; and thus ἀθίῶν here, and ἀνοσίων restored just above, beautifully harmonize with each other.

¹ Instead of οἷς, which Poppo might have quoted on Thucyd. iii. 97, in support of διώξεις τε καὶ ὑπαγωγὰι, ἐν οἷς—Boeckh suggested, and Ast has adopted, αἷς—

²⁻² Rhythm, says Ast, is applied to the motion of the body; harmony, to the modulation of the voice.

³⁻³ Like all plays upon words, this would be unintelligible to a reader, who did not know that in Greek χορὸς is a dance, and χαρὰ, joy. The etymology is adopted in Etymol. M. Χορὸς, οἶμαι, παρὰ τὸ χαίρειν. There is however an error in ὄνομα, which Bekker should have rejected from conjecture, rather than τὸ after παρὰ from the original reading in one MS.

Clin. It seems so.

Athen. Let us see then what has been now asserted.

Clin. What is that?

Athen. (A person), we have said, sings well and dances well. Whether shall we add that he does so, if he sings what is beautiful and dances what is beautiful, or not?

Clin. Let us add it.

Athen. What then, should a person consider things beautiful, as beautiful, and things base, as base, and use them as such, will such a one be better educated for us, with respect to dancing and music, who¹ may be sufficiently able to minister to the body and voice what is considered beautiful, but yet does not rejoice in things beautiful, nor hate such as are void of beauty? Or he, who, though he is not altogether able to act² or think rightly, with respect to his voice and body, yet acts rightly with respect to pleasure and pain, embracing such things as are beautiful, and feeling a disgust at such as are not beautiful?

Clin. You are speaking, guest, of a great difference of education.

Athen. If, then, we three know what is beautiful in singing and dancing, we likewise know correctly the person educated or not educated: but, if we are ignorant of this, we shall not be able to know if there is, and where, a guard of education. Is it not this?

Clin. It is thus.

Athen. We must then in the next place, like dogs on the track, seek out what is beautiful in form, and melody, and singing, and dancing. But if these shall escape us and get away, our discourse about proper education, whether Grecian or Barbarian, will hereafter be in vain.

Clin. Truly so.

Athen. Be it so. What forms then, or melody, is it proper to call the beautiful? Shall we say that the form and the voice of a brave and a timid soul, held fast by¹ the same and equal labours, are similar?

¹ Ast has rejected, with the approbation of Stalbaum, η before $\delta\epsilon$ $\alpha\upsilon$ —For of the two parties, opposed to each other, the second is not alluded to till shortly afterwards.

² This is Taylor's translation of $\kappa\alpha\tau\omicron\phi\theta\epsilon\upsilon\iota\nu$: and Ast too says that $\kappa\alpha\tau\omicron\phi\theta\epsilon\upsilon\iota\nu$ means "recte facere." But it does so, only when it is followed by its object, which is wanting here. Hence I suspect that Plato wrote $\kappa\alpha\tau'$ $\delta\phi\theta\delta\omicron\nu$ $\alpha\nu\acute{\upsilon}\sigma\epsilon\iota\nu$, similar to the version of Ficinus, "ut decet assequi," and similarly $\kappa\alpha\tau'$ $\delta\phi\theta\delta\omicron\nu$ for $\kappa\alpha\tau\omicron\phi\theta\epsilon\iota$ in the next sentence.

Clin. How (similar),² since neither are their colours?³

Athen. Well (said), my friend. But in music there are both forms and melody,⁴ since music is conversant with rhythm and harmony;⁵ so that it is possible for a person, making use of a resemblance, as the chorus-teachers do, to speak correctly of a melody or form as being in good rhythm or in good harmony, but not as being of a good colour. Now of a timid, and of a brave man, there is a certain form or melody; and (one) has the power to call those properties of brave men, beautiful, but of timid, ugly. And that there may not be to us a great prolixity respecting these matters, let all the beautiful forms and melodies connected with the soul or body be all abstractedly the property of virtue, either of itself or of some image of it; but of vice on the other hand, all that is of a contrary kind.

Clin. ⁶You correctly make a call upon me;⁶ and let it be decided, for the present, that such is the state of the case.

Athen. But (let us consider)⁷ still further this; whether all of us are similarly delighted with all dancing, or it wants much of such being the case?

Clin. It wants it entirely.

Athen. What then shall we say is that, which has caused us to err? Is it because the same things are not beautiful to ¹ In lieu of ἐρχομένης Stephens suggested ἔχουμένης, what Ast has adopted, and refers to Heindorf on Gorg. § 163, for examples of ἔχουμαι, thus united to ἐν πόνοις, and ἐν ξυμφοραῖς. The participle is omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

² Ficinus inserts "similes" to fill up the ellipse.

³ Although φωνή, σχῆμα, and χρῶμα are similarly united in Cratyl. p. 423, D., yet here χρῶμα is said by Boeckh and Ast to mean not only "colour," as applied to "bodies," but to modulations in music likewise, according to Suidas in Χρῶμα—λέγεται τι κατὰ μουσικὴν χρῶμα.

⁴ Boeckh would insert here χρῶματα δ' οὐκ ἔνεστι. But Ast observes, that the same idea is expressed in the subsequent words, εὐχρων δὲ μέλος ἢ σχῆμα οὐκ ἔστιν—

⁵ The words which follow in the Greek, οὗσης τῆς μουσικῆς, Ficinus omits here, but seems to have found them after ὥστε εὐρυθμον μὲν καὶ εὐάρμοστον: for his version is, "quare boni rhythmī harmoniæque figuram et cantum licet dicere."

⁶—⁸ Ficinus, and after him Taylor, omit προκαλεῖ.

⁷ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has inserted "animadvertamus." But the verb is omitted elsewhere in this formula, as remarked by Ast.

all of us? Or that some are, but do not appear to be the same? For surely no one will say that the choric movements of vice are more beautiful than those of virtue; or that he is delighted himself with the forms of depravity, but others with music, the contrary to this. And yet the majority assert, that the correctness of music consists in the power which imparts pleasure to the soul. But this is not to be endured, nor is it holy to speak so at all. But this more probably causes us to err.

Clin. What?

[3.] Athen. Since the things relating to choric movements are the imitations of manners, that take place in all kinds of actions, and ¹fortunes, and morals, and imitations, each going through.¹ For those then, to whom is suited what is said, or sung, or danced, according to nature or custom, or both, it is necessary to rejoice in and praise those acts, and to call them beautiful; but for those, to whom they are contrary to nature, or manners, or custom, it is possible neither to rejoice in nor praise them, but to call them base. And they, to whom the things of nature happen to be right, but the things of custom the contrary, or the things of custom right, but the things of nature the contrary, ²address their praises contrary to pleasures.² For they say that each of these is pleasant, but wrong; and in the presence of others, whom they consider to be intellectual, they are ashamed for such movements to take

by the MSS. that read μῦμασι or μῦμασι, ^{μα} one may suggest that Plato wrote καὶ γὰρ μῦμασι δείξει τούτων ἕκαστ' ἦν, “for it is possible to exhibit each of these things by imitations.”

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek, ταῖς ἡδοναῖς τοὺς ἐπαινοὺς ἐναντίους προσαγορεύουσιν. Ficinus has, “Laudes voluptatibus contrarias proferunt,” as if he had found in his MS. προφέρουσι. Taylor's translation is, “will denominate things contrary to pleasures laudable.”

place in their body, and ashamed to sing, ¹as if making a display with seriousness¹ of things beautiful; but by themselves they are delighted with them.²

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Does something then bring any injury to him, who is delighted with the forms or melodies of depravity? or an advantage on the other hand to those, who are pleased with the contraries to these?

Clin. It is probable.

Athen. Is it probable, or is it necessary also, for the same thing to take place, as when any one, associating with the depraved habits of depraved men, does not hate, but rejoices in and admits them; and yet blames his own depravity in the way of fun, as if he were in a dream. Surely at that time it is necessary for the party rejoicing to be assimilated to the things in which he rejoices, even though he is ashamed to praise them. And yet what greater good, or evil, can we say, would of every necessity happen to us than a thing of this kind?

Clin. I think, none.

Athen. But where laws are beautifully established, or will be at some future period of time, can we think that the instruction touching the Muses and amusement, will be in the power of poets, so that, whatever delights a poet in composition, or what is connected with rhythm, or melody, or verse, he can, by teaching it to the children of the well-regulated, and to young men formed into choirs, work out whatever may happen with respect to virtue and depravity?

Clin. This has no particle of reason; for how could it?

Athen. But, now it is in their power to do so in all states, so to say, except in Egypt.

Clin. But how say you that a thing of this kind has been established by law³ in Egypt?

Athen. It is wonderful even to hear. For, as it seems, this doctrine, of which we are now speaking, has been known of old amongst them, that young men in cities should be accustomed to occupy themselves with beautiful forms and beautiful melodies. And after regulating these, as to what they are, and of what kind they may be, they exhibit them in their temples; and except these it is not lawful either for painters or others, who work out forms, and whatever else there may be, to introduce any novelty, or even to think of any other than those of the country; nor is it lawful at present to do this, either in these particulars or in the whole of music; and you will, by observing, discover, that what have been painted and sculptured there ten thousand years ago,—¹ and I say ten thousand, not as a word, but a fact,—¹ are neither more beautiful, nor more ugly, than those turned out of hand at the present day, but are worked off according to the same art.

² Ficinus, "secum iis omnibus delectantur."

³ All the MSS. but one, by reading νενομοθετησθαι, confirm the conjecture of Stephens, founded on "sancitum esse," in Ficinus, in lieu of νομοθετῆσθαι.

Clin. You say what is wonderful.

Athen. It is, however, a matter relating pre-eminently to law and politics. But you would find other things there of a trifling kind. But this respecting music is true, and worthy of consideration, that it was possible for ²a law-giver upon these points to lay down² firmly and with confidence melodies, possessing correctness naturally. But this would be the work of a deity, or of some divine person; as they say there, that the melodies, which have been preserved for such a length of time, are the production of Isis. So that, as I said, if any one is able to understand their correctness ever so little, he ought with confidence to reduce them to law and order. Since the search after pleasure and pain does, through³ the seeking perpetually to make use of new music, possess ⁴scarcely no great⁴ power towards corrupting the consecrated dancing, by finding fault with its antiquity. The dancing there at

¹—¹ Such is the real meaning of the words οὐχ ὥς ἐπος εἰπεῖν μυριοστὸν ἀλλ' ὄντως. Ficinus has, “quasi non adeo vetera sint, ut ita dicam.”

²—² I have translated as if the Greek were νομοθέτην θέσθαι, not νομοθετεῖσθαι: for θαρροῦντα can be said only of a person.

³ To preserve the syntax, we must suppose that ἐνεκα has dropt out between ζητεῖν and ἀεὶ; or, since six MSS. read που for τοῦ before καὶ νῦν, that ἀπὸ has been lost before τοῦ— least it does not seem to have been able to corrupt, but the contrary has been entirely the case.

Clin. It appears from what has been just now stated, that it would be so.

[4.] Athen. Shall we not then confidently assert that there is in music and sport together with dancing a correct use in some such manner as this? We are glad, when we think we are doing well; and, when we are glad, think on the other hand we are doing well? Is it not so?

Clin. It is so.

Athen. And at such a time in our gladness we are unable to keep quiet.

Clin. It is so.

Athen. Are not then the young amongst us ready to dance? and do not we their elders think we conduct ourselves properly in looking upon them, while we take a delight in their sports and revelry, since elasticity fails us ¹at our time of life,¹ which regretting ²and loving³ we thus establish games for those, who are able in the highest degree to carry us by the aid of memory to our youth.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. Do we then think that the majority give really in vain the account now told of those who celebrate festivals, that it is meet to consider him the wisest, and to decide that he is the victor, who causes us to be delighted and to rejoice in the greatest degree? For since we are permitted to play at this period, it is surely meet, for him, who causes the most in number to be glad in the highest degree, to be honoured the most; and, as I just now said, ³to bear off the prize of victory.³ Is not this rightly said? and would it not be (rightly) done, if it took place in this way?

Clin. Perhaps so.

Athen. But, O blessed man, let us not hastily decide upon a matter of this kind; but, dividing it into parts, let us consider it in some such manner as this. If any one should at any time simply establish a certain game—but without defining

¹—¹ Instead of παρ' ἡμῖν, which can hardly be united to ἐκλείπει, the sense seems to require πρὶν ἡμῖν ὄν, "which was formerly to us."

²—² The words καὶ ἀσπαζόμενοι are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

³—³ Instead of the words within the numerals, Ficinus has "victorem esse dicamus," translated literally by Taylor.

whether it is gymnastic, or musical, or equestrian—and, collecting together all those in the city, should make a proclamation, after laying down the prizes of victory, for any one who wished to come and enter the contest for pleasure alone, and that he, who should delight the spectators the most, without receiving any order as to the manner (of contending),¹ and be victorious in effecting this very thing in the greatest degree possible, and should be adjudged to be the most agreeable of all the competitors,¹ what do we think would result from this proclamation?

Clin. Of what are you speaking?

Athen. It is surely likely that one would exhibit, like Homer, a rhapsody, another guitar-playing;² one a tragedy, and some again a comedy. Nor would it be wonderful, if some one, by exhibiting things of wonder, should think that he is especially the victor. Now when these and other competitors without number come together, can we say which of them would justly be the victor?

Clin. You ask an absurd question. For who can answer you on this point,³ as if he were cognizant of it,³ before⁴ hearing and being himself a hearer⁴ of each of the champions?

Athen. What then, are you willing for me to reply to this absurd question?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Now if very little children were to decide, they would decide that he who had exhibited the things of wonder,⁵ (was the victor over the others).⁵ Is it not so?

¹⁻¹ To avoid the difficulties arising from νικήσῃ thus placed before κριθῇ, to say nothing of the apodosis wanting after δς δ' ἂν τέρψῃ, Ast proposes, with the approbation of Stalbaum, to transpose the sentences thus, καὶ κριθῇ τῶν ἀγωνισαμένων ἡδιστος γεγονέναι, αὐτὸ τοῦτο ὅτι μάλιστα ἀπεργασάμενος νικήσειν, so that νικήσειν may depend upon προεῖποι. The transposition was suggested by Ficinus, who has "qui spectatores maxime delectabit, judicatusque fuerit id optime omnium effecisse," but omits νικήσῃ entirely.

² By this was probably meant song-singing, accompanied with the "cithera," corrupted into the modern "guitar."

³⁻³ The word between the numerals is omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁴⁻⁴ Others may, but I will never, believe that Plato wrote πρὶν ἀκοῦσαι τε καὶ—αὐτήκοος αὐτὸς γενέσθαι: for he might have written more elegantly πρὶν γε καὶ ἀσμάτων πάντων καὶ ἀθλητῶν ἐκάστων—"before he is himself a hearer of all the songs, and of each of the champions."

⁵⁻⁵ Ficinus alone has "vicisse alios," what the sense requires, in

Clin. How not?

Athen. But if greater boys (were to decide, they would decide in favour of the party exhibiting) comedies; but the women, who are better educated, and the young men, and perhaps nearly the whole multitude, (would decide in favour of the party exhibiting) a tragedy.

Clin. Perhaps so.

Athen. But perhaps we old men would hear with the greatest delight the rhapsodist, when stringing together in a beautiful manner the Iliad and Odyssey, or some of the works of Hesiod, and say that he was very far the victor. Who then would be rightly the victor? This (must be stated¹) after these.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. It is evident that it is necessary for me and you to say that those are properly the victors, who are judged so by persons of our age; ²for habit seems to us to be by far the best of things at present which are in all states and every where.²

Clin. How not?

[5.] Athen. I grant then thus much to the many, that music ought to be judged of by pleasure, yet not by that of any person one meets with,—but that that is nearly the most beautiful music, which delights the best of men, and such as are sufficiently educated; but especially, that which delights one person, who excels in virtue and education. On this account we say that the judges of these things stand in need of virtue; because they ought to be partakers of the rest of prudence and fortitude. For a true judge ought not to learn how to judge from a theatre,³ being stupefied by the clamours of the Greek, τοὺς ἄλλους νενικηέναι, which words, forming probably one line consisting of twenty-one letters, have dropt out after κρινούσι from all the copies, made from the Codex Archetypus, except the one that fell into the hands of Ficinus.

¹ Boeckh has adopted and confirmed the supplement of λικτίον proposed by Heindorf, and added ἀν εἶη—For Ficinus has “quis ergo jure victor sit, declarandum nonne restat?”

²⁻³ Such is the literal version of Bekker's text, τὸ γὰρ ἔθος ἡμῶν τῶν νῦν δὴ πάμπαν δοκεῖ τῶν—Ficinus has “usus enim rerum, quem ab ætate habemus, omnium quidem civium magnum quiddam ubique est et optimum”—which certainly makes an excellent sense; but it is not to be got out of the Greek. Perhaps Plato wrote τὸ γὰρ ἔθος ἐνεῖμ' ἡμῶν τὸν νοῦν, ὃ δὲ πάλαι πολὺ δοκεῖ—“for habit has imparted to us intellect, which thing of old appears to be much the best.”

³ In lieu of θαρίπον, a MS. of Eusebius in Præp. Ev. xii. 23, p. 597, multitude, and by his own ignorance; nor on the other hand, while knowing (something),² ought he through unmanliness and cowardice to give from the same mouth, with which when about to judge, he called upon the gods,³ a decision containing a falsehood,³ with an easy disposition. For a judge does not sit as the disciple, but, as is just, the teacher rather of the spectators, and as about to oppose himself to those, who do not afford pleasure fitly and properly to the spectators. For by the old law of Greece, it was permitted (to⁴ do), what the law of Sicily and Italy (permits)⁴ at present; (which⁵) by leaving to the mass of spectators to decide, by the holding up of hands, upon the victor, has corrupted the poets themselves; for they write according to the depraved pleasure of their judges;⁶ so that the spectators instruct themselves;⁶ and it has corrupted likewise the pleasures of the theatre. For while it is meet that the spectators should, by always hearing of manners better than their own, have a superior pleasure, it happens now that they do quite the contrary. What then do the matters discussed in the present discourse intend to point out? Consider whether it is this.

Clin. What?

Athen. The reasoning appears to me, after making a third or fourth revolution, to come to the same point—that education is the drawing and leading of youth to that, which is called by the law right reason, and which has been decreed by the most reasonable and oldest men through their experiand one of Plato, have alone preserved θεάτρον. On the uproar made in the theatre see Legg. ix. 14, p. 876, B.

¹ Instead of αὐ Ficinus has “fortitudinis autem,” adopted by Taylor.

² I have translated as if τι had dropt out after γινώσκοντα.

³ Here too Taylor has followed, what he found in Ficinus, “iniquum judicium.”

⁴ To preserve the syntax I have translated as if, instead of δὴ, the Greek were δρᾶν, and ἐπ had dropt out before ὁ—

ence to be really correct. In order then that the soul of a youth may be accustomed not to feel joy or sorrow in things contrary to the law, and to those that are recommended¹ by law, but follow in joy and in sorrow after the same things as those which an old man does, for the sake of this, the compositions which we call odes, and which are truly incantations for the soul, are (said)² to have been produced, having been carefully adapted to that kind of symphony, of which we are speaking; but on account of the soul of children not being able to bear a serious pursuit, sports and (other)³ odes (are said)⁴ to be played on the pipe and executed.⁴ Just as in the case of persons who are sick and have their bodies in a weak state, they, who have the care of them, endeavour to bring useful food in pleasant meats and drinks; but that, which is annoying,⁵ in such as are bitter, in order that they may receive kindly the one, and be accustomed to reject rightly the other. ⁶In the same way a correct lawgiver will by words fairly spoken and to be praised, persuade, or, not persuading, compel, the poet to represent correctly the attributes of men, temperate, and brave, and good in every way, by composing his forms in rhythm, and his melodies in harmony.⁶

Clin. Do persons, by Zeus, seem to you, O guest, to act thus at present in other states? For, as far as I hear, what you are now speaking of I do not know to be done except by us and the Lacedæmonians; but there are certain novelties ever taking place in dancing, and all the rest of music, and changes not through law, but some inordinate pleasures, which are very

² As γεγονέναι has nothing to govern it, some, says Boeckh, have thought that λέγονται has dropt out, which it might easily have done from its similarity to γεγονέναι, and that it is to be understood before καλεῖσθαι καὶ πράττεσθαι shortly afterwards.

³ In lieu of ΚΑΙ ΟΙΔΑΙ, the sense requires ΚΑΙ ΑΛΛΑΙ ΟΙΔΑΙ.

⁴ The Greek is καλεῖσθαι καὶ πράττεσθαι. But as πράττεσθαι is to be referred to παιδία, so ψῆδαι requires its own verb. Hence I have elicited καὶ ἀυλείσθαι from καλεῖσθαι.

⁵ I have adopted Boeckh's correction, τὴν δὲ τὴν πονηρὰν, in lieu of τὴν δὲ τῶν πονηρῶν, for the genitive is without syntax or sense.

⁶ All between the numerals Ficinus places after οἷσπερ ὁ γέρων, omitting there τούτων ἔνεκα. This variation was corrected by Grynæus, whom Taylor has followed.

far from being the same, and in the same manner, as you have said occur in Egypt, ¹but never belong to the same.¹

Athen. Most excellent, O Clinias! But if I have appeared to you, as you say, to speak of these things as existing at present, I should not wonder, if I have done this through my not clearly stating my meaning. But as to what I mean as taking place with respect to music, perhaps I have spoken of it in such a way ²as to seem to you to speak of it.³ For to abuse things which are incurable, and far advanced in error, is by no means agreeable, although it is necessary sometimes. But since the same things appear good to you likewise, come, tell me, do such kind of things exist amongst you and these here, more than amongst the other Greeks?

Clin. How not?

Athen. But if they thus existed amongst others likewise, should we say that they would thus be better than they now are?

Clin. By far better, if they subsisted, as they do amongst these here and with us, and as you just now said they ought to subsist.

[6.] Athen. ³Come then, (say,) should we agree³ for the present, are the things mentioned by you in every kind of education and music these? Do you compel poets to assert that a good man, if he is temperate and just, is fortunate and happy, and if he is a big man and strong, and if little and weak, and if rich or not? and that, although he is richer than ⁴both Cinyras and Midas,⁴ but unjust, he is miserable, and lives in sorrow, and, as the poet says,⁵ if he says rightly, "I would not mention nor place in account as a man" him, who does not perform all that is called beautiful with justice, and possess it likewise. For

¹ Ficinus has "sed variae semper fiunt," translated by Taylor, "but continually vary."

² In lieu of these unmeaning words, Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "ea tibi, quae fiant, dicere visus sum." Hence Taylor translates "I appeared to you to speak as if they actually existed."

³ The Greek is φέρε δὴ—But as MS. Leid. reads φέρε νῦν, I have adopted Boeckh's suggestion, Φέρε δὴ ἰδὺν, which is the perpetual form in Plato, as shown by Boeckh.

⁴ Cinyras and Midas, the kings respectively of Cyprus and Assyria, passed into a proverb for persons of great wealth.

⁵ The poet alluded to is Tyrtæus, whose verses are Οὐτ' ἂν μνησαίμην, οὐτ' ἐν λόγῳ ἄνδρα τιθείμην—Πλουτοίη δὲ Μίδεω καὶ Κινύραο πλείον.

being such a one¹ he² will stand near and grapple with the foe;² but he, who is unjust, will³ neither dare to look upon gory slaughter, nor will he vanquish in running the Thracian Boreas,³ nor will there ever be to him any other of the things called good. For what are called good by the many, are not rightly called so. For it is said that health is the best thing; beauty the next; strength the third; and riches the fourth; and numberless other things are called good. Thus, to see and hear acutely, and to possess with a clear perception all that is connected with the senses; and further, to do like a tyrant whatever you wish; and, what is said to be the completion of all happiness, to become, after possessing all these, as quickly as possible, immortal. But you and I surely say that all these are the best possessions for just and holy men; but for the unjust, all the worst, beginning from health. (For to be well),⁴ to see, hear, and possess the (other) senses, and, in short, to live, is the greatest evil, when a man is immortal⁵ [through the whole of time],⁵ and possesses all that is called good, except justice and all virtue; but it is a less evil, should such a person survive for the shortest time. In this manner, I think, you will persuade, and, as I said,⁶ compel the poets with you to speak; and moreover, that persons who follow them should, by giving out rhythms and harmonies, thus educate your young men? ⁷Is it not so? Look, then.⁷ For I clearly assert, that the things that are called evil, are good to the unjust, but to the just, are evil; but that things good are to the good truly good, but evil to the wicked. In what then, I asked, do you and I agree, or how?

Clin. We appear (to agree) in some things, but not in others.

¹ Ficinus has, "Is igitur justitia exornatus," translated by Taylor, "Such a one being just—"

²⁻³ The verse of Tyrtaeus is Καὶ δῶν δρέγοιρ' ἐγγύθεν ἰστάμενος.

³⁻⁵ The verses of Tyrtaeus are—Εἰ μὴ τετλαίη μὲν ὁρῶν φόνον αἵματόεντα, and Νικῶν δὲ θείων Θρηϊκίον Βορέην.

⁴ Ficinus alone has "sanum namque esse," adopted by Taylor.

⁵⁻⁵ The words within brackets, τὸν ξύμπαντα χρόνον, are properly omitted by Ficinus, as being superfluous after ἀθάνατον.

⁶ The Greek is ἅπερ ἐγώ—but as there is an allusion to what was said in § 5, Plato probably wrote ἅπερ λέγω: and for the same reason Stephens altered ποιήσετε into πείσετε, confirmed by Eusebius, and "invitabitis" in Ficinus.

⁷⁻⁷ As ἡ γὰρ always end a speech in Plato, it is evident that he wrote here ἡ γὰρ; ΚΑ. ἡν γὰρ. ΑΟ. ὁρᾶρ' οὖν ἐγὼ γὰρ—

[7.] Athen. Is it then in the case of a person possessing health, and wealth, and despotic power completely, and, I add further, superior strength and bravery, together with immortality, and to whom there is none else of the things called evil, but who has only injustice and insolence in his own person, that I do not perhaps persuade you that the person so living is not only not fortunate, but that he is clearly wretched?

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. Be it so. What then ought we to say after this? For if he is brave, and strong, and beautiful, and rich, and does through the whole of life whatever he wishes, does it not necessarily appear to you, that if he is unjust and insolent, he will live in a shameful manner?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. What then, and wickedly too?

Clin. This (does) not (seem) equally.

Athen. What then, (would he not do so) unpleasantly, and not conducing to his own interest?

Clin. How can we admit this too?

Athen. How? If, as it seems,¹ some god, my friends, should grant us to agree, as we now nearly dissent from each other. For these things appear to me as necessary, as it is not even² for Crete, friend Clinias, to be clearly an island. And if I were a legislator, I would endeavour to compel both the poets and all persons in the state to speak in this manner; and I would impose nearly the greatest of punishments, should any one in the land assert that there are certain wicked men, who lead a pleasant life; or that some things are more advantageous and lucrative, but others more just. And I would persuade my citizens to assert many other things, contrary to what are now advanced, it seems, by the Cretans and Lacedæmonians, and, differing from the rest of mankind. For come, by Zeus and Apollo, (say) ye best of men, if we asked the very gods, who laid down laws for us, whether the most just is the most pleasant life, or whether there are some two lives, of which one is the most pleasant, and the other the most just? and if they should say there are two, we should perhaps ask them again, if we in-

¹ The words ὡς εἴκεν, in which I can find no sense, are omitted by Ficinus.

² I cannot understand οὐδέ, nor could Ficinus, who has omitted it. Perhaps Plato wrote, οἶδ' εἰ, "I well know—" quired properly,—Whom ought we to call the most happy, those, who lead the most just life, or those, who lead the most pleasant one? Now, should they say those, who lead the most pleasant life, their answer would be absurd. But I am desirous that an expression of this kind should not be said of the gods, but of fathers and lawgivers rather. Let then the question previously put be asked of a father and a lawgiver, and let him say that he, who lives the most pleasant life, is the most happy. After this, I would say thus—Have you not, father, wished me to live most happily? And yet you have never ceased exhorting me to live most justly. He, then, who lays down¹ in this manner, whether he is a legislator or a father, would, I think, appear absurd, and unable to speak consistently with himself. But if he should, on the other hand, proclaim that the most just life is the most happy, every one, perchance, who hears him, would, I think, inquire—What is it, which the law praises in that life as good and beautiful, and better than pleasure? For what good, separate from pleasure, can there be to a just man? Come, (tell me,) —Is renown and praise from both men and gods a thing good and beautiful, but at the same time unpleasant? and infamy the contrary? ² We shall say—By no means, O thou dear lawgiver. But neither to do any one an injury, nor to be injured by any one, is it unpleasant, but at the same time good and ³ beautiful? And are the other things pleasant, but shameful and base?²

Clin. How can they be?

[8.] Athen. The reason, then, which does not separate the pleasant and the just, and the good and the beautiful, is persuasive, if towards nothing else, yet at least towards the wish to live a holy and a just life; so that the language of the lawgiver will be most disgraceful and opposed (to itself) should

¹ Ficinus has “una concedit—” He therefore did not, I think, find in his MS. τιθέμενος but συμφάμενος—

²⁻³ All the words between the numerals are considered spurious by Ast. And a portion of them, ἡκιστα, ὃ φίλε νομοθέτα, φήσομεν· ἀλλὰ τὸ μήτε τινα ἀδικεῖν μήτε ὑπὸ τινος ἀδικεῖσθαι, is indeed wanting in the MS. from which Aldus printed. But as one cannot account for their introduction, I suspect that Plato wrote, ΚΑ. ἡκιστα, ὡς θέλοι ὁ νομοθέτης εἶναι, φήσομεν. “By no means, we will say, as the lawgiver would wish (to say).” ΑΘ. ἀλλὰ τὸ μήτε—Compare viii. § 1, p. 829, A.

³ Boeckh suggests and well supports καὶ, from “atque” in Ficinus.

one deny that these things are so. For no one will voluntarily wish to be persuaded to do that, on which joy does not follow more than sorrow. But that which is seen from a distance produces upon all, so to say, and especially upon boys, a haziness. But the lawgiver, by dispersing the mist, will establish for us an opinion the contrary to this; and he will persuade the citizens, somehow or other, by customs, and praises, and arguments, that things just and unjust are both painted with shadow-lines; ¹ that things unjust, appearing contrariwise to that of the just, being viewed by the unjust and depraved man himself, pleasant; but things just, most unpleasant; but by the just man, all the contrary to every one as regards both.¹

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. But which shall we say is the more decisive truth of judgment? is it that of the worse soul, or the better?

Clin. Necessarily the better.

Athen. It is necessary then that an unjust life should not only be more base and depraved, but, in truth, more unpleasant than a just and holy life.

Clin. It appears nearly so, my friends, according to the present reasoning.

Athen. Would then a legislator, from whom there is even a little benefit, although the fact were not so, as the reasoning has detected it to be, ² dare, if there were any thing else, to tell an untruth to young persons for their good? ³ knowing that he

²⁻² Ficinus has, what is far more intelligible, "non alienum tamen sua gravitate putaret ad juventutis utilitatem falso aliquid, si modo quid unquam aliud falso dicendum sit, dicere."

³⁻³ The Greek is ἔστιν ὅτι τοῦτου ψεύδος—ἡψεύσατο, which I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus; whose version is "maxime cum nullum mendacium hac falsitate utilius excogitare possit." Hence I have translated as if the Greek were ἐπιστάμενος ὅτι τοῦτου οὐ ψεύδος— never would have told³ a falsehood more advantageous than this, and ¹more able to cause them to do all just things,¹ not by force, but willingly.

Clin. Truth is indeed, O guest, a beautiful thing, and stable. It does not however appear an easy thing to persuade.²

Athen. Be it so. And yet that fabulous tale of the Sidonian, although improbable, has been easy to persuade, and numberless others (likewise).

Clin. What fable?

Athen. That, teeth having been sown at one time, armed men were produced from them. Now this is a great example to a lawgiver, that he will persuade the souls of young men to whatever ³a person may attempt to persuade;³ so that he ought by considering to find out nothing else, than by persuading to what he may work out the greatest good to a state; and for this to discover every contrivance, after what manner the whole of such fellow-dwellers may speak as much as possible one and the same thing on these points, continually through the whole of life, in odes, and fables, and rational discourses. (So I think).⁴ But if it appears to you to be otherwise than in this way, there will be no grudging about contesting these points in our discourse.

Clin. It does not appear to me that either of us can contest them.

Athen. ⁵It shall then be my business to speak after this.⁵ For I assert, that it is necessary for the choirs, being three, to bring all together⁶ an enchantment upon the still young and

^{1—1} Ficinus has “quod videlicet ita trahere audientes valeat, ut non vised sponte justitiam velint suscipere.” Perhaps he found in his MS. ἐκόντας ἔλκειν ἀκούοντας, to which if we add πάντας, preserved by Eusebius, and insert ὥστε ποιῆν between πάντας and πάντα τὰ δίκαια, we shall probably recover the very words of Plato, that made up one line of the Codex Archetypus.

² After πεῖθειν the object is evidently wanting, and something to connect this remark with the allusion to the fable of Cadmus.

^{3—3} Ficinus correctly omits τις πεῖθειν after ἐπιχειρῶν. His version, adopted by Taylor, is “quodcunque velit, persuadere.”

⁴ The words within the lunes are found only in the version of Ficinus, “Equidem ita sentio.”

^{5—5} Ficinus has “Prosequar igitur,” translated by Taylor, “I will therefore continue my discourse.”

⁶ Although ἄπαντας might perhaps stand, yet Plato wrote, I suspect, ἐκόντας, similar to ὁ χορὸς—εἰσίοι, shortly afterwards.

tender souls of boys, and to say all the other beautiful things we have discussed, and shall still discuss. And let this be the sum of them. By saying that the same life has been pronounced by the gods to be the most pleasant, and the best, we shall, at the same time, speak with the greatest truth, and more persuade those, whom we ought to persuade, than if we assert any thing else.

Clin. We must agree to what you say.

Athen. In the first place then, the boy-choir of the Muses would most correctly enter the first, about to sing in public subjects of this kind, with all earnestness, and for the whole city. And let the second be the choir (of men) up to thirty years old calling upon the god Pæan, as a witness in behalf of the truth of what is said, and praying him to be, together with Persuasion, propitious to the youth. And it is necessary for the third to sing, consisting of those who are above thirty, and up to sixty years old; but those after that period—for they are no longer able to endure singing—are left as the tellers of stories relating to the same habits through a divine oracle.¹

Clin. Who do you mean, guest, by these third² choirs? for I do not clearly understand what you mean to say about them.

Athen. And yet these are nearly the parties, for whose sake most of the above assertions were made.

Clin. We do not yet understand. But endeavour to speak still more clearly.

[9.] Athen. We said, if we remember, at the beginning of our discourse, that the nature of all young persons was fiery, and unable to keep quiet either in body or voice, but that it was always speaking without order, and leaping; and that of the rest of animals not one had a sense of order in both of these things, but that the nature of man alone possessed it; and that rhythm was the name given to the order of motion, but to that of the voice, when the acute and the grave are mingled together, the name of harmony was addressed ;¹ and that both together are called a choir. We said too that the gods in pity have given us Apollo and the Muses as our associates in, and leaders of, the choir ; and we mentioned, if we recollect, Dionysus as the third.

² Instead of τρίτους one would expect τρεῖς, as before τρεῖς ὄντας τοὺς χοροὺς. The words τοὺς τριτοὺς, written in MSS. τοὺς ᾗ, are evidently an explanation.

Clin. How do we not remember ?

Athen. Now the choir of Apollo and the Muses have been mentioned ; and it is necessary for the third and remaining choir of Bacchus to be spoken of.

Clin. How so ? Say on. For to a person hearing on a sudden a choir of old men in honour of Dionysus it would seem very absurd, if persons, who have been born above thirty and fifty and up to sixty years old, were to join in the dance for that god.

Athen. You speak most truly. But I think there is need of a reason on these points, to show how this, taking place thus, may take place rationally.

Clin. How not ?

Athen. Are then the previous points agreed upon ?

Clin. Respecting what ?

Athen. That every man and boy, freeman and slave, female and male, and the whole city itself, should never cease singing for the whole city what we have gone through,² yet changed perpetually in some manner, and exhibiting altogether a variety, so that there may be to the singers no satiety of hymns and pleasure.³

Clin. How should it be not agreed that this ought to be done ?

Athen. Where then will the best part of the city, and which by its age together with intellect is the most persuasive of those in the state, effect the greatest good by singing the most beautiful subjects ? or shall we thus thoughtlessly omit that, which would be the chief object of songs, the most beautiful and the most useful ?

¹ The Greek is ἀρμονία ὄνομα προσαγορεύουτο. But the two last words are manifestly superfluous after the preceding ὄνομα εἶη, and are properly omitted by Ficinus. Ast too feels some difficulty in ὄνομα προσαγορεύεται, joined to a dative without the preposition ἐπὶ.

²⁻³ With this literal translation of the Greek original may be compared the looser version of Ficinus, "quotidie—variis modis et carminibus decantare, ut ex innumerabili hymnorum varietate inexplibili quodammodo voluptate concinentes afficiantur," where "quotidie" seems to be introduced as the translation of ἀμῶς γέπως—

Clin. But it is impossible to omit it, as¹ has been just now said.

Athen. How then would it be proper (to do)² this? Consider, if it is in this way.

Clin. In what way?

Athen. Every one on becoming rather old, is full of hesitation with respect to songs, and is less delighted³ in doing this; and when a necessity arises,³ is the more ashamed by how much the older and more modest he is. Is it not so?

Clin. It is so.

Athen. He will therefore be still more ashamed to stand up and sing in the theatre, and amongst persons of all kinds; and this too, if like the choirs that, contending for victory, are compelled, after practising their voices, to sing lean and fasting, such persons should, by singing altogether in a manner unpleasant to themselves and with feelings of shame, perform without readiness their part.

Clin. You speak of what is most necessary (to happen).

Athen. How then shall we soothe them into being ready for singing? Shall we not lay down a law, in the first place, that boys shall not taste wine at all, until they are eighteen years old? (thus) teaching them, that it is not proper⁴ to bring by a funnel fire to fire,⁴ into the body and soul, before they attempt to proceed to labours, (and) exercising a caution about the mad-like habit of young persons; but afterwards to taste indeed wine in moderation, until they are thirty years old; but that a young man is by all means to keep himself from intoxication and much wine; but on reaching forty years, to indulge freely in convivial meetings, and to call upon the other gods, and especially to invite Dionysus to the mystic rites and sports of old men,⁵ in which he kindly⁵ bestowed wine

² Ficinus has “Quomodo—decenter id fiet,” as if he had found in his MS. δρᾶν between τοῦτο and δρᾶτε.

³—³ The Greek is πράττων τοῦτο καὶ ἀνάγκης γενομένης. But Plato evidently wrote καὶ πράττειν τοῦτο ἀνάγκης γενομένης—

⁴—⁴ On this proverbial expression see the notes of Boeckh and Ast.

upon man as a remedy against the austerity of old age, so that through this we might grow young again, and that, by a forgetfulness¹ of heart-sinking, the habit of the soul might become from a harder state more soft, just as iron becomes, when it is placed in the fire, and moulded thus more readily. In the first place then, will not each person, who is thus affected, be willing with more readiness (and) with less shame, not indeed amongst many, but a moderate number, nor amongst strangers, but familiar friends, to sing, and, as we have often said, to join in a song?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. To lead them then to join with us in singing, this method will not be altogether unseemly.

Clin. By no means.

[10.] Athen. But what voice, and what music, will these men pour forth?² Or is it not evident that it must needs be some one becoming to them?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Now what will be becoming to divine men? Will it not be that of choirs?

Clin. We indeed, O guest, and these here,³ would not be able to sing any other song, than what we have learnt in the choirs, and have been accustomed to sing.

Athen. And reasonably so. For you have not in reality hit upon the most beautiful singing. For you have the polity of an army, but not of those dwelling in cities; and you keep your young men collected together in pastures, like colts, and feeding in herds. And not one of you has taken to himself his own offspring, and ⁴dragging from his fellow-feeders⁴ one that is very wild and very unmanageable,⁵ placed over him a groom, ⁶or privately⁶ educates him by rubbing him down and

¹ Instead of δυσθυμίας λήθην the sense requires δυσθυμίας λήθη—

² In lieu of ᾄδουσιν, Porson, on Eurip. Suppl. 932, reads ἤσουσιν, (for the fut. of ᾄδω is ᾄσομαι,) which Stalbaum says is probably correct.

³ From this expression it would seem that more persons were present than the speakers in the dialogue.

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him tacitly by Taylor.

⁵ In ἀγανακτοῦντα, which would be properly applied to a colt, that frets, while it is being broken in, evidently lies hid, ἀγαν ἀτακτοῦντα, as I have translated.

⁶—⁶ I have translated as if the Greek were ἡ ἰδίᾳ παιδεύει, not ἰδίᾳ καὶ παιδεύει.

rendering him gentle, and giving all that is suited to the bringing up of a boy; from whence he would become not only a good soldier, but able to administer a state and cities, and one who, as we said at the beginning, would be more warlike than the soldiers of Tyrtaeus, and would honour always and every where the possession of fortitude, as being the fourth, and not the first part of virtue, for the benefit of individuals and the whole state.

Clin. I do not know, guest, why you are thus again holding cheap our lawgivers.

Athen. I do so, if (so I do), by not giving my good man, my mind to that point.¹ But by what road the discourse may carry us, by that, if you are willing, we will go. For if we possess music more beautiful than that of the choirs and in the public theatres, let us endeavour to impart it to such as we said were ashamed of that music, and to seek that, which is the most beautiful, to share with them.²

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. In the first place, then, it is meet for this to be present to all things, which a certain agreeableness follows, that there be either this (the agreeableness) itself alone an object of the most serious attention,³ or a certain rectitude, or, in the third place, utility. For instance, I say, that agreeableness follows food and drink, and every kind of aliment, and this agreeableness we should call pleasure; ⁴but if it contributes to health, we denominate it rectitude and utility.⁴

Clin. Entirely so.

¹ Ficinus has "si quidem facio," from whence Stephens wished to insert ὁρῶ after εἶπερ— But both Boeckh here, and Heindorf on Parmenid. p. 138, D., have learnedly supported the ellipse. They have not, however, remarked, that, as ἀλλ' always precedes εἶπερ, we must read so here.

² In lieu of ταύτης, which I cannot understand, I have translated as if the word were τούτοις. Ficinus has "et aliam quærere meliorem."

³ Ficinus renders αὐτοῦ τὸ σπουδαιότατον by "in his alliciat sitque præcipuum."

⁴ Such is Taylor's translation of the version of Ficinus, "rectitudinem vero et utilitatem, si confert ad sanitatem." The Greek is ἣν δὲ ὀρθότητά τε καὶ ὠφέλειαν, ὅπερ ὕγιον τῶν προσφερομένων λέγομεν ἐκάστοτε, τοῦτο αὐτὸ εἶναι ἐν αὐτοῖς καὶ ὀρθότατον: which I confess I cannot understand, nor, I suspect, could Ast; for he is content to give the Latin of Cornarius, which, he says, expresses the general sense—Rectitudo vero et utilitas sita est in salubritate eorum, quæ exhibentur, et hæc est in ipsis id, quod rectissimum est.

Athen. ¹ And that learning too does an agreeableness follow, (namely,) the pleasure, but that it is the truth which perfects the rectitude and utility, and the well and the beautifully.¹

Clin. It is so.

Athen. ² But what, in the working out of things similar, should such arts as are productive of resemblances effect this, namely, for pleasure to result from them, would it not be most just to call it, should it by following be produced, an agreeableness?²

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. But the equality rather ³ of the so great, and of the such kind,³ would, to speak universally, effect the rectitude of such things.

Clin. Right.

Athen. Hence that alone can be rightly judged of by pleasure, which works out and affords neither a certain utility, or truth, or similitude; nor, on the other hand, a hurt; but which subsists for the sake of that very thing alone, (namely,) agreeableness, which follows the other things, and which a person may most beautifully denominate pleasure, when none of those follow it.

Clin. Are you speaking of innoxious pleasure alone?

Athen. Yes; and I say that this very same (agreeableness) is sport, when it does neither an injury or a benefit worthy of serious consideration or mention.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. Shall we not then assert, from what has been now said, that all imitations, and moreover all equality, ought to be judged of the least by pleasure and false opinion? For equality ⁴ would not be equality, or symmetry symmetry⁴

¹ Here again I must leave for others to ascertain the meaning of this literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus has "Sic et in discendo gratia inest, quæ voluptas nominatur; rectitudo etiam et utilitas et bonus habitus atque pulcher, quæ ab ipsa veritate efficiuntur."

² Whether I have succeeded in making the meaning of Plato intelligible, I know not; but the translation, I do know, is as close to the Greek as it can be; which cannot be said of the version of Ficinus—Quid porro in artibus, quibus similia effinguntur, nonne id ipsum inspicimus? Voluptas profecto ex illis quandoque provenit, quam par est gratiam nominare."

³ Ast remarks that by "the so great," and "the such kind," are meant, what is now called abstractedly, "quantity" and "quality."

⁴ Ficinus has "æquale ipsum æquale est aut commensurabile ipsum wholly,¹ although it appears so to some one, or some one is [not]² delighted with it; but they are so from truth, the most of all things, ³but from any thing else the least.³

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Do we not therefore say, that all music is productive of resemblances and is imitative?

Clin. How not?

Athen. When therefore any one asserts that music is to be judged of by pleasure, we must receive such an assertion the least of all, and seek in the least degree such music, as a serious thing, if, perchance, it exists any where; but that music (rather) which possesses a resemblance to the imitation of the beautiful.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. By those then, who are inquiring after the most beautiful singing and music, there ought, as it seems, to be sought not that which is pleasant, but that which is right. For the rectitude of imitation, as we said, was then, when the thing imitated is exhibited, as great and such as it is.

Clin. How not?

Athen. And surely every one will allow this with respect to music, that all its poetry is an imitation and resemblance. And this will not all poets and auditors and players allow?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. It is meet then, as it seems, for a person to know in the case of each poem, what it is, if he is about not to err in that point. For he who does not know its being, what it means, and of what it is the resemblance, will scarcely⁴ understand the rectitude or erroneousness of its intention.

Clin. Scarcely indeed; how not?

Athen. But would he, who does not know, ever be able to decide upon what is well or ill (done)? But I am not speaking very clearly; and perhaps it will be thus said more clearly.

Clin. How?

etiam commensurable;" as if he had found in his MS. αὐτὸ τὸ γε ἴσον οὐδ' αὐτὸ τὸ σύμμετρον.

² Instead of μὴ, omitted by Ficinus, and at variance with the train of thought, Boeckh would read καί—

³— The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor. Ficinus has "sed nullo alio quam virtute sola."

⁴ Literally, "at leisure." On this use of σχολῆ see at the Sophist, § 39.

[11.] Athen. There are surely numberless resemblances, as regards the sight.

Clin. Yes.

Athen. What then, if any one in these cases does not know what each of the imitated bodies is, would he ever know whether it is worked out correctly? I speak of some such thing as this, for instance, whether it has the joints¹ of the body, and the positions of each of the parts of the body, and how many are (the joints), and of what kind, when placed near to what kind, have (the parts) received their fitting arrangement, and moreover their colours and shapes; or whether all these are worked out in a confused manner. Do you think that any one can at all know these particulars, who does not know what is the animal imitated?

Clin. How should he?

Athen. But what, if any one knows that the thing painted, or modelled is a man, and that it has received all its parts, colours, and shapes from art, is it not necessary for a person knowing these facts, to know readily that too, whether it is beautiful, or whether it is in any respect wanting in beauty?

Clin. We should all of us, so to say, O guest, have known the beautiful points in animals.²

Athen. You speak with perfect propriety. Is it not then necessary for a person who is about to be an intelligent judge, to possess these three things, as regards every representation both in painting and music and every where?³ In the first place, to know what the thing is; then that it is⁴ rightly; and then thirdly, that whatever it be of representations, it is worked out well in words and melodies and rhythms?⁴

¹ In lieu of ἀριθμοὺς Heindorf suggested ῥυθμοὺς; but Boeckh understands by ἀριθμοὺς "the numbers and proportions," while Ast explains it by "the measures." Since, however, Ficinus has "articulos," he found, no doubt, in his MS. ἀρθμοὺς, what Plato probably wrote.

² By ζῶων Ast understands here, as in Politic. p. 277, C. § 19, a painted animal.

³ Ficinus has "sive quomocunque aliter fiat," as if his MS. had καὶ ὁποῦν ἄλλῃ, instead of πάντῃ.

⁴—⁴ Since ὁρθῶς and εὖ are synonymous, one of those words is evidently wrong. Taylor translates, "that it possesses rectitude." Plato wrote, I suspect, ἐπειτα ὡς ὁρθή ἐστι τῶν εἰκόνων ἡτισοῦν· ἐπειθ' ὡς, τὸ τρίτον, εὖ εἰργασται πᾶν χρωμασί τε καὶ μέλει καὶ τοῖς ἀρθμοῖς, where colours would refer to painting, melodies to music, and joinings, similar to the "callida junctura" in Horace, to writings and other arts.

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. Let us then be not faint-hearted in speaking of music in what point it is difficult. For since it has been bruited beyond the other representations, it requires of all representations the greatest caution. For a person erring in this, will be injured in the greatest degree by receiving kindly¹ depraved manners; and it is most difficult to perceive them, through poets being inferior to the Muses themselves. For these would never err so much as, in composing² the words of men, to give the figure³ and melody of women; and on the other hand in putting together the melody and gestures of freemen, to fit them for the rhythms³ of slaves and the not free; or, in taking as a subject the rhythms and gestures of a freeman, to assign a melody or words contrary to the rhythms. Moreover, they would never place together the voices of beasts and men, and instruments, and every kind of noise, as imitating one certain thing. But human poets, interweaving things of this kind very much, and mixing them together irrationally,⁴ would produce a laugh amongst men, such, as Orpheus says, "have obtained by lot the season of delight."⁵ For the poets perceive⁶ all these things mingled together; and moreover they tear away rhythm and figures⁷ apart from melody, put-

¹ Since φιλοφρονεῖσθαι is not elsewhere said of things, there is probably a word wanting here. Ficinus has "sub ejus suavitate malos imbibat mores."

²⁻³ The Greek is ῥήματα ἀνδρῶν ποιήσασαι τὸ σχῆμα γυναικῶν καὶ μέλος ἀποδοῦναι. But as Ficinus has "colorem mulierum," answering to χρῶμα in all the MSS. but the one used by Aldus, Plato wrote, perhaps, τὰ ἀνδρῶν ποιήσασαι τὸ ῥῆμα καὶ χρῶμα—"the language, and colour, and melody." For ῥήμασι—σχῆμα—μέλη are found in ii. § 5, unless it be said that ῥήματα is a corruption of δράματα.

³ Instead of ῥυθμοῦς, the syntax and sense require ῥυθμοῖς.

⁴⁻⁵ Ficinus has "hujusmodi multa perturbate et sine ratione commiscent," as if he had found in his MS. πολλὰ τὰ τοιαῦτα, with ἐμπλήκοντες omitted.

⁶ I cannot understand ὀρῶσι, nor could De Grou, who suggested δρῶσι—Plato wrote, I suspect, not γὰρ ὀρῶσι, but παρορῶσι, "overlook—"

⁷ Twining, on Aristotle's Poetics, n. 5, proposes to read ῥήματα, μέλους χωρὶς, "words, apart from melody;" and observes, that by λόγοι ψιλοὶ are meant "words without melody," not, as elsewhere, "words in prose."

ting naked words into measures, and, on the other hand, melody and rhythm without words, and employing the playing the harp and the hautboy nakedly;¹ from which it is very difficult to know what rhythm and harmony mean without words, and to which of the imitations,² worthy of mention, they are similar. But it is necessary to understand that every thing of this kind is full of rusticity,³ as much as it loves swiftness and not stumbling,³ and the voice of wild beasts, so as to make use of playing on the hautboy and the harp, except for dancing and singing. But to use either of those instruments unaccompanied with words, would be wholly a non-musical education, and a wonder-exciting act. In this way such assertions have a reason. And we are considering not only that persons of thirty years old, and those even beyond fifty, ought to make use of the Muses, but in what they ought. This then, for such reasons, does the discourse seem to me to point out to us respecting the music of choirs, that those who are fifty years old, and for whom it is suited to sing, ought to be better instructed (than the others).⁴ For they must necessarily possess a proper sensation and knowledge of rhythms and harmonies. Or how shall any one know the rectitude of melodies, and for what the Doric⁵ harmony is proper or improper, and of rhythm, which the poet has united to it, whether it is right, or not?

Clin. It is evident he cannot by any means.

Athen. But the numerous common people are ridiculous in thinking that they sufficiently know what is well harmonized, and in proper rhythm, and what is not so; such (at least) as have been compelled to sing and walk in rhythm. But as they do each of these things ignorantly, they do not reason upon them. Now every melody, when it has what is fitting, is in a proper state; but (when it has) what is not fitting, it is in an erring one.

¹ i. e. "without any words."

² Ast suggests, in lieu of τῶν μιμημάτων, "imitations," τῶν μιμητῶν, "things imitated."

³—³ Such is the literal version of the nonsensical Greek, ὁπόσον τάχους τε καὶ ἀπραισίας, where Ast would read ἀπνευστίας, or προήσεως, or ἀπαυστίας, all of which are to myself at least equally unintelligible, and so is Orelli's ἀποράσεως. What Plato wrote might perhaps be recovered by a bold conjectural critic.

⁴ Ficinus supplies here "cæteris—"

⁵ On the Doric harmony see Rep. iii. § 10.

Clin. Most necessarily so.

Athen. What then, will the person, not knowing what it possesses, know, as we have said,¹ how it is in a proper state in any way and at any time?

Clin. What plan is there (for so doing)?

[12.] Athen. This then, as it appears, we have now again discovered, that those singers, whom we are now calling upon, and, after a fashion, compel to sing voluntarily, ought from necessity to be disciplined thus far, as to be able each of them to follow the progressions of the rhythms, and the chords of the melodies, in order that, by perceiving the harmonies and the rhythms, they may be able to choose such as are fit to be sung by persons of such an age, and of such a kind, and who may sing thus, and by singing may themselves be immediately innocently delighted, and become the leaders to an adoption of good manners, suited to younger persons; and being educated to this point, they would take into their hands a share of that more accurate discipline, which has reference to the multitude, and is conversant about poets themselves. For, it is by no means necessary for a composer to know the third point, whether the imitation is beautiful or not. But it is nearly necessary (to know) that which relates to harmony and rhythm; but for those (the elders) to know all the three, for the sake of choosing the most beautiful, and the second, or else never to become a sufficient enchanter of young persons towards the acquisition of virtue. And thus, what our discourse intended at the beginning, namely to exhibit a well-spoken support in favour of the choir of Bacchus, it has spoken to the best of our power. But let us consider whether this has taken place in this manner. For such an assembly does of necessity ever happen to become tumultuous through the drinking going forward to a higher point, as we supposed at the beginning of our discourse it would necessarily do, ²as regards those of the present time.³

Clin. It is necessary it should.

¹ Instead of ὅτι περ, Bekker suggests ὅπερ, which he got from "ut" in Ficinus. He should have suggested ὃ τὸ πρὶν—

²⁻³ This I cannot understand, nor could Ast, who has adopted λεγομένων, found in Eusebius, in lieu of γιγνομένων. Perhaps in περὶ τῶν νῦν γιγνομένων lies hid περὶ τῶν οἶνον γανυμένων, "as regards those delighted with wine." On the confusion of γιγνόμενος and γανόμενος, see at i. § 15.

Athen. And every one becoming lighter than himself is elevated and joyous, and is filled with a freedom of speech, and with the not-listening at such a time to his neighbour, but considers himself sufficient to have a command over himself and the rest.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. Did we not say, that, when this takes place, the souls of the drinkers, becoming warmed, are rendered, like iron, more soft and juvenile? so that they are easily led by a person able and knowing how to instruct and mould them, as when they were young, and that this moulder is the same as he, who was then said to be a good lawgiver, from whom there ought to be laws for convivial drinking, competent (to restrain)¹ the person who had become full of confidence and bold and more impudent than is proper, and unwilling to endure a regulation, and the turn for silence and talking and drinking and music; (and so to instruct him,)² that he is willing to do every thing the contrary to those acts; and (laws) also competent to send, together with justice, a fear the most honourable, which is to fight against a confidence not honourable, whilst it is advancing; which divine fear we have denominated modesty and shame.

Clin. It is so.

Athen. [And we said] that there are guardians and fellow-fabricators of these laws, the cool and sober leaders of those not sober; without whom it is more difficult to fight against drunkenness than against enemies without cool leaders; and that the person³ unable to be willing³ to obey these and the leaders of Dionysus, upwards of sixty years old, suffers an equal or even⁴ a greater disgrace than the person, who disobeys the leaders of Mars.

¹ ² Ficinus alone has preserved some words requisite for the sense, "cohibere, atque ita instruere ut," in Greek κωλύειν παιδεύειν θ' ὥστε—which may have been lost between ὑπομένειν and ἰθίλειν, where they made up one line of the Codex Archetypus, consisting of twenty-one letters. See at § 4, p. 52, n. ⁵, and § 8, p. 61, n. ¹.

³ ³ The Greek is μη δυνάμενον ἰθίλειν παῖθασθαι. But as the will is that feeling of the mind over which there is no control, Ficinus has omitted δυνάμενον in his version, "si quis autem neque obtemperare velit," and so after him has Taylor. Perhaps Plato wrote μη δυνάμενον ἢ ἰθίλοντα, "not able or willing—"

⁴ Ficinus has "aequale vel etiam majus," in Greek ἴσην ἢ καὶ μείζω, not ἴσην καὶ μείζω—

Clin. Right.

Athen. If then there were such drunkenness and such sport, such fellow-drinkers, by being benefited and friends more than before, would not be separated from each other, nor enemies as at present; but having formed their whole association according to law, they would follow, whenever the sober should ¹ come and lead ¹ the not sober.

Clin. Certainly; if the (sport) were such as you now speak of.

[13.] Athen. Let us then not blame that part² of the gift of Bacchus simply, that it is an evil, and not worthy to be received into a state. For one might go on and say much more still, since³ it is the greatest blessing which he gives. ⁴There is a fear of speaking before the many, through men improperly taking it up, and knowing it when spoken.⁴

Clin. What is that good?

Athen. A certain tale and rumour is somehow floating secretly, that this god had the intellect of his mind⁵ scattered by his step-mother Juno;⁶ on which account he did, to avenge himself, introduce the Bacehic rites, and the whole of the mad choir; from whence he gave for this purpose likewise wine. But things of this kind I leave for those to say, who think they can assert them with safety respecting the gods. But thus much I know, that every animal is not born with

¹—¹ The Greek is ὅποτε ἀφίκοντο in six MSS. Ficinus has “ducentibus sobriis,” from whence Stephens elicited ἀφηγείντο, but Ast more correctly, ὑφηγείντο— I have translated as if Plato had written ἀφίκοντο καὶ ὑφηγείντο—

² I cannot understand what is meant by ἑκείνῳ γε— There is an error here, which I could, if needful, correct very easily.

³ Before “since,” says Ast, must be supplied “let us pass it by in silence.” But such an ellipse would be inadmissible here, where the speaker, after confessing his fear of mentioning something before the multitude, actually proceeds to lay open his mind. Here again I could easily restore what the author wrote.

⁴—⁴ The Greek is λέγειν μὲν— But μὲν could not thus stand by itself without οὖν, even admitting, with Ast, that it could without its corresponding δέ. Moreover, the subsequent τὸ ποῖον requires not αὐτὸ, but τοῦτο.

⁵ As the expression, τῆς ψυχῆς τὴν γνῶμην is not, I believe, to be found elsewhere in Greek, I should prefer τὴν ῥώμην, similar to “strength of mind” in English. On the confusion of γνῶμη and ῥώμη see my note on Prom. 535.

⁶ The earliest allusion to the madness of Dionysus is in Eurip. Cycl. 3.

such and so much intelligence as is suited to it, when perfectly grown; but that, during the time in which it has not yet obtained its proper intelligence, every animal is mad, and cries out in no order; and ¹when any one slays it rapidly, it again leaps without order.¹ But let us recollect that we said these were the principles of the musical and gymnastic arts.

Clin. We recollect it. How not?

Athen. And did we not say too, that this principle imparted to us men the sense of rhythm and harmony, and that Apollo, the Muses, and Dionysus were the causes of gods?¹

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. And wine too, it seems, the account of the others says, was given as a punishment for men, in order that we might become mad. But what has been now stated by us shows, on the contrary, that it was given as a medicine, for the sake of the soul acquiring shame, and the body health and strength.

Clin. You have brought, very beautifully, O guest, the story to our recollection.

Athen. And now let the half of the subject respecting the choir be held to be gone through. Shall we go through the (other) half, how it seems to be, or omit it?

Clin. What parts are you speaking of; and how do you divide each of them?

Athen. The whole of the choir was with us the whole of education. But of this one part consists in rhythms and harmonies according to the voice.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. But the other, according to the movement of the ¹—¹ Such is Taylor's translation of the then common text, ἄνθρωπος ἀποκτείνῃ αὐτὸ τάχιστα, ἀράκτως πηδᾷ, and this is his note on the passage: "viz. in another life; for the soul carries with it into another the habits and manners which it possessed in the present life." Since his day, the reading in all the MSS. is, ἀκραίνῳσι αὐτὸ, similar to which Ficinus has, "et fastu elatum lasciviensque salit." Schneider suggested ἀπακταίνῃ or ἀπακτάνῃ. Ast prefers ἀκραίνῃ τις, αὐτὸ τάχιστα—πηδᾷ, for he saw that αὐτὸ would make nonsense here. Winckelmann would read ἀποκναίσῃ αὐτὸ, "weary itself down." But of an animal that had wearied itself, Plato would not have said that it ἀράκτως πηδᾷ. What the author really wrote still remains to be discovered.

² Instead of θεῶν αἰτίους, found in all the MSS., Ficinus has "duces ad hæc," from whence Stephens elicited τούτων, adopted by Ast. From the two we might make τούτων τῶν ἰθῶν, "of these customs."

body, had a rhythm in common with the movement of the voice, but a figure peculiar to itself; but there (in the former part) melody is the movement of the voice.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. The things then pertaining to the voice, (and extending) as far as the soul, for the discipline of virtue, we have, I know not after what manner, denominated music.

Clin. They were rightly called so.

Athen. But the things pertaining to the body, which we called a dancing of those in sport, if such a movement should extend as far as the virtue of the body, we denominated the artistic leading of it to a thing of this kind, the gymnastic art.

Clin. Most rightly.

Athen. ¹Let then that portion of the musical art, which we have just now said we have gone through, as the half of dancing, and has been brought to an end, be held to have been spoken of.¹ But of the other half shall we speak? Or, in what manner and by what road must we proceed?

Clin. O thou most excellent man, who art conversing with Cretans and Lacedæmonians, (say,) since we have gone through the subject relating to the musical art, but are deficient in that relating to the gymnastic, what do you think either of us ought to reply to this question?

Athen. I would say that you have by putting this question nearly answered it clearly; and I understand that this, although a question, is for the present, as I have said, both an answer, and moreover a command to go through the points relating to the gymnastic art.

Clin. You understand me excellently well; and now act in this way.

Athen. And act I must; for it is not very difficult to speak about things known to both of you; for in this very art you have a greater share of skill than in that (of music).

Clin. You speak nearly the truth.

[14.] Athen. Is not then the principle of this very sport, that every animal is naturally accustomed to leap? But man, as we have said, receiving a sense of rhythm, has begotten and brought forth dancing; ¹but melody, putting him in mind of, and exciting, rhythm,¹ these two have, by their connexion with each other, brought forth dancing and sport.

¹—¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "De musica quidem, quam mediam choreæ partim diximus, satis actum putavimus; atque ita de ea sit dictum:" which Taylor has tacitly adopted. It is certainly preferable to the Greek, where I confess I cannot see the difference in sense between διεληγυθῆναι and διαπεπράνθαι.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. One portion of this, we say, we have already gone through; but the other we will endeavour to go through in order.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Let us then first put a Colophon² (finish) to the use³ of drunkenness, if it seems good to you likewise.

Clin. ⁴Of what kind of person, and whom⁴ are you speaking?

Athen. If any state shall make use of⁵ the pursuit lately mentioned, as being a serious thing,⁵ by law and with order, ⁶employing it as an exercise⁶ in behalf of temperance, and shall not keep itself from the rest of pleasures, in like manner, and for the same reason, by devising a plan for the sake of subduing them, after this manner it may use all these. But (if it uses them) as a sport, and it shall be lawful for any one to drink, both when he pleases, and with whom he pleases, in combination with any other pursuit whatever, I would not give my vote in this way, that it is meet for that state, or that individual to make use at any time of drunkenness; but I would give it much more to the law of the Carthaginians than to the custom of the Cretans and Lacedæmonians, namely, that no one, when in camp, is to taste of that drink, but to exist upon water during all that period; and that in the city neither a male or female slave

¹—¹ Ast would read τὸ δὲ μέλος ὑπομνησκοντος καὶ ἐγείροντος τοῦ ῥυθμοῦ—“but rhythm putting him in mind of melody and exciting—” For, says he, if man, already imbued with a perception of rhythm, discovered dancing, how could rhythm be said to be excited by melody?

² On the proverb “to put a Colophon,” i. e. a finish, see at Euthyd. § 15.

³ In lieu of χορεία, Cornarius suggested χρεία, found subsequently in four MSS. One, however, has χρήσει, which seems preferable.

⁴—⁴ Instead of ποῖον—καὶ τίνα, where the allusion to a person seems out of place, Ficinus has more correctly “Quonam pacto—”

⁵—⁵ The Greek is ὡς οὐσης σπουδῆς τῷ ἐπιτηδεύματι τῷ νῦν εἰρημένῳ. But as οὐσης σπουδῆς is without regimen, for a genitive absolute would be here inadmissible, Plato wrote, no doubt, οὐση σπουδῇ, similar to ὡς παιδιᾷ just afterwards. And so Ficinus found in his MS., as shown by his version, “tanquam re seria, computationibus,” adopted literally by Taylor.

⁶—⁶ A MS. of Eusebius, Præp. Ev. xii. p. 598, C., has correctly, μελέτη, instead of μελίτης: while χρωμένη is no less correctly omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

should ever taste it, nor magistrates during the year of their office, nor pilots, nor judges, engaged in business, should taste wine at all; nor any one, who goes to any council to deliberate upon any matter of moment, neither in the day-time at all, unless for the sake of bodily exercise or disease; nor at night, when any man, or even a woman, are thinking of begetting children. And many other cases a person might mention, in which wine ought not to be drunk by those, who possess a mind and correct laws; so that, according to this reasoning, there is to no state any need of many vineyards,¹ but other kinds of field-works should be ordained, and the whole of diet: but those relating to wine should be nearly of all the most moderate in kind and the least in number. And let this, if it seems good to you, O guests, be held to be said as the Colophon to the discourse relating to wine.

Clin. It is beautifully (said), and it does seem good to us.

BOOK III.

[1.] ²THUS much then on this point. But shall we say what was the commencement of civil government? Would not any one see it from hence in the easiest and best manner?

Clin. From whence?

Athen. From whence he might behold the progress of states marching³ continually to virtue and to vice.

Clin. From whence do you say?

Athen. I conceive, from a length and infinity⁴ of time, and from the mutations in it.

¹ In lieu of ἀμπέλων, Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, found in his MS. ἀμπελώνων, as shown by his version "vineis," and so it is quoted by Eusebius.

² From this commencement it is evident that Plato did not himself divide the dialogue into books.

³ In lieu of μεταβαίνουσιν Boeckh correctly suggested, what Ast has adopted, μεταβαινουσών, referring to Arist. Polit. iv. 5, τὰς μεταβολὰς τῶν πολιτειῶν· οὐ γὰρ εὐθὺς μεταβαίνουσιν: and to Proclus on the Timæus, ii. p. 88, πολιτείας γὰρ ἀρχὴν ζητήσας, ἀφ' ἧς εἰς ἀρετὴν τε καὶ κακίαν μεταβαίνουσιν αἱ πόλεις, where this very passage is alluded to.

⁴ The words τε καὶ ἀπειρίας seem unnecessary after χρόνου μήκουσ,

Clin. How say you?

Athen. Come (tell me), do you seem to have ever conceived what a length of time has elapsed, since cities and ¹men have been formed into polities?¹

Clin. This is by no means easy.²

Athen. It would however be something endless, and impossible (to be told).

Clin. Yes, this very much so.

Athen. Have not myriads upon myriads of states existed during this period? and, ³through the same ratio of the length (of time)³ have there not been destroyed no fewer in number? and have they not every where been often under every kind of polity? and at one time become greater from less, and at another less from greater, and worse from better, and better from worse?

Clin. It is necessary.

Athen. Let us then lay hold, if we can, of the cause of this change; for perhaps it would show us the first birth of polities, and their altered state.⁴

Clin. You speak well. It is then necessary for you to be ready to show, what you are thinking about them, and for us to follow.

Athen. Do the stories of old appear to you to possess any truth?

Clin. Of what kind?

Athen. That there have been frequent destructions of the human race through deluges and diseases and many other events, in which some small family of mankind was left.

Clin. Every thing of this kind must be very probable to every one.

Athen. Come then, let us consider one (of these destructions) to which alone is referable the subsequent ἐν τῇ τοιούτῃ. Perhaps Plato, καὶ τῶν διὰ γε ἀπειρίας μεταβολῶν, i. e. "and the changes through the want of skill, during that period."

¹—¹ Ficinus, followed to the letter by Taylor, has "civilesque hominum institutiones ceperunt."

² Instead of ῥᾶν Ficinus found in his MS. ῥᾶδιον. For his version is, "facile."

³—³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, who has merely "totidemque destructos."

⁴ The MSS. vary between μεταβολὴν and μετάβασιν: which lead to μετάστασιν, as I have translated.

out of many, (namely) that which took place through a deluge.

Clin. Considering what about it?

Athen. That those, who then escaped the destruction, were nearly some¹ hill-shepherds, preserved on the tops (of mountains),² like some slight fire-preserving (embers) of the human race.

Clin. It is evidently so.

Athen. Now such as these must surely of necessity have been ignorant of the rest of the arts and contrivance of those in cities towards each other, with respect to cupidity and a love of quarrel,³ and whatever other deeds of ill they had in their thoughts against each other.³

Clin. It is likely.

Athen. Let us suppose then that the inhabited cities, which were in the plains and on the sea-coast, were at that time entirely destroyed.

Clin. Let us suppose it.

Athen. Shall we not say then, that all instruments were destroyed, and that, if any thing connected with art, either in politics or any other wisdom, had been carefully discovered, all such were lost at that period?

Clin. For how, O most excellent man, if these things had remained through the whole time, as they are placed in order at present, could any thing new whatever have been invented by any one whatever?⁴ ⁵Because ten thousand times ten thousand years lay hid from persons then.⁵ But there have been a thousand or twice as many years, since some things have been made known by Dædalus, others by Orpheus, and others by Palamedes; while those relating to music have become

¹ In lieu of τινες, "some," one would prefer πάντες, "all," on account of σχεδόν, "nearly."

² Ficinus alone has "in montium cacuminibus."

³⁻³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, whose "and other base ends," is the version of "ceterasque adversus alios astutias" in Ficinus.

⁴ From "quicquam alicui" in Ficinus, Stephens fancied he found in his MS. ὅτι οὐν ὀρφοῦν, but Boeckh ὅτι οὐν τῷ—

⁵⁻⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek, where I am quite in the dark; and so is Boeckh, who endeavours to throw some light on the passage by supplying something which he supposes to have been lost, but which Ast rejects without being able to solve the difficulties of the text.

so by Marsyas and Olympus, and, as regards the lyre, by Amphion; and very many other things by others, so to say, but yesterday and the day before.

Athen. Know you not, Clinias, that you have omitted your friend, who was really of yesterday?

Clin. Do you mean Epimenides?

Athen. Yes, him. For he has leaped far over all amongst you in his contrivance, which Hesiod had formerly, my friend, divined in word, but he has in reality accomplished, as ye assert.

Clin. We do assert it.

[2.] Athen. Let us then assert, that, when that destruction took place, human affairs had then a solitude¹ infinitely terrible; that there was a very great part of the earth ungrudged;² and that the other animals having perished, there were some herds of oxen, and a race of goats, if perchance it happened to have survived,³ and these too rare to live for those feeding then at the commencement.³

Clin. How not?

Athen. But of a state, and polity, and legislation, to which our conversation has now turned,⁴ do we think there was any, so to say, any recollection at all?

Clin. By no means.

Athen. From those people then so situated all the present

¹ To the horrors of solitude Cowper alludes, when he feigns Alexander Selkirk, the real Robinson Crusoe of De Foe, to say—

Oh, Solitude, where are the charms

That sages have seen in thy face?

Better live in the midst of alarms,

Than reign in this horrible place:

where in the word “sages” he had an eye to Zimmermann’s work on Solitude.

² This is the literal version of the Greek, γῆς δ’ ἀφθόρου πλῆθος πάμπαν. Ficinus has “fertilium agrorum magnitudinem desertam.” Taylor, “a prodigious part of the earth was unprolific.”

³—³ Here again a literal translation will best show how unintelligible is the Greek, σπάνια καὶ ταῦτα νέμονται εἶναι ζῆν τότε κατ’ ἀρχάς: where to support the syntax Ast says that ζῆν depends upon σπάνια. Ficinus, no doubt finding himself at a loss, has “caprarumque genus, et illud quidem rarum relictum fuisse, quibus pascendis tunc homines vitam agebant.”

⁴ Instead of παρέστηκεν I have translated as if the Greek were περιέστηκεν.

things did not arise, namely, cities and politics and arts and laws and much of vice and much of virtue.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. Think we, O wonderful man, that the persons of that time, who were inexperienced in many beautiful things relating to cities,¹ and many too of a contrary kind, had become perfect as regards either virtue or vice?

Clin. You speak well, and we understand what you say.

Athen. As time then went on, and our race multiplied, all things advanced to [all]² their present state.

Clin. Most right.

Athen. But, as is probable, not suddenly, but by little, during some very long period.

Clin. And this too is very likely.

Athen. For there was a fear, I think, tingling³ in all, of coming down from their high ground to the plain.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Did they not with delight behold each other, through the fewness⁴ in things about that time?⁴ For the means of going to each other at that period by land or sea, were nearly all, so to say, lost together with the arts; hence it was not, I think,⁵ very possible for them to mingle with each other. For iron and brass and all metals had disappeared confused together; so that there was every want of means for them to be purified,⁶ and they had a scarcity (of means) in felling timber. For if any instrument had by chance been preserved in the mountains, these had by rapidly wearing away disappeared; and no others were about to be made, before the art of metallurgy had returned again to man.

¹ Ficinus has "cives," by an error, for "urbes," adopted by Taylor.

² Ficinus properly omits πάντα between εἰς and τὰ νῦν; but has "ad eum, quem nunc videmus, habitum." Perhaps Plato wrote πάντα πάντῃ, "all in all ways," similar to πάν παντί in § 1.

³ Instead of ἐναυλος, "tingling in the ears," so well explained by Ruhmkon on Timæus, p. 100, Plato wrote, I suspect, συναυλος, "fellow-dweller."

⁴ Here too a literal translation is the true touchstone of the text; where the letters περὶ ἐκείνον τὸν χρόνον have been wilfully altered from others, which it would be easy to recover; and at the same time to re-arrange the different members of the sentences, so as to meet the acute objections of Boeckh.

⁵ Ficinus omits οἷμαι.

⁶ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has "ut inveniri et in lucem erui non possent."

Clin. How could it?

Athen. But in how many generations afterwards think we did this take place?

Clin. It is evident, in a great many.

Athen. Would not then the arts that require iron and brass, and all things of that kind, have disappeared for the same and even a longer time at that period?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Dissension then together with war was at that time dead every where.¹

Clin. How so?

Athen. In the first place, they loved and had a friendly feeling towards each other, on account of their solitude; and then their food was not an object of contention; for of pastures there was no scarcity—except perhaps to some at the beginning—on which they lived for the most part at that time; for they were not at all in want of milk and flesh; and besides, by hunting they obtained food, neither indifferent (in kind) nor little (in quantity). Moreover, they had plenty of clothing, and beds, and dwellings, and utensils, for fire or not. For the earth-moulding and weaving arts did not require iron at all. And ²a god gave to man these arts to procure all those things,² in order that, when at any time they might fall into a difficulty of this kind, ³the race of man might have a shooting up and an improvement.³ Through some such means persons at that time were not very poor, nor had they, compelled by poverty, any differences with each other. But neither would they ever have become rich, being without silver and gold, ⁴which was then present in them.⁴ Now in any association, where neither riches nor poverty dwell, in this manners nearly the most just will exist. For neither inso-

¹ So Taylor translates πολλαχῇ. But that would be in Greek πανταχῇ. Ficinus omits the word entirely, as being here unintelligible. Perhaps Plato wrote τὰ τ' ἄλλ' ἐχθρῇ, "and the rest of enmities."

² Ficinus has "hæc omnia dei nutu consequimur," as if he had supplied what was wanting in his MS.

³ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "propagari genus humanum possit."

⁴ The words within numerals Ficinus no doubt omitted, as being unintelligible; and so, after him, has Taylor. The sense required seems to be, "for the metals, which then existed, it was not for them to find;" in Greek, δὲ γὰρ τὰ τ' ἦν, οὐκ ἐκείνοις παρῇν εὑρεῖν, corrupted into δὲ τὰ τ' ἐν ἐκείνοις παρῇν.

lence nor injustice, neither emulation nor envy, are produced there. Through these causes, and their so-called simplicity, they were good. For whatever they heard to be beautiful or base, they thought, through being of simple manners, it was said so most truly, and were persuaded. For no one, through his wisdom, knew to suspect an untruth, as at present; but, conceiving all that was said about gods and men to be true, they lived in this manner; and hence they were altogether such, as we have just now described them.

Clin. Both to me and to this person here such seems to be the case.

[3.] Athen. Shall we then not assert,¹ that many generations, both of those prior to the deluge and of those at present living in this manner, are likely to be less skilful and less learned as regards the other arts, and those too of war, such as exist at present by land and sea; and such, as in the case of a city being called only there² law-trials and seditions, contrive both by words and deeds every plan for doing evil and injustice towards each other? but that they were more simple and brave, and at the same time more temperate, and in every respect more just? Now of these things we have already detailed the cause.

Clin. You speak correctly.

Athen. Let then this be held to have been said by us; and let all that still follows upon this be said for the sake of understanding what need of laws there was to persons of that period, and who was their lawgiver.

Clin. You have spoken well.

Athen. Were they then neither in want of legislators, nor was there wont to be any matter of such a kind at that time? For surely to those existing at that portion of the period there were not writings, but they lived following the customs and the spoken³ laws of their ancestors.

¹ Instead of εἰπωμεν, one MS. reads εἴπομεν, similar to "diximus" in Ficinus. The two lead to εἴπομεν ἂν—

² I cannot understand αὐτοῦ; nor could Stephens, who suggested αὐτὸ, which Ast correctly says has no meaning. Perhaps Plato wrote νόμον αὐτοῦ δίκαιαι στάσεις λεγόμεναι, "the so-called just stations of law itself," where lies hid an Iambic verse, Αὐτοῦ δίκαιαι λεγόμεναι στάσεις νόμον. Or we may read καταστάσεις, as in § 6, p. 684, B.

³ The λεγόμενοι νόμοι mean here the same as the ἄγραφα νόμιμα, οὓς πατέριους νόμους ἐκονομάζουσι, in Legg. vii. 4, p. 793, A. Ficinus, appa-

¹ Clin. It is probable. But the manner of their polity do you know well what it was?

Athen. This.

Clin. What?¹

Athen. All appear to me to call the polity subsisting at that period, a dynasty, which even now exists in many places, both amongst the Greeks and Barbarians. And even Homer speaks some where of it as taking place in the administration of the Cyclopes, saying, (Od. ix. 12,) “ Meetings, that counsel bring, to them are not,

Nor legal judges. On the high hill-tops
They dwell, or in the hollow cave; and each
To wife and children gives the law, nor care
Aught have they of each other.”

Clin. This poet of yours appears to have been a graceful one; for we have gone through some other pieces of his, very clever, but not many of them; for we Cretans do not make a very great use of foreign poems.

Megil. But we do on the other hand make use of them. And he seems to excel poets of this kind; although he does not describe every where a Laconic, but rather an Ionic, life. At present indeed he appears to testify fairly to your language, mythologically referring the ancient state of mankind² to a savage life.

Athen. So he does testify; and let us receive him, as pointing out that polities of this kind did once upon a time exist.

Clin. Well (said).

Athen. Is it not then from those, who were dispersed by single families and races through the want arising from those destructions, amongst whom the oldest bears sway on account of the authority having come from the father and mother, that following them, as birds³ do, persons will form rently not aware of this, omitted the word λεγομένοις; which Grynæus, however, reintroduced, and hence Taylor has “as they were called.”

¹ I have followed the arrangement of the speeches found in Ficinus; but in lieu of ἡδὲ καὶ, which are unintelligible, substituted ἡδὲ καὶ εἰ.

² In lieu of αὐτῶν Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἄνθρωπων, as shown by his version, “hominum,” adopted by Taylor.

³ The mention of birds seems rather strange here. For all birds are not gregarious. There is evidently some error in ὄρνιθες, which it would not be difficult to correct.

one herd, and under their fathers' laws be governed by kingly rule, which is the most just of all?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And after this, more of them come together to a common spot, and form larger cities; and betaking themselves to agriculture, first at the foot of hills they make certain enclosures of thorns, as defensive walls against wild beasts, and thus establish one common and large dwelling.

Clin. It is probable that this occurs.

Athen. But is not this also probable?

Clin. What?

Athen. That, while these larger dwellings are increasing from the less and original ones, each of the small would remain,¹ having, according to the race, the oldest person as its ruler, and, through living separate from each other, its own peculiar customs, and different from different parents and bringers-up, and which have been accustomed to be, as regards the gods and themselves, the more modest in the case of the more modest, and more manly in that of the more manly; and thus according to reason, each one, after stamping his own edicts² on his children and children's children, would come, as we said, to the greater community, bringing their own peculiar laws.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Moreover it is surely necessary for each to be pleased with their own laws (first),³ and afterwards with those of the others.

Clin. It is so.

Athen. We appear then to be unconsciously walking, as it were, in the commencement of legislation.

Clin. Entirely so.

[4.] Athen. After this then, it is necessary for those, who thus come together to choose some among themselves in common, who, after inspecting the laws of all, shall lay open such of them as they most approve of in common before the rulers and leaders of the wards,¹ as before kings, and enable them to make a choice; and these would be called legislators; and after appointing their magistrates and making out of the dynasties an aristocratical or kingly government, they would dwell in such a change of polity.

¹ Instead of παρῖναι the sense requires περιῖναι, as I have translated.

² The Greek is ἀναρρήσεις, "takings off." Ast suggests ἀνευρήσεις, "discoveries," or αἰρέσεις, "choice in living," to which Orelli would prefix ἀει, not ἀν, as stated by Stalb. Winckelmann prefers Ast's ἀνευρήσεις. I have therefore translated as if Plato wrote ἀναρρήσεις, "edicts," literally "proclamations." Ficinus has been content with the general sense. His version is "et in ceteris omnibus, prout singuli filios aut nepotes eruderunt, quorum ritus, quasi leges proprias, ad maiorem habitationem ferunt."

³ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, "in primis" to answer to "afterwards."

Clin. This would in this way take place in due order.

Athen. Let us then speak of a third form of polity as occurring, in which all the forms and accidents of polities and at the same time of cities happen to exist together.

Clin. Of what kind is this?

Athen. That, which Homer likewise has pointed out, as having taken the third place after the second (Il. xx. 216).

“He built Dardania; for Ilion holy
Was in the plain, not yet a city made
For voice-dividing men; but still they dwelt Below Mount Ida with its many rills.

For he pronounces these verses, and those which he said respecting the Cyclopes, as having been spoken somehow divinely and naturally. For the race of poets being divine does enthusiastically² handle the hymnings on many events which have truly happened, in conjunction with some of the Graces and Muses.

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. Let us then now proceed onwards,³ a fable having just now come upon us;⁴ for, perhaps, it will make some sign respecting our wishes.⁴ Is it not proper?

Clin. Very much so.

² The Greek is ἐνθουσιαστικὸν ὑμνωδοῦν, where Boeckh proposed to omit ἐνθουσιαστικόν, as being not a Platonic, but a Neo-Platonic word; and his idea is adopted by Ast, Bekker, and Stalbaum. To myself however it is evident that Plato wrote ἐνθουσιαστικῶς ὑμνωδιῶν, as I have translated, to which I was led in part by Winckelmann's conjecture, ἐνθουσιαστικόν—

⁴ Instead of βουλήσεως I should prefer βουλευσεως, “deliberation.”

Athen. We say¹ then that Ilion was colonized down from elevated places to a large and beautiful plain, upon a hill not very lofty, and having many rivers which rush from Mount Ida.

Clin. So they say.

Athen. Do we not think that this occurred at some long time after the deluge?

Clin. How not a long time?

Athen. A dreadful oblivion then it seems has taken place of the destruction just mentioned, since they thus placed a city under rivers many and flowing from high ground, and put their trust in hills not very high.

Clin. It is then quite evident that they were distant some considerable time from that event.

Athen. And many other cities, I think, were at that time inhabited as mankind multiplied.

Clin. How not?

Athen. And these perchance fought against it; and perhaps by sea, all of them now fearlessly using the sea.

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. But the Achæans, after remaining ten years, overthrew Troy.

Megil. Entirely.

Athen. During then that period of ten years, in which Troy was besieged, the affairs of the besiegers happened to each of them to turn out very ill at home through the seditions of the young men, who received the commanders, when returning to their cities and homes, neither in a becoming nor just manner; but so that deaths² and murders and very many banishments occurred to those, who, after being exiled, returned with a change of name, and were called Dorians instead of Achæans, through Dorieus being the person who collected together the exiles of that period. And hence you Lacedæmonians turn all these things into a fable, and go through them.

Megil. How not?

[5.] Athen. To the same point from whence, while discoursing at the commencement about laws, we turned aside through falling upon music and drunkenness, we have now arrived again,

¹ From the answer of Clinias, "they say," it is evident that φασί, not φαμέν, is the correct reading. Ficinus has twice "accepimus."

² To avoid the tautology in θανάτους and σφαγὰς, it is easy to read ὡς ἀθροίους in lieu of ὡς τε θανάτους, without τε, omitted in one MS.

as it were, through some god ; and our discourse gives us, as it were, a handle. For it has come to the colonization of Lacedæmon, which you said was properly governed by laws fraternal to those in Crete. For the present then we obtain something additional to this extent from the wandering of our discourse, while passing through certain polities and colonizations. For we behold a first, a second, and a third city connected with each other, as we think, by their colonizations during a boundless length of time. But now this fourth city, or, if you please, nation, presents itself to us, ¹ which was formerly colonized, and is so now. ¹ From all which, if we are able to understand what has been colonized well or not, and what laws of theirs preserve, what is preserved, and what corrupt, what is corrupted, and what being changed for what will render, Megillus and Clinias, a state happy, ² (we shall think that enough has been done). ² But all these matters must be discussed by us, as if from the beginning, unless we have any fault to find with what has been said.

Megil. If, O guest, a god had promised us that, if we put our hands a second time to the inquiry respecting legislation, we should hear discourses neither worse nor fewer than those already spoken, I would go a long road, and the present day would appear to me to be short, although it is nearly that of the god, when he is turning from the summer to the winter (solstice).

Athen. It is meet then, as it seems, to consider these matters.

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. Let us then be present in thought at that time, when Lacedæmon, and Argos, and Messéné, and the places which with them were, Megillus, under the power of your ancestors. ³ For then, it is said, (according to) the story, ³ that after having divided their army into three parts, they colonized three cities, Argos, Messéné, and Lacedæmon.

¹⁻¹ The Greek is κατοικιζόμενον τί ποτε καὶ νῦν κατοικισμένον. But since Ficinus, whom Taylor follows tacitly, has "alicubi habitavit, et jam habitat," he evidently found in his MS. κατοικισμένον τί ποτε καὶ νῦν κατοικιζόμενον.

²⁻² The words between the numerals are found only in the version of Ficinus, "satis nobis factum putabimus."

³⁻³ Ficinus has "Tunc enim illud fabulæ ipsis, ut dicitur, placuit," as if in τὸ τοῦ μύθου there were an allusion to some dramatic story.

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. And Temenus became king of Argos, and Cresphontes of Messéné, but Procles and Eurysthenes of Lacedæmon.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Now, all of those then (present) swore to assist them, if any one should destroy their kingly rule.

Megil. How not?

Athen. Now (say), by Zeus, is kingly rule destroyed, or has any government whatever been destroyed by other parties than by themselves? Or after having just now ¹[a little before]¹ met with these words, did we suppose so, but have now forgotten it?

Megil. How so?

Athen. Now then, we will more confirm this kind (of assertion). For meeting with deeds, as it seems, which have occurred, we have arrived at the same discourse; so that we shall not seek the same discourse respecting a vain thing, but one that has occurred and possesses truth. Now this has occurred. Three kingdoms have made an oath with three cities under a kingly government, each with each other, according to the laws which they had laid down, about governing and being governed in common, that one party (the rulers) should not make for itself a government of violence, as time and race progressed, and the other, (the ruled,) that, while the rulers observed these (conditions), they would not at any time themselves destroy the kingly rule, nor permit others to destroy it, but that the kings would defend both kings and the people when injured, and the people, both kings and the people. Was it not so?

Megil. It was so.

Athen. Was not then that, which is of the greatest moment in the establishments of polities, present to these three² cities, regulated by law, whether the kings laid down the laws, or some other person?

¹ The words ὀλίγον ἔμπροσθεν are evidently an interpretation of νῦν δὲ, although quoted by Photius in Νῦν δὲ μὲν. Unless it be said that ὀλίγον ἔμπροσθεν ought to be inserted after μᾶλλον ἢ in the next speech, and νῦν δ' αὖ be read there instead of νῦν δὲ, as in Eurip. Hippol. 233. Νῦν δὲ μὲν—Νῦν δ' αὖ.

² I have with one MS. rejected ἐν ταῖς, found in the others between ταῖς and τροσι, unless it be said that ἐν ought to be inserted before ταῖς καταστάσεσι.

Megil. What was this?

Athen. That two cities should always assist¹ against the one, which happened to be disobedient to the laws laid down.

Megil. It is evident.

Athen. And yet this do the many order the lawgivers, that they are to lay down such laws as the wards and the masses will willingly receive; just as if any one should order the exercise-masters, or physicians, to take care of, and cure, the bodies under their direction in an agreeable manner.

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. It is however often a desirable thing, should any one with no great pain be able to render bodies of a good habit and in health.

Megil. How not?

Athen. This too, which is not a small matter towards making easy the laying down of laws, was present to those of that period.

Megil. What was that?

[6.] Athen. There was not to the lawgivers, while preparing an equality of property, the greatest blame, and which exists in many other cities regulated by laws, when any one endeavours to disturb the possession of land, or to wipe out² debts, through perceiving that equality can never sufficiently exist without such measures. For to the lawgiver, who endeavours to disturb anything of this kind, every one on meeting cries out, Do not move things to be not moved;³ and utters curses upon him, who introduces the distributions of land, and the cutting off debts, so that every man is thrown into a difficulty. ⁴ But to the Dorians even this happened successfully and without any finding fault, that both the

² This is the English phrase equivalent to the Greek διαλύειν, "to dissolve." According to Plutarch it was the policy of Solon to get rid of debts, which he said was σισάχθεια, "the shaking off a burden."

³ On this proverbial expression see Ast.

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek; where, says Ast, instead of ἦν one would have expected εἶναι, to answer to διανέμεσθαι. But, unless I am greatly mistaken, Plato wrote γῆν τε ἀναμφισβητήτως διανέμεσθαι, οὖσαν πολλήν, καὶ διαλύεσθαι χρεῖα, ἃ μεγάλα καὶ παλαιὰ οὐκ ἦν. For Ficinus has "Doris autem hæc difficultas turbatioque non fuit. Nam agros abunde sine controversia possidebant, debitaque ipsis æris alieni prisca et magna non erant;" where his "abunde" led me to suggest οὖσαν πολλήν; while διαλύεσθαι χρεῖα is similar to χρεῶν διάλυσιν just above. The reason why the words οὖσαν πολλήν καὶ διαλύεσθαι land was divided without causing disputes, and the debts were not large and of long standing.⁴

Megil. True.

Athen. How then, ye best of men, did the colonization and legislation turn out so badly to them?

Megil. How do you mean? and for what do you blame them?

Athen. That when three administrations had been established, two parts of them quickly corrupted their polity and laws, and one alone, belonging to your city, remained.

Megil. You ask a question not very easy (to answer).

Athen. And yet it is requisite for us, while considering now and examining into laws, and playing a game suited to old men temperately,¹ to go through the journey without annoyance, as we stated, when we began to enter upon it.

Megil. How not? and we must do as you say.

Athen. What inquiry can we make to ourselves relating to laws (in general), more beautiful than respecting those (individually) which have adorned cities of this kind?² or shall we make an inquiry about any cities and colonizations more illustrious and larger than these?

Megil. It is not easy to speak of others in preference to these.

Athen. It is then nearly evident, that the persons of that period conceived this arrangement would be an assistance sufficient not only for the Peloponnesus, but for all the Greeks, if any of the Barbarians should do it any injury; ³just as those, who dwelt then about Ilion, were, when trusting to the power of the Assyrians, as it existed in the time of Ninus, emboldened to excite war against Troy.³ For the showy were omitted, is to be referred to the similarity of διανέμεσθαι and διालύεσθαι, which were found at the end of two consecutive lines in the Codex Archetypus.

¹ Ficinus has, "senili quodam modestoque loco;" from whence Stephens proposed to insert καὶ after πρεσβυτικὴν—I have translated as if the Greek were σωφρόνως, not σώφρονα.

² Instead of ταύτας, Ficinus found in his MS. πόλεις τὰς τοιαύτας, as shown by his version, "civitates hujusmodi."

³—³ Respecting the events here alluded to, Ast refers to Pausanias, ii. 22, and Herodotus, i. 3, ii. 120; and, after observing that the account given by Herodotus in i. 95 is at variance with that of Ctesias, preserved by Diodorus, ii. 22, adds, that nothing can be stated for certain about the empire of Ninus and the war against Troy. With regard to the words, τῇ περὶ Νίνου γενομένην, Ficinus, whom Taylor follows tacitly, appearance¹ of its government, still preserved, was by no means small. (And) as we at present fear the great king, so the people then feared the combination (of power) standing together. For the taking of Troy a second time became a great accusation against them; because the Trojan power was a portion of that (the Assyrian) government. On all these accounts then, the unity of the arrangement of the army at that time, divided into three states, under the brother kings, the offspring of Hercules, appeared surely² to be beautifully planned and put into order, and superior to that which went against Troy. For, first, they conceived that the descendants of Hercules were better commanders than those sprung from Pelops; and, next, that this army far surpassed in valour that which came against Troy; for that these were the victors, but those vanquished³ by these, the Achæans by the Doriens. Do we not then conceive, that the persons of that period made their arrangements with this very view?

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. Is it not probable then, that they thought their affairs would be in a firm state, and endure for some lengthened period, through their having shared in many dangers and labours, and in being orderly governed by one race of brother kings; and in addition to this, through having made use of many other prophets, and the Delphic Apollo likewise?

Megil. How is it not probable?

Athen. But all these expectations so great flew away, as it seems, at that time quickly, except, as we just now said, a small part around your region; and this has never ceased warring against the two other parts, even to the present day.⁴

seems to have found in his MS. τῇ παρὰ Νίνου γενομένῃ; for his version is, "quæ a Nino traxit originem."

¹ On this meaning of σχῆμα, Ast quotes Wernsdorf on Himerius, p. 51. See too Musgrave on Eurip. in Andr. 1, Ἀσιατίδος γῆς σχῆμα Θηβαία πόλις.

² As all the MSS. read καλῶς ὥς, it is evident that Plato wrote καλῶς πῶς, where πῶς was spoken with a sneer. Stephens, whom Bekker, Ast, and Stalbaum have followed, was the first to reject ὥς, omitted by Ficinus.

³ Ficinus has "superatos fuisse," from whence Boeckh, whom Ast follows, suggested ἡττηῖσθαι in lieu of ἡττᾶσθαι.

⁴ All the MSS. read μέχρι τὰ νῦν. Ficinus has "ad hunc usque diem," from whence Stephens, whom Bekker follows correctly, elicited μέχρι τοῦ νῦν.

Since the policy then ¹existing would,¹ by agreeing for one object, have possessed a power in war not to be overturned.

Megil. How not?

[7.] Athen. How then, and why was it dissolved? Is it not worth while to consider, what accident destroyed a constitution of such a standing, and of such a kind?

Megil. Scarcely² would any one, looking elsewhere,³ behold either laws or other⁴ politics, conservative of doings beautiful and great, or on the contrary destructive of them, if he neglects these.⁵

Athen. It seems, then, we have by some good fortune come upon a sufficient consideration of this question.

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. Do not, then, all persons, thou wondrous man, and we too at the present moment, unconsciously fancy perpetually that they see some beautiful thing existing, and which would effect wonders, if a person knew how to use it properly. But now we should ourselves, perhaps, neither think correctly about it, nor according to nature; and moreover all men (err)⁶ respecting all the other things about which they think in a similar manner.

Megil. What do you mean? and about what especially shall we say this speech has been spoken?

Athen. My good man, I have been just now laughing at myself. For upon looking to that very expedition about which we have been conversing, it appeared to me to be very beautiful, and that a wonderful possession would have fallen accidentally to the Greeks, if, as I said, any one had at that time made a proper use of it.

Megil. Did you not say all correctly and with a fixed mind; and did not we properly praise them?

¹—¹ Instead of kai, we must read ἀν, unless γενομένη conceals, what is likely, a corruption; for γενομένη ἢ τότε could not be written in the sense of ἢ τότε γενομένη.

² Literally, "at leisure." See at ii. § 10.

³ I have adopted Ast's correction, ἄλλοσε σκοπῶν, in lieu of ἄλλο σκοπῶν.

⁴ ⁵ I hardly understand ἄλλας here and afterwards τούτων, which Ast explains by "ours." But in that case Plato would, I think, have written ἄλλοδαπὰς and ἡμεδαπῶν.

⁶ Ficinus alone, whom Taylor tacitly follows, has preserved the word "errant," requisite for the sense; unless it be said that τὰ αὐτὰ ποιῶσι have been lost after πάντες πάντα.

Athen. Perhaps so. But I think that every one, who beholds any thing great, and having much power and strength, has immediately this feeling, that if he knew as its possessor how to use it, being of such a kind, and such an age, he would do many and wonderful things, and be happy.

Megil. Is not this correct? or how say you?

Athen. Consider now, by looking to what does he, who gives this praise to each thing, speak correctly. Now first, as regards what has been said just now, how would the persons of that period, even if they had known how to draw up an army properly, have, by a complete marshalling, met with ¹the opportunity somehow? ¹ Would it not have been, had they put it together securely, and preserved it ²for ever, so that they might be free themselves, and rule over others whom they pleased, and do ³in short, both themselves and their descendants amongst all men, both Greeks and Barbarians, whatever they desired? Would they not for the sake of these things have felt a desire? ⁴

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. Has not he too, who, on seeing great wealth, or superior honours arising from a family, or any thing else of this kind, would have said the very same thing, said so, looking to this, as if through this there would come to him all he desires, or the greater part of them, and such as are the most worthy of mention?

Megil. It appears so.

Athen. ⁵ But there is certainly one common desire to all men, which is signified by our present discourse. ⁵

¹—¹ I cannot understand τοῦ καιροῦ πως. For the indefinite πως is at variance with the definite article. Plato wrote, I suspect, τοῦ κατὰ ῥοὴν πλοῦ, "a sailing down the stream," i. e. a successful voyage. On the metaphor in πλοῦς see Ast in Legg. vii. p. 803, A.; and with the phrase κατὰ ῥοὴν compare φερομένην κατὰ ῥοὴν in Rep. vi. p. 492, C.

² i. e. τὸ στρατόπεδον, "the army."

³ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows implicitly, has "consequenter," as if he had found some other word in his MS. in the place of πράττειν.

⁴ Instead of ἐπιθυμοῖεν, which Ast says truly makes nonsense here, he would read ἐπαινοῖεν, in reference to the ἐπαινον at the commencement of the speech. Orelli suggests ἐπαινεθεῖεν ἂν.

⁵—⁵ Such is Taylor's literal translation of the Latin of Ficinus. The Greek is Φέρε δὴ, πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἐστὶ κοινὸν ἐπιθύμημα ἕν τι, τὸ νῦν ὑπὸ τοῦ λόγου δηλούμενον, ὥς αὐτός φησιν ὁ λόγος. But there the two last sentences present an insufferable tautology. Which of them was really written by Plato, it is not easy to decide.

Megil. What is it?

Athen. That the things which do take place, should take place at the command of his own soul, all for the most part, but, if not (all), at least human affairs.

Megil. How not?

Athen. Since then all of us when children, and men, and grown old, perpetually wish a thing of this kind, we should of necessity¹ pray for that very thing to the end (of life).

Megil. How not?

Athen. And we would pray for our friends that which they do for themselves.

Megil. How not?

Athen. Now a son, being a boy, is a friend of his father, being a man.

Megil. How not?

Athen. And yet many of the things which the boy prays may happen to himself, the father would pray the gods that they may not happen according to the prayers of his son.

Megil. When, you mean, (the son) prays, being thoughtless and still young.

Athen. Yes; and when the father, being old, or with very youthful feelings, shall, although he knows nothing of what is honourable and just, offer up a prayer with great fervour in the midst of sufferings, akin to those that happened to Theseus, in the case of the unfortunate Hippolytus, when dying, will the boy, think you, who does know, join in prayer with his father?

Megil. I understand what you mean. For you appear to me to assert, that a person ought not to pray, nor be urgent for all things to follow his wishes, but for wishes rather² (to follow) his prudence; and that both a state and each of us ought to pray for and hasten to this, how to possess intellect.

[8.] Athen. Certainly. And, moreover, that the statesman (and³) lawgiver ought always to lay down the ordinances of your recollection, what, if we remember,¹ was said, at the commencement, that it was your advice, that a good lawgiver ought to lay down all laws for the sake of war; but it was mine, that this would enjoin him to make laws for one virtue out of four existing; that he ought to look to every virtue, but especially the first, which is the leader of the whole of virtue, and that is prudence, and intellect and opinion together, with love and desire attendant on them. But our discourse has now returned again to the same point; and I now say again, what I then said in jest, if you please, or in earnest,² that I assert then,³ that it is dangerous for a person not possessing intellect to pray; but that (it is better³) for the contrary to his wishes to happen to him. If you are willing to suppose that I am in earnest,⁴ suppose it. For I now fully expect to find you following the reasoning we produced a little before, that timidity was not the cause of the destruction of kings, and of the whole of their policy; nor was it because the rulers and they, whom it was meet to be ruled, did not know what relates to war;⁵ but they were destroyed by all the remaining depravity,⁵ and especially by their ignorance respecting the greatest of human affairs. That these things thus happened at that time,⁶ and (must so happen) now, if they happen any where,⁶ and will hereafter happen not otherwise, I will en-

¹ Ficinus has "sedulo," as if his MS. read another word in the place of ἀναγκαιώς. Perhaps διηνεκώς.

² I cannot understand μηδέν, which Bekker has inserted from four MSS. before μάλλον. Two MSS. read πολὺ—Neither word is acknowledged by Ficinus. Perhaps Plato wrote ὀπηδεῖν, of which πο has been preserved by some MSS. and ηδεῖν by others.

³ Boeckh was the first to insert καὶ from "legumque lator" in Ficinus; for the statesman and legislator are thus constantly united, as shown by Boeckh and Ast.

¹ This—"if we remember," is strangely introduced here, and is properly omitted by Ficinus; who has "et ipse recordatus sum et vos nunc recordari volo; nempe vos in disputationis principio dicebatis." Perhaps Plato wrote κατὰ γὰρ ἀρχὰς ἦν, εὐ μνησθεῖς, τὰ λεχθέντα, i. e. for it was said, I well remember, at the commencement—

²⁻³ The Greek is ὅτι δὴ φημι. But as Plato had just alluded to his being in jest or in earnest, I suspect he wrote σπουδάζων οὕτω· φήμι δὴ—for on pronouncing the words φήμι δὴ, he no doubt imitated the earnest manner adopted by speakers in public; and to which σπουδάζων οὕτω would naturally draw the attention of the other interlocutors.

³ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, "satiùs esse," as if his MS. read ἀλλὰ κάλλιον, not ἀλλὰ by itself.

⁴ If Plato wrote, as I have supposed, just before σπουδάζων οὕτω, he must have written here σπουδάζοντα δὲ μὴ εἰ με τιθῆναι βούλεσθε, not εἰ με, for σπουδάζοντα μὴ would answer to παίζοντα.

⁵⁻⁶ I confess I cannot make syntax or sense out of τῇ λοιπῇ δὲ πάσῃ κακίᾳ διεφθαρμένα. I could have understood τὰ δ' ὅλα ὁπθῶ ἀπάσῃ κακίᾳ διεφθαρμένα—"but the whole was destroyed by every depravity following them."

⁶⁻⁶ The Greek is καὶ νῦν, εἶπον, γίγνεται: where Bekker would repeat γίγνεται.

deavour, if you wish it, to find out, by proceeding according to a discourse in due order, and to show, as far as I can, to you, who are my friends.

Clin. To praise you, guest, in words, would be rather offensive; but we shall mightily praise you in deed. For we shall cheerfully follow what is said, by which (acts) he, who praises as a free-man or not, is most apparent.

Athen. You speak most excellently, Clinias; and let us do as you say.

Clin. These things will be so, if god pleases. Only speak.

[9.] Athen. We say then, proceeding along the still remaining road of our discourse, that the greatest ignorance destroyed that power at that time, and that it is naturally able to do the same thing now. So that, if this be the case, the lawgiver must endeavour, as far as he can, to infuse prudence into states, and destroy to the utmost thoughtlessness.¹

Clin. It is evident.

Athen. What then may be justly called the greatest ignorance? Consider whether you agree with me² in what I am going to say.³ For I lay it down to be such as this.

Clin. Of what kind?

Athen. When any one does not love, but hates that, which seems to him to be beautiful, or good; but loves and embraces that, which appears to him to be base and unjust, I assert that this discordance, respecting pain and pleasure, with opinion founded on reason, is the extreme of ignorance; and it is the greatest, because it belongs to the mass of the soul. For that part of the soul, which feels pain and pleasure, is what the common people and the mass are in a city. When, therefore, it is opposed to science, or opinions, or reason, the natural rulers, I call this ignorance; and it is the same as that of a city, when the multitude will not obey the rulers and the laws; and likewise in the case of one man, when although beautiful reasons reside in his soul, yet they do not produce any good effect, but every thing the contrary. All these kinds of ignorance I would lay down as the most inordinate,¹ in the case of a state and each individual citizen, but not as applied to handicraftmen, if, guests, you understand what I mean.

¹ Although ἄνοια would be properly opposed to φρόνησις, yet ἄγνοια unites better with ἀμαθία: and so Ficinus found in his MS., as shown by his version "ignorantiam:" whom Taylor, Boeckh, and Ast have followed.

² So Taylor, which would be in Greek τὸ λεχθῆσόμενον, not λεγόμενον, which Ficinus has omitted.

Clin. We do understand you, friend, and assent to what you say.

Athen. Let this then be laid down as determined upon, and said, that to citizens, who are after this manner ignorant, nothing connected with government is to be committed, but they are to be reproached as ignorant, even though they are very skilful in argument, and have laboured at all that is elegant (in language), and whatever relates to a quickness of intellect; but that those, who possess qualities contrary to these, are to be called wise, although they should, according to the saying, ²know neither their letters, nor how to swim,³ and that power is to be given to them as being prudent persons. For how, friends, can the smallest form of prudence subsist without symphony?⁴ It is not possible.⁴ But the most beautiful and greatest of symphonies may be most justly called the greatest wisdom; of which he participates, who lives according to reason; but he, who is deficient, is a family-destroyer, and in no respect a saviour as regards the city, but, quite the contrary, he will appear to be always ignorant on these points. Let this then, as I just now said, be laid down, as having been spoken of in this manner.

Clin. Let it be laid down.

[10.] Athen. But it is surely necessary for rulers and ruled to exist in states.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Be it so. But of what kind, and how many, are the axioms⁵ respecting the ruling and being ruled in the case of great and small states, and similarly in that of families? Is there not one relating to a father and mother? and universally

¹ Ficinus has "perniciossissimas—"

² This proverb, peculiar to Athens, is alluded to in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 953.

³ I confess I hardly understand what is meant by ἁρμονίας here. Ficinus has "consensu—" I could have understood ψυχῆς ἁρμονίας, "a harmony of soul—" Perhaps the best English version of ἁρμονία would be, "the being in tune," a musical expression, applied sometimes to the mind.

⁴ Ficinus alone attributes the words "οὐκ ἔστιν" to Clinias.

⁵ By ἀξιώματα are meant here "the received notions—" would it not be a correct axiom every where that parents should rule over their offspring?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. And the next to this, that men of high birth should rule over those of low birth? and the third, that the more aged should rule, and the younger be ruled?

Clin. How not?

Athen. And the fourth, that slaves should be ruled, and their owners rule?

Clin. How not?

Athen. And the fifth, I think, that the better person should rule, and the worse be ruled?

Clin. You speak of a ruling very necessary indeed.

Athen. And one that exists the most in all animals, and is "according to nature,"¹ as the Theban [Pindar] says. But the greatest axiom, as it seems, would be the sixth, which commands the ignorant to follow, but the prudent to lead and rule. And yet, O thou most wise Pindar, I should almost say, that this at least is not contrary to nature, but according to it, for the rule of law to be over willing (subjects), and not by an act of violence.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Let us then in speaking of the seventh rule, as being god-loved and fortunate, bring² it to a lot-drawing, and say,³ that he, on whom the lot falls, is most justly the ruler, but he the ruled, who goes away, after being unsuccessful in the lot.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. We will say then, playing with some one of those who go on with facility to the laying down of laws—Dost thou, O lawgiver, see how many axioms there are relating to rulers, and how they are naturally contrary to each other? For now we have discovered a certain fountain of seditions, to which it is necessary for you to attend. First, consider with us, by erring how and in what point, contrary to these axioms, did the kings of Argos and Messéné destroy themselves, and the power of the Greeks, which at that time was wonderful:

¹ On this saying of Pindar, frequently quoted by Plato, see Boeckh; who should however have rejected Πινδαρος as a gl.

^{2, 3} From "producamus" and "ducamus" in Ficinus, it is easy to see that his MS. read προάγωμεν and φάμεν, not προάγομεν and φάμεν.

Was it not through their not knowing that Hesiod had said most truly, that "the half is often more than the whole?"¹ (For), when to receive the whole brings a damage, but in the half is moderation, he held in that case the moderate to be more than the immoderate, as being better than the worse.

Clin. Most correctly so.

Athen. But whether think we that this, when it occurs, destroys on each occasion what² relates to kings before what exists amongst the people?

Clin. It is probable that this is mostly the disease of kings, who live proudly in luxury.

Athen. Is not this evident then, in the first place, that the kings of that time had a power above the established laws?³ and (as) to what they had praised both by word and an oath, they did not accord with themselves.³ But discordance, as we have said,⁴ being the greatest ignorance, although appearing to be wisdom, has destroyed all those things through⁵ error and a sad want of education.

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. Be it so. But why was it meet for the lawgiver then laying down laws to be cautious about the generation of this disease?⁶ Is it, by the gods, at the present time, no wisdom to know this, and not difficult to speak of it? but that, if it had been possible to foresee it then, the person, who foresaw it, would have been wiser than we are?

¹ Had not the hexameter line of Hesiod been preserved, Νήπιον οὐκ ἴσασιν, ὅσῳ πλεον ἡμῖν παντός, any one would have said that the words in the text, "ἡμῖν τοῦ παντός πολλάκις ἰστί πλεον, made a pentameter.

² I have translated as if τὰ had dropt out before περὶ, in order that διαφθεῖρειν might not want its subject.

^{3—3} Such is the literal version of the Greek, καὶ δὲ λόγῳ τε καὶ ὅρκῳ ἐπῆνεσαν οὐ ξυνεφώνησαν αὐτοῖς. But the perpetual antithesis between λόγος and ἔργον requires δὲ λόγῳ τε καὶ ὅρκῳ ἐπῆνεσαν, οὐ ξυνεφώνησαν ἔργοις, i. e. "and what they had praised by word and an oath, did not accord with their acts." Taylor's version is, "and that their actions did not accord with what they had celebrated both in discourse and by an oath."

⁴ In § 9, p. 98.

⁶ I have followed Ficinus in translating πάθους "disease," in allusion to the disease mentioned just above.

Megil. What kind of thing are you speaking of?

Athen. For a person looking, O Megillus, to what has occurred with you, it is easy to know, and, knowing, to state what ought to have occurred then.

Megil. Speak yet more clearly.

Athen. Some such thing as this then will be most clear.

Megil. What?

[11.] Athen. If any one gives a power too great to things rather small, by disregarding moderation,—as, for instance, sails to ships, food to bodies, and dominion to dispositions—all things are overturned; for some, by being full of insolence, run ¹ into disorders, and others ² to injustice, the offspring of insolence.² What then are we saying? Is it not, my friends, of this kind? that there exists not the nature of a mortal soul, which will be able, when young and not under supervision, to bear the greatest rule amongst men, so as, when filled as to its thinking faculty with folly, which is the greatest disease, not to suffer a hate from his nearest friends; which, when it takes place, is wont to corrupt quickly, and to cause all its power to disappear. To be cautious on this point, through knowing moderation, is the province of great law-givers. ³ Hence what took place at that time, it is now easy to perceive.³ It appears to have been this.

Megil. Of what kind?

Athen. Some god, ⁴ I think, (is) taking care⁴ of you; who,

¹ Ficinus has "in morbos incidunt." Hence two MSS. give as a var. lect. πίπτει for θεῖ: which is here applied in Greek, as "run" is in English, metaphorically, to persons running into debt, extravagance, and vice generally.

²⁻² Compare Soph. CEd. T. 863, ὑβρις φρεσὶν ῥύπαννον.

³⁻³ Such is the literal version of the Latin of Ficinus, "Quod igitur tunc factum, facile modo perspectu est." The Greek is ὥς οὖν δὴ τότε γινόμενον νῦν ἔστι μετριώτατα τοκάσαι, where Ast was the first to suggest, what the sense requires, τὸ τότε: but his paraphrastical translation of μετριώτατα, "satis certo et accurate," is at variance with the train of thought; which leads to ἔστιν οὖν δὴ τὸ τότε γινόμενον νῦν εἰς τὰ μέτρια ῥᾶστον τοκάσαι, i. e. "It is, then, now very easy to conjecture what then took place as regards things moderate:" where τὰ μέτρια is confirmed, not only generally by what has gone before, but specifically by εἰς τὸ μέτριον in what immediately follows; while it is not without reason that one MS. offers μετριώτατον for μετριώτατα.

⁴⁻⁴ The Greek is εἶναι κηδόμενος, where Ast understands ἔστι—But Ficinus has "ut arbitrator," as if his MS. read οἶμαι, adopted tacitly by Stephens, instead of εἶναι. Hence Taylor translated "as it seems—" But through foreseeing future events, and planting for you the two-fold generation of kings descended from one, has contracted you rather to a moderate state; and after this a certain human nature,¹ mixed up with a certain divine power, did, perceiving your government to be still in an inflamed state, mingle the temperate power of old age with the self-willed strength of noble birth, and made equal with the power of the kings the vote of twenty-eight² old men in matters of the greatest moment. But your third saviour,³ perceiving your government swelling with desire and passion, placed upon it the power of the Ephori,⁴ as a bit, and led it near the power which is chosen by lot. And by this arrangement the kingly power with you, being mingled with such things as were proper, and possessing moderation, was both preserved itself, and became the cause of preservation to others. For under the rule of Temenus and Cresphontes, and the lawgivers of that time, ⁵if indeed they were lawgivers,⁵ not even the portion of Aristodemus would have been saved. For they were not then sufficiently skilled in legislation; for, (had they been so),⁶ they never would have thought to moderate by oaths a youthful spirit, when receiving a power from which it was possible for a tyranny to arise. But now the deity has shown what kind of government it was and is necessary to be, that is about to continue the longest. But that these things should be known by us, as I said before, now that they have happened, is no feat of wisdom. For from a model already existing, it is not difficult to see.⁷ But if any one had then since another MS. has εἶναι καὶ κηδόμενος, it is easy to elicit εἶναι ἔοικε κηδόμενος, i. e. "seems to have had a care for you—"

² Taylor has, by an unaccountable mistake, "men eighty years old." On the senate of Sparta, called Γερουσία, see Meursius in Miscell. Lacon. § 4, and Cragius de Rep. Lacedæm. ii. 3, who have collected all that is known on the subject.

³ On the third saviour see Ast at Rep. ix. § 9, p. 583, B., who did not see that Plato wrote ὁ δ' αὖ τρίτος, ὡς σωτήρ—alluding to Theopompus, as shown by Plutarch in Lycurgus.

⁴ According, however, to Plutarch, in i. p. 43, E., the Ephori were appointed about thirty years after the time of Lycurgus. They were five in number.

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor; where, instead of οἱ τινες ἄρα, the sense requires, as I have translated, εἰ τινες ἄρα—

⁶ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, supplies the ellipse by "si fuissent—"

⁷ Here is evidently something wanting as the subject of ὁρᾶν. Hence foreseen these things, and had been able to render governments moderate, and to form one out of three, he would have preserved all the beautiful conceptions of that time, and neither the Persian expedition, nor any other, would have come against Greece, through despising us as being of little account.

Clin. You speak the truth.

Athen. Hence, Clinias, they defended themselves shamefully. Now by shamefully I mean, not that the persons of that time did not conquer by sea and land, and gain honourable victories; but what I call shameful at that time, I say is this. In the first place, that, out of those three states, (only) one fought in defence of Greece, but the other two were so miserably corrupted, that one of them (Messéné) prevented Lacedæmon from assisting her, (Greece,) by warring against it with all its strength; but the other, which had the first share at that period in the distribution, ¹that about Argos,¹ did, when called upon to repel the Barbarian, neither give ear nor assistance. But by detailing many things that occurred then relating to that war, a person might bring a charge against Greece by no means of a pleasant kind; nor would he, who should say that Greece defended herself, speak correctly; since, unless the policy in common of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians had warded off the slavery coming against them, there would have been mixed together nearly all the races of Greeks with each other, and Barbarians with Greeks, and Greeks with Barbarians; just as those, over whom the Persians are now the tyrants, are, after ²being carried away separately or together, and scattered abroad, made to settle down in a miserable state.² This, Clinias and Megillus, is what we have to urge against the men of old, called politicians and legislators, and likewise those of the present day, in order that, by seeking out the causes, we may Ficinus supplied the sense by translating, "exemplis commoveri." Perhaps δ δει has dropt out before εἰ δέ—

¹—The Greek is ἡ περὶ τὸ Ἄργος, which Ast says is an explanation of ἡ πρωτεύουσα. But though Ἄργος, or τὸ Ἄργος, might be so, ἡ περὶ could not be. In ἡ περὶ τὸ evidently lies hid ἡν περ εἶπον; for the allusion is to the διανομή mentioned in § 5, while Ἄργος would be the gl. for ἡ δ' αὖ—

²—This description may be applied to the very letter to the slaves, carried away singly or together, and compelled to settle formerly in the British West Indies, and even now in Spanish South America.

discover what else besides these ought to have been done, as we say for the present,¹ that it is not meet to lay down great or unmixed powers of rule, through considering this, that it is requisite for a state to be free and intellectual, and a friend to itself, and that a legislator ought looking to these points, to lay down laws. And let us not wonder if, after proposing (other)² things, we have frequently said that the legislator ought to look to these, while laying down laws, and that what have been proposed do not appear to us to be the same. But it is proper to infer that, when we say the legislator ought to look to temperance, or prudence, or friendship, our design is not different, but the same; ³and let not many other expressions of that kind, should they occur, disturb you.³

Clin. We will endeavour to do so by recurring to your reasoning.⁴ But for the present explain, ⁵what you mean by saying with respect to friendship, and liberty, and prudence, that a legislator ought to aim at those objects.⁵

[12.] Athen. Hear then now. There are, as it were, two mothers of polities, from which he, who says that all the rest are produced, will speak correctly. Now one of these it is right to call a monarchy, but the other a democracy; and to say that the race of the Persians possess the extreme of the one; but we of the other. Now nearly all the rest are, as I have said, variously formed from these. ⁶It is proper then, and necessary for (a state)⁶ to participate in both these, if there is to be freedom and friendship in conjunction with prudence. Now this our discourse intends to enjoin, by

² Ficinus has "alia quædam." For he found in his MS. ἀλλ' ἄττα correctly; since ἄττα cannot stand by itself.

³ Such is the exact version of the Greek. Ficinus has "ac si multis etiam aliis hujuscemodi verbis utemur, ne turbemini," literally translated by Taylor.

⁴ Here again Taylor was content to follow Ficinus' version, "verba ordine repetentes."

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were τὰ περὶ τῆς φιλίας—, πρὸς αὐτὰ, τί βουλόμενος, not τὸ περὶ—πρὸς ὅτι βουλομενος, where Ast has failed, I think, to make out the syntax.

⁶ Ficinus, by omitting δεῖ, and inserting "civitatem," shows that he found in his MS., what the sense requires, πόλιν δὴ οὖν—saying that a city is unable to be beautifully governed, while it is destitute of these properties.

Clin. For how can it?

Athen. When therefore the one embraces monarchy alone, but the other liberty more than is proper, neither of them¹ possess what is moderate in these.¹ Your cities however in Laconia and Crete (possess it) more (than others); and so too did the Athenians and Persians formerly, but now less so. Shall we go through the causes of this, or not?

Clin. By all means, if we wish to bring to an end what we have proposed for ourselves.

Athen. Let us hear then. The Persians under Cyrus possessed² more of moderation in slavery and freedom. At first they were free, but afterwards the masters of many others. For by sharing as rulers their freedom with the ruled, and leading them to an equality, the soldiers became greater friends with their commanders, and conducted themselves with alacrity in dangers. And if any one among them was intelligent and competent to give advice, as the king was not envious, and granted a liberty of speech, and honoured those, who were able to advise any thing, he brought into the midst of all the common power of intellect; and at that time every thing exhibited an improvement,³ through liberty, and friendship, and a communion of intellect.

Clin. It appears somehow that what has been stated did so occur.

Athen. How then was (that government)⁴ almost destroyed under Cambyzes, and again restored under Darius? ⁵ Are you willing for us, while thinking, to make use, as it were, of divination.⁵

Clin. This at least brings our inquiry to the point, whither we have been hastening.

² The Greek is ἤγον. But Ficinus found in his MS. εἶχον, as shown by his version, “habebant.”

³ I have adopted with all the modern editors Stephens's ἐπιδωκεν, instead of ἀπιδωκεν.

⁴ Ficinus, “regnum id fere,” as if he had found in his MS. ποτ' αὐτὰ ἀπώλετο σχεδόν—

⁵—⁵ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows literally, has “vultisne ut, quasi divinatione uti, dicamus,” as if his MS. read διαλεχθέντες instead of διανοηθέντες.

Athen. Respecting Cyrus, then, I thus divine; that in other respects he was a good general, and a lover of his country, but that he had not laid hold at all of a correct education, nor applied his mind to the regulation of his household.

Clin. How shall we say a thing of this kind?

Athen. He appears from his youth to have passed his life in the army, and to have committed to women the bringing up of his boys. Now these brought them up as persons fortunate immediately from their childhood, and born blessed, and indigent of nothing of these.¹ Hence they forbade any one to oppose them in any respect, as being ²sufficiently fortunate; ³and compelling every one to praise what was said or done by them, they brought them up ³being some such.³

Clin. You have detailed, as it seems, a beautiful education.

Athen. At least a feminine one, the women princesses having become recently rich, and bringing up the boys, during a scarcity of men, through the men not having leisure (to do so) in consequence of wars and many dangers.

Clin. So goes the story.

Athen. But their father possessed cattle and sheep and many herds of men, and of many other (animals); but he was ignorant that those, to whom he was to hand down all these things, were not instructed ⁴in his country's trade, which was a rough one, as the Persians were shepherds, the children of a rugged land,⁴ and competent to render the shepherds very strong, and able to live out of doors, and to be without sleep, and, if required,⁵ to become soldiers. But he disregarded the corruption of education by the so-called happiness of Media, and by his ¹ There is evidently some error in τούτων, which is omitted by Ficinus.

²⁻³ I am at a loss in ικανῶς εὐδαιμοσι, especially as εὐδαιμονας is repeated just before. Perhaps Plato wrote, οὐκ ὄνομ', ἰσοδαιμοσι—On ἰσοδαιμων, see Blomf. on Pers. 81.

⁴⁻⁴ The Greek is πατρῶαν—τίχνην οὖσαν Περσικὴν, ποιμένων ὄντων Περσῶν τραχείας χώρας ἐγόνων σκληρὰν, where Ast would reject all between οὖσαν and σκληρὰν, as an interpolation. But it will be sufficient to omit Περσικὴν, and to insert ἕτε before ποιμένων, as I have translated. Respecting the rugged country of Persia, see Herodotus i. 71; ix. 122.

⁵ Ficinus has, "et militare, si res postulare." For his MS. omitted στρατεύεσθαι, found in other MSS. before δέοι.

sons being instructed by women and eunuchs; from whence they became such as it was likely for those to become, who are brought up in luxury¹ unreprieved. Upon the death of Cyrus his sons came into the possession (of power), and being full of luxury and without reproof, at first one of them slew the other, through brooking ill an equality; and subsequently the survivor (Cambyzes) becoming mad through drinking and a want of education, lost his power through the Medes and the then called Eunuch,² who viewed with contempt his silly conduct.³

Clin. These things also are reported, and it seems they somehow happened nearly in this manner.

Athen. And it is said moreover that the power came again to the Persians through Darius and the seven.⁴

Clin. How not?

Athen. Let us then take a view,⁵ following out the reasoning. For Darius was not the son of a king, nor brought up in a luxurious manner. But coming to power, and receiving it,⁶ he divided it, himself the seventh (sharer), into seven portions, of which there are at present left some small dream-(like)⁷ remnants,⁸ and he thought proper to live, laying down laws (and) introducing a kind of equality common (to all);⁸ and he bound under law⁹ the tribute,¹⁰ which Cyrus had promised the Persians, (and) infusing into all the Persians a feeling of

¹ Ast was the first to correct τροφῇ into τροφῆ: to which he was probably led by finding in Ficinus, "in summa rerum licentia."

² The name of the Eunuch was Smerdis. See Herodot. iii. 61.

³ Ficinus has "quasi amentem contempserunt." Hence in one MS. μανίας. Perhaps Plato wrote both μανίας τε καὶ μωρίας, "his conduct at once mad and silly."

⁴ See Herodot. iii. 86. But as there were only seven conspirators, Valckenaer suggests ε (6) instead of ζ (7).

⁵ Perhaps θεωρῶμεν should be taken in the sense of a mental vision, and be translated, "Let us found a theory—"

⁶ Between λαβὼν and αὐτὴν I suspect μίαν has dropt out, i. e. "and receiving it as one—"

⁷ Compare Shakspeare's language in the speech of Prospero:

"And like the baseless fabric of a vision, Leave not a rack behind."

⁸⁻⁸ Ficinus, whom Taylor translates literally, has "censuitque vivendum esse sub legibus, ad communem quandam conferentibus æqualitatem."

⁹ In lieu of ἐνίδν Stephens elicited ἐνίδει, found subsequently in six MSS., from "complexus est," in Ficinus.

¹⁰ Respecting the tribute paid by the Persians, see Herodotus, i. 192; iii. 90.

interest, he attached to himself the masses in Persia, by money and gifts. ¹His armies therefore did with a good will add countries to his power¹ not less in number than what Cyrus had left. After Darius (came) Xerxes, who was again brought up with a royal and luxurious education. But it may be most just to ²say perhaps, "O Darius, thou hast not learned the evil conduct of Cyrus, but hast brought up³ Xerxes in the same manners, as Cyrus did Cambyses. He therefore, as being a child of the same education, has brought to pass what is very near to the sufferings of Cambyses; and from that time³ scarcely a single Persian king has become truly great except in name. Now the cause of this was not fortune, but, according to my reasoning, the vicious life, which the sons of those, who were remarkably rich and tyrannical, for the most part lived. For neither boy, nor man, nor old person, will ever become superior in virtue from such an education." And these are the matters which we say should be considered by a legislator, and by us likewise at present. But it is just, O Lacedæmonians, to give this praise to your state, that you never distribute any superior honour or food⁴ to poverty or wealth, or to a private station or a kingly one, which the oracle⁵ from some god has not at the first prophetically enjoined. For it is not proper in a state, ⁶to distribute to any one⁶ superior

¹—¹ Ficinus has, followed to the letter by Taylor, "ita dilectus a militibus—regiones ipse subjugavit."

²—² The Greek is ἴσως, δὲ τὸ Κύρου κακὸν οὐκ ἔμαθες, ἐθρέψω δὲ, where Stephens was the first to reject δὲ and to read ὥς—Ast, however, prefers ἴσως τὸ Κύρου—δὲ ἐθρέψω ἔπειθ'—Perhaps Plato wrote ἴσως τὸ Κύρου κακὸν, δὲ οὐκ ἔμαθες εὖ, ἐθρέψω δὲ, i. e. thou hast preserved the evil of Cyrus, which thou hadst not learned well.

³ Ficinus has "ex illo tempore." But that would be in correct Greek ἐκ γὰρ τοῦ τότε, not ἐκ γὰρ τοσούτου, which means either "after so great a person," or, "from such a long time."

⁴ In lieu of τροφήν Cornarius suggested ἀρχήν, to which he was led perhaps by "munera" in Ficinus. Boeckh and Ast however say that τροφή implies not only food, but education likewise.

⁵ To avoid the tautology in τὸ—θεῖον παρὰ θεοῦ, Ficinus has "oraculo." But Ast says that by τὸ θεῖον is meant Lycurgus, who is described in § 11, as φύσις ἀνθρωπίνῃ μεμιγμένη θεῖα. But in that case Plato would have written ἀνθρωπείον. Perhaps he did write τὸ—ἰθύνον, "the directing power—"

⁶—⁶ The Greek is κατὰ πόλιν γε εἶναι. But Ficinus found in his MS. κατὰ πόλιν τῇ νείμει, as shown by his version, "in civitate cuiquam conferre."

honours, because he is superior in wealth; nor because¹ he is swift-footed, or handsome, or robust, without some virtue, and not in the case of a virtue even, from which temperance is excluded.

Megil. ²How, guest, say you this?

[13.] Athen. Fortitude is surely one part of virtue.

Megil. How not?

Athen. Judge then yourself, after hearing my reasoning, whether you would admit any fellow-dweller or neighbour to be very brave, when not temperate, but profligate?

Megil. Speak good words.

Athen. What then, that an artist is wise in things of his art, but unjust?

Megil. By no means.

Athen. But justice could not be produced³ without temperance.

Megil. How could it?

Athen. Nor could he, whom we just now laid down to be wise, as possessing pleasures and pains, in harmony with, and following right reason.

Megil. Certainly not.

Athen. ⁴But let us still consider this too, touching the bestowing of honours in states, of what kind do they take place properly or not on each occasion.⁴

Megil. What?

Athen. Whether temperance, if it be alone in a soul without all the rest of virtue, can justly be a thing either of honour or dishonour?

Megil. I know not what to say.

Athen. You speak with moderation. For had you said either the one or the other, about which I asked the question,

² From hence to nearly the end of the book the conversation is carried on with Megillus, and not, as before, with Clinias. This arrangement, as Boeckh was the first to remark, is found in Ficinus.

³ On account of ἄν in the answer, we must read here φύειν ἄν in lieu of φύεται.

⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Taylor has translated the Latin of Ficinus, "Id præterea consideremus, ut quomodo inter cives honores recte vel non recte distribuantur, inspiciamus."

you would have appeared¹ to me at least to have spoken beside the measure.²

Megil. ³It would then have turned out well.³

Athen. Be it so. The addition then relating to honours and dishonours will be worthy not of a discourse, but rather of some irrational silence.⁴

Megil. You appear to me to mean temperance.

Athen. Yes. But that which benefits us the most of the others, would, in addition to its being honoured the most, be honoured the most justly; and that which is second (in benefit) would be second (in honour); and thus each thing obtaining, according to the reasoning in succession, its honours in due order, would obtain them justly.

Megil. Such is the case.

Athen. What then, shall we not say that it is the business of the legislator to distribute these?

Megil. And very much so.

Athen. Are you then willing for us to allow him to distribute all things, both pertaining to each work, and to trifling particulars? But with respect to making a triple division, let us endeavour, since we also are somehow desirous of laws, to divide the greatest, second, and third, apart from each other.

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. We say then that a state ought, as it seems, if it is about to be preserved happy to the utmost of human power, necessarily to distribute honours and dishonours in a proper manner. Now (to do so) properly, it is for the good things pertaining to the soul, to be laid down as the most honourable and the first in rank, temperance at the same time being present to it (the soul); and as the second in rank, the things beautiful and good pertaining to the body; and as the third in rank, the things pertaining to property and riches. But if any legislator or state proceeds beyond these, by leading either riches to honours, or by placing by means of honours in the ¹ I have adopted Boeckh's ἐδόκεις, similar to "videreris" in Cornarius, in lieu of δοκεῖς in some MSS., or δοκῆς in others.

² On the phrase παρὰ μέλος see at Phileb. § 49.

³⁻⁴ The Greek is Καλῶς τοίνυν γεγονός ἂν εἴη, which I cannot understand. Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "Bene igitur factum est."

⁴ Here again I am at a loss to understand ἀλόγου σιγῆς. Unless I am mistaken, Plato wrote τινος—οὐ λόγου, of which σιγῆς would be the interpretation, with a play upon λόγου and οὐ λόγου.

foremost rank any of the things in the rear, he will do a deed neither holy nor statesman-like. Is this to be held as said, or how?

Megil. Let it be held as said clearly.

Athen. The inquiry into the Persian polity has caused us to speak to a greater length on these points. And we find that they became much worse still;¹ and we say the reason was, that through their taking away too much of liberty from the people, and introducing a despotic power more than was proper, they destroyed the feeling of friendship and of a common interest in the city; and that, when this is destroyed, the deliberations of the rulers are not engaged in behalf of the governed and the people, but for their own power; (and)² should they think that something more, even if it were little, would accrue to themselves, they would, by destroying with fire³ cities overturned, and by (treating) friendly⁴ nations in an hostile and un pitying manner, at once hate and be hated.⁵ But when they come to the people during a time of need to fight for them, they find in them no such communion of interest,⁶ that any one is willing with alacrity⁶ to run a risk and to fight; and though they possess myriads, not to be defined in a calculation, yet they are all useless for war; and, as if in want of men, they hire some, and think they will be saved by mercenary and foreign troops; and added to this, they are compelled to act the part of simpletons, proclaiming by their acts,⁷ that the things constantly called honourable or beautiful in a state are a trifle as compared with silver and gold.

Megil. Entirely so.

[14.] Athen. Let then the subject of the affairs of the Persians, which are now administered not correctly through excessive slavery and despotism, have an end.

¹ In the Greek ἐπὶ ἔτι, to which Stephens was the first to object, evidently lies hid πολὺ ἔτι—Cousin would supply τοῦτοις after ἐπὶ—

² ⁴ The words within the luns have been supplied to complete the sense.

³ As the expression πυρὶ καταφείραντες is better suited to πόλεις than to ἔθνη, I doubt not it has been accidentally transposed.

⁵ On account of the preceding ἀν—ἡγῶνται, the syntax requires, as I have translated, μισοῦντ' ἀν in lieu of μισοῦνται.

⁶—⁶ The Greek is αὐ μετὰ προθυμίας τοῦ—I have translated as if it were ὥστε μετὰ προθυμίας τινα—

⁷ One MS. omits ἔργοις, which was originally written, I suspect, before λέγοντες, not after it.

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. But after this it is proper for us to go through in a similar manner the polity of Attica, ¹(that it may appear)¹ how perfect liberty even, exempt from all rule, is not a little worse than that, which has a moderation ²in rule under others.² For at the time, when the Persian invasion took place against the Greeks, and perhaps against almost all the inhabitants of Europe, our polity had been of long standing; and we had some four institutions framed with reference to a property-census;³ and a certain modesty too at that time was a despot, through which we were then willing to live in subjection to the laws. In addition to this, the magnitude of the expedition, extending over land and sea, brought on a fear not to be overcome, and caused us to endure a still greater submission to the rulers and the laws. And on all these accounts a violent friendship came upon us towards ourselves. For nearly ten years before the naval battle at Salamis, Datis had arrived, leading the Persian expedition of Darius, who had sent him distinctly against the Athenians and Eretrians, to reduce them to slavery, and to carry them off; and proclaiming ⁴death to him, if he did not do so. And Datis did in a very short time with his many myriads and by main force subdue them entirely;⁵ and he sent a certain dreadful report to our city,⁵ that not one of the Eretrians had escaped him; for that the soldiers of Datis had by joining hands to hands ⁶got, as into a net, the whole of Eretria.⁶ This report, whether arriving true or in any way whatever, struck with terror the other Greeks, and the Athenians likewise; and on their sending ambassadors every

²⁻² The Greek is in one MS. ἀρχῆς ὑφ' ἐτέρων. In all the others ἀρχῆς is omitted. It answers however to "magistratuum dominatione" in Ficinus, who omits on the other hand ὑφ' ἐτέρων: to which both Boeckh and Ast object, but are unable to correct it satisfactorily. Perhaps Plato wrote ὑφ' ἡγετόρων—without ἀρχῆς.

³ This alludes to the four divisions of the people made by Solon, and called respectively Πεντακοσιμέδωνοι, ἑκαπείς, Ζευγίται, and Θῆτες, as we learn from Plutarch, i. p. 87, F., and Aristotle Polit. ii. 10.

⁴ As there is nothing on which προειπών can depend, Plato probably wrote προειπόντος, to answer to the preceding πέμψαντος.

⁵⁻⁵ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "terribilisque inde rumor ad nos pervenit."

⁶⁻⁶ The Greek is συνάψαντες γὰρ ἅπα τὰς χεῖρας, where Valckenaer on Herodotus iii. 149, tacitly omits ἅπα. He should have read χερσὶ—where,¹ no one was willing to assist them, except the Lacedæmonians; and even they, through the war then raging against Messéné, or whether something else, as alleged,² prevented them,—for we know not,—arrived one day later than the battle that took place at Marathon. After this, mighty preparations and innumerable threats are said to have come from the king. But as time went on, Darius was reported to have died, and his son, young and violent, to have received from him the government, and by no means to have desisted from his (father's)³ undertaking. Now the Athenians were of opinion, that the whole of this preparation was against themselves, on account of what had occurred at Marathon; and hearing of Athos being dug through, and of (the shores) of the Hellespont being united, and of the great number of the vessels, they thought there was no safety for themselves by land or sea; ⁴for that none would assist them; as they recollected that, even when (the Persians) had come before, and had done thoroughly for the Eretrians, not one had given them assistance then,⁴ or had run a risk by fighting with them; and they expected the same thing would then take place, at least by land; and on the other hand, by sea they saw a want of all means of safety, since more than a thousand ships were being brought against them. They thought, however, upon a single source of safety, slender indeed and dubious, yet the only one, through their looking to what had previously occurred, how even then victory had appeared to spring out of difficulties, as they were fighting.⁵ Carried along upon this hope, they found their refuge rested in themselves alone and in the gods. All these things then ⁶engendered in them a friendship⁶ with each other, both the fear which was then present, and that which had been produced by the laws

² Plato alludes to the reason assigned by Herodotus vi. 106. See other reasons in Justin ii. 9, and Lucian Astrolog. § 25.

³ So Taylor follows the Latin of Ficinus, "a cæptis paternis desistere," where ἡρώπης is wanting in the Greek.

⁴— Here again Taylor has neglected the Greek entirely, and looked only to the Latin of Ficinus, "præsertim quia in nullius præsidio confidebant, quippe qui memoria tenerent neque tunc, cum primo illorum ingressu capti Eretrienses fuerant, quemquam sibi opem ferre."

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were μαχομένοις dependent on γασθῆσαι, not μαχομένους connected with νικῆσαι.

⁶—⁶ Ficinus has "majori inter se benevolentia copularunt—" before,¹ and which they had felt, when they were submitting to their former laws; (a fear) which we have frequently in the preceding discourse called modesty; to which we have said (all)² must be subservient, who are about to become good men; (and) of which he who is the slave³ is free and fearless; ⁴whom had not this fear seized,⁴ he would never have ⁵quickly come ⁵and defended himself and aided the sacred places, and tombs, and country, and all the rest of household ties, and friends, as he did aid at that time; ⁶but each of us would at that period have been routed in small parties, and scattered one hither and another thither.⁶

Megil. And very much so, guest; and correctly have you spoken, and in a manner becoming both to yourself and country.

[15.] Athen. Such is the case, Megillus. For it is just to mention to you, what happened at that time, as being a sharer in the nature of your parents. But do you and Clinias consider, whether we say what is suited to legislation. For I do not go through these matters for the sake of telling a story, but for the sake of what I am saying. For look ye. Since the same circumstance has in a certain manner happened to us, that did to the Persians, while they were leading the people to every kind of slavery, but we, on the contrary, turning the masses to every kind of⁷ freedom, how and what shall we say henceforth? ⁸The reasons that have previously occurred to us, have in a certain manner been detailed correctly.⁸

¹ Instead of τῶν ἐμπροσθεν, which I cannot understand, Ficinus has "jam pridem," for he found, no doubt, in his MS. τῷ ἐμπροσθεν—

² Ficinus alone has "omnes," adopted tacitly by Taylor.

³ In lieu of δουλος, Heusde, Heindorf, Faehse, and Ast justly read δοῦλος, similar to "quo quisquis afficitur" in Ficinus, translated by Taylor "a slave"—

⁴ The Greek is ὅν εἰ τότε μὴ δέος λαβεν. Ficinus has "ac nisi præsens ille metus pudori huic junctus fuisset—" But ὅν is to be referred to the person alluded to in δοῦλος, and hence I have translated as if the original reading were τόδε, not τότε—

⁵ The Greek is ξυνελθών, but as that could not be said of a single person, I have translated, as if the original were δέξας ἐλθών—On the loss or corruption of δέξας, see Porson in Adversar. p. 161, on Æsch. Suppl. 901.

⁶ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus has "ut fecisse narrantur; sed sparsi alius alio abiissent;" adopted in part by Taylor.

⁷ Instead of "all" Ficinus has "mere—"

⁸ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Taylor has translated the Latin of Ficinus, "habita jam verba et commode dicta quodammodo demonstrant."

Megil. You speak well. But endeavour to point out to us still more clearly what has been said just now.

Athen. This shall be. The people was not, my friends, according to the laws of old, the master of any, but did after a certain manner obey willingly the laws.

Megil. Of what laws are you speaking?

Athen. Those relating in the first place to music as then existing—in order that we may detail from the beginning the great progress made in a life of freedom. For music was then divided by us according to certain kinds and figures of itself;¹ and prayers to the gods was a kind of ode, and they were called by the name of hymns; and the contrary to this was another kind of ode, and a person would have called it lamentations for the most part;² and another was Pæans,³ and another the birth of Dionysus, called, I think,⁴ a Dithyramb: and they have called laws⁵ by this very name, as being another ode; and they have given the additional name of “harp music.” After these and some others had been ordained, it was not lawful to use one kind for another. But the authority to know any of these, and, after knowing, at the same time to judge of them, and to fine the person not obedient, was not the whistle⁶ nor certain uneducated noises of the multitude, as at present, nor yet the clatterings that express praise, but it was decreed that persons, who were conversant with education, should themselves hear to the end in silence; but for boys, and boy-leaders,⁷ and the numerous vulgar, there was ¹ I confess I cannot understand ἁντῆς, omitted by Ficinus.

² Instead of μάλιστα I should prefer καλλίστα—

³ The Pæans were hymns to Apollo, sung originally at Delphi to commemorate his killing the serpent, called Python.

⁴ This “I think” is said rather strangely by Plato, as if he did not know whether the Dithyramb did or did not relate to the birth of Dionysus. Cousin refers οἶμαι to the etymology given to διθύραμβος.

⁵ In Greek νόμος is literally “a distribution,” taken in a legal sense, the object of law being to give each person his own; but here it is applied in a musical sense to a measure or tune, that distributes the notes according to the laws of harmony. Specifically the musical “nomes” were sung in honour of Apollo, the god of music. Cousin has given another but less simple explanation.

⁶ Ast says that σύριγξ, “a reed,” is put here for the whistling sound made by a reed, and he refers to Muretus, Var. Lect. i. 19, and to Salmasius on Solinus, p. 156. Perhaps it answered to the English “cat-call.”

⁷ The boy-leaders are, I presume, thus put on a level with boys and the masses, because they were sometimes only manumitted slaves.

the admonition by a rod putting them in order. These things having been thus ordained,¹ the multitude of citizens were willing to be ruled, and not to dare to judge in a tumultuous manner. After this, as time went on, the poets (themselves) became the leaders of this uneducated lawlessness; being naturally indeed poetical, but ignorant with respect to what is just and lawful in music, they were acting like Bacchants, and possessed with joy more than was becoming, and were mingling lamentations with hymns, and pæans with dithyrambs, and imitated with harp music the music of the hautboy, and by bringing together all things to all they involuntarily, through their ignorance, asserted falsely that music did not possess any correctness whatever; but that it might be judged of most correctly by the pleasure of the party gratified, whether he were a better person or a worse. Composing, therefore, works of this kind, and adding to them words of this kind, they infused into the multitude a lawlessness with respect to music, and a daring of their being competent to judge. Hence theatres, from being silent, came to be noisy, as if capable of understanding what is beautiful or not in music; and instead of an aristocracy in it, a certain depraved theatrocracy was produced. For if only a democracy of free men had existed, nothing very dreadful would have taken place; but now from music there began an opinion with us respecting the wisdom of all men in all things, and a lawlessness, and after these did a licentiousness follow. For men became fearless, as if endued with knowledge; and this absence of fear generated shamelessness. For through boldness to feel no fear of the opinion of a better person, is almost a depraved shamelessness, (resulting) from a certain liberty that has dared too much.

Megil. You speak most true.

[16.] Athen. And consequent upon this liberty, there would arise that of being unwilling to submit to rulers; and following this, to fly from the submission to, and admonition of, a father and mother and elders, and to the being near the point of seeking to be not subject to laws; and (having arrived) at that point, to think nothing at all of oaths and faith and the gods; ² by

² Ficinus has "unde, ad priscam illam tyrannicamque revoluti naturam," exhibiting and imitating the ancient Titanic¹ nature, as it is called, so that, by again arriving at those² same things, they led a life of difficulty, and never ceased from ills. On what account then has this been said by us? It appears that I at least³ ought to pull up⁴ a discourse, like a horse, on each occasion,⁵ and not, by having its mouth without a bridle, to be carried away forcibly, and, according to the proverb, fall⁶ from the discourse, as from an ass. But I again ask⁷ what was just now said. On what account has this been mentioned?

Megil. Correctly so.

Athen. This then has been said on account of those?

Megil. Whom?

Athen. We have said that a legislator ought in laying down laws to aim at three things, how the state may, by being legislated for, become free, and friendly to itself, and possess a mind. These were the objects. Is it not so?

Megil. Entirely so.

Athen. For the sake of this we selected two kinds⁸ of goeadem illa iterum patiemur duraque secula rursus degemus," plainly proving that his MS. read τυραννικὴν for τιτανικὴν, and was defective in other respects, or that Ficinus himself did not understand what Plato was alluding to.

¹ To this passage Cicero alludes De Legg. "Noster vero Plato Titanum e genere statuit (esse) eos, qui, ut illi cœlestibus, sic hi adversentur magistratibus." From whence it is easy to perceive that instead of τὴν λεγομένην παλαιὰν Τιτανικὴν φύσιν ἐπιδεικνῦσι καὶ μιμουμένοις, Plato wrote τὴν λεγομένην πάλην Τιτανικὴν ἐπιδεικνῦσι καὶ φύσιν μιμουμένοις—"by exhibiting the so-called Titanic contest, and imitating their nature—"

² In lieu of ἐκείνα one would prefer τὰ Κρόνια, in allusion to the acts of the Titans, the allies of Κρόνος, who after their defeat were doomed to everlasting torments.

³ For the sake of the syntax we must read ἐμέ γε for ἐμοί γε, as I have translated.

⁴ This would be an English jockey's correct translation of ἀναλαμβάνειν.

⁵ As ἐκάστοτε could not be said of a single occasion, one would prefer ἀκατάστατον, "restless," similar to "stare loco nescit," in Virgil.

⁶ Instead of βία ὑπὸ τοῦ λόγου φερόμενον, it is evident at a glance that Plato wrote βία φερόμενον, ἀπὸ τοῦ λόγου, ὡς— With regard to the proverb ἀπ' ὄνου πεσεῖν, and the play upon it in ἀπὸ νοῦ πεσεῖν, see Aristoph. Νεφ. 1275, and Erasmus in Adag. Chil. i. Cent. 7. p. 200, who seems to have wished to read ἀπὸ νοῦ, ὡς ἀπ' ὄνου, πεσεῖν.

⁷ I have translated as if the Greek were ἐπανερωτῶ αὐ, not ἐπανερωτῶν. where the infinitive could hardly depend upon δεῖν.

⁸ Ficinus alone has "duas gubernationum species," from whence Boeckh elicited ἐνec εἶδη δύο from ἐνeca δὴ— vernment, one most despotic, and the other most free; and we were considering which of these is rightly administered. But on laying hold of each of them, as regards¹ a certain moderation, on the part of some to be despots, and of others to be free, we saw that then (in moderation) prosperity resulted to them in an eminent degree, but that when each party was proceeding to the extreme, the one, of slavery, and the other, of the contrary, no benefit had accrued to either these or those.

Megil. You speak most true.

Athen. And moreover, for the sake of these things, we looked into both the Doric army, and the country under the Dardan mountains, and the settlement by the sea, and first those persons who remained after the deluge; and moreover we had a previous conversation about music and drunkenness, and on subjects still prior to these. For all this has been mentioned, for the sake of seeing, how a state may be best administered, and how every one may individually best pass through life. Now, if we have done any thing of importance, what proof of error can be brought, Megillus and Clinias, against us?

Clin. I seem to myself, O guest, to have something in my mind. For it appears that the subjects of all the discourse, we have gone through, have arisen through some good fortune. For I have come almost in want of them at the present moment; and both you and Megillus here are by some opportune accident present. For I will not conceal from you what has just now occurred to me, but I will make it a kind of omen. For the greatest part of Crete is attempting at present to establish a certain colony, and orders the Cnossians to take the care of the matter; but the city of the Cnossians (imposes it) upon me and nine others; and at the same time orders us to lay down laws (taken) from this place, if any are pleasing to us, and, if there are any, from elsewhere, making no account of their foreign character, should they appear to be better. Let us then grant this favour² to myself and you. ³After making a selection out of what has been said,³ let us in our discourse form a state, and colonize it, as if from its commencement;

¹ By simply inserting εἰς between ἐκατέρω and μεριώρητα I have restored both syntax and sense,

² There is evidently some error here, which might, I think, be satisfactorily corrected.

³—³ Ficinus has, what makes better sense, "collectis undique legibus—" and there will be to us at the same time an inquiry into what we are in search of, and at the same time I may perhaps make use of this formation for the city that is to be.

Athen. You are not, O guest, proclaiming a war. And, unless there is some opposition on the part of Megillus, conceive that every thing on my side will be to the best of my power according to your mind.

Clin. You speak well.

Megil. And on my side likewise.

Clin. You both have spoken most beautifully. Let us then endeavour, in the first place, to form in our discourse a state.

BOOK IV.

[1.] Athen. COME then, what kind of state must we imagine it is to be? ¹ I mean that I am not asking what is its name now, nor what it will be necessary to call it in after-time; ¹ for this perhaps its colonization, or some spot, or the surname of some river or fountain, or of the gods of the place, may give their own appellation to the new state; but this is rather what I wish to ask concerning it, whether it is near the sea, or inland?

Clin. The state, of which we are now speaking, is, O guest, distant from the sea nearly eighty stadia.²

Athen. Are there any harbours along it, or is it entirely harbourless?

Clin. It has, as far as is possible, very good harbours, O guest.

Athen. Ho! ho! What say you? But is the country about it likewise all-prolific, or is it wanting in some things?

Clin. It is nearly in want of nothing.

Athen. Will there be any neighbouring state near to it?

Clin. Not very; on which account it is colonized. For an expulsion of the inhabitants having taken place of old in that spot, caused the country to be desolate for an immense space of time.

Athen. But with respect to plains, and mountains, and woods, how has it obtained by lot a portion of each?

² About eight miles.

Clin. It is wholly¹ similar to the rest of Crete.

Athen. Would you say it is more rough than plain?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. It is not therefore incurably unfit for the acquisition of virtue. For, if it were near the sea, and had good harbours, but not all-productive, but wanting in many things, it would require for itself some powerful preserver, and certain divine lawgivers,² unless being such naturally, it had been about to acquire³ many various and depraved manners.³ But now it has some consolation from its distance of eighty stadia. It is situated indeed nearer the sea than is becoming, by nearly as much that it has, as you state, good harbours. There is however this desirable circumstance. For a sea, being near to a country, ⁴brings something⁴ pleasant each day, although it is in reality a very brackish and bitter neighbour.⁵ For filling it through ⁶retail-trading with foreign commerce⁶ and money-making, it begets in the disposition a moral conduct tost backwards and forwards,⁷ and not to be trusted, and (renders) the state faithless and unfriendly to itself and to other nations likewise. It possesses however against these evils a consolation in being all-productive; since if it were rugged, it is evident that it would not be ⁸very productive and all-productive at the same ¹ Ficinus has "totius Cretæ," as if his MS. read ὅλης instead of ὅλη. And so Taylor. Eusebius, in Præp. Ev. xii. p. 617, offers ὅλη.

^{2—3} Such is the literal version of the unintelligible Greek. Perhaps Plato wrote ἵνα μὴ πολλά, ἃ γ' ἐμελλεν, ἦθῃ—ἔξου—similar to "ne contraheret" in Ficinus, in English—that it might not have, what it was about (to have), many—

³ On the mischief done to the morals of a people by living near the sea, Strabo, in vii. 9, refers to Plato, assigning, by a slip of the memory, to the Republic what he had read here in the Laws.

^{4—5} I have translated as if the Greek were originally τι νέμει, not, as at present, τὸ μὲν—

⁵ The expression ἀλμυρὸν γειτόνημα Plato is said to have taken from Alcman, the lyric poet, as we learn from the Scholiast on Aristides, quoted by Creuzer on Plotinus de Pulchritud. p. 464, who remarks that πικρὸν might perhaps be considered by some to be a gloss; for Aristotle says, Περὶ Αἰσθῆσ. iv. p. 1438, B., τὸ δὲ ἀλμυρὸν καὶ πικρὸν σχεδὸν τὸ αὐτὸ: but such is not his own opinion.

^{6—8} On the difference between ἐμπορος and κάπηλος see at Sophist, § 19.

⁷ Timæus rightly explains καλίμβολος by πολυμετάβολος καὶ ἐπὶ μὲν γνώμῃ μὴ μένων, similar to the description given by Virgil of a woman, "varium et mutabile semper."

^{8—9} This I confess I cannot understand. I could have understood, time.⁸ For possessing this (advantage), by possessing a great export-trade, it would in return be filled with gold and silver coin in abundance;¹ than which a greater evil cannot, so to say, exist, (comparing) one thing with another, in a state, as regards the possession of manners generous and just, as we stated, if we remember, in our previous discourse.

Clin. We do recollect; and we concede that we were then and we are now speaking correctly.

Athen. But how is the country situated as regards timber for ship-building?

Clin. There is not any fir worth mentioning, or pine, and not much cypress; and a person would find little of larch, or plane-trees, which it is necessary for shipwrights to make use of for the inner parts of vessels.

Athen. And this too would not be ill for the nature of the country.

Clin. How so?

Athen. Because it is good for a city to be unable to imitate easily its enemies in mischievous imitations.

Clin. To which of the subjects that have been mentioned have you, after looking, said what you are now stating?

[2.] Athen. Do thou, O excellent man, ² watch me, looking to what was said at the beginning, the question about the Cretan laws, how they looked to one thing.³ And you two asserted that this very thing was what regards war; but I, taking you up, said, that when ¹ such laws, being laid down, looked to

"since, had it been rugged, it would not have been very productive, much less all-productive I think," in Greek, οὐκ ἂν πολύφορος γε εἴη, μή τι γε πάμφορος, οἶμαι. Ast however says that Ficinus has correctly translated, "cumque silvosa sit et aspera, licet omnia ferat, non tamen abunde omnia; nam si esset ad omnia ferax et fœcunda—" And so Taylor to the letter.

¹ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "multum auri atque argenti," as if his MS. read πολλοῦ in lieu of πάντων—

^{2—3} Ast says that after φύλαττε, "watch," is to be supplied "if perchance I say what is at variance with previous assertions." But such an ellipse is not, I suspect, to be found elsewhere in Plato; who probably wrote here Ὁ δαμόνιε, ἐφύλαττές μ' εὖ, εἰς τὸ κατ' ἀρχὰς εἰρημένον ἀποβλέπων περὶ τῶν Κρητικῶν νόμων—Well hast thou, O excellent man, watched me while looking to what was said at the beginning about the laws of Crete, that they looked to one thing—where I have omitted τὸ before περὶ—To avoid however all the difficulties of the text, Ficinus omits ὡς πρὸς ἓν τι βλέπειν: and so too does Taylor; but he translates "I am looking," as if the Greek were ἀποβλέπω, not ἀποβλέπων.

virtue, it was well; but when¹ only to a part, but not to the whole almost of virtue, I did not entirely agree. Do you then still again watch² my present³ legislation, while following me, if perchance I lay down any law not tending to virtue, or to a part of virtue. For I make it a fundamental position, that he alone lays down a law correctly, who, like an archer, ever aims at that, on which alone some of those things that are ever beautiful⁴ follow close, but who leaves all the rest, whether it be wealth or any thing else of that kind, which happens to exist without those before mentioned. And I said on one side, that the imitation of enemies would be then⁵ mischievous, when any one residing near the sea is annoyed by enemies, as for instance—for I will relate (it) to you, although not wishing to remind you of a past annoyance—when Minos imposed the payment of a tribute upon the inhabitants of Attica, through his having acquired a great power by sea.⁶ But the Athenians did not at that period possess, as they do now, ships of war, nor a country abounding in wood, suited for ship-building, so as to exhibit with facility a naval power. Hence they could not, through nautical imitation, become immediately sailors themselves at that time, and defend themselves against their enemies. And it would have been for their advantage to have lost many times ⁷seven young men,⁷

¹ I have twice translated as if the Greek were ὄρε, not ὄρι—Ficinus has “quoniam—quoniam,” adopted by Taylor.

² As Clinias had been already said to be on the watch, he and his friend Megillus could not be ordered “to watch in return;” but they might be “to watch still again.” Hence I have translated, as if the Greek were αὐ εἶρι φυλάξατε, not ἀντιφυλάξατε.

³ Before τῆς παρούσης the article τὰ has evidently dropt out; for otherwise the genitive would be without regimen, and so too would the verb transitive.

⁴ Bekker retains here καλῶν, acknowledged by Ficinus, as shown by his version, “aliquid eorum, quæ bona sunt.” But Ast would read καλόν, found subsequently in four MSS., and taking τίθεσθαι passively, compare the law, and not the law-giver, to an archer, as in Legg. xi. p. 934, B., § 12, τοὺς νόμους τοξότου—στοχάζεσθαι δίκην. But as παραλείπη must be said of a person, not a thing, we must adopt the ordinary version.

⁵ Instead of τὴν κακὴν τοιάνδε, Ficinus found in his MS. κακὴν τότε—For his version is “improbram tunc—”

⁶ To the naval power of Minos allusion is made by Thucydides, i. 4, while the circumstances relating to the tribute are detailed by Diodorus, iv. 60, and Ovid. Met. vii. 556.

⁷ Such was the tribute the Athenians were required to pay.

before ¹(suffering what happened to them. For,) ¹instead of being foot-soldiers, with heavy arms, and remaining firm,² they were accustomed, on becoming sailors, frequently to leap with a run into and upon the vessels, and to come back again quickly; and to think they were doing nothing disgraceful in not daring to die, by waiting for the attacks of the enemy advancing; and there were pretexts plausible and ready to those throwing away their arms, and making, as they said, not disgraceful flights; for language of this kind³ is wont to arise from naval heavy-armed troops⁴—(language) by no means worthy ⁵of unbounded praise, but very much the contrary.⁵ For it is never proper to accustom persons to mischievous habits, and this too the best part of the citizens. And it is surely possible to understand this from Homer, that such conduct is not honourable. For with him Ulysses abuses Agamemnon for exhorting the Greeks, at that time pressed down by the Trojans in fight, to draw down their ships to the sea, and he (Ulysses) is harsh against him (Agamemnon), and says, (Il. xiv. 96,)

Thou bid'st, while e'en of war, still standing round,
The clamour's heard, our well-bench'd ships to drag
Seaward, that, what the Trojans oft have wish'd,
Their prayers may be accomplish'd, and 'gainst us
The scale from on high Death turn. But ne'er will Greeks
Hold to the fight, while ships to sea are drawn;
But frighten'd look, and from the fray retreat.
Such hurt will bring the counsel thou dost preach.

He too knew then that three-banked galleys standing near⁶

¹—¹ The words between the lunes are found only in the Latin of Ficinus, which Taylor has translated “quod illis accidit perpeti; nam.”

² In lieu of νομίμων, which is unintelligible, Ficinus found in his MS., with which all but one agree, μονίμων, as shown by his version “terrestribus firmisque copiis;” and so read Plutarch, i. p. 363, F., ἀντὶ μονίμων ὀπλιτῶν κατὰ Πλάτωνα ναῦται γενόμενοι.

³ From “hujusmodi,” in Ficinus, Coray was led, on Plutarch i. p. 208, 20, to suggest τοιαῦτα for ταῦτα, adopted by Bekker.

⁵—⁵ The Greek is ἐπαίωνων πολλακίς μυρίων ἀλλὰ τούναντίον. But Ficinus has “non laude quidem ulla sed vituperatione summopere dignas,” which leads to ἐπαίωνων μυρίων ἀλλὰ πολλακίς τοῦ ἐναντίον.

⁶ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows literally, has “ad pugnantium fugam were an evil to heavy-armed soldiers while fighting at sea. For even lions would, by adopting similar conduct, be accustomed to fly from stags. Moreover the states, when power and safety depend upon a navy, do not bestow honours ¹ on the most beautiful of warlike concerns.¹ For an account of the pilot's art,² and the rower's art, and that which is connected with persons of various kinds and of no great worth, no one could bestow upon each individual honours in a proper manner. And yet how can a polity deprived of this exist correctly?

Clin. It is nearly impossible. But yet, O guest, we Cretans say that the naval battle, which took place at Salamis, of the Greeks against the Barbarians, has preserved Greece.

Athen. And indeed many both of the Greeks and Barbarians assert the same thing. But we, my friend, both I and Megillus here, say, that the battle of foot-soldiers at Marathon and Platææ did one of them begin, and the other complete, the safety of the Greeks; and some made the Greeks paratas," omitting ἐν θαλάττῃ παριστῶσαι. With regard to the sentiment in the text, it was proposed by some of the Athenians to burn all their vessels, previous to the last decisive battle, in the harbour of Syracuse, and to march their army by land through Sicily; for the enemy would not be able to follow them thither, and the troops would conduct themselves with greater fortitude, when they saw all means of retreat cut off. See Thucyd. vii. 60.

¹— This I can hardly understand. For honours were most assuredly bestowed on those who excelled in war. Hence in lieu of πολεμικῶν one would prefer πολιτικῶν, "statesmanlike."

² Between κυβερνητικῆς γὰρ and καὶ ἱετικῆς the text has καὶ πεντηκονταρχίας, which means, says Ast, "the command of a ship with fifty rowers," referring to Jul. Pollux i. 119, and he might have added i. 96. But though the word πεντηκόνταρχον is found in Demosthenes, p. 1212, 21, R., as applied to the officer over fifty rowers, yet here the question is not about the number of rowers, or even of soldiers on board, but about a specific art, requisite in all vessels. Hence, unless I am greatly mistaken, in καὶ πεντηκονταρχίας lies hid καὶ κελευστικῆς καὶ ἀναρχίας: of which καὶ κελευστικῆς should follow κυβερνητικῆς γὰρ and καὶ ἀναρχίας come after καὶ ἱετικῆς; for otherwise the subsequent γιννομένης will want its noun. With regard to the office of κελευστής, it will be sufficient to refer to Alcibiad. i. p. 125, C., Ἄρα κελευστῶν χρωμένων ἱπταίς; Ναί. Κυβερνητικὴ γὰρ αὕτη γέ ἀρετὴ: where the same three things are united, and all relating to the arts required in vessels. Then as regards ἀναρχίας, the sailors of old were, like those of more modern times,—witness the mutiny at the Nore in 1797—accustomed to disregard discipline; and hence Euripides has in Hec. 611, ναυτικὴ τ' ἀναρχία.

better, but some not better, so to say of the battles that conjointly saved us at that time ; for to the naval battle at Salamis I will add the one at Artemisium. But now, looking to the virtue of a polity, let us consider the nature of the region, and the order of the laws ; not thinking, as the many do, that to be preserved and to exist is alone to mankind the most honourable of all things, but to become the best, and to continue to be so, for as long a period as they may live. But this, I think, has been stated by us in the former part of our discourse.

Clin. How not ?

Athen. Let us then consider this alone, whether we are proceeding in the same path as being the best for states, touching their settlement and legislation.

Clin. (Let us do so) very much.

[3.] Athen. Tell me, then, what is next in order to this, what are the people, who are to be the colonists ; whether any one (may go), who is willing from the whole of Crete, since the masses have become in the cities more numerous than according to the quantity of food to be got from the land ? For you surely do not bring together whoever of the Greeks is willing (to go). And yet I see that some persons from Argos, and Ægina, and other parts of Greece, have settled themselves in the country amongst you. But for the present, tell me, from whence do you say there will be an army of citizens ?

Clin. It seems it will be from the whole of Crete ; and of the rest of the Greeks it appears that (the colonizers) will receive persons from Peloponnesus, as fellow-settlers for the most part. For, what you were saying just now, you said truly, that there are some from Argos, and the race, which has the highest character here at present, is that of Gortyna, because it happens to have settled there¹ from Gortyna in the Peloponnesus.

Athen. The establishment of a colony would not take place in states with equal facility, when one family, like a swarm of bees, going from one country settles down, friends from friends, after having been, as it were, besieged by a certain want of space, or compelled by some other sufferings of a similar kind. For it sometimes happens that a part of a city is forcibly driven out by seditions and compelled to migrate as strangers to some other spot ; and sometimes a whole city has exiled itself, after being thoroughly vanquished in war. In all these cases then it is easy for one to be colonized and governed by laws, but difficult for another. For when a colony is of one race, and has the same language, and the same laws, it possesses a kind of friendship, as being a partaker in the same holy rites, and every thing else of a similar kind, nor does it easily endure other laws, and a polity foreign to what it had at home. And sometimes a colony, having revolted through the badness of its laws, and through custom still seeking to adopt the very same habits as those, by which it was previously corrupted, becomes refractory and disobedient to its colonizer and legislator. But on the other hand a colony, composed of all kinds of people flowing together to the same point, will perhaps be more willingly obedient to certain new laws ; but to conspire together, and, like a pair of horses to froth together,¹ as the saying is, individually to the same point, is the work of a long time and very difficult. Nevertheless legislation and the colonization of states is a thing the most effective of all for virtue in man.

Clin. It is probable ; but tell me more clearly, looking to what have you said this ?

[4.] Athen. I appear to myself, good sir, while praising² and speculating about legislators, to be about to say something

¹ The MSS. generally read ξυμφυσῆσαι, "to weld together," translated by Ficinus, "unum idemque—efflare." But that would be a tautology merely after ξυμπνεῦσαι. One MS. has ξυμφῦσαι, which leads to ξυν-αφρίσαι, "to froth together," which a pair of horses would do by making similar exertions. The word ἀφρίζειν is applied to horses in a chariot-race by Sophocles in El. 70, and hence in Aristophanes, Eip. 902, "Ἀρματα δ' ἐπ' ἀλλήλοισιν ἀνατετραμμένα Φυσῶντα καὶ πνέοντα προσκινήσεται, where since φυσῶντα is the same as πνέοντα we may read 'Ἀφρίσαντα, similar to the expression in Petronius, "inter sudores anhelitusque." There are however those, who would be content with "puffing and blowing," as the version of φυσῶντα καὶ πνέοντα.

² One MS. has ἐπαινῶν, adopted by Bekker in lieu of ἐπαινῶν, which Ast refers to the words spoken just before, ἐστὶ νομοθεσία—τελειώτατον πρὸς ἀρετὴν ἀνδρῶν. But in that case Plato would have written εἰρηκέναι: for ἐρεῖν has always a future sense. On the other hand, ἐπαινῶν, "returning," could hardly be said here ; for the subject of the laws had not been lost sight of. Hence I should prefer ἐπατῶν, "knowing—" The two verbs ἐπαινέειν and ἐπατῶν have been similarly interchanged in Hipp. Maj. p. 291, D., and Euthyd. § 79, as remarked by Heindorf.

unimportant. But if we shall say aught opportunely, it would be no matter. And yet why do I feel a difficulty? for nearly all human affairs appear to exist in this manner.

Clin. Of what are you speaking?

Athen. I was about to say, that no man is ever a legislator; but that fortune and all kinds of accidents, happening in all kinds of ways, are our legislators. For either a war by violence has overturned politics and changed laws, or the want of means arising from severe poverty. Many innovations too diseases compel men to make, through pestilences falling upon them, and unfavourable seasons during many years. He then, who foresees all this, will be eager¹ to exclaim, as I just now did, that no mortal was ever a legislator, but that nearly all human affairs are accidents; and that it is possible for him, who asserts all this respecting navigation, and the arts of the pilot, and physician, and general, to appear to speak correctly. But on the other hand, it is equally possible for the person (to appear) to speak correctly on these points, who says this.

Clin. What?

Athen. That a god, and, together with a god, fortune and opportunity govern all human affairs; but that it is necessary to admit that art, a somewhat milder power, follows them. For on the occasion of a storm I should consider it a thing of great moment for the pilot's art to take a part, or not. Or how (say you)?

Clin. Thus.

Athen. Will not the same reasoning apply similarly in the case of other things? And we must attribute the very same principle to legislation; that, other things concurring which ought to happen to a country, if it is about to live happily, it is requisite for a legislator, who adheres to truth, to fall on each occasion upon a state of such a kind.

Clin. You speak most true.

Athen. Would not he then, who possesses an art for each of the above-mentioned occasions, be justly able³ to pray for something to be present¹ with him through fortune, should he be wanting² only in art?

¹ Instead of ἀξίσειν Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἀξιώσειν, for his version is "non verebitur," translated by Taylor "will think fit."

² This is the only rendering of μέγα πλεονέκτημα suited to the context. But such is not the usual meaning of πλεονέκτημα.

³ One would rather expect "be said" than "be able—"

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And all the rest just now mentioned would, if commanded to tell their prayers, say so. Is it not so?

Clin. How not?

Athen. And a legislator likewise would, I think, do the same.

Clin. So I think.

Athen. Come then, Legislator, (and say)—for let us address him—a city possessing what, and being in what state, shall we give you,³ and you take and hold,³ so that you may administer sufficiently, from the things remaining,⁴ the city? What is it possible to assert rightly after this? ⁵Shall we not say surely something belonging to the legislator? For it is meet.⁵

Clin. It is.

Athen. This. Give me a city governed by a tyrant, he will say; and let the tyrant be a young man, of a good memory, and docile, and brave, and naturally of a magnificent disposition; and let that, which, we said before, ought to follow all the parts of virtue, now accompany the soul of the tyrant, if there is about to be any benefit from the presence of the other qualities.

Clin. Our guest, Megillus, appears to me to say that temperance should follow the other virtues. Is it not so?

Athen. Yes, temperance, Clinias, in its popular sense, and not that, which any one in solemn phrase would call prudence, and compel it to be temperance; but that feeling which, inherent in boys and savage animals, bursts into flower

² One MS. has, what the syntax demands, ἐπιδέρ. Ficinus has “nec alia re, præterquam artificio, opus sit.” From which it is difficult to discover what he found in his MS.

^{3—3} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁴ Ast says that ἐκ τῶν λοιπῶν means “hereafter—” But till such a meaning is confirmed by sufficient examples, I shall continue to believe that Plato wrote ἐκ τῶν λεγομένων, “after what has been said—”

^{5—5} The Greek is ἀρα τοῦ νομοθέτου φράζωμεν τοῦτο; ἢ γάρ; which, Stalbaum says, labours under some great corruption. He would therefore read ἀρα τὸ τοῦ—with Ast, and reject τοῦτο, and ἢ γάρ likewise, as it is wanting in Ficinus. I have however translated, as if Plato had written ἀρα τοῦ νομοθέτου φράζωμεν πού τι ὄν; δεῖ γάρ.

on the instant, so that some are incontinent¹ with respect to pleasures, but others continent; and which we said,² when it exists apart from the many things called good, is not worth mention. For you understand what I am saying?

Clin. Perfectly.

Athen. This nature, then, let our tyrant possess in addition to those (mentioned above), if the city is about to have a polity in the quickest and best manner possible, and on the receiving of which it may live the most happily. For there neither is, nor will there ever be, the establishment of a polity more rapid or better than this.

Clin. But how, O guest, and by what argument would any one, who asserts this, persuade himself that he is speaking correctly?

Athen. It is easy, Clinias, to understand how this is so naturally.

Clin. How say you? Do you assert,³ if the tyrant is a young man, temperate, docile, of a good memory, brave, (and) magnificent?

Athen. Add too fortunate⁴ in nothing else, except in that during his time a legislator is existing worthy of praise, and that a certain fortune leads the two to the same point. For, on this taking place, there is brought to pass by a god nearly every thing which (is done), when he wishes any state to be eminently prosperous; and in the second degree, when two rulers are of such a kind; and in the third degree, (when three);⁵ and in a similar proportion more difficult, (as the rulers)⁶ are more numerous; ⁷but, the contrary, by how much the contrary happens.⁷

¹ How the idea of temperance can be thus mixed up with that of incontinence, I certainly cannot understand. Others, I hope, will be more fortunate.

² In iii. § 12, p. 696, D.

³ The Greek is ἐὶ τύραννος γένοιτο, ὄψς, νέος— But as there is an allusion to what had been stated just before, Plato wrote, I suspect, ὅν, τύραννος ἐὶ γένοιτο, ἐφς, νέος— “Did you not say, if a tyrant were young—”

⁴ I have followed Ast in assigning Εὐτυχής to the Athenian, not, as Stephens did, to Clinias, misled, it would seem, by Ficinus.

^{5, 6} Ficinus has alone preserved the words, requisite for the sense, in his version, adopted by Taylor, “tertio loco, si tres; et, successionis eadem ratione servata, eo difficilius, quo plures.”

⁷⁻⁷ Ficinus has paraphrased this, “atque contra, quo pauciores, eo facilius.”

Clin. You assert, as it seems, that the best state would result from a tyranny, in conjunction with a superior legislator and a well-regulated tyrant; and that it would most easily and rapidly change ¹ into that from such a kind as this; ¹ and that the second in degree is from an oligarchy; and ² the third in degree, from a democracy. Is it not so? ²

Athen. By no means. But the first is produced from a tyranny; the second, from a regal polity; the third, from a certain democracy; but with respect to the fourth, an oligarchy would be able to receive a generation of this kind with the utmost difficulty. For in it there are the greatest number of the powerful. Now we say, that these things then take place, when a legislator is naturally true, and when there exists in him a strength in common with those, who possess the greatest influence in the state. But where this exists the fewest in number, but at the same time the most strong, as in the case of a tyranny, in this way and then there is wont to take place a rapidity and easiness in the change.

Clin. How? For we do not understand.

Athen. And yet I think this has been said by us, not once, but often. But perhaps you never saw a state under a tyrant.

Clin. Nor am I desirous of such a spectacle.

Athen. And yet you may see it in the one just now spoken of.

Clin. What?

Athen. That the tyrant, who wishes to change the habits of a state, has no need either of (great) ³ labour, or any very long time for the accomplishment of his purpose. For ⁴ it is necessary that he should proceed the first in whatever road he wishes, either to turn the citizens to the pursuit of virtue, or the contrary, and mark out the course by acting himself the first, and praising and honouring some things, but bringing a ¹—¹ The Greek is εἰς τοῦτο ἐκ τοῦ τοιούτου, which I hardly understand. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "ex illa in hanc:" but οὗτος and ὁ τοιοῦτος are not opposed to each other in Greek, as "ille" and "hic" are in Latin.

²—² So Ficinus correctly. The Greek is ἡ πῶς λέγεις; καὶ τὸ τρίτον ἐκ δημοκρατίας. But ἡ πῶς λέγεις could not be thus introduced between the second and third assertion. It is true however that οὐδαμῶς could not give the answer to πῶς, but it might to οὕτως, what Plato probably wrote, not ἡ πῶς.

³ Ficinus has "multo labore," as if his MS. read πολλῶν πόνων, not πόνων simply.

⁴ In lieu of δὲ one would prefer γὰρ, similar to "nam" in Ficinus.

blame upon others, and disgracing the party that is disobedient in each of these doings.

Clin. And how can we imagine¹ that the other citizens will quickly follow him, who has obtained such persuasion, and at the same time force?

Athen. Let no one persuade us, friends, that a state has ever changed² its laws more quickly and easily by any other way than the leading of its rulers, or that this happens now by any other means, or will happen ever again. For that indeed is neither impossible for us, nor would it be done with difficulty. But this is the thing difficult to be done, and has rarely taken place in a long time; although, when it does happen, it produces in the state, in which it is found, ten thousand, or rather every good thing.

Clin. Of what are you speaking?

Athen. When a divine love of temperate and just pursuits is inherent in certain mighty powers, whether they rule according to a monarchy, or a marked superiority in wealth or family, or should any one bring back the nature of Nestor, who they say excelled all men in the power of speaking, and still more in temperance. But this, as they say, took place in the times of Troy, but in ours not at all. If then such a man existed formerly, or shall exist, or is at present amongst us, he lives in a blessed state, and blessed too are those, who hear the words proceeding from his temperate mouth. Of a similar kind is the reasoning respecting all power, that, when the greatest power of a man falls to the same point with the acting prudently and temperately, then the production of the best polity and of such kind of laws takes place, but otherwise it will never be. Let this then be held to be spoken oracularly, as if it were a story detailed,³ and to have been shown, that in one way it is difficult for a state to have good laws, and in another, that, if what we have said should take place, it would have them in a manner the quickest and the easiest by far.

¹ One MS. has πανταχοῦ μέγα οἰόμεθα, similar to "ubique magnum quid aut arduum existimabimus—" adopted by Cousin.

² On account of the following, μηδὲ νῦν γίγνεσθαι μηδὲ αὐθις ποτε γενήσεσθαι, it is evident that a past tense is required here, μεταβαλεῖν, found in one MS., without ἀν, or what would be preferable, μεταβεβληκέναι.

³ Unless I am mistaken, Plato wrote not οὐκ καταπερί, but οὐκ, οὐ καθάπερ γραυσί, similar to ὥσπερ γραδὸς μῦθος in Gorg. p. 527, A., and ὥσπερ ταῖς γραυσὶ ταῖς τοῦ μύθου λεγούσαις, in Rep. i. p. 350, E.

Clin. How so?

Athen. Let us now endeavour, by adapting our laws to your state, to mould it, as old men do boys,¹ by our discourse.

Clin. Let us go this road, and no longer delay.

[5.] Athen. But let us call upon a god for the preparation of the state. And may he hear, and hearing come to us, in a propitious and kind manner, to adorn, in conjunction with us, the state and laws!

Clin. May he come!

Athen. But what kind of polity have we in our mind to enjoin upon the state?

Clin. Inform me still more clearly what you wish to say; for instance, whether it is a certain democracy, or oligarchy, or aristocracy, or a regal government. For you would not surely speak of a tyranny, as we should imagine.

Athen. Come, then, which of you is willing to answer first, by stating what is the polity at home?

Megil. Is it not more just for myself, who am the elder, to speak first?

Clin. Perhaps so.

Megil. When I consider, guest, the polity of Lacedæmon, I am unable to tell you what I ought to call it thus.² For it appears to me to be similar to a tyranny. For the power of the Ephori in it is wonderfully tyrannical. And yet it sometimes appears to me to be the most similar of all states to a democracy. But, on the other hand, not to say that it is an aristocracy, is perfectly absurd. There is in it likewise the office of a king for life, which is said, both by all men, and by us too, to be the most ancient of all. On being then asked thus suddenly, I cannot, as I have said, by a definition, tell you which of these polities it is.

Clin. I too, Megillus, appear to be affected in the same manner as yourself. For I am quite at a loss as to which of these I should firmly assert the polity in Cnossus to be.

Athen. For you, most excellent men, do really³ participate

² Ficinus, probably through not understanding οὕτως, has omitted it. Plato wrote, I suspect, ἀπλῶς, “simply.”

³ Ficinus has “Veræ—reipublicæ :” which has led me to believe that 713 in politics. But those, which we now name such, are not politics, but settlements of cities, ruled over, and a slave to¹ some portions of each other, and each is denominated from the power of the ruler. But if it were meet for a city to be called after this manner, it ought to be called by the name of the god, who is the ruler of those that possess truly a mind.

Clin. Who is this god?

Athen. Must we then still to a small extent make use of a fable, if we are about to explain in a careful manner what has been just now asked? Is it not meet to do so in this way?

Clin. By all means.

[6.] Athen. A long time antecedent to that of the cities, whose settlement we have before gone through, there is said to have existed in the time of Saturn a certain government of, and dwelling in, them extremely happy, and of which that, which is now administered the best,² exhibits an imitation.

Megil. It would as it seems be very requisite to hear about it.

Athen. It appears so to me; and hence I have brought the subject amongst us during our conversation.

Megil. And you have done so most correctly; and you will act very correctly too in bringing to an end the fable in due order as far as it is suitable.

Athen. I must do as you say. We have received then a report of the happy life of the persons living of that period, how it possessed all things without stint and produced spontaneously. Of this state of things the cause is said to have been something of this kind. Saturn, well knowing, as we have already detailed, that no human nature, when administering with absolute power the affairs of man, is so sufficient, as not to be filled with insolence and injustice, did, from reflecting upon this, place over our cities, as kings and rulers, Plato wrote "Ὅντως γὰρ, ὃ ἄριστοι, ἀρίστων πολιτειῶν, with the usual play on the words ἀριστοι ἀρίστων. See my note on Æschyl. Suppl. 304.

¹ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has more correctly "in quibus una pars servit alteri." For he thus avoids the tautology in δεσποζομένων καὶ δουλευουσῶν. And hence his MS. probably read δεσποζόντων—

² In lieu of ἀριστοκρατεῖται, acknowledged by Ficinus, whose version is "ab optimatibus gubernatur," Stephens mentions a var. lect., ἀρίστα οἰκεῖται, subsequently found in two MSS., and similar to ἀρίστα οἰκοῖν, in iii. § 16, p. 702, A.

not men, but Dæmons of a more divine and excellent race; 'just as we now do, by placing some men over flocks of sheep¹ and such herds of cattle as are tame. For we do not make oxen rulers of oxen, nor goats of goats; but we ourselves rule over them, as being of a better race than them. The same thing does² the god, who being a lover of mankind has placed over us the race of Dæmons, as being better than us; which through the great inactivity³ on their part, and great too on ours, has taken care of us, and by imparting to us peace and modesty and good legislation⁴ and abundance of justice, rendered the human race exempt from sedition, and happy. And now this our discourse, employing (the language of) truth, asserts, that of such states as not a god but some mortal governs, there is to them no escape from evils and labours; but it conceives that we ought, by every contrivance, to imitate the life, said to have been under Saturn; and, as far as immortality is in us, by being obedient to it, to administer both publicly and privately our houses and cities, calling law the distribution of mind. For should one man, or an oligarchy, or even democracy, possess a soul eager after pleasures and desires, and requiring to be filled with these, and retaining nothing,⁵ but connected closely with an⁶ evil not to be finished, and a disease not to be filled,⁶ and should such ¹—¹ The Greek is ὅλον νῦν ἡμεῖς δρῶμεν τοῖς ποιμνίαισι, where the dative is without regimen. Hence, since the words αὐτοῖσι τινας are found shortly afterwards following ποιοῦμεν, where they are perfectly useless, although acknowledged by Julian in Epistol. ad Themist. p. 476, Petav., I have translated as if the words in the original were ἀνθρώπους ἰστάντες τινας.

² From APA, to which Ast justly objects, I have elicited ΔΡΑ.

³ Here is evidently some error. For the Dæmons did not take care of men through their inactivity, but quite the reverse, in Greek δραστοςύνῃς, of which the Ionic form δρηστοςύνῃ is found in Homer Od. O. 302. And as thus the δραστοςύνῃ, the "activity" of the Dæmons, is properly opposed to the ῥαστώνῃ, the "inactivity" of mortals, we might insert δραστοςύνῃς after πολλῆς μὲν and ῥαστώνῃς after πολλῆς δέ, were it not that the common reading is acknowledged by Julian.

⁴ Instead of ἐλευθερίαν Ast and Bekker have adopted εὐνομίαν from two MSS. Neither word is found in Julian.

⁵ The metaphor, says Ast, is taken from a sieve or a perforated vessel unable to retain any liquid, and he refers to Gorgias, p. 493, C., τὴν δὲ ψυχὴν κοσκίνῳ ἀπίκναισε—τετρημένην, ἅτε οὐ δυναμένην στέγειν. I suspect however that Plato wrote στίργουσαν εὐδὲν, "contented with nothing—"

⁶—⁶ Such will perhaps seem to be a correct rendering of ἀνηνύτῳ καὶ

a person¹ rule over either a city or an individual, and trample upon the laws, there would be, as we just now said, no contrivance for security. It is necessary then to consider, Clinias, whether we shall be persuaded by this account or not.

Clin. It is surely necessary to be persuaded.

Athen. You understand then, that some say there are as many species of laws as of politics; but of politics we have already gone through as many as the multitude say there are. Do not then think that our present doubt is about a matter of no moment, but about one of the greatest. For that, to which the just and the unjust ought to look, has come again to us as a matter of doubt. For persons say that the laws ought not to look either to war or to the whole of virtue, but to see² what may be beneficial to a polity whatever it may be, so that it may always rule, and never be dissolved; and (they say) that the natural definition of the just is laid down most beautifully thus.

Clin. How?

Athen. That what belongs to the superior is beneficial.

Clin. Speak still more clearly.

Athen. Thus (do I speak). On every occasion the superior power, they say, lays down the laws in a state. Is it not so?

Clin. You speak the truth.

Athen. Think you then, say they, that ever at any time will a mob after being victorious, or any other polity, or even a tyrant,³ lay down willingly laws for any other purpose at first, than for what is conducive to the continuance of its own power?

Clin. How should it?

Athen. Whoever transgresses what is thus laid down, him will the lawgiver, who calls such laws by the name of just, punish as a person acting unjustly.

ἀπληστῶ κακῷ νοσήματι. For ἀνηνύτω may belong to κακῷ, as in Gorg. p. 507, E., ἀνηνυτον κακόν; and καὶ follow instead of preceding ἀπληστῶ. One would however prefer ἀπαύστῳ κακῷ καὶ ἀνηκίστῳ νοσήματι, similar in part to "inexplebili inextinguibilique ardore et insannabili morbo" in Ficinus.

¹ Julian properly omits ὁ τοιοῦτος, which words could hardly be interposed between κατὰ πατήσας and τοὺς νόμους.

² I have adopted ἰδεῖν, suggested by Schneider in lieu of δεῖν, to which Ast justly objects. Sydenham and Winckelmann would read ζητεῖν—

³ In lieu of τύραννιδα Ficinus, as shown by his version, "tyrannum," found in his MS. τύραννον, what Bekker has edited from four others.

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. In this way then, and in this wise, and by this manner, will what is just exist.

Clin. So at least this reasoning says.

Athen. For this is one of those prerogatives¹ relating to government.

Clin. What are those?

Athen. Those, which we were then considering as to what ought to govern what. And it appeared that it was proper for parents (to rule over) their progeny, and the older over the younger, and the well-born over the ignobly born. And there were many other things, if we remember, and² some an obstacle to others; and among them there was this one; (for) we said somehow that Pindar conceived it to be according to nature for the most violent to take the lead, to use his own words.³

Clin. This was indeed said formerly.

Athen. But consider to what⁴ persons our state is to be committed. For a thing of this kind has taken place ten thousand times in certain states.

Clin. Of what kind?

[7.] Athen. When power has been fought for, the conquerors are wont to take the affairs of the state so strongly into their own hands, as to give no share of the government to the conquered, or to their descendants, and they live watching each other,⁵ lest any one should get into power and cause an

¹ In lieu of ἀδικημάτων, Schulthes, in his German translation of the Laws, was the first to read ἀξιωμάτων. For the allusion is to iii. § 9, p. 690, A., as remarked by Ast, who has adopted the reading. The Zurich editors have however given δικαιωμάτων—

² Instead of καί, which is unintelligible here, Ficinus seems to have found ὢν, for his version is “quorum—”

³ From the expression ὡς φάναι, Ast supposes that the words of Pindar were “κατὰ φύσιν ἀγει τὸ βλαύτατον.” But in the passage of the lyric poet, to which there is an allusion in iii. § 10, p. 690, and a quotation from it more at length in Gorg. p. 484, B., the words were, as shown by Boeckh, κατὰ φύσιν ἀγει τὸ δικαιώτατον ὑπερτάτῃ χειρί: from whence, in lieu of ὡς φάναι, one would prefer ἐς θέμιν—Ficinus has “secundum naturam ac justum imperium esse, ut potentiora imbecillioribus dominentur,” which is a paraphrase rather than a translation.

⁴ The Greek is ποτίρεις τισιν— But that could be said only if a choice were to be made between two persons or things stated distinctly. Ficinus has “quibus,” which leads to ποίοις τισιν—

⁵ In lieu of ἀλλήλους, which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus, insurrection, through remembering the ills which had taken place. At present we surely say that those are neither politics, nor upright laws, which are not laid down for the sake of the whole state in common; and those, which so exist for the sake of some (alone), we call ¹seditions, but not politics; and that the things which they call just, are called so in vain. Now this has been asserted by us on this account, because we will give your state no one as a magistrate, because he is rich, or possesses any thing of this kind, such as strength, or size, or family; but whoever is most obedient to the laws laid down, and gains this victory in the state, to him we assert must be given the ministerial office, that relates to the gods,² the greatest to the first; the second to him, who gains the second prize; and ³so, according to a certain ratio,³ to those coming in a certain order must each of the things after these be assigned. But those, that are called rulers, I have now denominated the ministers of the laws, not for the sake of introducing any innovation in names; but I think ⁴there will be to a state a safety from this more than from any thing (else), and the contrary (from a contrary).⁴ For I see destruction is at hand to that state, ⁵in which the law is ruled over, and is powerless.⁵ But in the state, where the law is the absolute ruler over the rulers, and the rulers are slaves of the law, I behold safety and all for he has omitted the word, Plato wrote, I suspect, ἄλλοι ἄλλους, "some these, and others those—"

¹ Ficinus has "non cives sed seditiosos." He therefore found in his MS., what is read in all the rest, στασιώτας ἀλλ' οὐ πολίτας. Ast however defends στασιωτείας ἀλλ' οὐ πολιτείας, by quoting viii. 3, p. 832, C., πολιτεία μὲν οὐδέμια, στασιωτεία δὲ πᾶσαι λέγουντ' ἄν.

² In lieu of θεῶν Schulthes suggested, what Ast has adopted, νόμων, on account of the subsequent ὑπηρέτας νόμοις. Sydenham too would read νόμων—Orelli prefers θεσμών—Stalbaum defends θεῶν by saying that in θεῶν, "gods," is included the idea of "the laws." But how this can be, I do not see. Perhaps Plato wrote θειῶν νόμων, "laws given by the gods."

³ Ficinus has "eademque ratione," as if his MS. read κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον in lieu of κατὰ λόγον οὕτω—

⁴ The Greek is παντὸς μᾶλλον εἶναι παρὰ τοῦτο σωτηρίαν τε πόλει καὶ τούναντίον. But Ficinus has, what is far more intelligible, "salutem hinc maxime civitati fore et contrarium ex contrario," as if he had found in his MS. παντὸς μᾶλλον ἂν εἶναι παρὰ τούτου σωτηρίαν τῇ πόλει, καὶ παρὰ τοῦ ἐναντίον τούναντίον.

⁵ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has "in qua non lex magistratibus, sed legi magistratus præsunt."

other good things, such as the gods have bestowed upon states.

Clin. Truly so, by Zeus, O guest ! For according to your age you perceive acutely.

Megil. For every man, when young, sees, himself by himself, matters of this kind very dully ; but most acutely, when old.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. But what after this ? Shall we not suppose settlers as having arrived and being present ? and must we not finish the portion next in order of our discourse for them ?

Clin. How not ?

Athen. Let us then address them. O ye men, God, as the old saw¹ (says), having (in himself) the beginning, and end, and middle of all things, does, proceeding in a circle, according to nature, bring things to an end by a straight road ;² and him does Justice ever follow, the punisher of those, who are deserters from the divine law ; and close upon her attends in a humble and orderly manner he, who would be happy ;³ but ¹ The old saw alluded to is the Orphic verse preserved by Eusebius in Præp. Evang. xiii. 12, 'Ἀρχὴν αὐτὸς ἔχων καὶ μίσητον ἤδὲ τελευτήν, not the distich quoted by the Scholiast, Ζεὺς ἀρχή, Ζεὺς μίσησα, Διὸς δ' ἐκ πάντα τίττεται, Ζεὺς πᾶσιν γαίης καὶ οὐρανοῦ ἀστερόεντος, i. e. "Zeus is the beginning, and the middle, Zeus ; And formed from Zeus are all things, and of earth Zeus is the base, and of the starry sky : " which the Scholiast, probably after Proclus, thus explains—"He is the beginning, as the producing cause ; but the end, as the final (cause) ; the middle, as being equally present to all things, although all things partake of him differently. But by 'that which is direct according to justice,' (Plato) signifies desert, and the not inclining to one side, and, as it were, by one rule ; but by 'proceeding round,' he signifies the existing eternally, and that too which is perpetually after the same manner, and according to the same ; for the circumference has in sensible objects this property." Such is the literal translation of the Scholium. But Taylor has—"But by that which is direct according to nature Plato signifies desert, according to justice"—as if he wished to read εὐθεία δὲ κατὰ φύσιν σημαίνει κατὰ δικῆν ἢ ἀξίαν.

² Ast quotes opportunely Eurip. Tro. 896, Ζεὺς, εἴρ' ἀνάγκη φύσεος εἶπε νοῦς κρατῶν, Προσηξάμην σε πάντα γάρ, δι' ἀψόφου Βαίωνων κελύθου, κατὰ δικῆν τὰ θνήτ' ἄγει.

³ Unless I am greatly mistaken, in the whole of this description Plato had an eye to Alcibiades, who used to pride himself upon his wealth, and honours, and handsome person, and was no less remarkable for his insolent bearing, than for the high opinion he entertained of his talents as a statesman. With regard to the language, it is quite evident that Plato has put into prose, what he found in the verses of Eupolis or Aristophanes to this effect—Σκυρτᾷ ταραττων πάντα, καὶ πολλοῖς τι

he, who is lifted up by high-boasting, exalting himself¹ through his riches, or honours, or the fine form of his body, and having from his youthfulness and thoughtlessness his soul inflamed with insolence, as one who is in no need of either a ruler or a leader, but competent to lead even others, is left, deserted by the deity; and being thus left, and falling in with others of a similar kind, he leaps about, when he throws all things into confusion together; and to many indeed he appears to be somebody; but in no long time afterwards suffers a punishment, which justice would not blame, and causes himself and family and city to be utterly destroyed.³ With regard then to these matters thus disposed in order, what must a prudent man do, or think, and what must he not?

Clin. This at least is plain, that every man ought to think how he may be one of those, who are to follow the deity.

[8.] Athen. What manner of acting then is dear to and attendant upon the deity? There is one, which possesses one reason of old, that the similar will be friendly to the similar, when it is moderate; but that the immoderate are neither friendly to each other nor to the moderate. Now the deity will be especially the measure to us of all things, and much more than, as persons say, a man.² He then, who is to become friendly to a nature of this kind, must necessarily become such to the utmost of his power. And, according to this reasoning, our temperate man is dear to the deity, for he is similar to him. But the intemperate man is dissimilar, and at variance (with the deity), and unjust; and the rest of instances are by the same reasoning affected in this way. Let us then consider that language of this kind is to follow these premises, (language) I think the most beautiful, and the most true of all, namely, that for a good man to sacrifice to, and be conversant ever³ with, the gods, ⁴by means of prayers, and σιν Ἐδοξεν εἶναι τις μετὰ δ' οὐ πολὺν χρόνον Τιμωρίαν ὑπέσχετο οὐ μεμπτήν, ποιῶν Ἀρδὴν ἑαυτὸν, δῶμα, πόλιν, ἀναστάτους.

¹ Others may, but I will never, believe that Plato would thus after ἐξαρθεῖς introduce ἐπαιρόμενος, when he might have written γαυρούμενος, although ἐπαιρόμενος is acknowledged by Suidas in Πλάτων.

² The persons alluded to are the sect of Protagoras, who said that "man was the measure of all things," as stated in Cratyl. p. 386, A. § 6.

³ In lieu of ΔΗ all the MSS. read ΔΕΙ, answering to "deceit" in Ficinus: from which it is easy to elicit AEI.

⁴— The words between the numerals, although found in Ficinus, are omitted by Taylor.

offerings, and every kind of attention to the gods,⁴ is a conduct the most beautiful, and best, and most conducive to a happy life, and moreover pre-eminently becoming; but to the wicked man the contraries of these naturally happen. For the wicked man is unpurified in his soul, but the contrary one is pure; and to receive gifts from a defiled person is not at all correct for either a good man or a god.¹ To the unholy then there is much labour in vain respecting the gods; but it is the most seasonable to all holy men. Such then is the mark at which we ought to aim. ² Whither then can be most correctly carried, what are called the arrows of a person, and what is the shooting out by thought, as it were by arrows?² We assert, in the first place, that he, who gives after the Olympian gods, and those who preside over the city, as honours to the terrestrial gods, the things of an even number,³ and secondary, and on the left hand,³ will in the most proper manner reach the mark of piety; but to the gods above these, things of an odd number, and those that signify the opposite to what have been just now mentioned. And after these gods a prudent person will celebrate the holy rites of Dæmons, and after them of Heroes. And after them follow the statues of the household gods, held holy according to law; and after them are the honours paid to living parents; since it is just for a person, who owes the first and the greatest of debts, to pay those that are of the ¹ To this passage Cicero alludes De Legg. ii. 16, and there is a similar sentiment in Plautus' Rudens Prolog. quoted by Ast.

²⁻² The Greek is βέλη δὲ αὐτοῦ καὶ ὅλον ἢ τοῖς βέλεσιν ἔφεσις τὰ ποῖ' ἂν λεγόμενα ὀρθότατα φέρου' ἂν; where I am completely in the dark; and so was Ast, who has laboured, as I conceive, in vain, to make out the syntax and sense. I have therefore translated as if the Greek were βέλη δ' ἂν του τὰ λεγόμενα ποῖ' ἂν ὀρθότατα φέροιτο, καὶ διανοίη τις, ὥς βέλεσιν, ἢ ἄφεσις. The error arose from the words διανοίη, ὥς βέλεσιν, ἢ ἄφεσις, forming one line of the Codex Archetypus, being displaced, and οἷον η τοῖς being written instead of διανοίη τις ὥς. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows tacitly, has "sagittæ vero ad illud quænam? at quis propius ipsarum impetus rectissime diceretur?" as if he had found in his MS. βέλη δὲ αὐτοῖς τίνα; καὶ τις αὐτοῖς ἔφεσις ὀρθότατα λείγου' ἂν. Winckelmann would read τὰ ποῖ' ἀλλ' ἂν—

³⁻³ The idea of giving to the gods above the earth things of the first number (odd), and of the first place, and omens on the right (lucky) hand, emanated from the school of Pythagoras, as remarked by Ast; who quotes from Porphyry's Life of that philosopher, p. 197, ed. Cant., τοῖς μὲν οὐρανίοις θεοῖς περιττὰ θύειν, τοῖς δὲ χθονίοις ἅρτια: and refers to Plutarch, who says that Numa put forth many precepts similar to those longest standing ; ¹ and to think, ¹ that the things he has acquired and holds belong all to those, who begot him and brought him up, for supplying what is required for their service to the utmost of his power, beginning from his substance ; and, in the second place, from his body ; and, thirdly, from his soul, by paying off the debts due for their care of him, and in favour of those, who gave the pangs of labour as a loan to the young ; and by returning ² what has been due a long time to those ² who in old age are greatly in want. It is requisite likewise through the whole of life for a person to hold and to have held pre-eminently a kind language towards his parents ; because there is ³ for light and winged words a punishment most heavy ; for Nemesis, the messenger of Justice, has been appointed an inspector over all persons in matters of this kind. ³ It is necessary then to yield to them when in anger, and gratifying their feelings, whether they so conduct themselves by words or deeds, as not being ignorant ⁴ that a father would very reasonably be exceedingly angry with his son, if he conceived he had been injured by him. But, on the death of parents, the funeral which is the most moderate is the best ; and (let) not its size exceed what is customary, nor be deficient in those things, which the forefathers made for their parents ; and on the other hand, let persons pay yearly to such, as have now reached their end, the attention that brings a decoration (to the tomb) ; and by omitting nothing, ⁵ that contributes to a perpetual reof Pythagoras, and amongst others τοῖς μὲν οὐρανόις περισσὰ θύειν, ἄρτια δὲ τοῖς χθονίοις.

¹ Ficinus alone has "putare quisque debet," adopted by Taylor.

² The Greek is ἀποδίδοντα δὲ παλαιοῖς, where the article before παλαιοῖς could not be omitted. I have translated as if the text were ἀποδίδοντα, ἃ δὲ παλαι, τοῖς— To avoid the difficulty in δὲ after ἀποδίδοντα, Ast has cut out what he should rather have corrected.

³ Here again lies hid a poetical fragment, found originally in an Æsopo-Socratic fable—πράγματος κόφου Ἦν ζημία δὲ βαρυτάτη λόγων πτηνῶν. Ἐπίσκοπος γὰρ ἄγγελός τε περὶ ταῦτα Δίκης ἐτάχθη πᾶσι Νέμεσις οὐς ἡ καὶς : where πρᾶγματος κόφου is confirmed by λόγων, κόφου πρᾶγματος in xi. § 13, p. 935, A., while Νέμεσις is here called the daughter of Justice, as in the hymn of Mesomedes in Antholog. Gr. iii. p. 6, and as Adrastæa is by Ammianus Marcellinus. xiv. 1, "Adrasteia—quam theologi veteres fingentes Justitiæ filiam."

⁴ So Taylor has adopted "non ignorantes," found in Ficinus. But ἐγγιγνώσκειν means in Greek "to pardon," rather than "to be conscious."

⁵ I have translated as if τε had dropt out before παραλείπειν.

membrance, by this especially is there ever an honour, and likewise by a person contributing for the dead a moderate expense, such as is allowed by fortune. By acting thus, and living thus, we shall each of us on each occasion carry off what is due to us both from the gods and such as are superior to us, and we shall pass the greatest part of our lives in a good hope. But why¹ the person who is doing perfectly what relates to his offspring, and kindred, and friends, and fellow-citizens, and what relates to the rites of hospitality (laid down)² by the gods, and the intercourse arising from all these matters, ought to make his life a shining ornament according to law, the very course of the laws will (show forth);³ which, by persuading some of our habits and punishing by violence and justice others, that do not yield to persuasion, renders our state blessed and happy. But what it is meet and necessary for a legislator, who thinks as I do, to say, but which when spoken are unfitted to the form of a law, respecting these it appears to me that a person would,⁴ by bringing forward a pattern both before himself and those, for whom he is about to give laws, and by going through all that remains to the utmost of his ability, make after this a beginning in the laying down of laws.

⁵ Clin. Let then such things be laid in some form especially.

Athen. But⁶ it is not a very easy thing to embrace them, as it were in some one form, and to speak of them; but let us in ¹ Here again Ast has laboured hard to unravel the intricacies of this perplexed passage; which can be overcome I think only by supposing that Plato wrote not 'Α δὲ πρὸς, but 'Αλλὰ διότι τὰ πρὸς—as I have translated.

³ Ficinus has "legarum ipsarum tractatio demonstrabit," from which Ast was led to believe that δείξει had dropt out before ἡ διέξοδος. Plato wrote, I suspect, διδάξει ἡ ὁδός—

⁴ The syntax requires us to read, as I have translated, προενηγκόντ' ἂν ὑατῶ—ἀρχεσθαι, not with ἂν omitted.

⁵⁻⁶ I have adopted the arrangement of the speeches suggested by Ast; who did not however perceive that Plato wrote ἔστω, not ἔστι, and that ἀλλ' has been lost after κείμενα.

this way take some method, if perchance we may be able to establish any thing of a firm kind respecting them.

Clin. Say what method.

Athen. I should wish them to be very obedient as regards virtue; and it is evident that the legislator will endeavour to accomplish this through the whole of his legislation.

Clin. How not?

[9.] Athen. What then has been now said appears to me to effect something of moment towards a person listening with a greater mildness and a kinder feeling to what the words recommend, provided they do not come in contact with a disposition altogether savage; so that should what the words say render the person, who has become if not very much, yet a little more kindly disposed, more docile, we must be quite content. For there is no great facility¹ nor an abundance of those, who feel a desire to become the best to the greatest degree and in the shortest time; and the many point out Hesiod as a wise person for asserting that the road to wickedness is smooth, and offers itself to be passed through without sweat, as being very short; but (says he)

“Th’ immortal gods have before virtue placed
The sweat of labour, and the road is long
And steep, that to it leads. At first ’tis rough;
But when you reach the top, ’tis easy all,²
Although it was all difficult before.”³

Clin. And he appears to be like a person who speaks well.

Athen. Entirely so. But what the discourse has done, as it has been going on, I wish to place in the midst of you.

Clin. Place it then.

Athen. Let us then say to the legislator, while addressing these words to him—Tell us, Legislator, is it not evident that, if you knew what we ought to do and say, you would have said it?

Clin. It is necessarily so.

Athen. Did we not hear you saying a little before, that a legislator ought not to suffer poets to say what they please?

¹ I cannot very well understand here εὐπείρεια; nor could, I think, Ficinus, who has omitted the word entirely.

^{2, 3} Instead of δὴ πείρα and χαλεπή περ, I have translated as if the Greek were δὴ ἔς πάντα and χαλεπή πρὶν—

For they would not know, that by saying what is contrary to the laws, they would injure the state.

Clin. You speak truly.

Athen. If then we should speak in this manner to him in behalf of the poets, would what has been said be in moderation?

Clin. In what manner?

Athen. In this. There is an old story, O legislator, which is constantly told by ourselves, and seems correct to all the rest, that a poet, when he sits on the tripod of the Muse, is then not in his right senses, but, like a fountain, readily permits what comes to it to flow out:¹ and as his art is an imitation, he is (often) compelled, when representing persons placed in situations contrary to each other, to contradict himself frequently, and does not know whether of what is told these or the others are true. But it is not possible for a legislator to act in this manner in the case of a law, namely ²(to say) two (different) things about one thing;² but he must always make one assertion about one thing. And do you so consider it from what has been said just now. For in the case of a funeral, one being excessive, and another deficient, and a third moderate, you, having chosen one of these, the moderate, order it, and simply praise it. But if my wife were pre-eminently rich, and should order me to bury her,³ I would celebrate in a poem her magnificent sepulchre;³ but on the other hand, a parsimonious and poor man (would praise) a deficient one; but he who possesses moderate means, and is moderate himself (in mind), would praise a moderate one. But you must not talk, as you did just now, when speaking of the moderate; but you must tell us what the moderate is, and of what quantity it is; or do not imagine that a discourse of this kind is a law.

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were not ῥεῖν, but ἐκρεῖν, similar to "effundere" in Ficinus.

² Ficinus has "duo quædam diversa de uno in lege loqui," as if he had found in his MS. ἐν τῷ νόμῳ δύο περὶ ἐνὸς λέγοντι ἀλλοῖα, ἀλλὰ—

³ Such is Taylor's translation of the Latin of Ficinus, "in poemate excedens sepulchrum laudarem." The Greek is ἐν τῷ ποιήματι τὸν ὑπερβάλλοντα ἀν τὰφον ἐπαινοῖν: where Ast, unable to understand ποιήματι, suggested γράμματι, in allusion to the writing of the will; but Winckelmann prefers ἐπιστήματι, referring to ix. p. 958, E.—λίθινα ἐπιστήματα—said of the stone tablet on a tomb. Perhaps Plato wrote

Clin. You speak most true.

[10.] Athen. Whether then will he, who is placed by us over the laws, say nothing of this kind at the beginning of his laws, but immediately state what it is meet to do, and what not, and, having threatened a fine, turn himself to another law, and add nothing of exhortation and persuasion ¹to those, for whom the laws are laid down? ¹ ²But as in the case of physicians, one is accustomed on each occasion to attend in this way, and another in that, ² let us call to mind the method of either, in order that we may beg the legislator, as children do a physician, to cure them in the mildest manner. But what are we saying? There are, surely, we say, some persons physicians, and others the ministers of physicians; and these too we somehow call physicians.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And (this too), whether they are free-men, or slaves, and possess the art through the injunctions of their masters, both according to theory and experience, but not by nature, just like free-men, (who) ³ have both learnt the art in this way themselves, and are teaching it to their children? ⁴ Would you put down these as two kinds of the so-called physicians?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Do you then not perceive that when there are both slaves and free-men sick in cities, the slaves do for the most part go round and cure the slaves, or remain in the medical ἐν τῷ Πλούτου νοήματι—"with the thoughts of a Plutus." Cousin translates "dans mes vers."

¹—¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, while Taylor translates τοῖς νομοθετουμένοις, "the legislators," thus confounding the active voice with the passive.

²—² Ficinus has "Afferamus autem in medium modos medendi duos, quibus alii medici aliter curare consueverunt; ut quemadmodum pueri medicum orant, ut modo quodam facillime eos curet, ita et nos legum latorem—" From which it is evident that his MS. was defective here; or, if as full as the others, that he did not know how to make sense of the passage. After θεραπεύειν, Cornarius proposed to insert καὶ αὐτὸς οὕτως ποιήσει. Ast, however, conceives that a question put by Clinias, has been lost, while Bekker is content to place a dash after θεραπεύειν, to mark an aposiopesis. Stalbaum says the passage is corrupt, and requires correction.

³ Ficinus has "sicuti liberi, qui," which leads to what the syntax requires, ἐλεύθεροι, οἱ—

⁴ From this it would seem that in Greece the medical art was frequently hereditary; although occasionally a slave was taught his master's trade.

shops; and that not one of such physicians either give or receive any reason respecting each of the diseases of each of the slaves, but, as if knowing accurately from experience, orders, as if he were a self-willed tyrant, what seems good to him; and then goes away, bounding off from one sick domestic to another; and by this means affords a facility to his master of attending to (other) patients? But the freeborn physician, for the most part, attends to and reflects upon the diseases of the freeborn; and, by exploring them from the beginning, and according to nature, and communing with both the patient himself and his friends, does, at the same time, learn something himself from the sick, and at the same time teach him, as far as he can, something, and does not order him any thing until he has persuaded him of its propriety; and then, after rendering the patient gentle by persuasion, endeavours to finish the business by bringing him (back)¹ to health. Which of these is the better physician? he who cures in this way or in that?² [and which is the better exerciser? he who exercises in this way or that?]² he, who effects his single power in a twofold manner, or he, who works it out in one way, and in the worse and the more rustic of the two?

Clin. The twofold, O guest, is surely the superior.

Athen. Are you willing then for us to look into this twofold and simple method, as it exists in legislation?

Clin. How am I not willing?

[11.] Athen. Come then, by the gods, (and state) what law will the legislator first lay down? Will he not, according to nature, regulate by his ordinances first the commencement of generation³ relating to states?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Is not the connexion by and communion of marriages the commencement of generation in all cities?

¹ In δει, which is found, without any meaning, before παρὰσκευάζων, lies hid, I suspect, αὖ, which should be placed after ὕγιαν.

²⁻³ Unless the word γυμναστής is to be taken in the sense of the English "practitioner," applied to a medical man, one would suspect the words καὶ γυμναστής γυμνάζων to be an interpolation; for not a word had been said, nor even an allusion made to the exerciser previously; although it is true that amongst the ancients there was such a connexion between the professors of the medical and gymnastic arts, that the two were sometimes found united in the same person. See Sydenham on the Rivals, § 3, n. 33.

³ I have with Ast omitted περὶ before γενέσεως. For Ficinus has "generationis—principium."

Clin. How not?

Athen. The laws then of marriage being first laid down correctly, seem to be laid down for correct conduct in every state.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Let us then first speak of the simple law, which would perhaps exist somehow in this way; that a man is to marry when he is from thirty to thirty-five years old; but if he does not, that he should be fined both in money and with the loss of political privileges;¹ in money to this or that amount, and in disfranchisement of this or that kind. Let this then be the simple law respecting marriages; but this the twofold; that a man is to marry from thirty to thirty-five years old, considering that the human race has in some measure partaken naturally of immortality, of which every one has naturally every desire.² For to become famous, and not to lie when dead without a name, is the desire of a person of this kind. The human race then is a thing connected with all time, and follows and will follow it to the end, becoming in this manner immortal through that, which is ever the same and one, partaking by generation of immortality, in consequence of its leaving³ children's children. Now for a man to deprive himself willingly of this, is by no means holy; and he intentionally deprives himself of this, who has no care for children and a wife. He, therefore, who obeys this law would depart without a fine. But let him, on the other hand, who does not obey it, and does not marry when he is thirty-five years of age, be fined yearly so and so, in order that his solitary life may not seem to bring him gain and an easy state; nor let him share in those honours, which the younger in the state pay on every occasion to the elder. It is then in the power of a person, who hears this law compared with that, to form an idea of each particular law, whether it ought to become in this way double, and the longest⁴ in length

¹ Such is the real meaning of ἀτιμία in Greek, not simply "dishonour," but what in one word would be "disfranchisement," wholly or in part.

² A similar sentiment is to be found in the Banquet, § 32.

³ Instead of καταλείπόμενον the passive participle, which has no meaning here, Ficinus found in his MS. καταλείπον, as shown by his "relinquendo," unless it be said that καταλείπόμενον is in the middle voice.

⁴ Instead of σμικρότατον, which is perfectly unintelligible, Ast suggests, what I have adopted, μακρότατον— through its mingling threats with persuasions; or by employing threats alone, it ought to become simple in length.

Megil. It is the Laconic practice, O guest, to prefer ever the shorter method. But should any one order me to become a judge of such enactments, which of the two I would wish to be written and laid down for a state, I would prefer the longer; and as regards every law according to this model, if two such were proposed, I should make the same choice. It is, however, requisite that the present legislation should be agreeable to Clinias; for his is the state, which is now thinking of making use of laws of this kind.

Clin. Well have you spoken, Megillus.

[12.] Athen. To take any account of enactments either prolix or brief is very silly. ¹For we must honour, I conceive, the best, but not the shortest, nor (look to) their length.¹ But, in the laws which we have just now spoken of, one differs from the other not by the double alone as regards the value of their use; but that, which was said just now, respecting the twofold kind of physicians, was most properly adduced. To this point however no legislator seems at any time to have given a thought, that, when it is possible to make use of two things in legislation, persuasion and force, they employ the other alone,² as far as is possible, against the masses unexperienced in education. For they legislate, not mingling a fight³ with force, but (employing) unmingled violence alone. But I, O blessed men, perceive that a third thing likewise ought to exist with regard to laws, but which does not exist at present.

Clin. Of what kind are you speaking?

Athen. Of something, which has arisen, through a certain god-send, out of the matters we have just now discussed. For

¹—¹ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has more elegantly "non enim brevissima aut longissima sed optima sunt, ut arbitror, eligenda."

² If τῷ ἐρίῳ is to be referred to βία it should be τῷ ἐρίῳ. But Plato wrote, I suspect, τῷ βαιοτέρῳ τρόπῳ, "the more violent method."

³ In lieu of μάχην, which is perfectly unintelligible, Ast would read ἀνάγκην; but Winckelmann on Plutarch Amator. p. 233, διδαχὴν, referring to Plato in Tim. p. 51, E., τὸ μὲν—διὰ διδαχῆς, τὸ δὲ ὑπὸ πειθοῦς. Epist. vii. p. 332, A., πειθοὶ καὶ διδαχῇ. Ficinus has "minas," as if he had found in his MS. ἀπειλήν—Cousin defends μάχην by saying that it means the same as ἀνάγκην, and is sufficiently well opposed to πειθῶ. Badham on Euripid. Helen. 907, suggests ἀρχήν—from the time when we began to speak about laws in the morning, mid-day has now arrived ; and we have been in this very beautiful retreat discoursing upon no other topic than laws. But we seem to me to be just now beginning to speak about laws ; and that all before has been a prelude to laws.¹ Now why have I mentioned this ? It is because I wished to say, that in all discourses, and whatever else partake of a vocal sound, there are both preludes and, as it were, movements backwards and forwards,² that possess some artificial handling, useful to that which is about to be gone through. And, indeed, of the laws, as they are called, of guitar-songs and of every kind of music, preludes are laid down composed with wondrous care. But of laws really so, which we say are political, no one has ever at any time made any mention of their preludes, nor, as being a composer, has he brought it to light, as if it did not naturally exist. But our present discussion, as it seems to me, indicates that it does exist ; and the laws, which were just now mentioned as twofold, have seemed to be³ not surely thus twofold simply, but there (have seemed) to be some two things, law and a prelude to a law ; but the tyrannical injunction, which was spoken of as being similar to the orders of slave-physicians, (has appeared) to be an unmingled law ; but that, which was spoken of prior to this, and called persuasive by this person here, (seemed) to be in reality persuasive, but to have the power of a prelude, relating to discourses. For in order that the person, to whom the legislator addresses his law, may receive kindly, and, through his kindness, with more docility, the injunction, which is the law, on this account the whole of this discourse has appeared to me to have been spoken ; ⁴which the speaker has spoken persuading.⁴ Hence, according to my reasoning, this very thing

² By ἀνακινήσεις, says Ast, are meant the movements of the arms which a boxer especially adopts, previous to his striking a blow ; and he refers appositely to Aristotle Rhetor. iii. 14, οὐδὲν προεξαγκωνίσας οὐδὲ προανακινήσας εὐθὺς ἀρχεται, and the notes of Victorius on that passage.

³ To support the syntax of εἶναι, Ast would supply here κατεφάνησαν from κατεφάνη, found a little below. But all the infinitives here depend rather upon ἔδοξαν.

⁴ I confess I cannot understand ὃν πείθων εἶπεν ὁ λέγων : nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is "quæ ad persuadendum est inducta."

would be properly called a prelude to a law, but not a discussion of it. What then, after saying this, should I wish to be stated subsequently? It is this; ¹that the legislator ought ever prior to all laws to make them not without a share of preludes; and as regards each law, in so far as they differ from themselves, as much as the two just now mentioned have differed.¹

Clin. For my part, ²I would never exhort ²a man, skilled in these things, to lay down laws in any other manner.

Athen. You appear therefore to me, O Clinias, to speak correctly, so far that there is a prelude to all laws; and that it is requisite for a person commencing the business of legislation, to prefer to every discourse a preface, that is natural to each. For that, which is to be said after this, is not a thing of little moment, nor is it a trifling difference, whether they are stated clearly or not clearly. However, if we should enjoin upon legislators to make a prelude equally about what are called great and small laws, we should not speak ³correctly. For this is not to be done either in every song or in every discourse; since, though it naturally belongs to all, yet it is not to be used for all; and a thing of this kind is to be allowed to the orator, the lyric singer, and the legislator.

Clin. You appear to me to speak most true. But let us make a no further exercise of delay, but return to the question, and begin, if it is agreeable to you, from those points, which you did, as a person not preluding, speak of at that time. Again then, as persons say, when playing,⁴ since second things are better, let us turn up and back⁵ from the be-

¹—¹ Here again I am quite at a loss; and so is Ast; who has however suggested some slight alterations, from which nothing is gained.

²—² So Ficinus translates correctly τὸ γ' ἐμὸν οὐκ ἀν—διακελεύοιτο—

³ Ficinus has "si—jubeamus, non recte juebimus," in Greek εἰ—προσάττοιμεν, οὐκ ἀν ὀρθῶς προσάττοιμεν, which would be more in the manner of Plato, who is generally wont in this formula to repeat the same verb.

⁴ The Scholiast says that the proverb alluded to has reference to persons making a second sacrifice, after the omens in the first have proved unfavourable; but this idea is disproved at once by the introduction of the word παίζοντες. There is a somewhat similar proverb in Phileb. p. 60, A. § 140, τὸ καὶ δις καὶ τρίς τὸ γε καλῶς ἔχον ἐπαναπολεῖν τῷ λόγῳ δέιν.

⁵ The verb ἐπαναπολεῖν has two metaphorical meanings, one applied to turning up the soil, and causing that which was previously under to ginning, as finishing a prelude, and not an accidental discourse, as just now. Let us take then their commencement¹ acknowledging that we are preluding. And what has been just now stated, respecting the honours to be paid to the gods, and the attention due to ancestors, is sufficient. But let us endeavour to speak about what is next in order, until it shall appear to you that the whole prelude has been spoken of sufficiently. And after this you will go through detailing the laws themselves.

Athen. About the gods, then, and those that come after them,² and parents, both when living and dead, we made sufficiently then a prelude, as we call it now; but the portion that still remains of this kind of a subject, you appear to exhort me to lead forth into the light.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And after these matters, how it is necessary for persons to keep their souls, and bodies, and substance with reference to serious pursuits and remissions (of labour), and fitting too for both the speaker and the hearers to ruminate³ in common, and to become, to the utmost of their power, successful in attaining instruction. These very matters then must in reality⁴ be spoken of and heard by us after those.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

come to the top, as persons do when digging or ploughing; and the other to the act of ruminating, when an animal throws up the cud from the stomach to the mouth, where it is rolled about and turned over. But as neither sense seems suited to this place, I have translated the word literally, "turn up and back," for the allusion is probably to some sport, of which nothing is known at present.

¹ I cannot understand λάβωμεν αὐτῶν ἀρχήν, nor could, I suspect, Ficinus; whose version is "incipiamus" merely, which Taylor has translated. I could have understood "Let us lay down a foundation for other (laws)," in Greek, βάλλωμεν ἄλλων ἀρχήν—for thus "the others" would be opposed to those relating to the gods.

² Namely the Demons and heroes, see § 8.

³ I have adopted this word, found in its metaphorical sense in Shakespeare, as the ordinary meaning of the Greek ἀναπεμπάζεσθαι; but I conceive that the other sense, "to reckon up," as persons do on their five fingers, is what Plato here intended; and if so, πάντα must be inserted before ἀναπεμπαζομένους.

⁴ Instead of ὄντως, which I cannot understand, the sense seems to require οὕτως, "thus."

BOOK V.

[1.] Athen. LET every one then hear, who has already heard what we have said respecting the gods, and our dear progenitors. For a man's soul is, after the gods, the most divine of all his possessions, as being most his own. Now the whole of a man's possessions are altogether twofold. The more powerful and the better are the lords, but the weaker and worse, the slaves. Of those then that are his the lord must always be held in honour before the slaves. Hence after the gods, who are lords, and those that follow next to them, I properly exhort a person¹ to honour his own soul by speaking of it as the second in rank. But not one, so to say, honours his soul properly, although he appears (to do so). For honour is somehow a divine good; but of things that are evil not one is honourable. He then, who fancies that he shall enlarge his soul by certain discourses or gifts or certain yieldings, and yet does not make it better from being worse, appears indeed to honour it, but by no means does so. For instance,² every boy on becoming a man thinks himself competent to know all things,³ and that he honours his soul by praising it, and he freely permits it to do whatever it pleases. But⁴ we now say³ that he, who acts so, injures and does not honour (his soul). And yet it is necessary, as we have said, (to honour) it in the second rank after the gods. Nor, when a man does not consider himself, but others, as the cause of his own errors and of ills the most in number and magnitude, and ever exempts himself as free from blame, is he honouring his own soul, as he forsooth fancies; for he is far from doing so; since he injures it; nor when⁴ contrary to ¹ Instead of δεῖν, which I cannot understand, I have translated as if the Greek were τινι—It came from δεῖ—δενρίσαν a little below.

² Such was the case of Menexenus, it would seem, and of Melitus. See Menex. § 1, n. 7.

⁴ So Ficinus from his MS. probably. The others read παρὰ λόγον τὸν τοῦ νομοθέτου καὶ ἔπαινον.

reason, and the praise of the legislator,⁴ he indulges in pleasures, does he honour it all; but he dishonours it, by filling it with vice and repentance. Nor yet when, on the contrary, he does not thoroughly labour by bearing up against exertions that receive praise, and against fears and pains, but sinks under them; for ¹ by sinking he then dishonours it; for he causes it to be in dishonour by doing all these acts.¹ Nor does he honour it, when he thinks that to live is altogether a good: for then too he dishonours it. For while his soul imagines that every thing in Hades is evil, he yields, nor does he strive against it by teaching and convincing it that it does not know whether, on the contrary, that, what relates to the gods there is not the greatest of all good to us. Nor yet, when any one honours beauty before virtue, is this any other thing than truly and wholly a dishonour to the soul. For such an assertion falsely proclaims that the body is more honourable than the soul. For nothing born of earth is more honourable than what is in Olympus; and he, who thinks otherwise of the soul, is ignorant that he is careless of this wonderful possession. Nor when a person, who desires to possess wealth not honourably, or when possessing (unjustly),² does not bear it ill, does he then honour his soul with gifts? He fails³ of it entirely. For he sells what is honourable and at the same time beautiful in his soul for a little gold; for all the gold both on the earth and under the earth is of no value against virtue. And, to speak comprehensively, he, who is neither willing by every contrivance to abstain from such things, as the legislator numbers up and ranks amongst the disgraceful and bad, nor, on the other hand, to pursue to the utmost of his power the good and the honourable, does not perceive that, in all these cases, he treats his soul, which is a thing the most divine, with the greatest dishonour, and in the most unseemly manner. For not one, so to

² Ficinus alone has "possidens injuste," thus preserving the very word required by the train of thought. Hence we must insert κακῶς before κτώμενος.

say, considers what is the greatest of the so-called¹ punishment for evil conduct. Now the greatest is in the becoming similar to bad men; and by becoming similar, to avoid good men and good discourses, and to be cut off from them, but to be glued to (the bad),² while³ pursuing according to their intercourse;³ and sticking close to such persons, he must of necessity do and suffer what such persons naturally do and say to each other. Such a state then is not one of justice, for the beautiful is just [and justice],⁴ but of punishment, the attendant on a state⁵ of injustice, with which both he, who does meet, and he, who does not meet, are miserable; the one in not being cured; the other in being destroyed, in order that many may be saved. But to us it is an honour, to speak generally, to follow the better and to make the worse, still⁶ capable of becoming better, the best possible.

[2.] There is not then a possession belonging to a man more naturally fitted, than the soul, to flying from evil, and⁷ to tracking out and taking⁷ what is of all things the best; nor, when it has taken it, to associate with it for the rest of life. Hence it has been ranked second in honour; but the third—every one will understand this at least—is the honour, according to nature, of the body. It is however requisite to consider these honours, which of them are genuine, and which with a false stamp. ⁸ Now this is the business of a legislator. And he appears to me to point out that they are these and some such as these;⁸ that the body is honourable, not when it pos-

¹ Ficinus, probably unable, like myself, to understand τὴν λεγομένην, has “maximam enim secundum Justitiam ulfionem—”

² Ficinus alone has “improbis,” what the antithesis requires.

³⁻³ The Greek is διώκοντα κατὰ τὰς ξυνουσίας, which is, I believe, equally at variance with sense and syntax, that united require διώκοντα τὰ ἀκόλαστα τῆς ξυνουσίας, i. e. “while pursuing the licentiousness of an intercourse with them.”

⁴ The words ἡ δίκη are plainly an explanation of τὸ δίκαιον.

⁵ As Plato had just before used πάθος, he could not possibly have written πάθη: which Ast says is put for πάθημα. One MS. has πάθει, governed by ἀκόλουθος: and so I have translated.

⁶ The Greek is αὐτὸ τοῦτο, words I cannot understand; nor could, I suspect, Ficinus; for he has omitted them. Plato probably wrote δυναρὰ ἐν ὄντι—as I have translated; while in δε, before βελτίω, lies hid ἡδη—

⁷⁻⁷ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has “ad investigandum eligendum-que.”

⁸⁻⁸ Ficinus, supplying perhaps what was partly wanting in his MS., has “quorum differentia a legislatore declaranda mihi videtur.”

sesses beauty, or strength, or swiftness, or size, or health—although this would seem so to many—nor even when it possesses the contraries to these. But those things which, being in the middle, touch upon the whole of this possessing,¹ are by far the most moderate and safe.² For the former cause the soul to be puffed up and confident, but the latter humble and servile. And similarly situated is the possession of ³money and means,³ according to the same measure of valuation.⁴ For an excess in the bulk of all these things produces enmity and revolts, both in states and amongst individuals; but a deficiency (produces) slavery for the most part. Let not then any one be desirous of riches for the sake of his children, in order that he may leave them very wealthy; for this is better neither for them nor the state. For the substance of the young is not the prey of flatterers; and if it is not in want of the necessities of life, it is the most harmonious and the best of all. For by its harmony and fitness in all things it renders our life free from pain. It is meet then to leave to children abundance of modesty, not of gold. And we think we ⁵shall accomplish this⁵ by reproving impudent young men, when they act shamelessly. This, however, is not effected by the exhortation given at present to young men; which persons give by saying that it is meet to be modest in every thing; but a prudent legislator will rather advise old men to feel a shame before the young; and above all things to take care, that no young person, at any time, either sees or hears them doing or saying any thing base; since where old men are shameless, there too must young men of necessity be the most impudent; for the most excellent education both of the young and of themselves is, not in giving advice, but in being seen to do through the whole of life, what a person would say, while giving advice to another. But he who honours and venerates his relationship and the whole communion ⁶of family gods, that possess the nature of ¹ In ἕξις there is an allusion to the preceding ἔχον.

² Ficinus has, what Stephens preferred, "moderationa tutioraque."

³—³ In Greek χρήματα and κτήματα differ as in English "personal" and "real" property.

⁴ I have followed Cornarius and Ast in rejecting καὶ before τμήσεως.

⁵—⁵ So Taylor follows the version of Ficinus, "id nos facturos," instead of the Greek, τοῦτο καταλείψειν, "will leave this—"

⁶—⁶ Ficinus has, more briefly, "et universam sub iisdem penatibus generis communionem."

the same blood,⁶ will have, according to reason, the gods who preside over births favourably disposed towards him for the procreation of children. And moreover, he will obtain the kind feeling of friends and associates in the intercourse of life, by considering their attentions to himself as of a greater and more respectful kind than they do; but his own favours to them less than his friends and associates do themselves. As regards, however, the state and fellow-citizens, he is by far the best, who prefers before the contests at Olympia and all in war and peace, to be victorious in the glory of being the servant of the laws at home, ¹[as having been subservient to them]¹ in a manner the most beautiful of all men through (the whole of)² life. We must consider too the laws of intercourse³ with strangers to be matters of the most holy kind. For nearly all the delinquencies of strangers towards strangers depend more upon an avenging deity ⁴than do those in the case of fellow-citizens.⁴ For a stranger being destitute of companions and kindred, is an object of greater pity both to men and gods. He therefore, who is more able to take vengeance, is more ready to assist. Now the ⁵Dæmon of each person, and the god of hospitality, are as the attendants upon Zeus, who presides over strangers, powerful in the greatest degree. It is then a matter of much caution for a person, to whom there is even a little portion of forethought, to proceed on to the end of life, without having committed any error with regard to strangers. But,

² In ἀπορίᾳ lies hid πάντως—the origin of “totam” in Ficinus, whom Taylor has tacitly followed.

³ The Greek is συμβόλαια, derived from σύμβολον, “a symbol,” which was a piece of metal, wood, or leather, cut into two corresponding parts, one of which was retained by a person who had formed an acquaintance with a stranger, and the other by the stranger himself. The bearer of the symbol, whether one of the original parties, or a friend of theirs, was entitled, on presenting it, to the rights of hospitality, which were considered to be of the most sacred kind, and not to acknowledge them was a crime of the deepest dye.

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἐκάστων δαίμων καὶ θεὸς ὁ ξένιος τῷ ξενίῳ—not ὁ ξένιος ἐκάστων δαίμων καὶ θεὸς τῷ ξενίῳ—For ὁ ξένιος ought to precede τῷ ξενίῳ, as shown by the mass of passages collected by others and myself on Æsch. Suppl. 139.

of all the crimes done by strangers and denizens, the greatest is that which takes place in the case of each towards suppliants. For the god, with whom the suppliant happens to have met, as a witness to agreements made with a suppliant, becomes himself pre-eminently the guardian of the sufferer.¹

² So that no one, who injures suppliants, will go unpunished.³

[3.] Thus then have we nearly gone through the modes of intercourse³ relating to parents, and to a person himself, and the things belonging to him, and those relating to the state, and friends, and kinsmen, and strangers, and natives. But as to what follows how a person by being what can best pass through life, (it is meet)⁴ to detail, not what a law, but what praise and blame may, by teaching individuals, render them more obedient to the rein, and more kindly disposed to the laws about to be established. These then are the matters we must subsequently speak of. Now truth is the leader of every good both to gods and men; of which he, who is about to be blessed and fortunate, should participate immediately from the beginning, in order that for the greatest length of time he may live a person of truth. For he is trust-worthy; but he is not trust-worthy, by whom a voluntary falsehood is loved; while he, by whom an involuntary one is so, is a senseless person; of which states neither is an object of envy. For he, who is not trust-worthy and untaught, is unloved; and as time progresses towards morose old age, he becomes known, and at the end of life has prepared for himself a solitude complete; so that, whether his associates and children are alive or not, his life becomes nearly equally an orphanhood. He however who

¹ Ficinus has "deus enim, per quem supplex fœdus est consecutus, diligentissimus ejus est custos." For he could not understand, nor can I, the Greek, μεθ' οὗ γὰρ ἱκετεύσας μάρτυρος ὁ ἱκέτης θεοῦ ἔτυχεν ὁμολογιῶν, φύλαξ διαφέρων οὗτος τοῦ παθόντος γίγνεται. But by merely changing ἱκετεύσας into ἱκετεύσαντι all will become quite plain, as is shown by the translation.

²⁻³ Such is Taylor's translation of the Latin of Ficinus, "quare nullus in supplices sceleratus impunis abibit." The Greek is literally, "so that he, who has met with (the god), will not suffer, what he has suffered, unavenged."

³ This is the only way of translating literally δμολήματα. Ficinus has "officia—"

⁴ For the sake of the syntax and sense, we must suppose that δεῖ has dropped out before διεξιλθεῖν, as I have translated. Ficinus, being equally at a loss, has omitted ἐπόμενον τούτῳ, and so after him has Taylor.

does no injury is held in honour ; but he, who does not suffer the unjust to act unjustly, deserves more than double the honour of the former person. For the former has a value equal to one man ; but the latter to many others,¹ by pointing out to the rulers the injustice of the rest. But let him, who unites with the rulers in inflicting punishments to the utmost of his power, be proclaimed the great man in a state, and the complete victor, if ever one was,² in virtue. The very same praise it is meet to proclaim of temperance and prudence ; and the person, who possesses other goods, that have a power not only for him to possess them himself, but to share them with others, it is meet to honour, as being at the tip-top (of excellence) ; but him, who is unable, although willing, to put aside in the second rank ; and to blame indeed the man who is envious and unwilling through friendship³ to be a sharer of any of his good things with any one ; but not to hold a jot the more in dishonour his possession on account of the possessor, but to acquire it with all one's might. Let then every one contend with us for virtue unstintingly. For such a person advances a state by striving himself, and not cutting down others through calumny. But the envious man, while he thinks to become the superior by detracting from others, tends less himself to true virtue, and makes his competitors disheartened through their being blamed unjustly ; and by these means causing the whole state to be untrained for the contests of virtue, he renders it, as far as he can, of less account as regards its renown. It is proper, moreover, for every man to possess a spirit, and yet to be as mild as possible. For it is not possible to avoid the unjust acts of others, which are harsh and difficult to be cured, or entirely incurable, otherwise than by fighting and conquering, after defending oneself, and by remitting nothing, when in the act of punishing. Now to do this every soul is unable, without possessing a noble spirit.

With respect to the acts of those, who do an injury that admits of a cure, it is requisite to know, in the first place,

¹ The Greek is ἑτέρων : but one would have expected here ἄλλων, as in the very words of Homer, πολλῶν ἀντάξιός ἄλλων, which Plato had in mind. Ficinus however omits ἑτέρων—

² In lieu of οὗτος, which is never said in praise of a person, correct language requires εἰ τις, as I have translated

³ Instead of διὰ φιλίας, the sense evidently requires δι' ἀφιλίας, "through a want of friendship."

¹ that no unjust man is voluntarily unjust.¹ For no one would at any time willingly possess any of the greatest evils, and least of all in the case of the most honoured belonging to himself. Now the soul, as we have said, is in truth a thing the most honoured by all. No one, therefore, would at any time voluntarily receive the greatest evil in the thing most honoured, and live through the whole of life possessing it. But the unjust man and he who has what are evils, is in every respect an object of pity. It is proper, however, to pity him, who has an evil that is curable, and to restrain and soften down one's anger, and not, like a woman with an excess of passion, to continue embittered against him. But it is meet to let loose one's anger against a person incontinently² sinful, and past all exhortation depraved. On which account we have said that the good man ought to be conspicuous³ for possessing a spirit, and yet to be on each occasion mild.

[4.] But of all evils the greatest is implanted in the souls of the major part of mankind; for which, while each one is giving himself a pardon, he devises no plan for avoiding it. And this is what people⁴ say; that every man is naturally a friend to himself, and that it is well for a thing of this kind to be necessarily so. But, in truth, the cause of all his mistakes arises to each man, upon each occasion, through the violent love of self. For the lover is blinded with respect to the object loved.⁵ So that he judges improperly of things just, and good, and beautiful, through thinking that he ought always to honour what belongs to himself in preference to truth. For it is necessary that he, who is to be a great man, should love neither himself, nor the things belonging to himself, but what is just, whether it happens to be done by himself or by another

¹—¹ On this celebrated saying of Plato, Ast refers to a mass of writers, who have alluded to it.

² In lieu of ἀπαρῶς Ast would read ἀνάρως, as the antithesis to λάσιμα. Ficinus too has "qui autem ita sunt flagitiosi, ut incurabiles sint."

³ Stephens would reject πρέπειν, omitted by Ficinus; while Ast would read θυμοειδῆ, εἰ πρέπει, "if fitting—"

⁴ Since the time of Plato, not only the people, but philosophers likewise have said the same, as may be seen in Adam Smith's Theory of Moral Sentiments. Aristotle however, in Polit. ii. 2, says τὸ φιλαυτὸν εἶναι ψέγει--αι δίκαιως.

⁵ To this doctrine of Plato allusion is made, says Ast, by Plutarch, Galen, and Longinus.

person rather.¹ From this very same mistake it has come to pass in all cases that his ignorance appears to a person to be a wisdom peculiarly his own. Hence, although we know, so to say, nothing, we fancy we know every thing; but, by not permitting others to do that, of which we ourselves are ignorant, we are compelled to make mistakes through doing it ourselves. On this account every man ought to avoid the vehement love of himself, and ever² to follow one better than himself, without placing, in a matter of this kind, a feeling of shame in the foreground. But what are of less importance than these, and mentioned frequently, and not less useful than these, it is proper for a person to remind himself of and to state. For, as something is always flowing away from us, it is necessary for something on the contrary to be flowing (to us). Now recollection³ is the influx of thoughts, which had left us. On which account⁴ it is meet to abstain from ill-timed laughter, and tears; and for every man to announce to every man that he must endeavour, by concealing⁵ all excessive joy and all⁶ excessive sorrow, to preserve a decent bearing, each person, while his Dæmon is standing steadily, going on successfully or unsuccessfully to places on high and steep, while Dæmons are opposing

² Instead of ΔΕΙ, which is unnecessary after χρῆ, Plato evidently wrote ΑΕΙ, as I have translated.

³ On the Platonic doctrine relating to memory, see the Phædrus, p. 72, E., and Meno, p. 81, D.

⁴ Unless I am greatly mistaken, something is wanting here to unite what now appears to be very disjointed.

⁵⁻⁵ By merely placing πᾶσαν before περιωδυνίαν, instead of after περιχάρειαν, we shall get rid of the difficulty, which Stephens and Ast could not master, nor Orelli, who proposed to read κοάλεμον for ὅλην, nor Winkelman, who suggests ἄλλην—

with certain disturbances;⁶ and that it is meet ever¹ to hope that the deity will, when troubles fall upon the good state,² which he has given, make them less instead of greater, and (cause) a change from the present state to a better one; and with respect to³ [good things]³ the contraries of these, that they will always be present to them⁴ with good fortune. In these hopes it is meet for every one to live, and in the recollection of all these things to be sparing on no point, but ever amidst serious and sportive occupations to remind another and himself clearly.⁵

[5.] Now then there have been mentioned nearly (all), as far as divine things are concerned, respecting the pursuits, to which every one ought to attend, and respecting each individual himself, of what kind he ought to be; but matters relating to man have not been at present spoken of. But it is necessary (to speak of them): for we are conversing with men, and not with gods. Now pleasures, and pains, and desires, are naturally in the highest degree human; on which it is necessary for the whole mortal animal to hang, as it were,⁶ [and to be suspended]⁶ with the greatest earnestness. It is requisite then to praise the most beautiful life, not only because by its form it is superior, as regards fair renown; but because, if any one is willing to taste of it, and not, as being young, to become a deserter from it, it excels in that too, of which we all are in search, (I mean) the possessing more of joy and less of sorrow through the whole of life. That this will be clearly the case, if any one tastes of it correctly, will readily and vehemently appear. Now what is this correctness? This it is requisite to ascertain from the reasoning, and to consider whether it is produced according to nature in this way, or in another, contrary to nature. It is requisite therefore to consider in this manner one life, as compared with another, if it be more pleasant and more pain-

¹ Ficinus has "sperare semper—debent." He therefore found in his MS. ἐλπίζειν δὲ ἀεὶ δεῖν, not merely ἐλπίζειν δὲ ἀεὶ—

² I have followed Cornarius and Ast in considering τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς to be governed by ἐμπιπτόντων, and in that case τὸν θεὸν must precede, not follow, τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς.

³ The words τὰ ἀγαθὰ are evidently an explanation of τὰ ἑναντία.

⁴ Instead of αὐτοῖς, which has nothing to which it can be referred, one would prefer ἀγαθοῖς.

⁵ In lieu of σοφῶς the sense requires σοφῶς, "wisely."

⁶ I must leave for others to explain, what I cannot, the difference between ἐξηρησθαι and ἐκκρεμαμένον εἶναι. Nor could, I suspect, Ficinus; who has merely "quasi pendere—"

ful. We wish for pleasure to be present with us; but we neither choose nor wish for pain. But what is neither the one or the other we do not wish for in the place of pleasure; but we do wish for it to be exchanged in the place of pain. We wish too for less pain with more pleasure; but we do not wish for less pleasure with greater pain. But we can show clearly that we do not wish to possess each of these, equal in the place of equals. All these differ in multitude and magnitude and intensity and equality, and in whatever things are the contrary to all these, with respect to wishing; but ¹with respect to the choice of each, ¹they do not differ. Since then these things have been thus arranged by necessity, we wish for that life, in which the many and great and intense of each kind exist, but in which pleasures exceed; but we do not wish for that life, in which the contraries to these exist. And on the other hand, the life in which things few and little and quiet exist, but in which pains exceed, we do not wish for; but we wish for that life in which the contraries to these exist. ²And again, the life, in which the balance is equal, as we said before, it is meet to consider as an equal-balanced life; ²since we wish for the life, which exceeds ³in what is agreeable to us; but we do not wish for that (which exceeds) in what is disagreeable. ⁴Now it is necessary to consider all our lives as naturally bound up in these; and ⁵[it is necessary to consider] ⁵what kind (of lives) we naturally wish for. And if we say,

²—² Ficinus has more briefly, “si autem æqualia sunt, de æquali vita, ut diximus, cogitandum;” while Taylor translates ισορροπεῖ by “these possess equal power.” Plato wrote, I suspect, ισορροπεῖ πάντα καθ' ἐκάτερα τὰ ἐν τοῖς πρόσθεν,—“all are balanced according to either of the things previously stated,” namely, pleasure and pain.

³ The Greek is τῶν ὑπερβαλλόντων—τῶν δ' αὖ—But as the genitive is without regimen, Ast suggests τὸν ὑπερβάλλοντα—τὸν δ' αὖ—to agree with βίον understood, and so Taylor had already translated. I should prefer τὰ τῶν ὑπερβαλλόντων—Ficinus has “volumus enim, quæ illo excedunt—”

⁴ Why Plato should thus have written τοῖς ἐχθροῖς here, to balance the preceding τῷ φίλῳ, I cannot understand. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, avoids the difficulty by translating, “quæ contrario superant,” as if his MS. read τῷ ἐναντίῳ, of which τοῖς ἐχθροῖς would be the explanation.

⁵—The words within the brackets are evidently an interpolation, and properly omitted by Ficinus.

that we wish for any thing except these, we say so through an ignorance of, and inexperience in, lives as they exist.

[6.] What then and of what kind are the lives, respecting which it is necessary for a person to know something,¹ while forecasting² what is to be wished for and is voluntary, and what is to be not wished for and is involuntary; and,³ after prescribing a law to himself, to choose what is agreeable and pleasant and the best and the most beautiful, and to lead a life as far as possible, the most happy for man? Let us then call one life temperate, another prudent, another brave, and rank one as healthy;⁴ and four others, the contraries to these four, by the name of the imprudent, the cowardly, the intemperate, and the diseased. He, then, who knows the temperate, will lay it down as mild in all things, and exhibiting quiet pains, and quiet pleasures, and placid desires, and loves not insane; but the intemperate as being impetuous in all things, and exhibiting vehement pains, and vehement pleasures, and desires on the stretch and goaded on, and loves the maddest possible; and that in a temperate life the pleasures exceed the pains; but in an intemperate one the pains (exceed) the pleasures in magnitude and multitude and intensity. Hence, the one of these lives happens of necessity to be according to nature more pleasant to us, but the other more painful; and it is no longer in the power of him, who wishes to live pleasantly, to live voluntarily in an intemperate manner; but it is evident, if what has been said is correct, that every licentious person is of necessity so unwillingly. For the whole mass of mankind live in the want of temperance, either through the want of teaching, or through incontinence, or through both. The same things are to be considered respecting a diseased and healthy life, that

¹ The Greek is ιδόντα. But Ficinus has "nosse." Hence his MS. probably read ἐπατεῖν τι— On the loss or confusion of ἐπατεῖν, and of the phrase ἐπατεῖν τι περὶ τινος, see myself on Hipp. Maj. § 22, n. 4.

² In lieu of προελόμενον, which could not thus precede the subsequent ἐλόμενον, I have translated as if the word were προϊδόμενον— Ficinus omits προελόμενον entirely.

³ Ficinus has "hisque cognititis," from which Stephens was led to suggest εἰτα for εἰς, which Ast says may mean "instar." But such is never its meaning. Perhaps Plato wrote καί, which was first corrupted into ὦς, and then into εἰς—

⁴ Ficinus has "sanam denique quartam," as if his MS. read not "ENA, but ONTA Δ, where Δ would mean "the fourth—" On the errors arising from letters expressive of numerals see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 223.

they possess pleasures and pains, but that the pleasures exceed the pains in health, but the pains the pleasures in illness. Our wish however in the choice of lives is not that pain may exceed, but, where it is exceeded, that life we have decided to be the more pleasant. Now the ¹[temperate man],¹ we would say, possesses in both respects things fewer, and less, and slighter than [the intemperate], and the prudent than the imprudent, and the man of bravery than the one of timidity, each exceeding each on the score of pleasures; but on that of pains, ²the former exceeding the latter,² the brave man has the victory over the timid, and in that of the prudent the imprudent; so that ³of the lives, the more pleasant are the temperate, and the brave, and the prudent, and the healthy, than the timid, and imprudent, and intemperate, and the diseased;³ and in short, the life which is connected with virtue, pertaining either to the body or the soul, is more pleasant than the life which is connected with depravity, and is superior even to superfluity in the other points, such as beauty and rectitude and virtue and fair renown; so that it causes the person, who possesses it, to live more happily in every respect and totally, than he (who possesses) the contrary (life).⁴

[7.] ⁵Let then the prelude of the laws, having been here spoken of, have an end of the speeches.⁵ But after the prelude

^{1—1} The words within brackets, in Greek ὁ δὲ σώφρων τοῦ ἀκολάστου, Cornarius, with whom Ast agrees, was the first to reject as an interpolation. For the question relating to the σώφρων and ἀκόλαστος has been discussed already; besides, the subsequent words, ἐκάτερος ἐκάτερον, prove that only two lives are spoken of, not three.

^{2—2} So I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐκείνων ὑπερβαλλόντων, τοὺτους, not αὐτούς; but why the genitive plural ἐκείνων and τοὺτους should be thus introduced in lieu of the nominative singular to answer to the preceding antithetical clause, I confess I cannot understand, much less explain. Ast indeed refers the plurals to the ἀφρων and δειλός, opposed to the φρόνιμος and ἀνδρείος respectively; and as regards the genitive for the nominative quotes his own note on ii. 3, from which however nothing is gained. With respect to Ficinus, he seems to have been so completely at loss, as to omit nearly all the words, in which the whole difficulty lies, between ἔχων and βίων; for his version is, "habet; et alter voluptatibus, alter doloribus superat, ita ut fortis—"

^{3—3} All between the numerals are tacitly omitted by Taylor.

⁴ So Taylor correctly; for he probably wished, instead of τοῦ ἐναντίου, to read τοῦ τὸν ἐναντίον, with the ellipse of ἔχοντος and βίων.

^{5—5} All between the numerals Taylor has tacitly omitted; while Ficinus has merely "Verum exordium legum jam finem accipiat." For he was doubtless dissatisfied (as who is not?) with the Greek, Καὶ τὸ μὲν it is necessary somehow for the strain to follow ; or rather, in good truth, to write down the laws of a polity. As then it is not possible, in the case of a web, or any other tissue whatever, to work up the weft and the warp from the same materials, but there must needs be a difference as regard their quality in the production of the warp, by being some of it ¹ strong and assuming a firmness through the spindle,² and another part of it softer and ³making use of a just easiness ;³ from whence⁴ it is meet that those, who are about to hold great offices in the state, should be judged of separately in this way, and those too, who have been tested in a trifling education, on each occasion according to reason. For there are two kinds of politics, one relating to the appointment of offices to each individual, and the other relating to the laws assigned to the offices. But before all it is requisite to consider things of this kind. A shepherd, and a herdsman, and a breeder of horses, and whatever else there are of this kind of occupations, will, after receiving the whole herd, never attempt to attend to them otherwise than by first applying a purification suited to their individual living together ; and having by a selection separated the healthy and diseased, and the well-bred and ill-bred, he will send away one part to some other herds, but attend upon the other part, thoroughly perceiving that his labour would be in vain and non-effective as regards both the body and soul,⁵ which after nature and improper aliment had corrupted, ⁶they προοίμιον τῶν νόμων ἐνταυθοῖ λεχθέν τῶν λόγων τέλος ἔχεν: where Plato wrote, I suspect, δειχθέν τῷ λόγῳ, i. e. "shown by the discourse—"

¹ Here, as elsewhere, τὸ μὲν is to be supplied from the subsequent τὸ δέ.

² Instead of τοῖς τρόποις, which is perfectly unintelligible, Ast would read from "tortura" in Cornarius, ταῖς στροφαῖς, referring to Politic. p. 282, E., τούτου δὲ τὸ μὲν ἀτράκτω τε στραφέν καὶ στερὸν νῆμα γενόμενον: from which it is easy to elicit τοῖς ἀτράκτοις, as I have translated. Cousin translates βεβαυῶτητα ἐν τοῖς τρόποις by "solide dans sa façon" c' est a dire, solidement."

³—³ I must leave for others to explain, what I cannot, the words ἐπιεικὴς δικαίᾳ χρώμενον, applied to a process in weaving. For ἐπιεικεία is elsewhere applied to a person. Ficinus has "ut facilius cedat."

⁴ Ast correctly remarks, that to answer καθάπερ there should have been here ὡσαύτως, similar to "ita" in Ficinus.

⁵ The idea of a soul is strangely united to that of the body in the case of an animal ; unless it be said that ψυχὴ means here "spirit," as in Minos, § 17.

⁶—⁶ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has "ut, nisi quis segreget sanorum integrorumque morum ac corporum genus, in singulis contagione interimant."

moreover destroy the race of healthy and unmixed habits and bodies in each of the flocks, unless a person purifies what is present in them.⁶ The attention, however, which is paid to other animals is indeed less, and is alone worthy to be brought forward for the sake of an example. But the affairs of men (need) the greatest attention on the part of the legislator, to investigate and detail what is suited to each individual, as regards purification and all other actions. For instance, that which relates to the purification of a state should be in this way. Of many existing purifications, some are rather easy, but others more difficult; and he who is both a tyrant and a legislator may be able to use such purifications as are difficult and the best. But the legislator, who without being a tyrant lays down a new polity and laws, would, if he were able to purify with the mildest of purifications, do a thing of this kind contentedly. ¹The best purification is however painful; just as are the remedies of some such kind, which leading for justice to punishment with avenging,¹ put death or exile as the finish to punishment. For it is wont to free the city from those, who have erred the greatest, and who, as being incurable, are the greatest hurt to the state. But with us there is a milder purification of this kind. For upon these, who, having nothing themselves, do, through the want of food, exhibit themselves as prepared to follow their leaders in an attack upon the property of persons, who possess something, upon such, as being naturally a disease in the state, it imposes a removal, under the name, by way of good omen, of a colony, and sends them away in the kindest possible manner. This then should somehow be done at the very commencement by every one legislating. To us however what is still more strange than this has now happened relating to these. For there is no need to devise either a colony or any selection for a purification; but as if the waters, partly from fountains and partly from mountain torrents, were flowing together into one lake, it is necessary for persons to be on the watch, that, partly by pumping out, and partly by drawing off into channels, and partly by diverting its course, the water flowing together may be the most clear. But labour and danger, as it appears, are to be found in every political establishment. However, since what is now done exists in discourse, and not in action, let our selection be held to be completed, and the purification to have taken place according to our notions. For having by every kind of persuasion and for a sufficient length of time tried by a test those amongst evil men, who were endeavouring to enter our city in order to administer it, let us prevent them from reaching it, and let us introduce the good, (rendering them)¹ well-disposed and propitious to the utmost of our power.

¹⁻¹ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, ἔστι δὲ ὁ μὲν ἀριστος ἀλγυνός, καθάπερ ὅσα τῶν φαρμάκων τοιούτοτροπα, ὁ τῇ δίκῃ μετὰ τιμωρίας εἰς τὸ κολλάζειν ἄγων, where I am quite at a loss in the last clause; and so, I think, was Ficinus; whose version is "nam exactissima purificatio, quemadmodum medicina, quæ validior corporibus adhibetur, doloris plena est, et cum ultione justa penam infert, morte peccantem aut exilio dam-nans."

[8.] Let not, however, the good fortune, which has happened, lie hid from us, that, as we said that the colony of the Heraclidæ was fortunate, because it escaped the dreadful and dangerous strife respecting the division of land and the abolition of debts,² in which strife³ it is impossible for a state, compelled to be regulated by law, to leave any of its ancient institutions undisturbed, nor on the other hand is it possible to disturb them after a certain manner (successfully),⁴ (the same thing appears nearly to have happened to us);⁵ and there is left merely, so to say, a prayer,⁶ and a trifling change to those making a slight alteration cautiously⁷ and slowly in a great length of time; ⁸ which alteration should take place⁸ by those persons innovat-

¹ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, "facientes:" unless it be said that Plato wrote τοὺς δὲ ἀγαθοὺς, θεοῖς ἴσους δυναμένους εἶναι εὐμενεῖς—not τοὺς δὲ ἀγαθοὺς εἰς δύναμιν εὐμενεῖς—i. e. "the good, able to be, equally with gods—"

² From the version of Ficinus, adopted by Taylor, "dividendorum agrorum contentionem," it is evident he found in his MS. γῆς διανομῆς καὶ χρῶν ἀποκοπῆς περί—not γῆς καὶ χρῶν ἀποκοπῆς καὶ νομῆς περί—for the correct word is διανομή, not νομή, as shown by διανομήν τῆς γῆς shortly afterwards; although νομή is found a little below—

³ The Greek is ἦν, which is without regimen. The sense and syntax require ἐν γ, i. e. ἰρίδι: where ἐν has been lost through the last syllable of ἐξέφυγεν—

⁴ Here I have inserted εἶ, which might easily have dropt out before εὐχῇ—

⁵ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has alone, what is required to complete the sentence, "ita ferme et nobis accidisse videtur."

⁶ On this use of εὐχῇ in Greek, and "votum" in Latin, see Ast.

⁷ I have translated as if the Greek were εὐλαβῶς, not εὐλαβῆς—

⁸—The Greek is ἡ δὲ τῶν κινούντων—ὑπάρχειν, where I cannot discover either sense or syntax. Hence for the sake of both I have translated as if the text were ἦν δαὶ οὕτω κινούντων—ὑπάρχειν.

ing, who have an abundance of land, and have likewise many debtors, and are willing through a kind consideration to share with those in want, partly by giving up (debts) and partly by distributing (property), and by holding to moderation, and by thinking that poverty does not consist in a diminution of property, but in an insatiable desire to acquire more. For this is the greatest beginning of safety to a state; and upon this, as upon a stable foundation, it is possible to build up whatever political arrangement any one would raise up, befitting a constitution of this kind. But when the change is of an unsound kind, no political movement will afterwards take place easily in a state. ¹ From this, as we have said, we fly. It would however have been more correct to have said in what way, if we have not fled from it, we might have made for ourselves the flight. Let it then be said how that through not being fond of money together with justice; but there is no other escape, either broad or narrow, of such a plan.¹ Let this then be laid down by us as ²a prop of a state.² For it is necessary that (the citizens)³ should somehow raise up for themselves their property without reproach from each other; ⁴or, that they should not be willing to proceed previously to the before of the rest of the constitution,⁴ who have

¹—¹ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus; whose version, of which the latter portion has been adopted by Taylor to the letter, is “itaque nos, id fugientes, immo vero verbis, quo pacto fugiendum sit, ostendentes, dicimus nullam esse aliam aut latam aut angustam fugiendi viam, nisi ut colamus justitiam, neque acquirendi cupiditatem sequamur.” Equally in the dark was Heindorf, who wished to read μετ’ ἀδικίας for μετὰ δίκης, with the full approbation of Ast, and the less decided one of Stalbaum. With regard to ὁρθότερον, Stephens correctly saw that ἀν εἶη had dropt out before εἰ—while Ast remarks that τῆς τοιαύτης μηχανῆς διαφυγῆς is put for τῶν τοιοῦτων διαφυγῆς μηχανῇ—But he does not state what could induce Plato to put down words, that, taken literally, have no meaning, in the place of others, which would have been perfectly intelligible.

²—² Since two MSS. offer λιμήν as a various reading for ἡμίς, it is probable that both are corruptions of the word written here originally; and as Plutarch has in Polit. Præcept. ii. p. 814, 25, ὥσπερ ἔρμα τῆς πολιτείας βέβαιον, I suspect he has preserved what he found in Plato, although πόλεως ἔρμα is similar to ἔρμα πόλεως in Ιλ. Π. 549, and Οδ. Ψ. 121.

³ Ficinus alone has “cives,” what is required by ἀλλήλους.

⁴—⁴ Here again the version of Ficinus proves he could not understand the Greek, which to myself is equally unintelligible. His translation, adopted to the letter by Taylor, is “vel ulterius in acquirendo progredi ultro desistant.”

accusations of old standing against each other, and to whom there is even a small share of intellect. But for those persons, to whom a god has given, as it has to us at present, to settle a new state, and for ¹no enmities to exist¹ against each other, to become ²themselves the cause of enmities to each other² through the division of the land and dwellings, would be a not-human want of education, united to every kind of wickedness.

What then would be the method of a correct distribution? In the first place, it is requisite to fix³ the same quantity³ of the number, ⁴how great it ought to be.⁴ After this it must be agreed respecting the distribution to the citizens, into how many and what kind of parts it is to be made by them for the mass of people. And for this purpose the land and dwellings must be distributed as equally as possible. Now a sufficient quantity of the mass of people cannot be correctly stated otherwise than with reference to the land and cities of neighbouring nations. As regards⁵ the land, how much of it is sufficient to feed how many temperate persons⁶—for of more there is no need—but as regards the number, how many would be able to defend themselves ⁷not altogether without resources⁷ against bordering tribes acting unjustly, and to assist their neighbours when injured. Having then viewed these points, we will define both

²—² Here again, by the slight change of τούτους into αὐτοὺς, and taking ἐαυτοῖς in the sense of ἀλλήλους, I have recovered what is required by the train of thought.

³—³ The Greek is τὸν αὐτὸν ὄγκον, where Boeckh suggested, what Bekker, Ast, and Stalbaum have adopted, αὐτῶν. But αὐτῶν could not be thus inserted between τὸν and ὄγκον—It would be in correct Greek, αὐτῶν τὸν ὄγκον or τὸν ὄγκον αὐτῶν. Ficinus has omitted αὐτὸν entirely. Perhaps Plato wrote τὸν ὅλον ὄγκον—

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁵ Six MSS. read γῆ, one γῆι, and another γῆς. The last, answering to πλήθους in the next sentence, has been retained by Ast; who says that the genitive is used absolutely in the sense of κατὰ γῆν. But Stephens more correctly would supply δεῖ—for otherwise in lieu of προσδεῖ there would have been written simply δεῖ.

⁶ Ast observes correctly that Aristotle, alluding to this passage in Polit. ii. 4, has misrepresented the very party with whose doctrines he finds fault.

⁷—⁷ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him tacitly by Taylor, because they were not in his MS., or deemed by him to be not suited to the train of thought; which would require rather βοηθῆσαι εὖ παντάπασιν ἀπὸροις οὖσι, i. e. to well assist (the neighbours) altogether without resources.

by deed and word the land and neighbours. But now, for the sake of a sketch and outline,¹ that the thing itself may be accomplished, let the discourse proceed to our laying down the laws.

Let the land-owners and those that defend the distribution of the land, be, for the sake of a fitting number, five thousand and forty; and let, in like manner, the land and the dwellings be distributed into the same portions,² so that the man and his portion may accord in distribution.³ And in the first place, let there be of the whole number two parts distributed, and afterwards three of the same;³ for it is by nature (divisible) into four and five, and so in succession as far as ten. Thus much ought every person, who is legislating, to understand respecting number, what it is, and what kind will be the most useful to all states. Let us then say it is that, which possesses in itself the greatest quantity of divisions and most in orderly succession. For the whole number does (not)⁴ obtain by lot all kinds of divisions for all things. But the number five thousand and forty, in matters relating to war and whatever in peace have to do with conventions and communions, and relating to revenue and distributions, cannot be cut into more than sixty parts wanting one; but there are continuous divisions of it from one up to ten.

[9.] These things however it is meet for those to take in hand firmly at leisure,⁵ on whom the law enjoins to take them; for they cannot exist otherwise than in this manner. But it is requisite for them to be mentioned to a person settling a state for the sake of this; that no one, whether

²⁻³ So Taylor translates the Latin of Ficinus—"ut vir et portio cum distributione convenient." The Greek is διανεμηθῆτων γεγόμενα ἀνὴρ καὶ κλῆρος ξυννομή: which I cannot understand. Perhaps Plato wrote διανεμηθῆτων, ἢ ἂν λεγομένη, ἀνὴρ καὶ κλῆρος, ξυννομή ᾗ, i. e. "that a man and portion may be called a co-share."

³ I have adopted with Ast the correction of Stephens, τοῦ αὐτοῦ for τὸν αὐτὸν, omitted entirely by Ficinus and Taylor.

⁴ Instead of ὁ μὲν πᾶς, Ast reads οὐ μὲν πᾶς, from "non enim omnis" in Gryneus' refiction of Ficinus, adopted tacitly by Taylor. Ficinus himself has not the negative.

⁵ Before κατὰ σχολὴν there is introduced καὶ, which I cannot understand; nor could Ficinus, who has omitted it.

he is making a (polity) new from the beginning, or patching up an ancient one that has been corrupted, will, if he has any mind, attempt to disturb, with respect to the gods or sacred rites, and whatever else ought to be established in the state for each of the gods or dæmons, by whatever name they may be called, whatever (has come)¹ from Delphi or Dodona² or Ammon,³ or what⁴ certain old accounts have somehow persuaded persons on hearing them, when, through visions having occurred or an inspiration from gods having been declared,⁴ parties have, through being persuaded,⁵ established sacrifices mixed up with mystic ceremonies, (emanating) either from their own country, (or) being exotic⁶ from Tyrrhenia,⁷ or Cyprus,⁸ or any other place what-

¹ I have translated as if ἤκεν had dropt out between ὅσα and ἐκ—

² Delphi and Dodona, the two most ancient oracular shrines in Greece, are similarly united by Æschylus in Prom. 678, 'Ο δ' ἐξ τε Πυθῶ καπὶ Δωδώνης συχνοῦς Θεοπρόπους ἰαλλεν: and by Sophocles in 'Οδυσσ. Ακανθοπλ. Fr., Νῦν δ' οὔτε μ' εἰς Δωδῶνος οὔτε Πυθικῶν Γυάλων τις ἀν πέσειε (τοὺς θεοπρόπους Πέμψαι).

³ There is not, I believe, any mention in ancient authors of the shrine of Ammon in Libya antecedent to the time of Herodotus, when those at Delphi and Dodona had lost no little of the odour of sanctity they once possessed.

⁵ The Greek is ἔπεισαν—πείσαντες δέ, in which on the ground of language there is nothing to offend except that κατέστησαν should have been written instead of κατεστήσαντο. Hence, as Ficinus has "quibus approbatis veteres," he probably found in his MS. πεισθέντες, as I have translated.

⁶ The Greek is αὐτόθεν ἐπιχωρίους. But from the mention of two places, Tyrrhenia and Cyprus, it is evident that Plato wrote, as I have translated, αὐτόθεν ἢ ἀποχώριους οὔσας—

⁷ Although it is known that the Romans received their religious rites from Tuscany, yet that the Greeks did so likewise, is not, I believe, mentioned elsewhere. Perhaps however Plato had heard of what is stated by Theopompus, quoted by Athenæus, xii. p. 517, that they had wives in common,—the very doctrine which he inculcated.

⁸ It is difficult to understand what are the Cyprian rites to which Plato alludes. For if they were those of Venus, these, according to Ovid, were taught by Nature alone, and were indigenous in all countries. Is there any reference here to the fact mentioned by Strabo, xiv. p. 1001, B., that there was in Cyprus a temple of Venus, which women were not permitted to enter?

ever; and from these ancient accounts and oracles they consecrated statues, and altars, and temples, and made for each of the deities a sacred grove. Of all these not even the least must the legislator disturb; but he must assign to each of the portions a god, a dæmon, or some hero. And in the division of the land, he must give up, selected for the first in rank, the groves and all that is fitting, so that the assemblies of each of the portions, taking place at stated times, may furnish resources against their wants, and during the sacrifices kindly entertain, and become familiar with, and recognise, each other. ¹For there is no greater good to a state than for persons to be the acquaintances of each other. ¹ Since where there is no light ² to each other in the manners of each other, but a darkness, there no one will properly meet with the honour due to his worth, nor with offices, nor even with the justice which is fitting. ³It is meet then for every man in all states to be earnest in this matter, compared as one with one, ³ that he never appear to any one to be of a base stamp, but always artless and true, and that no other person of that kind ⁴ deceive him. But the next movement, as in the case ⁵ of the pebble-game,

^{1—1} The Greek is οὐ μᾶλλον οὐδὲν πόλει ἀγαθὸν ἢ γνωρίμους—εἶναι: where Ast says that ἢ γνωρίμους—εἶναι is superfluously added by way of an explanation. But correct sense would require οὐ γὰρ μᾶλλον οὐδὲν—and correct syntax, ἢ τὸ γνωρίμους—εἶναι, as I have translated. With regard to the sentiment, Ast refers to Aristotle Politic. vii. 4, 7.

² On this metaphor Ast quotes from Cicero, “in luce atque in oculis civium magnus,” and from Xenophon, εἰς κάλλος βίῃ τὸ φῶς—παρίχεν, and refers to Wetstein on S. John iii. 21, “Let your light so shine before all men, that they may see your good works—”

^{3—3} Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus has what is more intelligible, “nihil est autem, si unum uni conferas, in quo majus studium—ponere quisque debeat,” as if he had found in his MS. οὐδὲν δὲ ἦν, ὃ δεῖ πάντα ἀνδρά μαλλον, ἐν πρὸς ἐν, ἢ τοῦτο σπεύδειν, not δεῖ δὲ πάντα ἀνδρά, ἐν πρὸς ἐν τοῦτο σπεύδειν.

⁴ Namely, “of a base stamp.”

⁵ The proverb, to which Plato alludes, has been thus explained. In the game called πίττωια there were five lines on two opposite sides of the board, as there are eight on a draught-board; and between them a vacant line, not occupied by the pebbles, or counters, used in the game. This vacant line was called ιερά γραμμή, “the holy line;” and the party who was driven to it the first, was considered as the loser, just as in the game of fox and geese; although there it is not a line, but a space that is left vacant: and hence, as Plato has written ἀφ’ ιεροῦ, we must understand τόπον; but γραμμῆς after ἀφ’ ιεράς. With regard to the authors who have treated on the subject, Ast refers to the Scholiast here; Suidas on *Ἀφ’ *ιεράς; from the sacred spot would, as being unusual, cause, in the case of legislation, the person who hears of it for the first time perhaps to wonder. To him however who has reasoned upon, and tried it, it will appear that the state is in a second way settled for the best. Perhaps however some one will not receive the movement, through its not being customary with a tyrannic legislator. It will¹ however be most correct to speak of the best polity, and of the second and third, and then to leave the choice to each person,² who is the lord in the co-settlement.³ Let us act then even now according to this very method, by speaking of a polity the first, and the second, and the third in worth; and let us leave the choice to Clinias at present, and to any one else who may be willing to come to the selection of such polities, and to assign, according to his own method,³ that which is agreeable to him (with respect to) his own country.³

[10.] Now the first state and polity and the best laws are there, where the old saying may be most in vogue through the whole state; for⁴ it said that, amongst friends all things are really in common. This saying, whether it now is or ever will be (practised),⁵ that women are in common, and children in common, and all possessions in common,⁵ has taken away⁶ by every means every where and entirely from life what is called private property; and it has planned that things even naturally Pollux, ix. 7; Eustath. Od. A. p. 28, 42; Meursius De Ludis Græcor.; Erasmus Adag. p. 28; and Salmasius on Vopisc. p. 466, A. The proverb was applied to those, who placed themselves in a perilous position.

²⁻³ Such is the literal version of τῷ τῆς συνουκίσεως κυρίῳ. Ficinus has "arbitratu suo quamlibet electuro," from whence Taylor translated "to choose that which pleases him the most."

²⁻³ The Greek is τὸ φίλον αὐτῷ τῆς αὐτοῦ πατρίδος. This Ast renders "ea quæ in patria sua ipsi placent;" which I cannot understand. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has "patriæque (Bekker incorrectly "partique") suæ, quod sibi placet tribuere." I have translated as if πᾶσι had dropt out after πατρίδος.

⁴ Instead of δὲ the sense requires γὰρ, as I have translated, or else ὅ λέγεται, similar to "quo fertur" in Ficinus.

⁵⁻⁶ The St. Simonians of the present day have attempted to put this precept into practice, but with so little success, as to show that Plato's Laws are better suited for an ideal Republic than a real one.

* If the doctrine had never been put into practice, one cannot understand why Plato used the definite perfect ἔγρηται and μεμυχάνηται instead of the indefinite pluperfect ἔγρητ' ἄν and μεμυχάνητ' ἄν.

private, as far as possible, become by some means in common; such as the eyes, the ears, and the hands, in seeming¹ to see, and hear, and work, in common; and that, again, all men taken singly² praise and blame as much as possible (the same things),³ rejoicing in, and pained by,³ the same things;⁴ and (hence) no one (has) ever laid down or will lay down a definition more correct and better (than this), that of such laws as cause a state to be as much as possible one, (there is) the superiority on the ground of virtue.⁴ Such a state will ours⁵ be, whether gods or the children of gods, more in number than one,⁶ dwell there,⁷ and with delight save and regulate⁸ those living in that manner.⁸ Hence it is proper to reflect upon the pattern of a polity in no other way; but, sticking to this, to seek that, which is as much as possible of such a kind. But that, which we have now taken in hand, would,⁹ if it ex-

¹ This "seeming" seems very strange here, as if the eyes, ears, and hands did not really see, hear, and work. The verb δοκῆν ought, I conceive, to follow παινεῖν τε, in lieu of αὐ, which is perfectly superfluous.

² In lieu of καθ' ἑνα, which is unintelligible, Ast, whom I have followed, suggests καθ' ἑνα.

³ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, "laudentque et vituperent eadem similiter."

⁴ The Greek is καὶ κατὰ δύναμιν οἱ τινες μάλιστα νόμοι μίαν ὅτι μάλιστα πόλιν ἀπεργάζονται τούτων ὑπερβολὴ πρὸς ἀρετὴν οὐδεὶς ποτε ἕρον ἄλλον θέμενος ὁρθότερον οὐδὲ βελτίω θήσεται: which, says Ast, has been wrongly translated by Ficinus, Cornarius, Serranus, and Schulthes. In fact they were all equally at a loss, and naturally so; for the passage is evidently corrupt. It was, I suspect, originally to this effect—Καὶ οὕτω κατὰ δύναμιν—τούτων ὑπερβολὴν πρὸς ἀρετὴν εἶναι οὐδεὶς ποτε ἕρον ἄλλον ἢν θέμενος—as I have translated. To meet the difficulty Ficinus places the clause τούτων ὑπερβολὴ—θήσεται after κοινὰ φίλων: and from his version, "certe in hoc præcipue virtutis erit terminus, quo nullus poni rector poterit," it is evident that his MS. was defective, or that he designedly abridged what he found in it.

⁵ The Greek is ἡ μὲν δὴ τοιαύτη πόλις, which Ast calls an absolute sentence. He should have called it rather an imperfect one. For Plato probably wrote ἡμῖν δὴ τοιαύτη ἡ πόλις ἔσται, as I have translated.

⁶ By the expression of more numerous than one are probably intended Castor and Pollux, the twin sons of Jupiter, who were the tutelary gods of Sparta.

⁷ The gods were supposed to dwell in the towns sacred to them.

⁸ The Greek is οὕτω διαζῶντες. But four MSS. read διασῶζοντες. Ficinus united both—"ita viventes eamque servantes—vivunt"—Hence I have been led to τοῦς οὕτω ζῶντας διασῶζοντες—

⁹ In lieu of εἶναι τε, where τε is connected with nothing, Heindorf suggested γε—He should have proposed ποτε— isted at all, be the nearest to immortality; and if it is ¹ not in the first rank, it will be at least one in the second.¹ After this we will, god willing, go through the polity, which is the third in order. But now let us speak of this polity, what it is, and how it may be produced.

In the first place, let them distribute the land and houses. But let them not cultivate the ground in common; since a thing of this kind is spoken of as greater than is suited to their present birth, nurture, and education. Let them however distribute land and houses with somehow such an intention as this, that each on obtaining his allotment ought to consider it as being common to the whole state; and, as this country is their paternal land, they ought to attend to it in a greater degree than children do their mother, in that, being a goddess, she is the sovereign mistress of mortals. The same conceptions they ought to have of the gods of the place, and likewise of dæmons. But that these things may exist in this manner through all time, on this too they must thoroughly reflect. As many hearths as are distributed by us at present, so many must there be always, and neither more nor less. Now a thing of this kind will be firmly established through every state in this way. Let the person, who has obtained his allotment, leave ever the child, who is most dear to him, the only heir of his household, and his successor, and the attendant upon the gods and family and state, and of those still living, and of such as their end has already reached up to the then period. But with respect to the other children, they, to whom there are more than one, must give their daughters in marriage according to a law to be laid down; but distribute their male children as sons to those, who have no family, as an act of kindness conferred; but if there be a lack of kindness, or if more females are born than some² males, or the contrary, when they are fewer, through barrenness taking place, let the magistrate,³ whom we shall lay down as the greatest and most honourable, consider what is proper to be done with the superabundance and deficiency of children, and devise a method by which five thousand and forty households alone may exist always. Now there are many methods. For there are checks to procreation when it is overflowing;¹ and, on the contrary, care and an attention to the number of births do, by means of honours, and disqualifications, and ²the advice of elders to young persons, meet (the difficulty), and are able to effect what we are speaking of [by admonitory discourses].³ ³Moreover, should at last every difficulty arise about the inequality of the five thousand and forty households,³ and an excessive influx of citizens take place through the kind feelings of those, who dwell together, and we come to want, there remains the old contrivance, which we have often mentioned, of friendly colonies being sent out from friends, whithersoever it may appear to be suitable. But if, on the contrary, there should at any time come⁴ a wave bringing an inundation,⁵ or ⁶a destruction arising from plagues or wars, and the people become, through a state of orphanhood, much less than the prescribed number, we must not willingly introduce citizens educated in a not legitimate discipline; but ⁷to use force against necessity it is said not even a god has the power.⁷

¹—¹ Such is the literal version of the Latin of Ficinus, “ac si non primo, saltem secundo loco erit una.” He therefore found in his MS. kai, ei mē ā, ἀλλὰ δευτέρα ἔσται μία: where ā is πρώτη. See my Poppo’s Prolegom. p. 223. The Greek is kai ἡ μία δευτέρως, which Ast would explain by referring δευτέρως to what is to follow.

² I scarcely understand τινες here. It is omitted by Ficinus.

³ In lieu of ἀρχὴν Winckelmann would read ἀρχή, obtained from “magistratus” in Ficinus.

¹ Aristotle had this passage in view in Polit. ii. 3, 6.

²⁻³ The Greek is νουθετήσῃσι πρεσβυτέρων περὶ νέους διὰ λόγων νουθετητικῶν ἀπαντῶσαι. But after νουθετήσῃσι the words διὰ λόγων νουθετητικῶν present an insufferable tautology; and hence they ought to be inserted just above after γένεσις, as showing of what nature are the checks to which Plato allude. The cause of the mistake is owing to the fact, that they formed one line of the Codex Archetypus, containing about twenty-one letters. Moreover, as Ficinus has "monitionibus senum ad juvenes," Cornarius correctly saw that his MS. read πρὸς νέους—Lastly, as one MS. offers λόγους in lieu of νέους, it is probable that in περὶ λογὸς lies hid ἀπορία λέχους, and thus ἀπαντῶσαι will recover, what it has lost, its object.

³⁻⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows in part, has "denique hinc omnes defectus oritur et inopia, cum quinque millium et quadraginta domorum numerus non servatur."

⁴ Instead of ὧν Ficinus found in his MS. οἱ, as shown by his "quo—"

⁵ For examples of cities situated on the sea-coast being destroyed by a wave, see Thucyd. ii. 89; Pausanias vii. p. 585; Agathias ii. p. 53; Athenæus vii. p. 333, C.; and Suidas in "Υφαλος."

⁶ I have adopted ἡ, introduced by Cornarius, before καὶ—Ficinus has "morborem lues bellorumve calamitas, velut quadam illuvione."

⁷ This sentiment is attributed to Simonides by Plato in Protag. p. 345, D. § 87, but to Pittacus by Diogen. Laert. i. 77.

[11.] This then let us assert our present discourse advises, by saying—O ye best of all men, do not relax¹ in honouring similitude and equality and the same and what is generally acknowledged according to nature and according to number and all the power of things beautiful and good.² And now guard, in the first place, through the whole of life the above-mentioned number; next, do not hold in dishonour³ the height and magnitude of³ the property, which ye first distributed, as being moderate, by buying from, and selling to, each other. For neither⁴ the distributing lot, being a god, is an ally,⁴ nor the legislator. For now the law, in the first place, enjoins upon the disobedient,⁵ by proclaiming beforehand, that upon these conditions any person, who is willing, may cast lots or not; and that, since the land, being sacred, belongs first to all the gods, and next, to the priests and priestesses, who pray at the first sacrifices, and the second, and even to the third, both the buyer and seller of tenements and farms, which they have obtained by lot, are to suffer what is befitting upon such transactions; and having written⁶ memoranda on cypress (tablets),⁶ they shall place them in temples⁷ written for the time hereafter;⁷ and in addition to

² I must confess my inability to understand what Plato is aiming at.

³—³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of Bekker's text. Ficinus has “neque, deus ipse distributor—favebit,” as if his MS. read οὔτε γὰρ ὁ νείμας θεὸς αὐτός, not οὔτε γὰρ ὁ νείμας κλήρος ὢν θεός, where Stalbaum has adopted κλήρον, found in Stephens, and written thus in two MSS., κλήρος—But who was the god, that distributed the lot, is no where mentioned. Hence Plato wrote, I suspect, οὔτε γὰρ Ἑρμῆς, ὁ νείμας κλήρον, ὢν θεός—For Hermes was not only the god, who presided over buying and selling, but he gave his name likewise to the lot first drawn out, and therefore the successful one; as we learn from a gl. in Hesychius and Photius, Ἑρμοῦ κλήρος—and hence we find in Aristoph. Εἰρ., 364, Ἑρμῆς γὰρ ὢν κλήρω ποιήσεις οἶδ' ὅτι: where see the Schol.

⁵ Although ἀπειθοῦντι is repeated a little below, yet here it is scarcely intelligible: for there is nothing to which the idea of disobedience can be referred.

⁶—⁶ The Greek is κυπαριττίνας μνήμας, where Stephens explains κυπαριττίνας by saying that the cypress tree was selected as being free from the attacks of worms.

⁷—⁷ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has “ad posteritatis instructionem,” omitting γεγραμμένας, which certainly seems unnecessary, and adding, what renders εἰς τὸν ἔπειτα χρόνον more intelligithis they shall invest the guardianship of these, ⁸ in order that they may be, ⁸ in that magistrate, who seems to see the most acutely, in order that the matters fraudulently introduced ¹ may not lie hid from them, but that they may punish the person disobedient at the same time to the law and to the god. ² For how great a good will what is now enjoined be to all states that are persuaded, when they adopt the following arrangement, according to the old proverb, ³ no person being wicked will know, but being experienced and reasonable in his habits (he will). For in such an arrangement there exists not much of money-making; and there is attendant upon it the being neither necessary nor lawful for any one to make money by any illiberal kind of money-making—inasmuch as the so-called operative art is reproached as subverting liberal habits—nor to think it right to scrape money together at all by such means.

[12.] In addition to this a law still follows all these, that no private person be permitted to possess any gold or silver; ⁴ but that (there be) ⁵ a coin ⁶ for the sake of daily exchange, which it is almost necessary for handicrafts to change, and for all, who have a need of such things, ⁷ to pay the wages due to hired persons, be they slaves or domestic servants. On which account we say that they must possess coin, which is of value amongst themselves, but of no worth amongst the rest of mankind. For the sake of war indeed and of going abroad to other countries—for instance in the case of embassies, or some other business of a herald, compulsory on the state—should it be ble than those words now are. But unless I am greatly mistaken, the clause εἰς τὸν ἔπειτα χρόνον ought to follow (⁸—⁸) ὅπως ἂν γίγνηται, or rather γίγνωνται, i. e. μνημαί, as in Ficinus, “ut—serventur.”

¹ Ast translates παπαγωγαί “transgressionēs.” But this neither is nor could be its meaning. Ficinus has more correctly “si qua forte præter rationem hæc commercia fiant.”

² Here again by the god is to be understood Hermes.

³ What the old proverb is, to which Plato alludes, I confess I do not know. It was perhaps like the line of Pope—

“He best can paint them, who has felt them most.”

⁴ This was the law of Lycurgus, as we learn from Polybius vi. 47, and Plutarch in Lycurg. i. p. 44, D.

⁵ Ast understands κεκτῆσθαι: but I suspect that εἶναι has dropt out before ἐνεκα.

⁶ The coin was iron in Laconia. What kind of metal Plato had in mind is no where stated.

⁷ The Greek is τῶν τοιούτων, which, says Ast, agrees with νομισμάτων requisite to send out the common coin of Greece, it will be necessary on each occasion for the state to possess it.¹ But if there be any necessity for a private person to go abroad, let him, after obtaining leave of the magistrate, go abroad ; but the foreign coin, which on his return home he has brought from any place, still remaining, let him put down for the state, and take up that of the country at the rate (of exchange).² And if ³any-one is detected in making (the foreign money) his own,³ such money shall become public property ; and let him, who ⁴knows the fact, but does not divulge it, be subject to a curse⁴ and reproach together with the party bringing it in, and to a fine in addition, not less than the amount of the foreign money so brought in.

And (be it enacted), that a person who is going to marry, or is giving (a daughter) in marriage, is neither to give or receive a marriage portion at all of any kind whatsoever, nor to deposit money with a person, ⁵whom one does not trust,⁵ nor to lend money upon interest, since it will be lawful for the borrower to repay neither interest nor principal. Now that these pursuits are the best for a state to pursue, a person would decide correctly by considering them in this way, and referring them ever ⁶to their origin and intention.⁶ Now the intention of the statesman, who has a mind, we say, is not that, which the many would say, that a good legislator ought to wish, how the state, ⁷for which he is with correct thoughts legislating,⁷ understood ; for coin is of different kinds and value. I suspect however that in χρεία τῶν τοιούτων lies hid χρεία ἂν ᾗ ἀντὶ τοῦ τι ποιεῖν— where ἀντὶ τοῦ τι ποιεῖν would depend upon μισθοῦς, “wages for doing something.”

¹ Ast correctly rejects νόμισμα Ἑλληνικόν as interpolated from the beginning of the sentence ; where however those words are omitted by Ficinus, who perhaps found in his MS. ἕνεκα δὲ, not ἕνεκά τε—

² Ficinus omits πρὸς λόγον, which he perhaps did not understand.

³ Ficinus has, what the sense requires, “quod si quis eos occultare et in privatum usum convertere—”

⁴ With this passage may be compared the curse imprecated by Œdipus on the party, who might know, but would not divulge, the murder of of Laius in Soph. Œd. T. 236.

⁵ This seems a strange idea, as if any one would deposit money with a person he could not trust. What Plato really wrote might be guessed at, but not without, perhaps, a rather violent alteration.

⁶ Ficinus has “si ad præcipuam ipsam recti legum latoris semper referat voluntatem,” which would lead to εἰς αὐτῶν τὴν ἀρχὴν καὶ τὴν τοῦ νομοθέτου βούλησιν, what the train of thought evidently requires.

⁷ The words ᾗ νόων εἰς νομοθετοῖ, omitted by Ficinus, Ast considers an may be the greatest and the wealthiest possible, and possess gold and silver money, and rule over as many as possible by sea and land; and they would add, that the person legislating correctly ought to wish the state to be the best and the happiest possible. Now of these things some can take place, but others cannot. The possible then the arranging party would wish; but the impossible he would not; ¹ nor would he make even an attempt at wishes that are vain.¹ For it is almost necessary for them to be at the same time happy and good. This then he would wish. But it is impossible for persons to be very rich and good, such at least as the many reckon rich. For they reckon rich those, who amongst a few persons have possessions valued at the greatest quantity of coin, which even a bad man may possess. Now if such be the case, I will never agree with them that the rich man, if not a good one, can be truly happy; but that it is impossible for the person pre-eminently good, to be pre-eminently rich. What then?² some one would perhaps say. Because, we would say, the possession of what is obtained both justly and unjustly, is more than double of that which is obtained justly alone; and that the expenditure, which is wont to be made neither honourably nor disgracefully, is doubly less than that which is honourable, and is wont to be made for honourable objects. He, therefore, who acts in a contrary manner, will never be richer than him, who has double the means and half the expenditure. Now of these, the one is a good person, but the other not a bad one, since he is (< verely)³ parsimonious; sometimes, indeed, he is altogether bad; but, as we have just now said, is never good. For he, who receives both justly and unjustly, and spends neither justly nor unjustly, is indeed rich, because he is parsimonious; but he who is altogether bad, as being for the most part luxurious, is very poor. And he, who spends upon honourable objects and acquires only justly, will never at any time become pre-eminently rich, nor yet very poor; so that our assertion is interpolation. Perhaps however they ought to follow τὴν βούλησιν, just before, by reading ᾗ ὁ εἰς νόων ἀν εἰς νομοθετοῖ, thus forming one line of the Codex Archetypus, consisting of twenty-one letters.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were οὐδ' ἀν ματαίας βουλήσεις, not ματαιας βουλήσεις οὐτ' ἀν— Ficinus avoids the difficulty by his version, "nam vana esset cupiditas; neque aggredditur."

² The sense requires τί δ' οὐ; why not? not τί δὴ; Ficinus, "cur ita?"

³ Ficinus alone has "duntaxat," required by the sense.

right, that the very rich are not good men ; and, if they are not good, they are not happy.

[13.] With us, however, the laying down of laws looks to that point, that the citizens may become the most happy and in the highest degree friends to each other. But the citizens will never be friends, where there are many lawsuits with each other and much injustice ; but (most so) where the least and fewest are found. We have said too, that there ought to be neither gold nor silver in the state ; nor, again, much money-making through handicraft trades and usury,¹ or ugly cattle,² but what agriculture gives and bears,³ and of these too such as will not compel a person by making money to neglect those things, for the sake of which riches are produced.⁴ Now these are the soul and body ; which, without gymnastics and the rest of discipline, would never be worth mentioning. Hence we have said more than once, that we must put the attention to money in the last place of honour. For, since all, about which every man is seriously engaged, are three, the last and third is correctly the attention paid to riches, but the middle is that relating to the mind ; but that relating to the soul the first. And, indeed, the polity, which we have just now been going through, has been correctly laid down by laws, if it ordains honours in this manner. But if any one of the laws which are ordained in it shall seem to put health in the place of honour in the state before temperance, or wealth before health and temperance, it will appear to be not properly laid down. A legislator, therefore, ought often to point out to himself this.⁵ "What do I intend ?" and, "If this happens, or I fail in my

¹ Ficinus, "cauponationibusque et fœnore," which would lead to καὶ καπηλειῶν καὶ τόκων.

² This introduction of βοσκημάτων αἰσχροῶν is very strange, for nothing had been said on the subject before. Ficinus has "ex pecoribus turpiter," as if his MS. read βοσκημάτων αἰσχροῶς. I suspect however that some words have dropt out, in which interest was said to increase like cattle, just as Shylock says in Shakspeare, that "his monies breed as fast as ewes ;" or as Aristophanes in Neph. 1291, says of interest, that it is a wild beast, which "by months and days becomes a larger sum."

³ Instead of φείρει, I should prefer τρέφει, "feeds."

⁴ This idea of Plato seems to have been caught by Juvenal, and embodied in the verse—"Et propter vitam vivendi perdere causas."

⁵ Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows almost to the letter, has "quid ipse velit ; quid, si contigerit, bene succedet ; sin minus, instituti sui spes eum frustrabitur—" To supply however the ellipse, I have added "what then ?"

aim,"⁵ (what then?) And thus perhaps he would get himself out of legislation, and liberate likewise the rest, but never a single person by any other means. Let then the person, who has obtained by lot his portion, keep it on the conditions we have detailed.

¹It were a beautiful thing¹ for each person to come to the colony possessing the rest of things also equally. But as this is not possible, and one will come possessing more means, and another less, it is requisite, for the sake² of many things, and of the opportunities in the state, for the sake of equality,³ that the value of property should be unequal, in order that magistracies, and contributions, and distributions,³ (may exist) to each (according) to the value of his worth;³ ⁴(and) that, not according to his own virtue alone, and that of his ancestors, nor yet according to the strength or beauty of his body, but according to the using of wealth and poverty they may receive as equally as possible, by what is unequal, but commensurable, and not differ.⁴ For the sake of these things it is requisite that there should be four valuations in the size⁵ of property; and that these should be called first, second, third, and fourth, or by some other appellation; and that, when they remain in the same valuation, and when becoming richer from being poor, and poor from being rich, each may pass to the valuation suited to themselves. This scheme of law I would lay down as following after these.

We say then that in a state, which is to have no part in the greatest of diseases, which would be more correctly called dissension or sedition, there should exist neither severe poverty amongst some of the citizens nor (great)⁶ wealth: for both ¹ Ficinus, whom Taylor has followed, has "probe autem fieret," as if his MS. read ἦν δ' ἀν καλόν in lieu of ἦν μὲν δὴ καλόν.

² The words between the numerals I scarcely understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus; whose version is "multorum et æqualitatis in civitate, temporum opportunitatumque causa," as if his MS. read πολλῶν, ἰσότητος τε καὶ τῶν κατὰ πόλιν καιρῶν, for thus ἰσότητος—καιρῶν would be put in opposition with πολλῶν—

³ I have adopted the suggestion of Stephens, who supposes that κατὰ has dropt out before τὴν τῆς ἀξίας, and γίγνονται after τιμῆς.

⁴ Such is the literal version of the unintelligible Greek; in which Ast confesses there are more errors than he can pretend to correct.

⁵ Ficinus has "magnitudine—" His MS. therefore read μεγέθει, subsequently found in another.

⁶ From "ingentes divitiæ" in Ficinus, it is easy to see that he found in his MS. πολὺν before πλοῦτον.

these produce both. It is therefore requisite for a legislator to say at present what is the bound of each. Let then the limit of poverty be the valuation of the lot, which ought to remain, and which no magistrate will ever overlook its becoming less to any one, nor any one of the rest of those who in the same way love honour on the score of virtue. Now the legislator, having laid down that limit as a measure, will permit a person to possess the double, triple, and even to the quadruple of it. But, if any one possesses more than these, whether by finding them, or their being given, or by money-making, or by acquiring through any other such like fortune, by giving up what is above the measure to the state and to the gods, who guard the city, he will be in good repute and without damage. But if any disobeys this law, any one may inform against him on condition of receiving half the property, and the delinquent shall pay another portion to the same amount, and the half shall go to the gods. And let the whole property of all, except the allotment,¹ be written down openly before the magistrates, who are the guardians, in order that such of the suits upon all points as² relate to money may be easy and extremely clear.

[14.] After this it is meet in the first place to build³ the city as much as possible in the middle of the country, ⁴after selecting a spot from those at hand, which possesses what is suited for a city,⁴ which it is not difficult to imagine and detail. After this, to divide it into twelve⁵ parts; and placing first the temple of Hestia, (Vesta,) and Zeus, and Athéné, to call it the

¹ Ficinus has "ultra sortem"—Taylor, "as surpasses the allotted portion," what the sense seems to require. But in that case the Greek should have been πέρα, not χωρίς—

² From ῥσαι, which is unintelligible, Stephens elicited ῥσ' εἰς, adopted by Ast.

³ For the sake of the syntax we must read ἰδρῦσαι in lieu of ἰδρύσθαι, as I have translated.

⁴—⁴ I have followed Ast in the interpretation of this passage; who should however have proposed to read ἔχοντα ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων τόπον, in lieu of τῶν ὑπαρχόντων ἔχοντα τόπον.

⁵ The reason, says Taylor, why Plato adopted this division is, because the number 12, the image of all-perfect progression, is the product of 3 by 4, both of which numbers, according to the Pythagoreans, are images of perfection. On the other hand, Ast conceives that Plato had in mind the division of the country into twelve parts found in Egypt and elsewhere, and which seems, as may be inferred from vi. 15, p. 771, B., to have been connected with the division of the year into twelve months, each under the superintendence of one of the twelve greater gods.

Acropolis, and to throw round it a circular (enclosure), and from it to cut the city and all the country into twelve parts. But the twelve parts ought to be equalized by the portions of the prolific land being small, but those of the unprolific large, and the allotments to be five thousand and forty. And again (it is meet) to cut each of these into two; and to unite two sections into one allotment, each having a share of what is near to, and what is remote from, the city, the near portion being added to that one farthest off, making one allotment; and that, which is the second from the city, (to be added) to that, which is the second from the extremity; and so on with all the rest.¹ And (it is meet) to contrive in the twofold divisions, that what has just now been said (respecting)² the badness and goodness of the land, be equalized³ by the greater and less quantity at the distribution; and to divide the males⁴ likewise into twelve parts; and for a person to arrange the whole⁵ of the rest of property into twelve parts equal, as much as is possible, a description being made of all particulars. After this, to assign the twelve allotments to the twelve gods, and to call them after their names, and to consecrate to each the portion obtained by lot, and to call it a Phylé;⁶ and again to divide the twelve sections of the city in the same manner as they divided the rest of the country; and that each should possess two habitations, one near the centre and the other near the extremity; and thus let the method of settlement have an end. But it is requisite for us to consider by all means a matter of this kind, that all the points, which have just now been stated, will never concur on such like occasions, so that all should happen to take place according to reason; and that men will exist, who would not feel annoyed at such a method of living together,

² Ast would supply correctly πέρι after φαιλότητός τε from "de fecunditate" in Ficinus.

³ I have translated as if the Greek were ἐπανισούμενον ἔσεσθαι, not ἐπανισουμένους, which is without syntax or sense.

⁴ Taylor has "the streets," as if his head was running upon τὰς ἀγυιάς in lieu of ἀνδρας—

⁵ Ast, unable to understand τὴν τῆς ἄλλης οὐσίας, would read τὰ τῆς—Plato wrote, I suspect, καὶ τὴν ὅλην τῆς—as I have translated, or else τὸν—συνταξάμενον—

⁶ From this passage it is evident that Φυλὴ means "a parish," which in Christian countries is dedicated to some saint, as the Phylé was in Attica to some god or demigod.

but would endure to have property fixed (by law) and moderate through the whole of life; and the procreation of children to be such as we have mentioned; and to be deprived of silver and gold, and other things, which the legislator is clearly, from what has been said, about to forbid; and (endure) further ¹the equalization of the land and the dwelling in a city placed in the centre,¹ as we have mentioned above. ²Of all which matters a person has been speaking almost as if they were dreams, and moulding² a state and citizens, as it were, of wax. Subjects however of this kind have been in a certain manner not badly spoken of. ³But it is requisite to take up again against himself things of this kind.³ ⁴For the legislator would say⁴ again to us this—"Do not think, my friends, that what has been now asserted in these speeches has lain hid from me, and that (a person)⁵ has gone through in some manner the truth. But I think this will be most just in each of those things about to be, that he, who exhibits a pattern, according to which the thing attempted ought to be done, should omit nothing of what is most beautiful and true; but that he, to whom it is impossible for any thing of this kind to happen, should decline executing that very thing; but that of those which remain, and is nearest to it, and most closely connected naturally with what it is fitting to do,⁶ he should devise a plan how this very thing may take place;⁶ but permit the legislator to put a finish to his intention; and this being done, then to con-

¹—¹ I have translated as if the Greek were ὡς εἰρήκαμεν ἰσότητας, not εἰρηκε μεσότητας. For the construction is χώρας ἰσότητας καὶ ἀστειος ἐν κύελψ οἰκήσεις. Ficinus has "regiones et urbis in medio et in extremis, sicut ordinavimus, ubique habitationes."

²—² The Greek is πάντη σχεδὸν οἷον ἐνείρατα λέγων ἢ πλάττων—But as there is nothing to which λέγων can be referred, I have translated as if the Greek were—ἂ πάντ' ἦν σχεδὸν οἷον ἐνείρατά τις λέγων καὶ πλάττων.

³—³ Such is the literal translation of the Greek—χρηθ' ἐπαναλαμβάνειν πρὸς αὐτὸν τὰ τοιάδε: where I am quite in the dark; and so, I think, was Ficinus; whose version is, "sed ea quoque narranda, quæ legislator adversus diceret—" One MS. has πάντα λαμβάνειν. Perhaps Plato wrote χρηθ' εἰπεῖν τιν' ἀναλαμβάνειν πρὸς ταῦτ' ἂν τοιάδε. "But it is meet to conceive that a person would say against such remarks something of this kind."

⁴—⁴ The Greek is πάλιν ἄρα—φράζει—I have translated as if it were πάλιν γὰρ ἂν φράζοι—

⁵ After διείρηται there has evidently dropt out τις—

⁶—⁶ Ficinus has "omni studio prosequatur—" sider in common with him, which of the matters that have been mentioned are conducive, and which adverse to legislation.¹ For it surely behoves the artist in a matter the most trifling to make by all means his work consistent with itself, if it is to be worthy of mention. But now after the decree relating to the division into twelve parts, we must be ready to look into this too,² namely, to show in what manner the twelve parts have the greatest possible number of divisions of the things within them,³ and what are consequent upon these, and produced from them, up to the five thousand and forty; and from whence (they have)⁴ clans,⁵ and wards, and villages, and, in addition, the drawing up and leading out of (troops) in war, and moreover coins, and measures dry and liquid, and weights; all these it is requisite for the law to regulate in measure⁶ and in harmony with each other. In addition to these we ought not to feel a fear even on that ground, lest there should be what is considered an attention to trifles, should any one regulate all the chattels which persons are to possess, nor permit any of them to be immoderate, and consider by a reason common to all, that the distributions and variations of the numbers are useful for all things, even such as are various themselves⁷ in themselves, and such as are so in length and depth, or in sounds and motions, both those that proceed in a straight direction upwards and downwards, and (those that)⁸ move in a circle. For it behoves the legislator, looking to all these points, to enjoin all the citizens not to swerve from this arrangement to the utmost of their power. For no one branch of learning suited to ¹ The Greek is πρόσαντες εἴρηται. But εἴρηται is plainly superfluous after the preceding εἰρημένων.

² Instead of δῆλον δὲ, which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus, I think, for he has omitted those words, wanting likewise in another MS., I have translated as if the Greek were δηλοῦν δὲ—

³ In lieu of αὐτοῦ, which is unintelligible, Ast reads αὐτῶν—He should have suggested αὐτῶν, similar to “in se” in Ficinus.

⁴ I have introduced “they have” from “habent” in Ficinus.

⁵ By φάρτρια was understood one of the three sections into which the φυλή was divided, as shown by Harpocration in Τριττός, which was another; and the third was called ἔθνος.

⁶ Ficinus has “commensurata,” as if his MS. read σόμετρα.

⁷ In lieu of αὐτοὶ, the sense requires αὐτὰ, and hence we can get rid of the verb, “accipiunt,” which Ficinus has introduced to supply the otherwise defective syntax in ποικίλματα, which is evidently an interpolation.

⁸ Before τῆς there has evidently dropt out ταῖς to answer to the preceding ταῖς.

children possesses such a mighty power as regards domestic economy, and state politics, and all arts, as the study of numbers; and, what is the greatest of all, excites even the sleepy person and naturally untaught, and renders him docile, and with a good memory, and clever, while making a progress, by a divine art, beyond his own nature. All these, if a person shall have taken away by other laws and pursuits illiberality and a love of money from the minds of those, who are about to possess them sufficiently and profitably, would become a course of instruction honourable and befitting; but if not, a person would unconsciously, instead of wisdom, produce the so-called cleverness, such as it is in our power to see the ¹ Egyptians and Phœnicians,¹ and many other nations produce, through the illiberality of their other pursuits and possessions; either because some indifferent legislator of theirs has caused such results, or a severe misfortune has fallen upon them, or some other nature of this kind. For let not this, Megillus and Clinias, lie hid from us respecting places, that some differ² from others in producing men better or worse; in opposition to which we must not lay down laws. For through all kinds³ of winds and violent heat, some persons are of an alien disposition, and with feelings of hostility;⁴ others through the water; but others ⁵through that food from the

² So Ficinus, whom Cornarius, Taylor, and Ast have followed. The Greek is οὐκ εἰσιν, where, I suspect, ἀκούουσιν lies hid in the Latin sense of “audiunt,” and which is found likewise in Greek.

³ In lieu of παντοῖα I should prefer ἀνταῖα, “hostile,” see my note on Æsch. Suppl. 814, or πᾶν βίαια, see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 261. For it was not the variety but the quality of the wind, that would produce the difference in the inhabitants.

⁴ I have adopted the emendation of Ruhnken, ἀνέριστοι for ἐναίσιτοι. Ast would read ἐξαίσιτοι, which Stalbaum passes off as his own conjecture. But ἐξαίσιτος is never, I believe, applied to a person.

⁵ The Greek is at present διὰ ταύτην τὴν ἐκ τῆς γῆς τροφήν ἀναδιδούσαν οὐ μόνον τοῖς σώμασιν ἀμείνω καὶ χεῖρῳ. But as Galen in T. i. p. 349, ed. Bas., quotes διὰ τὴν—ἀμείνον καὶ χεῖρον, Plato wrote, I suspect, διὰ τὴν γῆν ἐκ τῆς γαστρὸς τροφήν ἀναδιδούσαν οὐ μόνον τοῖς σώμασιν ἀμείνω καὶ χεῖρῳ, i. e. through the earth yielding from its womb food, better or worse, not only for the body— For thus πνεύματα, ὕδατα, and γῆ would make up the three powers of matter, air, water, and earth, which earth,⁵ which not only imparts to bodies (properties) better and worse, but which is no less able to infuse all things of this kind into their soul. But of all the places in a country those excel the most, in which there is a certain divine inspiration, and allotments for dæmons, who are either always propitious to the inhabitants, or the contrary; for whom the legislator, who has a mind, would, after reflecting, as much as it is possible for man to reflect upon (all)¹ things of this kind, endeavour to lay down laws; which must be done by you, Clinias; for to matters of this kind must he turn himself, who is about to colonize a country.

Clin. Very beautifully, Athenian guest! do you speak; and so must it be done by me.

BOOK VI.

[1.] Athen. BUT, after all that has now been said, there will be almost² the appointment of magistrates in your state.

Clin. Such is the case.

Athen. Respecting the proper arrangement of a polity, these two kind of things happen to exist. First, the appointment of offices, ³[and of persons about to rule,]³ how many they ought to be, and in what manner appointed. Next, with respect to the laws that are to be imposed upon each office, what, and how many, and of what kind it will be fitting (to impose) upon each. But, previous to choosing them, let us were constantly united, as being the creators and preservers of the world, and all that it contains, as I have shown on Æsch. Prom. 88, and to the passages there quoted I could now add many more; while on the causes that have led to the loss or corruption of γαστήρ it would be easy to write a still longer note. Suffice it to say that γαστήρ might have easily dropt out between τῆς and τρε—

¹ Instead of οὐρῳ, which I cannot understand, I have translated as if the Greek were πάντα.

² In σχεδόν, although supported by "ferme" in Ficinus, there is, I suspect, some error. For it could hardly thus stand by itself.

³⁻³ The words between brackets are properly omitted by Ficinus. They are evidently an explanation of ἀρχῶν, as shown in part by ἀρχόντων, found in Bas. 2, in lieu of ἀξίοντων.

stop a little, and give some account fitting to be detailed respecting them.

Clin. What account is this?

Athen. This. Something of this kind is surely evident to all, that, since the work of legislation is a matter of moment, ¹ by placing a state well furnished with laws well laid down under not suitable magistrates, ¹ not only would there be a very great laugh at the (laws) well laid down to no purpose, but there would arise nearly the greatest mischief and bane to states from them.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Let us then consider this, as happening to you, my friend, touching the present polity and state. For you see that it is necessary in the first place for those, who are proceeding in a straight road to the powers of magistrates, to have given, both themselves and their respective families from childhood to the period of their election, a sufficient test. Next for those, who are about to make the choice, to have been brought up and well taught in legal habits, so as to be able to judge correctly of those worthy of either (fate), and to receive, or to reject them with disgust.² But how can those, who have recently met together for this purpose, and are unacquainted with each other, and moreover uninstructed, be ever able to choose magistrates in a blameless manner?

Clin. They nearly never can.

Athen. But a contest, as they say,³ does not readily admit of ¹—¹ By merely changing τοῦ into τῷ, and ἐπιστῆσαι into ὑποστῆσαι, the passage which Stephens, Heindorf, Ast and all others consider to be defective, and endeavour to supply, becomes perfectly intelligible. For Plato meant it to be inferred that even good laws, when improperly administered, are a bane to a state.

² Ast remarks correctly that in the words δυσχεραίνοντάς τε καὶ ἀποδεχομένους ὁρθῶς κρίνειν καὶ ἀποκρίνειν, there is the figure of speech called Chiasmus; by which δυσχεραίνοντάς and ἀποκρίνειν, the two extreme terms of the sentence, are to be united, and ἀποδεχομένους and κρίνειν, the two middle terms.

³ This passage alone would be sufficient to show that Taylor translated from neither the Greek nor the genuine version of Ficinus, but the refiction of it by Grynæus; who alone has added "ut aiunt." The Greek is προφάσεις οὐ πάντῃ δέχισθαι, where to support the syntax, Stephens proposed to insert φασὶ after προφάσεις: while Ficinus has "suscipit," as if his MS. read δέχεται. Respecting the proverb see Aristoph. Ἀχ. 367, Ὅς σκῆψιν ἁγῶν εὐτος οὐ προσδέξεται, and the Schol. on Cratyl. p. 421, D., with Heindorf's note.

excuses. This then must now be accomplished both by you and me; since you have with readiness undertaken to settle a colony for a clan of the Cretans, and are, as you say, the tenth commissioner; and I have promised to assist you, according to our present story-telling. I will not therefore willingly leave this discourse without a head.¹ For should it meet us,² while wandering in this state, it would appear to be deformed.

Clin. You have spoken, guest, very well.

Athen. Not (spoken) merely, but so I will do to the utmost of my power.

Clin. Let us do by all means, as we have said.

Athen. Be it so, if god be willing; and so far at least let us be victors over old age.

Clin. And it is likely that he will be willing.

Athen. It is reasonable. Following him therefore, let us understand this.

Clin. What?

Athen. In how manly and hazardous a manner will our state have been at present settled.

Clin. Looking to what³ and whither especially have you thus spoken at present?

Athen. How easily and fearlessly have we laid down laws for persons unskilled, in what way they may receive what has been just laid down. Thus much, at least, is evident, Clinias, nearly to every one, although not very wise, that no one will easily admit these laws at first. But if we wait for the time⁴ when those, who in their boyhood had tasted of, and been sufficiently brought up in, the laws, and accustomed to them,⁴ shall have taken a common part in them with the whole city in the election of magistrates,⁵ on such an event happening as we

² I have adopted with Ast the version of Erasmus, who saw that Plato wrote here ἀπαρτῆ, similar to περτῆ in the similar passage of the Gorgias. Bekk. and Stalb. are content with ἀπάντη, for which Heindorf proposed to read ἄπαντι—

³ Stephens correctly proposed πρὸς in lieu of περὶ. Ficinus has merely "Quorsum hæc."

⁴ Ficinus has "donec legibus instituti pueri unaque et diu sub iisdem legibus conversati," from which it is difficult to see what he found in his MS.

⁵ Here again the version of Ficinus is extremely loose, "certe et tunc et in posterum procul ab errore sic instructa civitas permaneret."

are speaking of, if this should take place in a certain manner and skill, I conceive there would be a great security that a state would remain even after the then existing period educated in this way.⁵

Clin. This carries reason with it.

Athen. Let us then look to this, whether we can furnish any means sufficient for this end. For I assert, Clinias, that the Cnossians ought, in a manner superior to the other Cretans, not merely to go through a formal rite¹ respecting the country which is now being colonized, but to be strenuously careful that the first magistrates may stand² in the most secure and best manner possible. With respect to others, it is a shorter work; but it will be most necessary for us to choose the guardians of the laws with every care.

Clin. What road then and method³ can we discover⁴ for this?

Athen. This. I assert then, ye sons of Cretans, that the Cnossians, since they take the lead of the majority of cities, ought to choose in common with those who are going to this joint settlement, from themselves, and them, thirty-seven men in all; nineteen from the settlers, but the rest from Cnossus itself; and let the Cnossians give up these to your state, and for yourself to be a member of this colony and one of the eighteen men; and this, either by employing persuasion or moderate force.

Clin. But why do not you, O guest, and Megillus, share with us in this polity?

[2.] Athen. Athens, O Clinias, has a high opinion of herself, and so too has Sparta, and each have their dwellings far off. But to you and the other settlers there is a care on all points, the same as what we were just now saying respecting ¹ On this meaning of the word ἀφοσιῦσθαι Ast refers to Maussac on Harpocration, p. 259, Valckenaer on Herodotus iv. 149, and Wyttienbach on Phædon, p. 127.

² In lieu of στῶσι one would have expected καταστῶσι, similar to "constituantur" in Ficinus.

³ From the reply in τόνδε it is evident that Plato did not write πόρον καὶ λόγον. But he might have written, what he probably did, πόρον κατὰ λόγον—"a road according to reason—"

⁴ Ficinus has "faciemus,"—as if his MS. read τίς ἂν οὖν—ἀνευρίσκομεν for τίνα οὖν—ἀνευρίσκομεν.

you. ¹Let it then be held to have been stated how these things may, from what is at present in our power, take place in the most likely manner.¹ But as time progresses, and the form of polity continues, let the choice of them (the magistrates) be something in this way. In the election of magistrates let all take a share who bear arms, either as horse-soldiers or foot-soldiers, and who have taken a part in war according to their respective ability in age; and let the election take place in whatever temple the state holds in the highest veneration; and let each person bring to the altar of the god a small tablet, on which he has written the name of his father,² and parish, and ward where he is a liveryman;³ and let him write thus his own name in the same manner.⁴ But let it be lawful for any one to take away the tablet, which appears to him to be not properly⁵ written, and to place it in the Agora, (there to remain⁶) for not less than thirty days. Of the tablets let the magistrates exhibit to the view of the whole city up to three hundred, that have been judged to be amongst the first; and from these in a similar manner let the city vote whomsoever each person pleases; and let (the magistrates) exhibit again to all one hundred of those selected out of them a second time; and out of the hundred let any one vote a third time for whom he pleases, going⁷ through cuttings.⁷ But the thirty-seven, who

¹— All the words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor. Ficinus has "et quæ tibi et illis hac tempestate convenientissime fieri possunt."

² I have translated as if the Greek were not πατρόθεν, but πατρός θ' ἄμα, to which πρόσθεν in one MS. seems to lead. Plato could hardly have said πατρόθεν. For children in Greece were seldom called after their father. They got their name either from some accidental circumstance, or else from their grandfather.

³ This seems to be the exact meaning of δημοτεύεσθαι, explained by Hesychius, τὸ μετίχειν δήμου καὶ πολιτείας κατὰ νόμον.

⁴— The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, either because they were wanting in his MS., or because he knew that, as παρεγγράφειν means to "introduce improperly into a writing," it would be here inadmissible; and hence too just before he has "nomen suum et patris," as if his MS. read αὐτοῦ τε τοῦνομα πατρός θ' ἄμα—

⁵ So Taylor from "non recte" in Ficinus; who either found in his MS., or wished to read, κατὰ νόμον in lieu of κατὰ νοῦν—

⁶ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "ubi—permaneat," as if ὄν had been found in his MS. after ἐλαττον, or μένον after ἡμερῶν.

⁷— Such is the literal translation of διὰ τομίων, with which words Ficinus was probably so dissatisfied as to omit entirely διὰ τομίων πορευόμενος. One MS. has τομίωνων. From "per eosdem" in Cornarius, Stephens may have the greatest number of votes, let some persons deciding declare to be the magistrates. Who then, Clinias and Megillus, shall appoint all these things for us in the state, respecting magistrates and the testing of them? Do we not perceive, that in states, so united from the first, there must be some; ¹ but who they would be, it is not the province of all magistrates? ¹ It is however necessary (that there should be some), and these too men of not an inferior kind, but as much as possible at the very summit. For the beginning, according to the proverb, ² is the half of the whole; and all men praise a good commencement. But this, as it seems to me, is more than the half; nor has any one sufficiently praised it, when it has taken place correctly.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Let us then, since we know it, not pass it by untold, by making nothing clear to ourselves as to the manner in which it exists. For my part I have it not in my power to say but one word necessary for, and conducive to, the present purpose.

Clin. What is it?

[3.] Athen. I assert that to this state, which we are about to settle, there is not, as it were, a father and mother except the city which colonizes it. Nor am I ignorant that oftentimes some differences have arisen, and will arise, between colonies and their parent countries. At present then, as a child, although it is about to be at variance with its parents, through its present want of instruction, loves and is beloved by them, and is constantly flying to its relations, finds allies in seems to have introduced τῶν αὐτῶν— Plato wrote, I suspect, διὰ τῶν ὀνομάτων ἅμα τομῇ πορευόμενος, "going through the names with a cutting instrument—" Cousin translates "procédant de divisions en divisions—" But what can be the meaning of those words here he does not say.

¹— Here again a literal version best shows that the Greek is unintelligible; where in lieu of πρὸς πασῶν, Ast has edited πρὸ πασῶν, from "ante magistratus," in Cornarius; while one MS. has ἐκ, from which nothing, as far as I can see, is gained. Ficinus was equally at a loss; whose words are, "qui vero ex omnibus magistratibus deligantur, in eis nequam reperientur," partially adopted by Taylor, "but that they will never be found among those that are chosen for magistrates." Cousin gives in his Notes a paraphrase in the place of a literal translation.

² The proverb alluded to is in Hesiod, and quoted in iii. 9. Ovid too says, "Dimidium facti, qui bene cœpit, habet."

them alone, which¹ I assert has now taken place² readily to the Cnossians through their care for the new city, and to the new (city through their care) for the Cnossians. I repeat then, as I have just now said,³—for what is well said it does no harm (to say) twice—that the Cnossians ought to have a care over all these particulars in common, by selecting from those, who are departing for the colony, the oldest and best possible,⁴ not less than one hundred, and let there be another hundred from the Cnossians themselves. I say too, that these should, on coming to the new city, be careful how the magistrates are appointed according to the laws, and after being appointed undergo a scrutiny. And on this taking place, let the Cnossians dwell in⁵ Cnossus; and let the new city endeavour to preserve itself and become prosperous. Let then those numbered amongst the thirty-seven men be held to have been chosen both now and for all time to come for these purposes. First, let them be guardians of the laws; next, of those writings (in) which⁶ every one shall write down for the magistrates the amount of his property, except⁷ the person who has the greatest valuation of four minæ,⁸ and the second of three, and the third of two [minæ];⁹

¹ Instead of α one would have expected τοῖα, on account of the preceding καθάπερ—Hence Ficinus has “ita quoque.”

² This past time seems very strange here, as if the colony had been already settled.

³ Ficinus has “non enim nocet bis dicere, quod bene dicitur,” who either found in his MS., or supplied from his head, λέγειν or εἰπεῖν after βλάπτει. To the same proverb there is an allusion in xii. 8, p. 957, A., and in Phileb. p. 59, E. § 140, and Gorg. p. 498, E. § 117.

⁴ Before μὴ ἔλαττον there is inserted ἐλομένους, which could not thus be repeated after the preceding προσελομένους.

⁵ Ficinus has “Gnosum Gnosii redeant—” as if his MS. read τὴν μὲν Κνωσὸν τοὺς Κνωσίους ἤκειν αὐ—which is far preferable to οἰκεῖν—Cousin is content with οἰκεῖν, which he renders, “resteront chez eux,” and explains it by saying, “c’est à dire ne se mêleront plus que de leurs propres affaires.” But how οἰκεῖν can have such a meaning he does not state, nor do I see.

⁶ Stephens would insert δὲ before ὧν, from “ubi” in Ficinus.

⁷ The word πλήν, which I cannot understand, nor could, I think, Ficinus, as he has omitted it, Ast renders “verumtamen,” a meaning that I am not aware it ever has elsewhere.

⁸ Ast says that after ὁ μὲν μέγιστον ἔχων τεττάρων μνῶν, is to be supplied τίμημα ἔχέτω. But how this could be, I confess I cannot understand. Ficinus has, what is perfectly intelligible, “sitque maximus census minarum quatuor.”

⁹ The insertion of μναῖν here, after its omission in the preceding clause, seems very strange.

but the fourth of (one)¹ mina. But if any one shall be shown to possess any thing else beyond what has been written down, let all this become public property ; and, besides this, let him² undergo a punishment, through any one bringing him to trial, neither honourable nor with a good name, but disgraceful,³ should he be convicted of despising the laws through the love of gain. Let then any one indict him for being addicted to a disgraceful love of gain, and follow up the charge by a trial before the guardians of the laws. And if the defendant is condemned to pay a fine, let him have no share in the public property ; and when any distribution takes place in the state, let him be without a share, except as regards his (first)³ allotment ; and let him be written down, where any one who wishes may read it, as a person condemned, as long as he lives. Let not the guardian of the laws be in office more than twenty years ; and let him not be inducted into his office, if he is less than fifty years of age. But if he is sixty years old when he is inducted into it, let him hold it for ten years ; and according to this ratio let it be, that he, who has passed beyond seventy years, shall not imagine that he holds an office of such importance amongst those who are holding it.

[4.] Let then these three ordinances be considered to have been stated, touching the guardians of the laws. But as the laws progress, each one may enjoin upon these men, what matters they ought to attend to, in addition to what have been detailed already.

And now we will speak in order about the election of other magistrates. For after this it is necessary to elect Generals, and such as minister to them in war, such as the⁴ Hip-

¹ One MS. has μᾶς for μῶς. Plato probably wrote both, μᾶς δὲ μῶς ὁ τέταρτος.

² Ficus, unable, it would seem, to understand the Greek, is content to give the general meaning, "præterea reus sit volentis eum tanquam infamem accusare." Cornarius, more closely, "ad hoc autem iudicium subeat—non honestum neque illustre sed turpe." But εὐώνυμος never elsewhere does or could mean "illustre." Ast renders it by "faustum." But what is "iudicium faustum" he does not explain, nor can I tell.

³ Ficus alone has "præter sortem primam."

⁴ In using the words Hipparch, Phylarch, and Taxiarch, Plato merely adopted the custom of his own country, as may be inferred from Demosth. Phil. i. where they are similarly united. By Hipparch was meant the commander-in-chief of the cavalry ; by Phylarch, the commander of the cavalry of each Phyle, with which may be compared the cavalry in England, called Fencibles, and with the infantry of the Phyle the regiment of Militia, belonging to each county.

parchs and the Phylarchs, and those who drill the foot-soldiers of the Phyle,⁴ to whom would be very fitting the name of Taxiarchs, as the common people call them. ¹ Of these let the guardians of the laws propose for Generals from this very state itself;¹ and from those so proposed let all, who have taken a part in war at their proper age, or are in the act of doing so on each occasion,² make the selection. But if it shall appear to any one that some one of those, who have not been proposed, is superior to some of those, who have been proposed, let him name the person, whom he proposes, in the place of some one, and, taking an oath touching this very matter, let him bring forward the other party; and which ever shall be voted by a show of hands, let him be decreed as belonging to the selection. And let the three, who have the greatest number of votes for them to be Generals and to have the care of the war department, undergo a scrutiny, as the guardians of the law (underwent). And let the twelve elected Generals propose twelve Taxiarchs for themselves, for each tribe one;³ and let there be a preference nomination, as occurred in the case of the Generals, done in the same manner, respecting the Taxiarchs, and a second show of hands and a decision. And let the guardians of the laws, after they have brought together an assembly at a place the most holy and most convenient, cause to sit, before the Prytanes and Council have been chosen, the heavy-armed apart, and apart too the cavalry, and the third in order after these the whole of those employed in war. And let all hold up their hands for the Generals and Hipparchs; but for the Taxiarchs those who carry shields; but let all the cavalry choose for itself⁴ Phylarchs; but let the Generals appoint for themselves the officers

¹ The words between the numerals I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is, "Igitur ipsi custodes legum hujusmodi exercitus duces futuros aliquos civitatis hujus cives proponant," as if he had found in his MS. οὕτω δὴ στρατηγούς μὲν τοιαύτης ἐξ αὐτῆς τῆς πόλεως στρατιῶς πολίτας τινὰς αὐτοὶ οἱ νομοφύλακες. προβαλλίσθων—

² I hardly perceive the meaning of ἐκάστοτε here, omitted by Ficinus.

³ Ficinus alone has "unum cuilibet tribui," for he found, no doubt, in his MS. ἓνα between δώδεκα and ἐκάστη— On the loss of εἷς and its cases before ἐκαστος, see my Poppe's Prolegom. p. 226, and to the passages quoted there I could now add many more.

⁴ Instead of αὐ τοῦτοις Ast has suggested, what I have adopted, αὐτοῖς—over the light-armed soldiers, or archers, and the rest of those employed in war. There still remains for us the appointment of the Hipparchs. These then let those propose, who proposed the Generals; and let the election and the preference nomination¹ take place, as it occurred in the case of the Generals. And let the cavalry hold up their hands for them in the presence of the infantry looking upon them; and let the two, who have the greatest show of hands, be the commanders of all the cavalry; and let the disputes about the show of hands² take place up to twice; but if any one doubts about them a third time, let those determine the votes,³ whose province it is to fix the measure of voting.³

[5.] The Council shall consist of thirty dozen; for three hundred and sixty would be suited to the distributions; and by dividing that number into four parts, (each) ninety, from each portion of the census ninety councillors would give (their vote).⁴ And in the first place let all those of the largest valuation give their vote; or the person who disobeys (the law) will be fined⁵ according to the fine decreed,⁵ and⁶ when they shall have been carried in, let a person put a mark against them. On the following day let those of the second class give (their vote), as on the former (day); and on the third day let any one of the third class bring (his vote). In the case of those belonging to these three classes, let it be compulsory⁷

² Ficinus has "pronominationem bis fieri liceat," as if he had found in his MS. not τῶν χειροτονιῶν, but τῶν προβολῶν, which he constantly renders "pronominationem," and ἐξείναι in lieu of εἶναι.

³ Such is Taylor's translation of the Greek οἷσπερ τῆς χειροτονίας μέτρον ἐκάστοις ἕκαστον ἦν, which Ast confesses to be obscure, but has been unable, I conceive, to throw any light upon the subject. Ficinus too was equally at a loss; whose version is, "qui comitiorum modum in singulos statuere," which Ast says he cannot understand, nor can I. Did Plato write, οἷσπερ τὰ τῆς χειροτονίας μετρεῖν ἐν ἐκάστοις ἐκάστοι ἦν— "to whom it is ever the business to take the measure of the voting on each matter."

⁴ So Ast understands φέρειν, with the ellipse of ψῆφον.

⁵ Such is the literal version of τῇ δοξάσῃ ζημίᾳ. Ficinus has "pro arbitrio condemnatur."

⁶ Such is the Greek literally. Ficinus has "postquam vero delati sunt, conscribantur." By comparing what Plato says a little below, it would seem that a mark was placed against the names of those who declined to vote, and that the list of them was laid before the rulers.

⁷ This law was introduced by Plato, perhaps in imitation of the enact-to give (a vote); but let the fourth and smallest class be dismissed exempt from fine, should any one belonging to it be unwilling to give (a vote). On the fourth day let all belonging to the fourth and smallest class give (their votes); but let him, who belonging to the third and fourth class, is unwilling to give (a vote) be exempt from a fine. But let him, who, belonging to the second and first class, does not give a vote, be fined; he, who belongs to the second rank, be fined the triple of the first fine;¹ and he, who belongs to the first, quadruple. On the fifth day let the rulers bring out for all the citizens to see the names that have a mark against them; and let every man of them give (a vote) or be fined with the first fine. And after selecting one hundred and eighty out of each class, let them, after choosing by ballot one half of them, make a scrutiny of them, and these shall form the council for one year.

The election taking place in this manner, would be a medium between a monarchy and a democracy; which medium a polity ought always to preserve. For slaves and masters can never become friends, nor the depraved and worthy, when proclaimed² with equal honours. For through things, that are unequal, those that are equal will become unequal, unless they partake of moderation; for, through both of those (inequalities) polities are filled with seditions. For the old saw, being true, that equality produces friendship,³ has been asserted very correctly⁴ and carefully. But through its not being very evident what the equality is, which is able to effect this, it ment of Solon, who would not permit persons to be neutral during public commotions; for he knew that they merely waited till the opposing parties were exhausted, and could thus secure the prize for which both were contending.

¹ By the first fine is intended what is called above "the fine decreed by law." Ast.

² In lieu of διαγορευόμενοι, Stobæus has διαγενόμενοι; from which Ast would elicit διαγόμενοι, "living." But διάγεισθαι is not found, I believe, in that sense any where. The passage produced by Ast from vi. 6, p. 758, is not in point.

³ This saying is similar to that quoted by the Scholiast on Phædrus, p. 240, C. § 37, Ἡλιξ ἥλικ' ἔτερπε, γέρον δέ γ' ἔτερπε γέροντα, and the other passages collected there by Ast, and on Sympos. p. 195, B. § 21.

⁴ The expression μάλα ὀρθῶς is plainly superfluous after ἀληθής ὦν—For if a saying be true, it must be said correctly. Perhaps Plato wrote ἀηθής ὦν νῦν, "being unusual at present—" On the confusion between ἀηθής and ἀληθής, see at Euthyd. § 16, p. 60.

throws us into great trouble. For, as there are two equalities,¹ of the same name, but in reality nearly contrary to each other on many points, every state and every legislator is competent to introduce one of these in the case of honours by regulating, as regards the distribution by means of the ballot, the equality consisting in measure, weight, and number; but it is not easy for every one to perceive the most true and the best equality.² For it is the decision of Zeus;³ and it furnishes⁴ but little at all times to men; although as much as it does furnish to states or private persons, it works out every good. For it distributes more to the greater, and less to the smaller,⁵ imparting to each what is moderate according to its nature. Moreover it distributes greater honours to those who are even greater in virtue,⁶ but to those who have (less) of virtue and education (it distributes) less (honours), as being suited⁶ to each according to reason. For this surely is justice itself even in politics, at which we ought at present to grasp, and, looking to this equality, Clinias, to settle our now rising state. And should any one settle any other (state), he ought to give laws, with his mind turned to this point, and not to a few tyrants, or one, or to any power of the people, but always to justice itself. And this is what has just now been stated, namely, the distributing what is according to nature, equal to unequals.

¹ The two equalities alluded to are the arithmetic and geometric, as shown by Plato in Gorg. p. 508, A. § 136. Aristoph. Nicomach. v. 4, and Plutarch. Sympos. Problem. viii. 2, p. 719, B., quoted by Ast.

² See Aristot. Polit. vi. 3, περὶ μὲν τοῦ ἴσου καὶ τοῦ δίκαιου—πάντα χαλεπὸν εὐρεῖν.

³ According to the Scholiast on Gorg. p. 508, A., the decision of Zeus is δικαιοσύνη, another name for geometric analogy. For Plato, says Plutarch, in Sympos. viii. 2, p. 718, R., γνώμην ἀπεφάνετο γεωμετρεῖν τὸν θεόν. But he adds, εἰ γὰρ δὴ θεῖον εἶναι τὴν ἀπόφασιν ταύτην Πλάτωνος.

⁴ This is the usual meaning of ἐπαρκεῖν. But the sense requires rather "it is used by—"

⁵ Plato is here speaking of a geometric equality, according to which the merits of individuals are to be estimated; so that as merit is to merit, so should gift be to gift. T.

⁶—⁶ The Greek is τοῖς δὲ τοῦναντίον ἔχουσιν ἀρετῆς καὶ παιδείας τὸ πρέπον. But Ficinus has "minoribus autem virtute et disciplina minores, et—quod decet." From whence Stephens was led to suspect that something had dropped out to answer to the preceding μείζους. Perhaps Plato wrote μείζους, μείους δὲ τοῖς μείον τι ἔχουσιν ἀρετῆς καὶ παιδείας, ὥτε πρέπον—as I have translated.

It is necessary however for every state to make use of these (two)¹ equalities in name, if it is about not to have a share in seditions in any degree. ²For the easy and lenient temper of what is perfect and accurate contrary to justice the correct is improperly broken down when it takes place.³ Hence it is perhaps necessary to make use in addition of the equality by ballot, on account of the moroseness of the multitude; and afterwards to invite by prayers a god and good fortune to direct the ballot to what is most just. In this manner then it is necessary to use both the equalities; but the one which is in need of good fortune on the very fewest occasions.

[6.] These things, and in this way, and for these reasons, it is necessary, friends, for that state to do, which is about to be preserved. But since both a ship, while sailing on the sea, requires constantly a watch both night and day, and in like manner a state dwells,³ while driven along by the storm of other states, and running the risk of being caught by all kinds of plots, it is requisite through the day to night, and from night to day, for the rulers to join with rulers, and watchers

¹ Ficinus alone has, what is more intelligible, "his duabus æqualitatibus," as if his MS. read ταύταις δυοσι παρωνύμοις ἰσότησι.

^{2—3} Such is the literal version of the Greek, τὸ γὰρ ἐπιεικὲς καὶ ξύγγνωμον τοῦ τελείου καὶ ἀκριβοῦς παρὰ δίκην τὴν ὀρθὴν ἴστι παρατεθραυσμένον, ὅταν γίγνηται, which I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose paraphrastic version is "æquabilitas enim illa laudabilis et æqua dijudicatio perfecti atque exacti, cum præter rectum iudicium fit, violatur et frangitur." Taylor has more closely, "the equitable and lenient judgment of the perfect and accurate." But the genitives τοῦ τελείου καὶ ἀκριβοῦς could not thus follow τὸ ἐπιεικὲς καὶ ξύγγνωμον. Of this Ast seems to have been aware. Hence his rendering is "perfecti et exacti dissolutio et depravatio;" and he makes τοῦ τελείου καὶ ἀκριβοῦς to depend upon παρατεθραυσμένον, observing that the participle is in the place of a noun. But no perfect participle passive can stand for a noun, except when it is united to an article. Schneider too has been at a loss here; for his version is "infracti juris et recti violatio," as if he wished to read παρατεθραυσμένον. In this mass of difficulties it seems almost hopeless to suggest any thing certain. But to my mind the train of ideas would lead to something like this—"For what is easy and lenient is, when it exists to any person, broken down by the complete and exact relating to justice unbending—in Greek, τὸ γὰρ ἐπιεικὲς καὶ ξύγγνωμον ὑπὸ τοῦ τελείου καὶ ἀκριβοῦς περὶ δίκην τὴν ὀρθὴν ἴστι παρατεθραυσμένον, ὅταν γίγνηται. With regard to the union of ἐπιεικὲς and ξύγγνωμον, it will be sufficient to refer to Aristot. Ethic. vi. 11, τὸν γὰρ ἐπιεικῆ φαιμέν εἶναι συγγνωμονικόν, καὶ ἐπιεικὲς τὸ ἔχειν περὶ ἓνα συγγνώμην.

³ In lieu of οἰκῆ, which I cannot understand, Plato wrote, I suspect, δεινῆ, "is in fear—" with watchers, and to succeed each other constantly, and never to cease handing over (their power). But the multitude is not able to do any of these things quickly. And it is necessary to permit the majority of the counsellors to remain for the greatest part of their time properly managing their own private affairs; but that a twelfth part of them should distribute themselves over the twelve months, so as to furnish a watch, one part for one month, and ¹ to be in readiness for any thing ¹ in the case of any one coming from any where else, or from the city itself for any purpose, whether a person should be desirous of telling or hearing aught respecting what it is fitting for one state to give an answer to other states, or by putting questions to others to receive replies; and moreover for the sake of those innovations of all kinds which are wont to happen perpetually, in order especially that they may not occur; or, if they have occurred, that the consequences may be cured as quickly as possible, after the state shall have become acquainted with them. Hence that portion, which presides over the state, ought to be the master of public meetings and their dissolutions, which take place both according to law and on a sudden. All these matters it should be for the twelfth part of the council to arrange, who are to be at rest for eleven parts of the year. But this part of the Council ought always to keep these watchings over the state in common with the other magistrates.

Such then being the state of affairs as regards the state, they may be put into order with moderation. But what care, and what order, will there be in all the rest of the country? Must there not, since all the city, and the whole country, is distributed into twelve parts, be shown to be Commissioners of the roads, and dwellings, and buildings, and harbours, and of the market-place, and fountains, and moreover of sacred groves, and temples, and all other things of this kind belonging to the state?

Clin. How not?

[7.] Athen. Let us say then, that there ought to be persons to cleanse the temples, and priests and priestesses; and that it is meet to choose three kinds of officers over roads and buildings, and the ornaments belonging to things of this kind, and over human beings that they may do no injury, and over the rest of wild beasts,¹ in the very encircling enclosure and suburb of the city, in order that every thing may take place befitting cities; and that as regards the duty just now stated, it is meet to call them City-Stewards,² but as regards the market, Market-Stewards, and as regards the temples, Priests. But let us not disturb those, with whom, as priests or priestesses, the sacred office is hereditary. But if, as is likely to happen to those first settled, nothing has been laid down respecting holy³ things of this kind in favour of any body or only a few, one must appoint priests and priestesses to be the cleansers of the temples of the gods. But of all these things some are to be in their appointment by election, and some by lot, through those that are and are not Wardsmen mingling in a friendly manner with each other in every district and town, in order that they may be as much as possible of one mind. To commit then what relates to sacred rites to the god himself, let it be an act of gratification to him, and to allow divine fortune to settle by lot. But the party who has happened to obtain the lot, (it is meet) to subject to a scrutiny first, whether he is of a sound body and lawfully begotten; next of a family as pure as possible, and unpolluted himself by blood and all crimes of such a kind against the gods, and whether his father and mother have lived in a similar manner. And it is meet to bring from Delphi the laws relating to all divine things, and, after appointing interpreters for them, to make use of them. And let the priestly office be for a year, and not longer; and let the person be not less than sixty years of age, who is, according to holy laws, to attend for us sufficiently to divine matters. And let there be the same¹ laws relating to priestesses. And let² the thrice four tribes bring (to the vote) thrice four interpreters,² each (one) from themselves; and after scrutinizing the three who have the greatest number of votes, (it is meet) to send the other nine to Delphi, for the god to designate by an oracle one out of each triad; and let the scrutiny relating to these, and their age, be as in the case of the priests,³ and let these be interpreters for life; and let the four⁴ wards⁵ elect in the place of him, who may have left (life), (another)⁶ from the ward where there is a deficiency. (It is meet) too to choose Stewards for the sacred money in each of the temples, with full powers over the sacred groves and their produce, and the leasing (of the property), and three for the largest temples out of those with the largest estates; but two for the smaller temples, and one for the most moderate;⁶ and let the choice and scrutiny of these be in the same manner as the election of the Generals was made. And let what relates to sacred things take place in this way.

¹ To avoid the strange notion of thus uniting human beings with the rest of wild beasts, Ast translates ἀνθρώπων καὶ τῶν ἄλλων θηρίων, "not only men, but wild beasts likewise." I suspect, however, that Plato wrote περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτ' ἀπανθρώπων τε καὶ τινῶν ἀνελευθέρων—For he had probably in mind the mutilation of the Hermæ, which took place at Athens at the hands of some persons not human and of a not gentlemanly conduct. In Greek, ἀνελεύθερος means frequently what is understood in English by "ungentlemanly." On the loss or corruption of ἀπανθρώπων see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 220.

² The officers called ἀστυνόμοι in Greece corresponded to those called Ædiles in Italy.

[8.] But let nothing be as far as possible without a guard.

¹ Ficinus has "eademque—statuta." For his MS. read not ταῦτα, but ταῦτά— Perhaps Plato wrote τὰ δ' αὐτὰ ταῦτα—"the very same laws."

²⁻² I have adopted, what Ast suggested, φερέωσαν μὲν τρεῖς τέτταρες αἱ τρεῖς τέτταρες φυλαὶ—in lieu of τρεῖς φερέωσαν μὲν αἱ τέτταρες φυλαὶ τέτταρες, for the parishes were twelve, and each parish had its own Interpreter on sacred matters. Ficinus too found something similar in his MS., as shown by his version, "interpretes autem ter quatuor ferant tribus ipsæ quatuor, ex earum ordine unaquæque tres." But why Plato should thus employ τρεῖς τέτταρες instead of δώδεκα I confess I cannot explain.

³ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, "qualis et sacerdotum dicta est," as if his MS. read καθάπερ εἶρηται καὶ περὶ τῶν ἱερῶν.

⁴ Ast would expunge τέτταρες, or read as before αἱ τρεῖς τέτταρες. Cousin renders αἱ τέτταρες φυλαὶ by "les tribus, divisées quatre par quatre."

⁵⁻⁶ The Greek is τὸν δὲ γε λιπόντα προαιρεσθῶσαν—where must be supplied βίον after λιπόντα, and ἕτερον after προαιρεσθῶσαν, to suit the sense in the version of Ficinus, "et in defuncti vicem—aliū eligant." But even thus the syntax would be incorrect, which would require ἀντὶ τοῦ λιπόντος—

⁶ So Ast translates ἡμελείστατα. Ficinus, as usual in doubtful passages, employs two words, "mediis maximeque concinnis."

Let the guards of the city be in this way, through the Generals, and Taxiarchs, and Hipparchs, and Phylarchs, and the Prytanes, and moreover the City-Stewards and Market-Stewards, attending to their (respective) duties, after they have been chosen and appointed sufficiently; but the whole of the rest of the country (it is meet) to guard in this way. The whole country has been divided by us into twelve parts as nearly as possible equal. Let then, one Phylé (ward), after being allotted to each portion, furnish for the year five, as it were, Rural-Stewards and Phylarchs.¹ And let it be for these to choose, each of ²the five,² out of their own Phylé, twelve from the young men not less than five-and-twenty years of age, and not more than thirty. To these let there be allotted portions of the country during a month, each for each, so that all of them may have a practical knowledge of every part of the country. But let the government and guardianship continue to the guards and governors for two years; and let those, who³ first obtain by lot their respective portions, the guard-officers lead out, changing the places of the country constantly, (by going) ⁴to the place next in order towards⁴ the right in a circle, and let the right be that which is in the east. But as the year comes round, in the second year,⁵ in order that the greatest portion of the guards may become acquainted with the country, not only during one season of the year, but that as many as possible may know thoroughly, in addition to the country, at the same time what occurs relating to each spot in the country at each season, let the then ¹ Cousin, and after him, C. F. Hermann, would read Φρουράρχους instead of Φυλάρχους, as shown by ἀγρονόμους—καὶ φρουράρχους, shortly afterwards. And so too Sydenham in Not. MSS.

²⁻³ Ficinus omits τῶν πέντε—and so after him did Taylor.

³ Ast renders ὅπως ἀν—“quomodocunque—” For he did not perceive that Plato wrote ὅροις ἀν—where ὅροις, Attic for οἰσισι, depends upon ἡγεῖσθαι a little below, and ὅροις is put by attraction for τισιν, οἱ—On similar errors arising from ὅρων and ὅροις being corrupted into ὅπως, see myself on Æsch. Eum. 282.

⁴⁻⁵ Bekker, whom Ast and Stalbaum follow, has edited tacitly τὸν ἐξῆς τόπον instead of τῶν ἐξῆς τόπων, which Stephens had preserved from Ald., for he doubtless knew that μεταλλάττειν is united to an accusative and genitive, and not to two accusatives; or else we must read αἰ ἐπὶ τὸν—ἐξῆς—ἡγεῖσθαι—as I have translated: for ἐπὶ might easily have dropt out between αἰ and τὸν—

⁵ This use of ἐν after ἐνιαυτοῦ seems to be supported by ἐν ὥραις ἐτῶν καὶ ἐνιαυτῶν in Rep. x. p. 906, C.

officers lead them out again to the left, ¹ constantly changing the place, until they go through the second year.¹ In the third year, (it is meet) to choose other Rural-Stewards and guard-officers as the five curators of the twelve young men; and in their occupations attention should be given of some such kind as this to each place. First that the country may be as much as possible well fortified against the enemy, ² by trenching and digging out² wherever it is requisite, and with buildings restraining, as far as they can, those endeavouring to injure in any way the country and its possessions; and by making use of animals under the yoke, and the servants in each place, for these purposes, ³ doing through them, standing over them, selecting as much as possible their own employment in their own works,³ to render every place difficult for the enemy to pass, but as easy as possible for friends, and animals under the yoke and cattle; and by taking care ⁴ of the roads that they may be in the most quiet state,⁴ and of the waters from Zeus,⁵ that they may not injure the country, but benefit it rather, when descending from high grounds into hollow places in the mountains,⁶ and by restraining the outlets of the waters with buildings and ditches, such hollows may, by receiving and drinking up the waters from Zeus, produce streams and fountains for the fields below them and for all places,⁷ and thus cause the

²—² Ficinus has "foveis—effossis," as if his MS. omitted καὶ προσκάπροντας, an evident explanation of ταφρεύοντας.

³—³ Such is the literal translation of the text. How much more elegant is the version of Ficinus, adopted to the letter by Taylor, "ad hæc utique facienda subjugalibus servisque indigenis utantur, quando minime in suis operibus occupantur, nonnullos ipsis præficientes—" From whence it is evident that in his MS. some words were transposed, and others, in which the difficulty lies, omitted. Plato wrote, I suspect, something to this effect, χωρμένους—πρὸς ταῦτα τῶν οἰκείων ἔργων ἐνιαυτοῦ ἐναργίαις ὅτι μάλιστα ἐκλυομένοις, ἃ δὲ δόκνως ποιοῦντας αὐτοὺς, ἐκίνοις τε ἐπιστατοῦντας—"employing for these purposes (those), when released during the idle time of the year from their own occupations, and doing themselves what is requisite, and superintending the others unhesitatingly." It is not then without some advantage that one MS. omits αὐτῶν, and another reads ἐκλεγομένοις and four ἐν τοῖς—

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁵ So rain water was called. Hence the title of Ζεὺς ὀμβριος.

⁶ Such hollow places are frequent in all mountainous districts.

⁷ I cannot believe that Plato wrote ἀγροῖς τε καὶ τόποις πᾶσι. Ficinus most dry places to possess water plentiful and good. And let them, by ornamenting the water from fountains, whether it is a river or its source, with plantations and buildings,¹ render it more beautiful, and bringing all the streams together make them abundant by means of ²mine-like tunnels and surface-irrigations, according to each season,³ if perchance there may have been a grove or sacred precinct about those very streams dedicated to a deity,³ and by sending which⁴ to those spots they may adorn the holy places of the gods.⁵ By all means too in spots of this kind it is necessary for youths to fit up places for naked exercises for themselves, and old men's baths, and has "inferioribus locis agrisque omnibus." But though this is somewhat less objectionable, yet τόποις would hardly thus precede the repeated τόπους. I should prefer πίστρους, "water-troughs." Compare Eurip. Cycl. 45, ποιητὰ βοτάνη, δινῶν θ' ὕδωρ ποταμῶν ἐν τίστραϊς κείται.

¹ Juvenal, however, in ii. 18, objects to the buildings placed round the fountain of Egeria, which he says was more beautiful in its natural state than when decked with marble. Plato had probably in mind the fountain of Callirhoë at Athens, which was built over by the Peisistratidæ, as we learn from Thucyd. ii. 15.

² Such seems to be the meaning of μεταλλείαις—ὕδρειαίς τε καθ' ἐκάστας τὰς ὥρας, where Bekker, whom Stalbaum follows, has edited ὕδρειαίς τε, which I confess I cannot understand; and still less καθ' ἐκάστας τὰς ὥρας: as if irrigations took place at any fixed season. Hence I suspect that Plato wrote συνάγοντες εἰς μισγαγκείας νάματα πάντα, ἀφθονὰ ποιῶσιν εἰς ὕδρειαίς τὰς κατὰ κανονικὰς τὰς ὥρας. For thus there would be an allusion to the Homeric μισγάγκεια, and to the line of another poet, Ἐς μισγάγκειαν συνάγοντες νάματα πάντα, and the irrigations be said to take place, as they should, during seasons of excessive heat. Ficinus, unable, it would seem, to translate the whole passage literally, has thought proper to remodel it—"lucos quin etiam jugi irrigatione et dedicatos Diis agros aquis immissis pinguefacere curent et metallis humorem scatebrasque adhibeant," omitting entirely καθ' ἐκάστας τὰς ὥρας.

³ Instead of ἀφιμένον, defended by Winckelmann on Plutarch Erotic. p. 230, Ast suggested ἀνιμένον, which he doubtless got from "dedicatos" in Ficinus. But ἀνιμένος neither is, nor could be, applied in this sense to a thing, only to a person or animal. Hence I should prefer καθημένον, "situated—" Sydenham in Not. MSS. suggested ἀφιδρυμένον—

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were, not ρέυματα ἀφιέντες εἰς αὐτὰ, but ρέυματα, ἃ ἐφιέντες εἰς αὐτὰ, where ἃ refers to ρέυματα, and αὐτὰ to ἄλλος ἢ τίς.

⁵ Plato seems to have had in mind the celebrated passage in the Hippolytus of Euripides, as supplied by myself in The Surplice, No. 22 Αἰδῶς δὲ ποταμίαισιν οὐ πλημμυρίσιν ἄλλ' ἄλλος ἀμιάντοισι κηπεύ. δρόσοις.

making them warm for the aged, by placing wood ¹dry and dry¹ for the benefit of those labouring under diseases, ²and receiving kindly bodies worn down by rustic labours, and a habit (of body) much better than that of a medical practitioner not very skilful.²

[9.] All these things then, and of this kind, would be to such places an ornament and use, in conjunction with sport by no means unpleasant. But let the serious attention relating to these things be this.—Let the sixty³ defend, each their own place, not only on account of enemies, but for the sake of those, who call themselves friends. But if any one, whether he is a slave or a free-man, injure his neighbour, or any other citizen, let those five rulers act as judges in the case of the party asserting that he has been injured, with respect to trifling matters; but where one person brings a charge against another on greater matters, let the seventeen, together with the twelve, on questions up to three minæ. No judge or magistrate ought to be exempt from giving an account of his conduct as judge or magistrate, except such as, like kings, put the finish to suits. Moreover as regards the Rural-Stewards if they behave insolently to those, of whom they are the guardians, by enjoining unequal tasks, or by attempting to seize and carry off any thing from those, employed in agriculture, not having previously persuaded them (to give it up); and if they receive aught from those, who offer it to curry favour; or if they give their decisions unjustly, through yielding to adulation; let them bear off as their reward the reproach of the whole state. But for the other wrongs, which they may

¹—¹ That Plato wrote αὔην καὶ ξηρὰν no man can for a moment believe. One word is plainly enough an explanation of the other; but which is which it is impossible to decide. Ficinus has “copiose siccia,” answering to αὔην or ξηρὰν—ἄφθονον, but not to both.

²—² Such is the literal translation of a mass of Greek words, where Stephens confesses himself to be quite in the dark; and so too am I; although Ast conceived he had restored the passage by simply omitting δ' between ἰατροῦ and ἔξιν. But Winckelmann would read δέξιν, to correspond with δεχομένους, and similar to Δεξιόμεθα δέξιν, ἥν σε δέξασθαι χρεών, in Eurip. Iph. 1182. Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, “ut et remedium ægrotantibus, et lenimen labore defessis benevole afferatur; quæ sane curatio longe melior est quam medici parum periti medela.”

³ “The sixty” are made of the five Rural-Stewards, which each of the twelve wards is supposed to have chosen in § 8.

do to those in their district, let them voluntarily undergo a fine, as far as one mina, imposed by the villagers and neighbours. But for greater or smaller injuries, on each occasion, if they are not willing to pay, through their trusting to being removed monthly to another place, and thus escaping, although pursued by law, in such cases the injured party is to have the chance of a trial at common law; and if he obtains a verdict, let him demand of the defendant to pay ¹ a double fine, ¹ and ² having been unwilling, ² to undergo punishment willingly.

And let the rulers and the Rural-Stewards have their dietary for the space of two years in some such manner as this. First let there be in the different places a common table, ³ ⁴ [at which they must all make a common table]. ⁴ And let the person, who is absent from table, and sleeps out for one day or night, without orders from the rulers, or ⁵ some every necessity ⁵ falling upon him, if the five inform against him, and, after writing the indictment, place it in the market-place, to the effect that he has broken through his guardianship, let him bear the disgrace of having on his part betrayed the constitution, and be chastised with stripes by any one, who meets him, and is willing (to do so) with impunity. And if any one of the rulers themselves is doing any thing of this kind himself, it is necessary for all the sixty to direct their care to such ¹—¹ By "a double fine" is meant the double of what the defendant would otherwise have paid, had he not compelled the plaintiff to sue him. This double sum was no doubt ordained to prevent defendants from compelling plaintiffs to undergo the expense of a lawsuit to obtain justice. For a similar reason in England a verdict in favour of the plaintiff generally carries with it costs. See Taylor on Lysias, T. v. p. 34, R.

²—² The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor; for they were perhaps considered unintelligible by them, as they certainly are by me. I could have understood ὥς μὴ ἐθελήσαντα υποσχεῖν, ἣν ἐκόντ' ἔδει, τιμωρίαν, "as not having been willing to undergo the punishment, which he should have done willingly." There are indeed a few passages in Sophocles and Xenophon that seem to give some support to the common text here; but they only seem; for they are in reality corrupt, as I could easily show, were this the place for doing so.

³ Plato in his Συσσίτια has adopted what took place at Sparta.

⁴—⁴ All the words between the brackets are omitted by Ficinus, whom Taylor has followed, correctly; for they are evidently an explanation of εἶναι συσσίτια.

⁵—⁵ The Greek is πάσης τινος ἀνάγκης. But though πᾶσα ἀνάγκη is perfectly correct, πᾶσά τις ἀνάγκη is by no means so. Plato wrote, I suspect, ἐκ βίας ἢ τινος ἀνάγκης, i. e. "by force, or some necessity."

a person; and let him who perceives or hears of it, but does not bring him to trial, be amenable to the same laws¹ (as the party offending);¹ and let him be punished with a greater fine than the young men,² (and)³ be held dishonoured with respect to all the rule over young men.
